It is therefore clear that the old process would produce only one half the amount of glycerine reported by the master and stated in table B; and that the sum of $61,701.77, at which the master has arrived by deducting from $103,143.03, the value of 65,312 barrels of glycerine water obtained under the new process, $41,441.26, the value of 130,624 barrels, as obtainable under the old process, must be increased by adding half of the amount deducted, or $20,720.63.

The findings of the master, upon which he bases his conclusion of the amount of loss of fatty acids in using the plaintiff's invention as compared with the old process, are shown by the following extracts from his report:

"It does not appear that saponification by water alone in such digesters" as the defendants used "had been regularly employed by any one; but the testimony shows that" those who tried to do so, under licenses from the plaintiff, "all became satisfied that a satisfactory result could not be secured by that process alone, and found it necessary to employ some additional agency to secure complete saponification at safe pressures within reasonable time."

"During the period of this accounting, the respondents used one per cent of lime and a second charge of water, completing the process in about nine and a half hours, at a pressure of about 225 pounds. With these two modifications, both of which are shown by the evidence to be efficient, a good quality of fatty acids was obtained, though not fully equal to that obtained by lime saponification."

"The fatty acid product obtained by the respondents, operating in their digesters for nine and a half hours, at an average pressure of 225 pounds, by the action of water alone, was inferior in value to the product of lime saponification."

"The experiments made pending the hearing before the master, at 225 pounds pressure, without lime or change of water, yielded products containing an average of 92.5 per cent of fatty acids."

"As compared with the result of lime saponification, the experiments at 225 pounds pressure show a loss of 6 pounds of free fatty acids for each hundred pounds of fat treated, and an admixture of undecomposed fat seriously affecting the value of the product." "The fatty acids were worth at least 9 cents per pound, making the direct loss of fatty acids not less than 54 cents upon each hundred pounds of fat treated."

"There is no testimony from which the master can determine to what extent the value of fatty acids actually obtained was affected by the admixture of undecomposed fat, and no allowance has been made therefor."

"During the period of infringement, the respondents treated 23,822,777 pounds of fat in their digesters with one per cent of lime. The evidence shows that 11¼ pounds of lime completely saponify 100 pounds of fat, in close digesters, under pressure;" and "in the process employed by the respondents 2,028,024 pounds of the fat treated by them were converted into lime soap by the action of lime; and 21,294,753 pounds were converted into a fatty acid mixture, containing 92.5 per cent of free fatty acids, by the action of water, the further decomposition of such mixture being effected by modifications of the complainant's process."

Upon comparing the master's report with the evidence, we are unable to accept his conclusion upon this part of the case.

Much of the testimony on which he chiefly relies was in the record upon which the case had been previously heard before this court, having been introduced to support the objection that the particular apparatus described in the plaintiff's patent for carrying the process into effect could not be operated to produce any useful result, of which the court then said: "We have examined the evidence on this point, and are satisfied that it shows the objection to be unfounded." 102 U. S. 730 [26:288]. Under these circumstances, the master appears to us to have given too much weight to this, as contrasted with the other testimony in the original record, although it is quite true, as argued by the defendants, that the question of the practical economy of the patented process, as compared either with older processes, or with the subsequent modifications used by the defendants, is distinct from the questions of utility and infringement heretofore determined.

The testimony of experts since taken, and the tables of experiments made by them pending the hearing before the master, are quite unsatisfactory, for reasons fully set forth in the brief for the plaintiff, which it would take too much space to recapitulate.

Apart from these considerations, and even assuming that the master is right in reporting that the modifications of using one per cent of lime and two charges of water, made by the defendants in the plaintiff's process, are shown to have been efficient, and that the defendants, in accounting with the plaintiff for the profits made by them from the use of his invention, are entitled to be allowed for the effect of such modifications, the evidence wholly fails to support the master's conclusion that in the use of the plaintiff's process, without addition of lime or change of water, as compared with the lime saponification process, there is a loss of 6 pounds of free fatty acids for each hundred pounds of fat treated; or to show that there has been any loss of free fatty acids which affects the value of the product.

The master's conclusion is based upon the finding that the product of the patented process, without modification, contains only 92½ per cent of free fatty acids, and upon the hypothesis that the product of the old process contained 98½ per cent.

But there is no proof whatever that there was any such difference in the result of the two processes, or that the product of the old process contained 98½ per cent of fatty acid. No chemical analysis of the product of the old process appears to have been made. The defendants' own experts testify that the highest possible amount of fat acid in pure tallow is only 95 and a fraction per cent. And two of the defendants, as well as Ropes, one of the witnesses on whom the master relies, and Verdin, a partner of Mitchell, testify that in using the old process the whole average product was 95 per cent of the amount of fat treated.

The testimony of one of the defendants, James Gamble, who had been forty years in the business, and was examined as a witness in their behalf, clearly exhibits his general impression as a practical manufacturer, not only that the product of the old process was not more than 95 per cent of fatty acid, but also that there was no comparative loss of fatty acid by Tilghman's process. On cross examination he testified as follows:

"14. Was there more or less fatty acid obtained by the old process used by you prior to 1858 than by the process used by you since 1870? Ans. I think there would be no difference if the fatty acid from the tank in the new process is well settled, but it won't settle as well as in the old. In actual practice, there is more weight in the product of the new process, as it contains more sediment than from the old; but I think the amount of fatty acids in each is the same."

Upon the direct examination being resumed, he further testified:

"16. Do you know how many pounds of fatty acids were practically produced from 100 pounds of fat treated by the old saponification process used by you prior to 1858? Ans. We always made a calculation of 95 pounds, but I cannot say more than that.

"17. Do you know how many pounds of fatty acids were practically produced from 100 pounds of fat treated by the process used by you from 1870 to 1875? Ans. We calculated the same.

"18. Was this calculation or estimate founded upon any tests made by your firm or under their direction? Ans. No, sir. I do not think a test practicable; it is no more than guesswork.

"19. So far as you have any actual knowledge, there may have been a difference in the weight of fatty acids produced from 100 pounds of fat treated by the old saponification process, and the process as used by you from 1870 to 1875, may there not? Ans. I think when we have examined and find the lime all clear of the acids, the product in each case must be the same, except as to the sediment remaining in the tank stock."

The great preponderance of the evidence is to the effect that the product of the plaintiff's process, using water alone and all at one time, would contain as much as 95 per cent of free fatty acids. Even the defendants' principal expert, in an experiment testified to by him, and stated in his table, obtained that proportion by the use of equal quantities of water and of fat, without lime or change of water, under a treatment for nine hours at 225 pounds of pressure.

Moreover, the real question is not of the exact quantity of fatty acid, as proved by chemical tests, contained in the two products, but whether the one is as good as the other for use in the manufacture of candles. The defendants' testimony shows that manufacturers always test the fitness of the product for that use by pressure with the thumb, and never by chemical analysis; and upon all the evidence there can be no doubt that a difference between 95 and 92½ per cent in the proportion of fatty acids does not affect the commercial or practical value of the product.

From these considerations, it follows that nothing is to be deducted for a loss in fatty acids, and that to the amount of $182,781.46, saved in chemicals, and $61,701.77, gained in glycerine water, as reported by the master, there is to be added $1,000 for his mistake in adding up the items of chemicals, and $20,720.63 for his error in computing the amount of glycerine water, making a total amount of $266,153.86.

This result is arrived at by taking the amount of savings in chemicals, as found by the master, which the defendants produced no evidence to control, and which is less than such savings if computed by the standard of their own use under the two processes; then adding the amount gained in glycerine water, as appearing by the facts stated in the master's report or testified to by the defendants themselves, correcting only a clear error in the master's computation; and rejecting the deduction made by the master on account of a supposed loss of fatty acids in using the plaintiff's invention as compared with the old process, because the evidence returned with the master's report is quite inconsistent with the theory that there was any loss in this respect.

The only exception of any importance, not disposed of or rendered immaterial by what has been already said, is the exception of the plaintiff to the refusal of the master to allow interest on profits before the date of his report.

If the question thus presented were a new one, it would require grave consideration. But by a uniform current of decisions of this court, beginning thirty years ago, the profits allowed in equity, for the injury that a patentee has sustained by the infringement of his patent, have been considered as a measure of unliquidated damages which, as a general rule, and in the absence of special circumstances, do not bear interest until after their amount has been judicially ascertained; and the provision introduced in the Patent Act of 1870, regulating the subject of profits and damages, made no mention of interest, and has not been understood to affect the rule as previously announced. Silsby v. Foote, 61 U. S. 20 How. 378, 387 [15:953,956]; Mowry v. Whitney, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 620, 651 [20:860,866]; Littlefield v. Perry, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 205, 229 [22:577, 581]; Act July 8, 1870, chap 230, § 55, 16 Stat. at L. 206; Rev. Stat. § 4921; Parks v. Booth, 102 U. S. 96, 106 [26:54,58]; Root v. R. Co. 105 U. S. 189, 198, 200, 204 [26:975,978-980]; Illinois Cent R. R. v. Turrill, 110 U. S. 301, 303 [28:154,155]. Nothing is shown to take this case out of the general rule. At the time of the infringement, the fundamental questions of the validity and extent of Tilghman's patent were in earnest controversy and of uncertain issue. Interest should therefore be allowed, as in Illinois Central Railroad v. Turrill, just cited, only from the day when the master's report was submitted to the court (which appears, by the terms of his report and of the decree below, to have been October 7, 1884), upon the amount shown to be due by that report and the accompanying evidence.

Decree reversed, and case remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to enter a decree for the plaintiff for the sum of $266,153.86, with interest from October 7, 1884, and costs.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite dissented.

Mr. Justice Matthews did not sit in this case or take any part in the decision.

JOHN F. HARTRANFT Collector of Customs for the DISTRICT OF PHILADELPHIA, Plff. in Err.,

v.

ABRAM M. LANGFELD, ET AL., Trading as LANGFELD, LICHTEN & CO.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 128-136.)

Duty on velvet ribbons—exception, when not sustained—statute—predominant use.

1. Velvet ribbons of silk and cotton, of which silk is the material of chief value, which are trimmings chiefly used for making or ornamenting hats, bonnets and hoods, pay a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem under schedule M of the Act of March 3, 1883, 22 Stat. at L. 512.

2. An exception, founded upon an entire misconception of the charge of the court, is not well taken.

3. A criticism, by way of objection to a part of a charge, which is hypercritical, will not be sustained.

4. Where the duty upon an article is specially provided for by a section of a statute, it is excluded from the operation of other sections.

5. It is the predominant use to which articles are applied that determines their character, within the meaning of the above mentioned clause of the Tariff Act.

[No. 750.]

Argued Feb. 15, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, to review a judgment against the Collector, in favor of importers, for an illegal excess of duties exacted. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for plaintiff in error:

Mr. Joseph H. Choate, Henry Edwin Tremain, Mason W. Tyler and H. T. Kingston, for defendants in error:

This court has interpreted the tariff paragraph under examination.

Arthur v. Zimmerman, 96 U. S. 124 (24: 770).

The commercial meaning of the words of the section does not differ from the ordinary import of the words employed by Congress. It follows that their interpretation is within judicial knowledge and, therefore, matter of law. Marvel v. Merritt, 116 U. S. 12 (29: 550); Swan v. Arthur, 108 U. S. 597 (26: 526); Greenleaf v. Goodrich, 101 U. S. 284 (25: 847); Maillard v. Lawrence, 57 U. S. 16 How. 251 (14: 925).

This court, in the case of Arthur v. Sussfield, 96 U. S. 128 (24: 772), has held that such clauses as this hat-material clause are clauses of special enumeration and provision, within the meaning of the Tariff Acts.

Arthur v. Zimmerman, 96 U. S. 124 (24: 770); Arthur v. Lahey, 96 U. S. 118 (24: 766); Smith v. Field, 105 U. S. 52 (26: 1007); Schmieder v. Barney, 113 U. S. 645 (28: 1130).

This is not a case where the commercial designation of the article fixes its character for the purpose of the Tariff Law.

Arthur v. Unkart, 96 U. S. 118 (24: 768); Arthur v. Moller, 97 U. S. 865 (24: 1046); Victor v. Arthur, 104 U. S. 498 (26: 833); Barber v. Schell, 107 U. S. 617 (27: 490); Drew v. Grinnell, 115 U. S. 477 (29: 453); Newman v. Arthur, 109 U. S. 133 (27: 884); Arthur v. Morrison, 96 U. S. 108 (24: 764); Marvel v. Merritt, 116 U. S. 11 (29: 550).

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action against the Collector of the Port of Philadelphia by importers, to recover an alleged illegal excess of duties exacted by and paid to him. There was a verdict for $856.56 in favor of the plaintiffs, and judgment rendered thereon, to reverse which this writ of error is prosecuted.

The goods which were the subject of the duty were velvet ribbons made of silk and cotton, of which silk was the material of chief value. The custom house officers assessed upon them a duty of 50 per centum ad valorem under the last paragraph of schedule L of the Act of March 3, 1883, 22 U. S. Stat. at L. 510, which reads as follows: "All goods, wares and merchandise not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act, made of silk, or of which silk is the component material of chief value, fifty per centum ad valorem." The plaintiffs claimed, and the jury found, under the instructions of the court, that the duty should have been assessed under the following paragraph of schedule M of the same Act, 22 U. S. Stat. at L. 512.

"Hats and so forth, materials for: braids, plaits, flats, laces, trimmings, tissues, willow-sheets, and squares, used for making or ornamenting hats, bonnets, and hoods, composed of straw, chip, grass, palm leaf, willow, hair, whalebone, or any other substance or material not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act, twenty per centum ad valorem."

A bill of exceptions sets out all the evidence in the cause, together with the charge of the court to the jury, and instructions asked for by counsel on both sides, respectively, with the exceptions to certain parts of the charge as given and to the refusal of the court to charge as requested by counsel for the defendant.

It appears from the evidence that the goods in question were "trimmings," and that they were "used for making or ornamenting hats, bonnets, and hoods." That they were "trimmings" was not a matter of controversy; all the witnesses on both sides spoke of them as such. Neither was it disputed that they were "used for making or ornamenting hats, bonnets, and hoods," but there was no evidence that they were used exclusively for that purpose. The testimony on the part of the plaintiffs tended to show that they were chiefly used for making or ornamenting hats, bonnets, and hoods, but that they also might be, and sometimes were, used for trimming dresses. The testimony on the part of the defendant tended to show that they were dress trimmings equally with hat trimmings, and were commonly used as much for the one purpose as the other. In this state of the proof the judge charged the jury as follows:

"It is the use to which these articles are chiefly adapted, and for which they are used, that determines their character within the meaning of this clause of the Tariff Act. It would in my judgment be a fair construction of the meaning of this Act to say that because certain articles are indifferently adapted for use for different purposes either of these purposes may determine the rate of duty. It is the predominant use to which articles are applied that determines their character. It certainly could not have been the intention of Congress in framing this clause of the law to admit the importation, at a low rate of duty, of articles which may be used for certain purposes, but which are used chiefly for another and different purpose.

"You will therefore determine to which use these articles in question are chiefly devoted. If they are hat trimmings, and used for making and ornamenting hats, then the rate of duty imposed was excessive, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover the excess.

"If, however, in the determination of this question of fact, you find the articles to be chiefly used for other purposes, you will find for the defendant. The question is simply and purely one of fact; namely, what is the predominant use to which these articles are devoted. As you determine that question you will return your verdict."

The plaintiffs had requested the judge to charge the jury as follows:

"1. That if the jury find the goods in question are used for making or ornamenting hats, their verdict should be for plaintiffs.

"II. That where the articles are named or described in one section of the Tariff Act and a duty so imposed thereon, general terms in the same Act, although sufficient to comprehend such articles, by which a higher rate of duty is fixed, are not applicable to it, and will not prevail to make such higher rate of duty; and, that if the jury find the goods in question are hat trimmings used for making or ornamenting hats, and also find that silk is the component material of chief value, the verdict should be for the plaintiffs.

"III. That the clause imposing a duty on hat trimmings being subsequent in the Act to the clause imposing a duty on articles of which silk is the component material of chief value, if the jury find the goods are hat trimmings used for making or ornamenting hats, and also that they are articles of which silk is the component material of chief value, that the subsequent clause imposing the duty at twenty per cent should be taken as showing the latest and final intent of the law-makers, and the verdict should be for the plaintiffs.

"IV. That if the jury find the goods in question are known and used as hat trimmings, used for making or ornamenting hats, although they may be used from time to time for other purposes, their verdict should be for the plaintiffs."

In reply to these requests the judge said to the jury as follows:

"1. If the evidence shows that the goods upon which the duty was charged are adapted to use and are used for various purposes other than for trimming hats, the jury must be satisfied that the use to which they are chiefly applicable and for which they were employed was in making or ornamenting hats, to bring them within the scope of the clause of the Tariff Act imposing a duty of twenty per cent.

"2, 3 and 4. Subject to the qualifications stated in the foregoing answer to the first point, the three remaining points are affirmed."

The counsel for the defendant requested the judge to charge the jury as follows:

"I. That if the jury should find that the goods in question are not specially enumerated or provided for, and that silk is the component material of chief value, then the rate of duty should be fifty per centum ad valorem, and your verdict should be for the defendant.

"II. That if the jury should find that silk is the component material of chief value of the goods in question, and that they are suitable for and are occasionally used for hat trimmings, but that they are generally used for other purposes, then, as they are not exclusively or specially used for hat trimmings, they cannot be said to be 'used for making or ornamenting hats' within the meaning of the Act of Congress so as to subject them to a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem, and your verdict should be for the defendant.

"III. That if the jury should find that the goods in question can properly be classified under schedule M, Act March 8, 1883, as 'trimmings used for making or ornamenting hats,' not specially enumerated or provided for in said Act, and subject to a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem, and can also properly be classified as goods not specially enumerated or provided for, of which silk is the component material of chief value, and subject to a duty of fifty per centum ad valorem, then, as two rates of duty are applicable to the goods, they should be classified as subject to a duty of fifty per centum, as this is the higher rate, and your verdict should be for the defendant.

"IV. That unless the jury should find that the goods in question are not specially provided for, and that by their style and character they are fitted only for use for making or ornamenting hats, then your verdict should be for the defendant."

The court declined to give these instructions and the counsel for the defendant excepted as follows:

1. Because the judge declined to charge as requested in defendant's first, second, and fourth points, stating that those points were substantially covered by the answers to the plaintiff's points.

2. Because the judge declined to charge as requested in the defendant's third point.

3. Because the judge charged the jury that "If the evidence shows that the goods upon which the duty was charged are adapted to use and are used for various purposes other than for trimming hats, the jury must be satisfied that the use to which they are chiefly applicable and for which they are employed was in making or ornamenting hats, to bring them within the scope of the clause of the Tariff Act imposing a duty of twenty per cent." And that, "subject to the qualifications stated in the foregoing answer to the first point, the three remaining points are affirmed."

In support of these exceptions, it is argued by the solicitor-general, that the charge of the court and the answers to the points of instruction requested by the respective counsel, misled the jury from the real point involved in the case to a foreign issue, by substantially instructing it, that the inquiry was whether these materials had a predominant use for making and ornamenting hats, bonnets, and hoods; whereas, the true construction of the statute required that the inquiry, which should have been submitted to the jury, was whether the materials imported were "braids, plaits, flats, laces, trimmings, willow-sheets and squares, * * * composed of straw, chip, * * * used for making or ornamenting hats, bonnets, and hoods." The instruction of the court, it is said, was that any material, of which the predominant use was for the making or ornamenting of hats, bonnets, and hoods, not specially provided for, should be classified under this clause. It is contended that "The true construction is that the use of the material must not only be for making and ornamenting hats, bonnets, and hoods, but it must be in some of the forms fixed in the statute; that is, in the form of either 'braids, plaits, flats, laces, trimmings, tissues, willow-sheets, or squares.'"

But this is an entire misconception of the charge of the court. There was no controversy in the evidence as to whether these velvet ribbons were or were not "trimmings." All the witnesses agreed that they were; it was so assumed throughout the case; it was expressly stated in the charge of the court to the jury that they must be "trimmings" within the sense of the section in order to justify a recovery. The court said expressly in its charge: "If they are hat trimmings, and used for making and ornamenting hats, then the rate of duty imposed was excessive, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover the excess." This necessarily implied that if they were not hat trimmings, the plaintiffs could not recover; and also that even if they were hat trimmings, but were not chiefly used for making and ornamenting hats, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to recover, because in the sentence immediately preceding in the charge, the court had said to the jury: "You will, therefore, determine to which use these articles in question are chiefly devoted." What the court charged the jury, therefore, was that in order to entitle the plaintiffs to recover, they must find that the velvet ribbons in question were "trimmings" used for making and ornamenting hats, and that they were "chiefly" used for that purpose. The jury were told: "If, however, in the determination of this question of fact, you find the articles to be chiefly used for other purposes, you will find for the defendant. The question is simply and purely one of fact, namely, What is the predominant use to which these articles are devoted? As you determine that question, you will return your verdict." The objection, therefore, to the charge of the court, that it would have authorized a recovery if the goods in question were materials used for making or ornamenting hats, although not coming within the enumeration of the section as "braids, plaits, flats, laces, trimmings, tissues, willow-sheets and squares," is not well taken.

The court in fact did instruct the jury that they must find the goods in question to be "trimmings" chiefly used for making and ornamenting hats, bonnets, and hoods, composed of a material not otherwise specially enumerated or provided for. It is not suggested that the velvet ribbons are specially mentioned as subject to a duty by that name or description. It is true that there was no evidence showing that the exclusive commercial designation of such velvet ribbons was "trimmings," but all the witnesses spoke of the velvet ribbons in question as "trimmings," manifestly according to the natural meaning of the word, and because they were used to trim either hats or dresses; the real controversy being for which purpose as "trimmings" they were principally used.

A further criticism, by way of objection, is made to that part of the charge excepted to wherein the judge states that "the jury must be satisfied that the use to which they (the goods) are chiefly applicable, and for which they were employed, was in making or ornamenting hats," etc. The point of this criticism is that the language, "and for which they were employed," "would require the Collector to suspend the assessment until he should know how the goods were used or employed. That use or employment of the goods might not take place for years after the importation was made. The law clearly did not intend the classification should be required to await such an uncertain event." This is hypercritical. The language does not admit of any such instruction. It means for which they were habitually employed, or customarily employed, or usually employed, and not "for which they had been employed." It is impossible that any jury could have otherwise understood the instruction.

The remaining exception was on account of the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as requested by the counsel for the defendant in the third point, viz: "That if the jury should find that the goods in question can properly be classified under schedule M, Act March 3, 1883, as 'trimmings used for making or ornamenting hats,' not specially enumerated or provided for in said Act, and subject to a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem, and can also properly be classified as goods not specially enumerated or provided for, of which silk is the component material of chief value, and subject to a duty of fifty per centum ad valorem, then, as two rates of duty are applicable to the goods, they should be classified as subject to a duty of fifty per centum, as this is the higher rate, and your verdict should be for the defendant." The section of the Revised Statutes upon which this instruction was framed is section 2499, which provides: "If any nonenumerated article equally resembles two or more enumerated articles on which different rates of duty are chargeable, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on such nonenumerated article the same rate of duty as is chargeable on the article which it resembles paying the highest duty." The principle of this section, however, is not applicable to the circumstances of this case. The velvet ribbons were found by the jury to be trimmings chiefly used for making or ornamenting hats; that brought them within the operation of schedule M of the Act of March 3, 1883, fixing the duty at twenty per centum ad valorem; and being specially provided for by that section, they were excluded from the operation of all others.

The contention which appears to have been made on behalf of the government on the trial of the cause, that these velvet ribbons could not be classified as trimmings used for making or ornamenting hats, bonnets, and hoods, within the meaning of the section levying the duty of twenty per centum ad valorem, unless they were shown to have been used exclusively for that purpose, is not insisted upon by the solicitor-general in this court. It was very properly abandoned, the charge of the court upon that point being, in our opinion, clearly right.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is accordingly affirmed.

JACOB KREIGER, Plff. in Err.,

v.

SHELBY RAILROAD COMPANY, The SHELBY R. R. DIST. OF SHELBY COUNTY, JAMES P. FOREE ET AL.

JACOB KREIGER ET AL., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

SHELBY R. R. CO., A. P. CARRITHERS ET AL.

JACOB KREIGER ET AL., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

SHELBY RAILROAD COMPANY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 39-46.)

Jurisdiction to review state judgment—opinions of state courts.

1. In order to give jurisdiction to this court to review a judgment of a state court, it must appear that the state court gave effect to the statute which, it is alleged, impaired the obligation of the contract.
2. Where the statutes of a State require that written opinions be delivered by its highest court in all cases, and that they be recorded, this court may examine the opinions so delivered and recorded, to ascertain the grounds of the judgment of the state court.

[Nos. 948, 949, 950.]

Submitted Dec. 12, 1887. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky, to review judgments of that Court affirming the judgments of a lower court of the State, that the Shelby Railroad District was entitled to vote upon stock. Dismissed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

These were three suits in equity, one brought by the Shelby Railroad Company, another by the Shelby Railroad District of Shelby County in the State of Kentucky, and the third by Kreiger and other individual stockholders in the Railroad Company. The plaintiffs in each suit were made defendants in each of the other suits. All the cases were argued together in the courts of the State of Kentucky and in this court, and presented the question whether the Shelby Railroad District had the right of voting at stockholders' meetings upon stock held by it in the Shelby Railroad Company, under the following circumstances:

By an Act of the Legislature of Kentucky of March 15, 1851, the Shelby Railroad Company was incorporated; its capital stock was fixed at $600,000, in shares of $50 each, to be subscribed for by any individual or corporation; at any meeting of the stockholders, each stockholder was to be "allowed one vote for every share owned by him, her or it;" on every share subscribed, one dollar was to be paid at the time of the subscription, and the residue in installments and at times to be fixed by the president and directors; all payments made on the stock were to bear interest until a dividend made, certificates of stock for all such interest were to be issued to the persons entitled, in addition to the shares subscribed or held by them, and no certificates of stock were to be issued until they were paid for; the County Court of Shelby County was empowered to subscribe for stock in behalf of the county, its subscription was to be made payable at such times and places and upon such terms as might be agreed on between it and the commissioners or directors taking its subscription, and, for the purpose of paying that subscription, it was authorized to levy and collect a tax on all the property subject to taxation within the county; and every person paying any part of the tax was to be entitled to his pro rata share of stock, and to receive a certificate thereof on paying, or producing transfers from those who had paid, for a full, half or quarter share.

An Act of February 8, 1869, amending the original charter, authorized a certain portion of Shelby County, included in a boundary defined in this Act, to subscribe for any amount of the stock not exceeding $300,000, and also authorized other counties to subscribe for certain amounts of stock, and further enacted as follows:

"Sec. 3. Upon the written application of the president and directors of said Company and of ten taxpayers of any of said counties, the county judge of such county shall, within thirty days thereafter, cause a vote of the legal voters residing in the county, or portion of county, to be taxed, to be taken at the several places of voting therein, to ascertain whether the voters of said counties, or portion of Shelby County, are in favor of said subscription."

"Sec. 5. If a majority of the votes cast shall be in favor of said subscription, it shall be the duty of the county judge forthwith to cause the subscription to be made in the name of said county, or portion of Shelby County, as the case may be.

"Sec. 6. Where any such subscription to the capital stock of said Company shall have been ordered, and the conditions aforesaid complied with, bonds shall be executed in the name of and under the seal of or scroll of said portion of Shelby County, or said counties, as the case may be, in such form and in such amounts, the entire amount of said bonds not to exceed the sum subscribed, and payable at such places, and bearing interest payable semi-annually, at such rates, not exceeding eight per centum per annum, as the president and directors may elect. The bonds shall be due and payable twenty years from their date, with the privilege reserved to the said counties to pay them after three years from date. The bonds shall be signed by the judge of the county court and countersigned by the county clerk. When so executed, said bonds shall be delivered to the president and directors of said Company, in payment of said subscription, and they may be by them negotiated, hypothecated or sold, upon such terms and at such times as may by said president and directors be deemed expedient, and may be transferred by indorsement.

"Sec. 7. When any such subscription shall have been made, it shall be the duty of the county judge and the justices of the peace of the precincts or the counties in which the vote is taken, to levy annually a direct tax upon all the property in such county, or portion of county, subject to taxation for state revenue, to pay the interest when due, and the principal at maturity; and they may levy a tax to pay any portion of said bonds at any time after three years; Provided, That no greater tax than one per cent shall be levied in any one year, except to pay the bonds at maturity." "The collecting officer shall execute to each person a receipt for the amount of taxes paid by him, which shall be assignable, and, when they amount to fifty dollars or more, shall entitle the holder, upon presentation to the proper officers of the Company, to certificates of stock at the rate of one share for fifty dollars, and every multiple of fifty."

"Sec. 9. The several counties and portion of counties shall not vote the stock for which certificates may be issued to the taxpayers, but the same shall be voted by the individual stockholders."

An Act of March 11, 1870, further amending the charter of the Railroad Company, contained the following section:

"Sec. 8. When any county, or part of a county, city, town or precinct, shall have delivered its bonds in payment for stock subscribed, it shall be entitled to representation, and to vote the amount of such stock in any meeting of the stockholders of said Company. The stock owned by a county shall be represented by the county judge and all the justices of the peace of the county; stock owned by a part of a county, or a precinct, by the county judge and by the justices of the peace residing in the district or precinct taxed; stock owned by a city or town, by its general council or board of trustees; and these several bodies may designate a suitable person or persons as their proxies to represent them in any meeting of the stockholders of said Company. It shall be the duty of the county judge to call together at the county seat the justices entitled to vote, and to cause their action to be spread upon the records of the county court."

Another Act, passed February 26, 1878, enacted that "the part of Shelby County embraced in the boundary given" in the Act of 1869 should "have the corporate name of the Shelby Railroad District of Shelby County," and by that name might sue and be sued.

In accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1869, that portion of Shelby County therein defined forthwith subscribed $300,000 to the stock of the Railroad Company, and its bonds for that amount were issued and delivered to the Railroad Company on June 1, 1869, and were sold by the Company and the proceeds applied to the construction of its road; and a tax was annually levied and collected, amounting in all to more than $300,000, which was applied to the payment of interest becoming due on the bonds, and of part of the principal, leaving such bonds, or others given in renewal thereof, now remaining unpaid to the amount of $248,000; and the District holds certificates of stock to that amount, and always voted upon its stock until these suits were brought. Certificates of stock to a large amount have also been issued to taxpayers and are held by Kreiger and others. The first dividend on the stock was declared in December, 1881, and was paid to all the stockholders, including the District.

The Court of Appeals of Kentucky, affirming the judgments of a lower court of the State, adjudged that the Shelby Railroad District of Shelby County was a stockholder in the Shelby Railroad Company to the extent of the principal of the bonds of the District, issued and delivered to the Railroad Company, and still outstanding and unpaid, and was entitled to vote and to receive dividends accordingly.

Kreiger and others sued out these writs of error, which the Railroad Company and the District now move to dismiss for want of jurisdiction.

Messrs. B. F. Buckner and John L. Dodd, for plaintiffs in error:

A federal question was raised by the pleadings and was decided.

Bridge Propre. v. Hoboken Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 142 (17: 575); Furman v. Nichol, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 57 (19: 376); Knox v. Exchange Bank, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 388 (20: 415); Northwestern University v. People, 99 U. S. 321 (25: 389); Almonester v. Kenton, 50 U. S. 9 How. 9 (13: 24); Fisher v. Cockerell, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 254 (8: 116); Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 688 (22: 443); Gross v. U. S. Mortgage Co. 108 U. S. 485 (27: 797); Adams Co. v. Burlington & M. R. Co. 112 U. S. 127 (28: 678); Jacks v. Helena, 115 U. S. 289 (29: 392); Myrick v. Thompson, 99 U. S. 295 (25: 326).

The Acts of 1851 and 1869 confer on the individual stockholders rights which are impaired by the Acts of 1870 and 1878.

Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659 (24: 1036); Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 81, 82 (25: 951, 952); Gregory v. Shelby College, 2 Met. (Ky.) 589.

Messrs. P. J. Foree, Bullock & Beckham and J. C. Beckham, for defendants in error:

The question was simply one of the construction of state legislation by a state court. To such questions, the revisory power of this court does not extend.

McBride v. Hoey, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 167 (9: 673); Lawler v. Walker, 55 U. S. 14 How. 149 (14: 364); Robertson v. Coulter, 57 U. S. 16 How. 106 (14: 864); Marshall v. Ladd, (19: 153).

It does not appear that a federal question was raised or, if raised, it was not decided.

Northern R. Co. v. N. Y. 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 384 (20: 412); Knox v. Exchange Bank of Va. 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 379 (20: 414); Mississippi & M. R. Co. v. Rock, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 177 (18: 381); Lehigh Water Co. v. Easton (80: 1059); Detroit City R. Co. v. Guthard, 114 U. S. 133 (29: 118); Williams v. Norris, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 117 (6: 571); Matheson v. Branch Bank of Alabama, 48 U. S. 7 How. 260 (12: 692); Parmales v. Lawrence, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 36 (20: 48); Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590 (22: 429); McManus v. O'Sullivan, 91 U. S. 578 (23: 390); Chouteau v. Gibson, 111 U. S. 200 (28: 400); Bolling v. Lerner, 91 U. S. 594 (23: 366); State v. Board of Liquidation, 98 U. S. 140 (25: 114); Poydras De La Lande v. Louisiana, 59 U. S. 18 How. 192 (15: 350); Farney v. Towle, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 350 (17: 216); Hoyt v. Thompson, Id. 518 (17: 65); Maxwell v. Newbold, 59 U. S. 18 How. 511 (15: 506); Susquehanna Boom Co. v. West Branch Boom Co. 110 U. S. 57 (28: 69); Worthy v. Barrett, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 611 (19: 565); Messenger v. Mason, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 507 (19: 1028); Caperton v. Bowyer, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 216 (20: 882).

This court will not interfere if the record shows that besides the federal question there is another and distinct ground on which the state judgment can be sustained.

Kennebec & P. R. Co. v. Portland & K. R. Co. 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 23 (20: 850); Rector v. Ashley, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 142 (18:783); Gibson v. Chouteau, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 314 (19: 317); Klinger v. Missouri, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 257 (20: 635).

When this court comes to construe a state statute it will adopt the construction placed upon it by the highest judicial tribunal of that State.

Green v. Neal, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 291 (8: 402); Smith v. Kernochen, 48 U. S. 7 How. 198 (12: 666); Randall v. Brigham, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 523 (19: 285).

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended for the plaintiffs in error that the Statutes of 1851 and 1869 created a contract by which the stockholders of the Shelby Railroad Company were those persons who had become so by subscribing for stock or by the payment of taxes, and the right to vote upon stock subscribed for by counties or other municipal subdivisions was in taxpayers only; and that the Statutes of 1870 and 1873 first granted to the Shelby Railroad District of Shelby County the right to vote as a stockholder in the Railroad Company, and thereby impaired the obligation of the contract created by the earlier statutes.

But the insuperable difficulty in the way of sustaining these writs of error is that it does not appear that the Court of Appeals of Kentucky gave effect to the Statutes of 1870 and 1873 as making any change in that contract.

The Statutes of Kentucky require written opinions to be delivered by the court of appeals in all cases, and to be recorded by its clerk. Code of Civ. Proc. § 765; Gen. Stat. chap. 28, art. 2, § 10; chap. 16, art. 1, § 1. By the settled course of decision under the existing Judiciary Acts of the United States, this court may examine opinions so delivered and recorded, to ascertain the ground of the judgment of the state court. Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590, 633 [22: 429, 443]; McManus v. O'Sullivan, 91 U. S. 578 [23:390]; Gross v. U. S. Mortgage Co. 108 U. S. 481, 487 [27: 796, 798]; Adams County v. Burlington & M. R. R. 112 U. S. 123, 129 [28: 678]; Detroit City R. Co. v. Guthard, 114 U. S. 133, 137 [29:118,119]; Jacks v. Helena, 115 U. S. 288 [29:392]; Philadelphia Fire Asso. v. New York, 119 U. S. 110 [30:342]. The decision in Fisher v. Cockerell, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 248, 255 [8:114,116], cited by one of the defendants in error, in which, on a writ of error to the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, this court held that the opinion of that court could not be taken into consideration, was decided under the Judiciary Act of 1789, which contained a provision, omitted in the later Acts, expressly requiring the error assigned as a ground of reversal to appear on the face of the record. Acts Sept. 25, 1789, chap. 20, § 25, 1 Stat. at L. 86; Feb. 5, 1867, chap. 28, § 2, 14 Stat. at L. 386; Rev. Stat. § 709.

In the cases now before us, the opinions delivered in writing by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, recorded by its clerk, and sent up with the transcript, consist of an elaborate opinion upon the original hearing, and a shorter one upon a petition for a rehearing.

The original opinion makes no mention of the Acts of 1870 and 1873, but, proceeding wholly upon the construction of the Charter of 1851, as amended by the Act of 1869, holds, for reasons stated at length, that by the legal effect of the Act of 1869, defining by boundaries a district in Shelby County, authorizing it to determine by popular vote of its inhabitants to subscribe for stock in the Railroad Company, and requiring bonds to be executed in its name by the county judge to the Railroad Company for the amount so subscribed for, the District was made a corporation, and entitled to all the rights and privileges of other stockholders in the Railroad Company, and had the right to vote and to receive dividends upon the stock thus subscribed for, except so far as owners of property within the District, having paid taxes assessed upon them towards paying the principal sum so subscribed, had received certificates of stock for the sums so paid by them; and that the right of the District to vote and to receive dividends upon so much of its stock as had not been so paid for was not displaced or affected by the issue of certificates of stock to taxpayers for sums paid by them to meet the accruing interest on the sum subscribed by the District, because the stock so issued for interest was, by the express provisions of the charter constituting the contract between the stockholders, to be in increase of the original capital stock.

The opinion delivered on overruling the petition for a rehearing reaffirms the positions of the former opinion, and declares that, while the provisions of the Act of 1869, amending the original Act of incorporation, were indefinite as to the manner in which stock held by the District should be voted on, the Acts of 1870 and 1873 did no more than make that certain which was before uncertain, or had been omitted from the original Act of incorporation, by giving the District a distinct name and authorizing it to be represented by the county judge and justices of the county, and providing a remedy by which the rights of the corporation might be asserted and its liabilities enforced; but that there had been no change of contract.

It thus appears that the state court, upon full consideration, decided that the Acts of 1870 and 1873 conferred no new rights, but only defined more clearly the manner in which the rights conferred by the earlier statutes should be exercised; and that it based its judgments entirely upon the construction and effect of the earlier statutes, and upon grounds which would have been equally controlling if the later Acts had not been passed. The necessary conclusion is that this court has no jurisdiction to review those judgments. Bank of West Tenn. v. Citizens Bank of La. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 432 [20:514]; S. C. 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 9 [20:514]; Palmer v. Marston, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 10 [20:826]; Kennebec & P. R. R. Co. v. Portland & K. R. R. Co. Id. 28 [20:850]; Stevenson v. Williams, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 572 [22:162]; New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Ref. Co. 125 U. S. 18 [ante, 607].

Writs of error dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

SOUTHERN DEVELOPMENT COMPANY OF NEVADA, Appt.,
v.
FRANK SILVA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 247-259.)

Answer in equity action, effect of—fraudulent representations—expressions of opinion in regard to value—presumption—acts of vendee—investigation by purchaser.

1. Where an answer to a bill in equity is direct and positive, and under oath, and denies the allegations of the bill, and an answer on oath is not waived, the complainant will not be entitled to a decree unless such denials are disproved by more than one witness or by one witness and corroborating circumstances; and this is so where the bill is filed for fraud.

2. In order that a vendee of property may avoid the sale for fraudulent representations, it must appear that he relied upon such representations in the purchase.

3. Expressions of opinion which are not statements of facts do not constitute fraud.
4. Statements which are expressions of opinion by the vendor, in respect to the value of the property sold, are not fraudulent in law to the extent that the sale will be set aside if they are untrue.
5. The law raises no presumption of knowledge of falsity from the single fact per se that the representation was false. There must be something further to establish the defendant's knowledge.
6. In order to set aside a sale for fraudulent representations, it is essential that the vendee has acted upon such representations, to his injury.
7. Where the purchaser undertakes to make investigations of his own, and the vendor does nothing to prevent his investigation from being as full as he chooses to make it, the purchaser cannot afterwards allege that the vendor made misrepresentations.

[No. 1210.]

Submitted Jan. 9, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, dismissing a bill in equity to rescind a contract of purchase on the ground of fraudulent representations. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wm. M. Stewart, A. T. Britton and A. B. Browne, for appellant:

If the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law, then the decree should be reversed without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to maintain its action at law.

Buzard v. Houston, 119 U. S. 354 (30: 454); Rogers v. Durant, 106 U. S. 644 (27: 303).

These statements as to Silva's opinion, which were untrue and made with an intention to mislead, were fraudulent and afford grounds for relief.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 878.

The rule of caveat emptor applies only when the buyer and seller have equal opportunities of knowledge; but it does not apply where the seller makes express representations in respect to matters of which the buyer has no knowledge and no means at hand of obtaining knowledge.

Fishback v. Miller, 15 Nev. 440; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 845, pp. 381, 382.

It is no objection to a restoration of property received on a fraudulent sale that it has fallen in value since the date of the transaction.

Neblett v. Macfarland, 92 U. S. 101 (23: 471); Blake v. Mowatt, 21 Beav. 613; Veazie v. Williams, 49 U. S. 8 How. 134, 158 (12: 1018, 1028).

Nor, if the property is of a perishable nature, is the holder bound to keep it in a state of preservation until the bill is filed.

Scott v. Perrin, 4 Bibb, 360; Kerr, Fraud & M. 337.

Messrs. John H. Miller and J. P. Langhorne, for appellee:

Equity will pursue money which is once impressed with a trust, even when commingled, and award it to the true owner.

Knatchbull v. Hallett, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696; Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54 (26: 693); Newton v. Porter, 69 N. Y. 133; Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 562; Bank of America v. Pollock, 4 Edw. Ch. 215; Barry v. Brune, 8 Hun, 395; Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379; Thompson v. Perkins, 3 Mason, 232; Pennell v. Deffell, 4 De Gex, M. & G. 372; Frith v. Cartland, 2 Hem. & M. 417; Stephens v. Brooklyn Board of Education, 79 N. Y. 183; Re LeBlanc, 14 Hun, 8; Wells v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 133; George v. Ransom, 14 Cal. 660; Bayles v. Baxter, 23 Cal. 578; Simson v. Eckstein, Id. 593; Greiner v. Greiner, 58 Cal. 122.

A misrepresentation, in order to constitute fraud, must contain the following elements: (1) its form as a statement of fact; (2) its purpose of inducing the other party to act; (3) its untruth; (4) the knowledge or belief of the party making it; (5) the belief, trust or reliance of the party to whom it is made; (6) its materiality.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 876.

Fraud is odious, and never to be presumed.

Attwood v. Small, 6 Clark & F. 232; Tuck v. Downing, 7 Morrison, Mining Rep. 108-10; Walker v. Hough, 59 Ill. 375; Dirkson v. Knox, 30 N. W. Rep. 49.

The rule of caveat emptor applies.

1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 200 a; Reynolds v. Palmer, 21 Fed. Rep. 434.

Silva merely gave expression of an opinion, and in such there is no fraud.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 878; Tuck v. Downing, 7 Morr. Min. Rep. 84; Rendell v. Scott, 70 Cal. 514.

Statements as to value are not fraudulent in law.

McDowell v. Simms, 6 Morr. Min. Rep. 476; Tuck v. Downing, 7 Morr. Min. Rep. 83.

Yerington purchased on the advice of Forman and his own judgment.

Tuck v. Downing, 76 Ill. 71.

There never was any valid rescission or offer to rescind.

Wilbur v. Flood, 16 Mich. 45; Pearsoll v. Chapin, 44 Pa. 9.

Rescission is a condition precedent to the commencement of the suit.

Herman v. Haffenegger, 54 Cal. 164; Gifford v. Carvill, 29 Cal. 589; Getty v. Devlin, 54 N. Y. 403, 7 Morr. Min. Rep. 29; Byard v. Holmes, 33 N. J. L. 119, 6 Morr. Min. Rep. 599; Cook v. Gilman, 34 N. H. 556; Bassett v. Brown, 105 Mass. 557; Schiffer v. Dietz, 83 N. Y. 308; Cobb v. Hatfield, 46 N. Y. 536; Masson v. Bovet, 1 Denio, 74; Wilbur v. Flood, 16 Mich. 45; Beetem v. Burkholder, 69 Pa. 249.

Even if the offer to rescind was valid and made in due time, the parties cannot be placed in statu quo.

State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 458; Fratt v. Fiske, 17 Cal. 380; San Jose v. Younger, 29 Cal. 172; Morrison v. Lods, 39 Cal. 381; Perley v. Balch, 23 Pick. 285; Hunt v. Silk, 5 East, 449; Masson v. Bovet, 1 Denio, 69, 74; Reed v. Blandford, 2 Young & J. 278; Turnpike Co. v. Commonwealth, 2 Watts, 433; Herman v. Haffenegger, 54 Cal. 163.

Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity to rescind a contract of purchase of a silver mine on the ground of fraudulent representations and to recover the consideration paid.

The suit was commenced originally in the Superior Court of Inyo County, California, on the 8th of May, 1884, but on account of the diverse citizenship of the parties, the plaintiff being a corporation organized under the laws of Nevada, and the defendant a citizen of California, it was removed into the United States Circuit Court. Demurrers to the original bill and to an amended bill having been sustained, the present "second amended" bill of complaint was filed. Answer was filed by defendant, replication by complainant, and issue was joined. Testimony was taken, and the case was heard, resulting in a decree dismissing the bill on the 14th of March, 1887.

It appears from the record that on the 15th of March, 1884, the appellant (who was the complainant below) purchased from the defendant a mining claim, known as the "Sterling Mine," together with other mining property, all situated in Inyo County, California, paying him therefor the sum of $10,000.

On the 8th of May, 1884, the original bill of complaint was filed, charging in substance that complainant was induced to purchase said mine and mining property solely upon the representations made by Silva as to its condition, extent, and value; that such representations were made to H. M. Yerington, the president of said complainant Company, and to one Forman, a mining expert in his employ, in January, 1884, when an examination of said mine was made by them; that said representations were false and fraudulent, and were well known to the defendant at the time to be such; and that said representations were, in substance and in a somewhat different order, as follows:

(1.) That there were 2,000 tons of ore in the mine;

(2.) That the bottom of what is called the "ore chamber" was solid ore, as good as the ore exposed on the sides of the chamber;

(3.) That there were not less than 500 tons of ore in and about the said "ore chamber;"

(4.) That the mine was worth fifteen thousand dollars; and,

(5.) That, after going through the mine, the defendant represented to said Yerington and Forman that he had shown them all the work which had been done in or about the mine that would throw any light upon the quantity of ore therein.

The answer of the defendant is direct, positive, and unequivocal in its denials of the allegations of the bill, and, as an answer on oath is not waived, unless these denials are disproved by evidence of greater weight than the testimony of one witness, or by that of one witness with corroborating circumstances, the complainant will not be entitled to a decree; and this effect of the defendant's answer is not weakened by the fact that the equity of the complainant's bill is the allegation of fraud. Vigel v. Hopp, 104 U. S. 441 [26: 765]; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1528; Daniell, Ch. Pr. 844.

The burden of proof is on the complainant; and unless he brings evidence sufficient to overcome the natural presumption of fair dealing and honesty, a court of equity will not be justified in setting aside a contract on the ground of fraudulent representations. In order to establish a charge of this character the complainant must show, by clear and decisive proof:

First. That the defendant has made a representation in regard to a material fact;

Secondly. That such representation is false;

Thirdly. That such representation was not actually believed by the defendant, on reasonable grounds, to be true;

Fourthly. That it was made with intent that it should be acted on;

Fifthly. That it was acted on by complainant to his damage; and,

Sixthly. That in so acting on it the complainant was ignorant of its falsity, and reasonably believed it to be true.

The first of the foregoing requisites excludes such statements as consist merely in an expression of opinion or judgment, honestly entertained; and again (excepting in peculiar cases) it excludes statements by the owner and vendor of property in respect to its value.

The evidence in the case shows that in the development of this mine a tunnel, called the "Sterling Tunnel," had first been dug. At a distance of about 140 feet along the line of this tunnel, from its mouth, there are branches running easterly and westerly. About 60 feet from the main tunnel, in the eastern branch, winze No. 1 starts down. About 38 feet below the level of the tunnel, a level known as the "38 feet level" starts off from this winze, and at the bottom of the winze, a distance of about 82 feet vertical below the main tunnel, there is another level known as "82 feet level." In the easterly branch of the tunnel, about 80 feet from winze No. 1, there is another winze starting downward, inclining to the southeast as it goes down. This winze is numbered 2, and is connected with the 38 feet and the 82 feet levels. Intermediate between these levels is another level, known as the "55 feet level," which opens out to the eastward of winze No. 2, into a chamber about 15 feet long and about 8 feet wide. In the southeast corner of this chamber was a little hole or shaft, extending downward a few feet only. In sinking winze No. 2, Silva struck an ore body at a point opposite the 38 feet level. It was irregular in shape, dipping at an angle of about 45 degrees. Commencing at a point, comparatively speaking, it increased gradually as it descended, and was in form somewhat like a pyramid. At its base it measured 4 or 5 feet across, and it was about 9 feet long. The surface of this inclined pyramid formed the floor or bottom of the chamber. There was, however, a small space between the base and the opposite foot wall, which is called the "bottom" of the chamber by complainant's witnesses, and is the "bottom" spoken of in the bill. The ore comprising this pyramid was carbonate, and being friable, had slacked down over the face of the pyramid to the bottom, partially covering it and partially filling up the little hole or shaft in the southeast corner.

As to the first alleged representation, as classified above—viz., that there were 2,000 tons of ore in sight in the mine, and that Yerington relied upon such statement when he made the purchase—the proof utterly fails to establish either that Silva made the statement, as a statement of fact, or that Yerington relied upon such statement even had it been made. Silva, both in his answer and in his testimony, denies ever having made the statement; and the testimony of Yerington himself is to the effect that Silva's statement was qualified by the phrase "in his judgment." This then is shown to have been nothing more than an expression of opinion on the part of Silva as to the quantity of ore in sight in the mine. But even if Silva had made the statement imputed to him in the bill, there is abundant evidence to show that Yerington did not rely upon it in the purchase of the mine. Yerington's own evidence, on this point, is against him. He testifies that he did not believe that there were more than 1,000 tons of ore in the mine, and that Forman agreed with him on that point. And he further testifies that, valuing this ore at 32 ounces of ore and 45 per cent of lead per ton (which it appears was its approximate value as determined by several assays) and calculating that there would be 1,000 tons of ore there, the mine would be worth $10,000—the sum he actually gave for it. This lacks much of coming up to the rule that the complainant must have been deceived, and deceived by the person of whom he complains. Attwood v. Small, 6 Clark & F. 232; Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 57. Besides, the quantity of ore "in sight" in a mine, as that term is understood among miners, is at best a mere matter of opinion. It cannot be calculated with mathematical or even with approximate certainty. The opinions of expert miners, on a question of this kind, might reasonably differ quite materially.

In the case of Tuck v. Downing, 76 Ill. 71, 94, the court says: "No man, however scientific he may be, could certainly state how a mine, with the most flattering outcrop or blowout, will finally turn out. It is to be fully tested and worked by men of skill and judgment. Mines are not purchased and sold on a warranty, but on the prospect. 'The sight' determines the purchase. If very flattering, a party is willing to pay largely for the chance. There is no other sensible or known mode of selling this kind of property. It is, in the nature of the thing, utterly speculative; and everyone knows the business is of the most fluctuating and hazardous character. How many mines have not sustained the hopes created by their outcrop!"

We approve the position of the court below, that "Yerington and his expert, Forman, were as competent to judge how much ore there was 'in sight' as Silva was. They were no novices in matters of that kind. This misrepresentation, if such it be, does not contain either the 1st, 4th, or 5th element stated by Pomeroy as essential elements in a fraudulent misrepresentation."

As stated above, the substance of the allegation of the bill is that Silva represented that the bottom of this ore chamber, which was covered with loose ore slacked down from the pyramid, was composed of ore as good as that exposed on the sides of the chamber. Silva in his answer expressly denies ever having made such statement. Forman testifies that with a little prospecting pick he had with him he raked through the dirt and loose ore that had slacked down, to see if it would reach the bottom of the ore chamber, but that it would not. He further says: "I asked Silva how the bottom was; if he had sunk below there. He said, 'No.' I said, 'How is the bottom? You as a miner know it is a suspicious thing to see a bottom covered up or anything of that kind.' He said the bottom was as good or better than any ore which we saw in the chamber." Yerington at first testifies that Silva, in reply to a question by Forman, stated that this floor was solid ore; but he says that he does not think any comparison was made between that ore and the ore in the sides of the chamber, as narrated by Forman. On the next day, however, Yerington, having, as he says, refreshed his memory, "and I (he) had the means of doing it," was positive that the conversation between Silva and Forman at that time was as Forman afterwards stated it. Silva, in addition to his positive denial in his answer, testifies that "there never was a word said about that. They asked me this, 'What I thought of the ore body?' and I said 'I thought it would be extensive.' I thought so at the time, and I think so yet." The witness, Eddy, who was present all the time in the ore chamber, except when he went to the 88 feet level to get a pick, does not know anything about a conversation such as Yerington and Forman narrate.

On this point, then, the testimony of Silva is directly to the contrary of that of Yerington and Forman. Certain other material facts in the case seem to indicate that there is just as strong probability that Silva's statements in this matter are true, as that those of Yerington and Forman are true. In the bill Yerington alleged, under oath, that Silva had discovered the fact that the bottom of the ore chamber was not composed of ore, and had afterwards covered that bottom with ore, vein-rock, and matter—in other words, had "salted" the mine. There is no evidence in the record to prove this, or tending to prove it. On the contrary, the evidence of Yerington himself, and of the other witnesses who were examined on that point, is all to the effect that the ore covering the floor of the chamber had slacked down from natural causes in fine particles like wheat. Nor is there such evidence to show that Silva knew the character of this floor, or of the extent of the ore vein, or deposit (as it afterwards turned out to be), as would justify the interposition of a court of equity to set aside the contract on the ground of fraudulent representations. He had come on to the ore in excavating from the top. The sides of the ore chamber contained some ore of a good quality, and he had never demonstrated the extent and amount of ore in the pyramidal wedge in the side of the chamber. It is shown by the evidence of Yerington himself, that, in the side of a drift running westerly from the ore chamber, there was ore which appeared to be continuous with the body of ore in the chamber. So that the statement Silva said he made—viz., that he thought the ore body would be extensive—at least, appears reasonable. Upon all the facts and circumstances apparent of record, he might have made the statement he says he made, and believed he was telling the truth. For there is also some evidence to the effect that Silva had commenced to run a drift from the bottom of winze No. 1, for the purpose of striking and cutting the supposed downward extension of the ore body in the chamber, and this before the examination of the mine by Yerington and Forman. After the sale of the mine, Coffin, the superintendent for the complainant Company, when he commenced work in the mine, started in where Silva had left off in this drift, and carried it immediately beneath the ore chamber, entering the chamber by an up raise. Then it was that the discovery was made that the ore body, instead of being a continuous ledge or lead, was merely a deposit.

Furthermore, the testimony of Yerington and Forman, as regards the little hole or shaft in the southeast corner of the chamber, is directly opposed by the testimony of Silva and Eddy. Both Yerington and Forman testify that this little shaft was completely filled up with dirt and loose ore; while Silva and Eddy both testify that it was not so filled up, but that both Yerington and Forman stood in that shaft and took samples of ore from it.

It is thus seen that the evidence on this material point does not clearly establish the fraudulent representations of Silva as claimed by the complainant; but that, on the contrary, the material facts and circumstances as disclosed by the record are entirely compatible with the theory that Silva did not make the representations charged against him, or at most, that he merely gave expression to an opinion as to the extent of the ore body, erroneous though it proved to be. This would not constitute fraud. In the language of the court below: "This testimony was taken in June, 1886, about two and a half years after the conversations took place. They were present at the time examining the mine and engaged in conversation for an hour or more. These discrepancies in matters of detail during a long conversation, related by different parties, viewing the subject from different standpoints after the lapse of so long a period of time, are no more than might reasonably be expected, even in honest witnesses. There is no occasion to impute any intention to testify falsely to either. * * * Parties are extremely liable to misunderstand each other, and, in looking back upon the transaction in the light of subsequent developments, are prone to take the view most advantageous to themselves."

As to the third alleged representation—to wit, that there were not less than 500 tons of ore in and about that ore chamber—Silva, both in his answer and in his testimony, denies that he ever told Yerington and Forman, or anybody else, that there were 500 tons of ore there, or that there was any amount fixed or agreed upon by them as to the quantity of ore there; while the testimony of both Yerington and Forman is to the effect that Silva said in his opinion, or in his judgment, there were 500 tons of ore in the chamber. So that, taking the strongest testimony produced on the part of complainant upon this point, it simply amounts to an expression of opinion on the part of Silva as to the amount of the ore in the chamber, and not a statement of fact. It therefore does not constitute fraud.

It is equally true that any statements that may have been made by Silva with reference to the value of the mine cannot, under the circumstances of this case, be considered an act of fraud on his part sufficient to warrant a court of equity in setting aside the contract herein. Yerington testifies that Silva said he had been asking $15,000 for the mine, but that he would take $12,500; while Forman says he does not recollect that Silva made any statement as to the value of the mine, but that he heard Silva say he thought it was worth $15,000. Such statements are not fraudulent in law, but are considered merely as trade talk, and mere matters of opinion, which is allowable. Gordon v. Butler, 105 U. S, 553 [26:1166]; Mooney v. Miller, 102 Mass. 217. Moreover it is clear, beyond question, that Yerington did not purchase the mine upon Silva's representations as to its value, as we shall hereafter see.

This disposes of all the alleged fraudulent representations, as arranged above, except the last, adversely to the complaint, and it is to this one that attention will now be directed. This charge is, substantially, that Silva represented to Yerington and Forman, when they visited the mine in January, 1884, and had gone through it, that he had shown them all the work which had been done in and about the mine that would throw any light on the quantity of ore therein. This representation is alleged to have been false and fraudulent, and well known by Silva to be such, because at a cut a short distance from the mouth of the main tunnel, at a point known as the "point of location," a little hole or shaft had been sunk which had been filled up, and was not observable at the time of the examination of the mine in January, 1884, and also because there had been a number of drill holes made in the sides of the ore chamber, and afterwards filled up before the examination in January, 1884, so that they were not observable at that time, which holes clearly developed the fact that the ore about the chamber was nothing more than a shell instead of a continuous body as it appeared to the observer.

The existence of the plugged-up drill holes in the sides of the ore chamber is the worst feature of the case against Silva. They could not have been made by a former proprietor of the mine, as is slightly claimed in his behalf, for, as has been already shown in this opinion, Silva himself, or at least persons in his employ, had excavated that chamber after he had purchased it from one Edwards in 1876. And certain it is that the drill holes were found plugged up within a short time after he had sold the mine to the complainant Company, March 15, 1884. The question is, Did Silva know of their existence at the time he sold the mine, and, having such knowledge, did he falsely represent to the complainant that he knew nothing of them, thereby inducing complainant to act upon such representations? Upon this question the evidence is somewhat conflicting. Yerington testifies that after going through the mine, he asked Silva if he had shown him the whole of the mine, and he replied that he had. And Forman testifies that Silva, in reply to a question from him, said that he had shown him all the work that had been done in and about the mine that would throw any light upon the quantity of ore in the mine, or the extent of the ledge or deposit. Silva admits that, in reply to a question by Yerrington, he told him that he had shown him all the work that had been done in and about the mine, either by himself or under his direction. So that the question is narrowed down to simply this: "Were said drill holes in existence at the time Silva made such statement; if so, had they been made by him or under his direction, or did he know of their existence? In his sworn answer Silva expressly "denies that he drilled any such hole or holes through the ore into the country rock or otherwise, or thereby or at all discovered the extent of said ore, or that he filled up said drill holes, or concealed them from view or kept them secret from complainant," etc., and in his testimony he also denies having any knowledge of their existence. He says that he drilled no holes in the mine, except what he had to do as a miner, and that he concealed nothing from Yerington when he showed him the mine. And again he says: "I showed Mr. Yerington all the work that was done in the mine that I knew anything of." There is no direct evidence going to show who drilled the holes. And there is nothing in the entire record to connect Silva with them, except the fact that he was the owner of the mine, and was in possession of it at a time when it is most likely they were drilled. But this circumstance alone should not outweigh the positive denial of Silva in his answer, and also his equally positive denial in his testimony, of his knowledge of the existence of said drilled holes. The law raises no presumption of knowledge of falsity from the single fact per se that the representation was false. There must be something further to establish the defendant's knowledge. Barnett v. Stanton, 2 Ala. 181; McDonald v. Trafton, 15 Me. 225. This rule is fortified by the consideration that had he known of the limited quantity of ore in and about the "ore chamber," Silva would hardly have gone to the expense and labor of starting a drift from the bottom of winze No. 1, and constructing it for a certain distance, before the sale of the mine, for the purpose of reaching the supposed downward extension of the ore in and about that chamber. Knowing that the ore body terminated within a few inches of the surface of the chamber, and then in the face of that knowledge actually constructing a drift on the 82-feet level, at enormous expense, for the purpose of getting under that limited quantity of ore, would not appear a reasonable thing to do by anyone, especially by such an experienced and practical miner as Silva is admitted to have been.

The testimony, therefore, and all the other facts and circumstances of record, do not substantiate complainant's theory of the case on this point; in other words, there is not a satisfactory case of fraudulent representations on this point made out—not such a case as would justify the interposition of a court of equity to set aside the contract under consideration on the ground of fraudulent representations.

As regards the little hole or shaft that had been sunk at the "point of location" and afterwards filled up, so that it was not observable at the time of Yerington's visit in January, 1884, there is absolutely no testimony at all to show that Silva knew anything about its existence. He had done no work at that place, or very little at most, and was using the cut there as a sort of kitchen. The sides of the cut indicated that there was a ledge of ore there. It is admitted that Forman asked Silva why he did not "go down" on that ore, and that he replied that he considered the tunnel the best place to mine. Silva denies, both in his answer and in his testimony, that he ever knew that a shaft had been sunk at the point of location, and no one is found who can testify that he did know anything about it. On the contrary, the former owner of the mine, one Edwards, testifies that he himself dug that shaft and filled it up prior to the time Silva purchased it, and that to his knowledge Silva did not know anything about that shaft.

It is essential that the defendant's representations should have been acted on by complainant, to his injury. Where the purchaser undertakes to make investigations of his own, and the vendor does nothing to prevent his investigation from being as full as he chooses to make it, the purchaser cannot afterwards allege that the vendor made misrepresentations. Attwood v. Small, supra; Jennings v. Broughton, 5 De Gex, M. & G. 126; Tuck v. Downing, supra.

The evidence abundantly shows that Yerington had been willing to give $10,000 for the mine prior to the time he visited it and made his examination in January, 1884. He had made inquiries of various persons for months previous to that visit. Several experts in his employ had visited the mine, had taken samples of ore from it, and it must have been from reports thus received that Yerington had made up his mind as to what the mine was worth. From the letters of an agent (Woods) to Eddy, the testimony of the witness Boland, the testimony of the witness Anthony, Eddy's testimony, and from the testimony of Silva himself, there can be no doubt that Yerington had offered $10,000 for the mine several months before he had ever seen it; thus showing that his examination of the mine in January, 1884, merely went to corroborate the reports that he had received of it from his experts, Forman, Bliss, et al., and that it was upon such reports, and his own judgment after an examination of the mine, that he made the purchase of it.

From all which it is clear to this court that the complainant has not proven his case, and the decree below is affirmed.

DALE TILE MANUFACTURING COMPANY (Limited), Plff. in Err.
v.
ELIZABETH A. L. HYATT.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 46-54.)

Federal question—action to enforce contract for use of patent—state decision.

1. In an action in a state court upon a contract in regard to letters patent, where the defendant contended that the state court had no jurisdiction, because the plaintiff's right to maintain her action depended upon the question whether the second reissue of her patent was valid or invalid under the Patent Laws of the United States, and that of that question the United States courts had exclusive jurisdiction,—the judgment of the state court, holding that the question of the validity of the reissue could not be contested in that action and assuming jurisdiction to render judgment against the defendant, involved a decision against the immunity claimed by the defendant under the Constitution and laws of the United States, which this court has jurisdiction to review.

2. An action to enforce a contract for the use of a patent right is not within the Acts of Congress by which an appeal to this court is allowable in cases arising under the patent laws, without regard to the value of the matter in controversy.

3. A decision of the state court, based upon the contract between the parties, does not necessarily decide any question depending upon the construction or effect of the Patent Laws of the United States.

[No. 1282.]

Submitted Jan. 9, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the City Court of New York, to review a judgment for the plaintiff in an action upon a written contract to pay for the use of a patent right.

On motions to dismiss and affirm. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

The original action was brought in a court of the State of New York by Elizabeth A. L. Hyatt, a citizen of New York, and the owner of letters patent for an improvement in illuminated basement and basement extensions, against the Dale Tile Manufacturing Company (Limited), a corporation organized by the laws of New York, upon a written agreement between the parties, dated December 28, 1880, which contained, either in itself, or by reference to previous agreements, the following provisions:

The agreement began by reciting that letters patent for this invention had been issued to the plaintiff on August 27, 1867, and reissued on August 6, 1878. The plaintiff on her part, licensed the defendant to make and sell, within certain States and districts, during the full term of the patent, and of any extension or renewal thereof, illuminated basements, and basement extensions and materials therefor; and agreed not to manufacture herself, or to license others to manufacture, within the same territory. The defendant, on its part, acknowledged the validity of the said letters patent; consented that the plaintiff might obtain further reissues thereof when and as often as she should choose without prejudice to this agreement; and promised to pay her a fee of seventy cents for each square foot of surface in gratings made by the defendant to be used in illuminated basements or basement extensions made and sold by it under the license; provided, however, that "until a court shall have given a decree sustaining the validity of the above named patents" the plaintiff should receive a fee of thirty cents only, in lieu of the fee of seventy cents; and that "if at any time an adverse decision shall be rendered against the validity of the patent which shall not be appealed from for three months", the fees under this license should cease; and the defendant agreed to make such payments and render accounts to the plaintiff quarterly. It was further stipulated that either party, knowingly violating the agreement, should forfeit all rights under it.

The defendant in its answer admitted the agreement, and set up sundry breaches thereof by the plaintiff, and, among others, that on September 27, 1881, she obtained from the United States a reissue of her patent, whereby a discontinuance of actions previously brought by her against infringers in the Circuit Court of the United States became necessary, and she refused to bring new suits against them.

The plaintiff afterwards, by leave of court, amended her complaint by alleging the reissue of 1881.

By order of the City Court of New York, the case was referred to a referee, who found that the plaintiff was the owner of the letters patent issued and twice reissued as aforesaid; that there had been no breach of the agreement on her part; that the defendant made and sold the invention under the license, and rendered quarterly accounts for the royalties down to and including the quarter ending October 31, 1881; that by the account for that quarter there appeared to be due to the plaintiff the sum of $524.55, which the defendant refused to pay; and that in December, 1881, the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant that it had forfeited its license, and withdrew the notice upon its promising to pay the royalties.

The defendant requested the referee to find, as a conclusion of law, that by the plaintiff's surrender of the patent on taking out the reissue of 1881, the license held by the defendant was canceled and became of no effect; and also that the court had no jurisdiction of the action because it involved necessarily and directly the construction of letters patent of the United States. The referee declined so to find, and reported, as his conclusion of law, that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendant for the sum of $524.55, with interest from November 1, 1881.

The referee filed with his report an opinion in which he said that the defense, at first, proceeded upon the theory that the plaintiff had violated her agreement by not prosecuting and restraining infringers, but that defense was abandoned, because it appeared that she had assumed no such duty; and that "the defense was finally rested upon this sole ground: that the reissue of the patent in 1881 was entirely void, because it covered much more ground than the patent of 1867 as reissued in 1878, and that therefore the surrender of 1878 left no patent whatever existing;" but that the defendant was not in a position to raise this question, because it could not, in this action to recover the royalties agreed upon, deny the validity of the original patent or of any reissue thereof, so long as it had not been declared void by a court of competent jurisdiction, and while the defendant retained and acted under its license from the plaintiff.

The City Court of New York gave judgment for the plaintiff on the referee's report. That judgment was affirmed by the court of common pleas, and the defendant appealed to the court of appeals, which affirmed the judgment, and remitted the case to the City Court of New York. The opinion filed by the court of appeals, and included in the transcript sent up to this court, is mentioned, but not reported in full, in 106 N. Y. 651, and is copied in the margin.* [See 7 Cent. Rep. 790, for full report.]

*PECKHAM, J. We think this case is controlled by that of Marston v. Swett, reported upon two appeals to this court. See 66 N. Y. 206; 82 N. Y. 526.

The general and material features of the two cases are similar. In both there was an agreement on the part of the plaintiff to refrain from manufacturing, in consideration, among other things, of the promise of the defendant to pay the royalties. While continuing the manufacture under the license, the defendant ought not to escape liability to pay the royalties.

The defendant's counsel, it is true, seeks to distinguish this case from Marston v. Swett, supra, because, as he says, since the reissue of the patent in 1881, which he insists was wholly void, the defendant has no protection from the manufacture by others, for the reason that by the surrender of the patent of 1878 and the reissue of 1881 there was no valid patent in existence, and the consideration for the promise to pay royalties had therefore wholly failed.

There was consideration enough for the promise to pay such royalties, in that the plaintiff bound herself not to manufacture, and because the defendant could not be called to account as an alleged infringer while manufacturing under the license.

The defendant sued out this writ of error; and assigned for error, that the state courts, both of original and of appellate jurisdiction, had no power to entertain the issues in this action, because they involved directly and solely the validity of the letters patent reissued by the United States to the plaintiff on September 27, 1881. The defendant moved to dismiss the writ of error for want of jurisdiction, and also moved to affirm the judgment.

Mr. George W. Van Slyck, for defendant in error in support of motion:

There were no issues in the case involving directly or solely the validity of the letters patent, and hence the state court had jurisdiction.

The validity or invalidity of the reissued patent was an immaterial fact in this case, it being decided upon the contracts made between the parties.

Marston v. Swett, 66 N.Y. 212; S. C. 82 N.Y. 526; Jones v. Burnham, 67 Me. 93; Kinsman v. Parkhurst, 59 U. S. 18 How. 289 (15:385); Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. v. Wilson, 16 Jones & S. 160; Bartlett v. Holbrook, 1 Gray, 114.

The decision of the state courts was made exclusively on settled pre-existing rules of general jurisprudence.

Bank of West Tennessee v. Citizens Bank, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 9 (20:514); Palmer v. Marston, Id. 10 (20:826); Marqueze v. Bloom, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 351 (21:280); U. S. v. Central Pac. R. R. Co. 99 U. S. 454 (25:289); Hartell v. Tilghman, Id. 547 (25:357).

It is essential to the jurisdiction of this court that a federal question must have been presented to the state court, and that a decision upon such question was necessary.

Detroit City R. Co. v. Guthard, 114 U. S. 133 (29:118); Jenkins v. Loewenthal, 110 U. S. 222 (28:129); Chouteau v. Gibson, 111 U. S. 200 (28:400); Brown v. Atwell, 92 U. S. 327 (23:511); Barnes v. Dist. of Columbia, 91 U. S. 554 (23:444); Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590 (22:429); Ex parte Newman, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 154 (20:877); Parmelee v. Lawrence, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 38 (20:49); Jacks v. Helena, 115 U. S. 288 (29:392).

Mr. Edward D. McCarthy, in opposition:

This reissue of patent has been declared void.

Hyatt v. Southworth, 15 Fed. Rep. 751; Hyatt v. Lindsay, U. S. C. Ct. So. Dist. N. Y. Dec. 18, 1884.

The opinion of the court below cannot be resorted to.

Gibson v. Chouteau, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 317 (19:317); Rector v. Ashley, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 142 (18:783); Williams v. Norris, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 117 (6:571).

Opinions will be read in aid of construction of the record.

Philadelphia Fire Asso. v. New York, 119 U. S. 116 (30:345).

Licensee estopped from refusing to pay royalties, because of the patent's alleged invalidity.

Taylor v. Hare, 1 Bos. & P. N. R. 260; Williams v. Hicks, 2 Vt. 36; Marston v. Swett, 66 N. Y. 206.

When the plaintiff's patent is put in question by the pleadings in a state court, the jurisdiction is in the courts of the United States exclusively.

Saxton v. Dodge, 57 Barb. 118; Elmer v. Pennel, 40 Me. 434; Ball v. Murry, 10 Pa. 118; Dudley v. Mayhew, 3 N.Y. 14; Gibson v. Woodworth, 8 Paige, 132; Burrall v. Jewett, 2 Paige, 134.

That the Commissioner of Patents has granted letters is not equivalent to the decision of a federal court.

Russell v. Dodge, 93 U. S. 460 (23:973); Woodward v. Dinsmore, 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 163.

State courts have jurisdiction when the validity of a patent comes up incidentally, or is only a matter of evidence not essential to the judgment.

Dickinson v. Hall, 14 Pick. 217; Cross v.

If it were a question of the validity of the reissue of 1881, and a decision of that question were necessary to the decision of this case, the defendant is, of course, correct in his claim that a state court has no jurisdiction to determine such an issue; but within the decision of the Marston Case no such question arises. The defendant has protection enough to base its promise to pay royalty upon as long as it so conducts itself towards the plaintiff as to prevent her from treating it as an infringer. In other words, so long as the defendant continues to manufacture under its license (the patent not having been legally annulled), and thus elects to treat the agreement as in existence, it prevents the plaintiff from treating the defendant in any other light than that of a licensee. If the defendant desired to repudiate any obligation under this agreement, it should have given notice to the plaintiff that it refused to longer recognise its binding force, and that it would thereafter manufacture under a claim of right founded upon the alleged invalidity of the patent. Otherwise, the defendant in claiming to manufacture under the license and refusing to pay the royalties thereunder would, if successful, prevent the plaintiff from recovering anything from it. She could not treat the defendant as an infringer, because it was manufacturing under a license from her; and she could not collect the royalties under the license (although herself refraining from manufacturing, as she had agreed), because the defendant would allege the invalidity of the patent, although continuing to manufacture under cover of a license from its owner. Such doctrine cannot stand a moment. Of course, as is said in the Marston Case, from the time that the patent is annulled by proper legal proceedings no royalties could be collected, even though no notice of the repudiation of the agreement had been thereafter served.

There is another ground upon which it seems to me this judgment might well rest. Under the clause in the agreement between the parties, which provided for a forfeiture of all rights thereunder if one party should willfully violate one of its provisions, the plaintiff gave notice of such forfeiture to the defendant, based upon its refusal to pay the royalties which it had acknowledged to be due for the quarter ending October 31, 1881 (the very quarter in question here), an account of which it had rendered under the oath of its secretary, as provided for in such agreement. Subsequently to the service of such notice, the plaintiff withdrew the same at the request of the defendant and upon its promise to pay these very royalties which it had already acknowledged to be due. A failure to carry out such promise gives, as it seems to me, a good cause of action.

The defendant says there was no consideration for such a promise, because there was no patent upon which to ground a license, and the defendant therefore had no license and no protection; but the plaintiff of course contended that the reissued patent was valid, and at the request of the defendant the plaintiff withdrew her notice of forfeiture of the license, and thus reinstated the defendant in its possession, and freed it from the liability to be proceeded against as an infringer and put to expense and inconvenience in the defense of such a litigation. This was saved at the request of the defendant, and upon its special promise to pay the royalties. Plainly here was a good and sufficient consideration for the defendant's promise.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs. All concur.

Huntley, 13 Wend. 385; Head v. Stevens, 19 Wend. 411; Bliss v. Negus, 8 Mass. 46.

Whenever it becomes necessary to try the patent itself, then the state court loses jurisdiction.

Hartell v. Tilghman, 99 U. S. 550 (25: 358); Burr v. Gregory, 2 Paine, 426; Brooks v. Stolley, 3 McLean, 523; Mercerole v. Union Paper Collar Co. 6 Blatchf. 356; Wilson v. Sandford, 51 U. S. 10 How. 99 (13:344); Continental Store Service Co. v. Clark, 100 N. Y. 368.

Neither is it essential that the pleadings should present the jurisdictional issue.

Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 442 (24:761).

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant contended in the courts of New York that those courts had no jurisdiction, because the plaintiff's right to maintain her action depended upon the question whether the second reissue of her patent was valid or invalid under the Patent Laws of the United States, and that of that question the courts of the United States had exclusive jurisdiction. The judgments of each court of the State, holding that the question of the validity of that reissue could not be contested in this action, and assuming jurisdiction to render judgment against the defendant, necessarily involved a decision against the immunity claimed by the defendant under the Constitution and laws of the United States, which this court has jurisdiction to review.

The motion to dismiss must therefore be denied. But the decision was so clearly right, that the motion to affirm is granted.

The action was upon an agreement in writing, by which the plaintiff, as owner of letters patent, already once reissued, granted to the defendant an exclusive license to make and sell the patented articles within a certain territory, during the term of the patent and of any extension or renewal thereof; and the defendant expressly acknowledged the validity of the letters patent, and stipulated that the plaintiff might, without prejudice to this agreement, obtain further reissues, and promised to pay to the plaintiff certain royalties, so long as no decision adverse to the validity of the patent should have been rendered.

The defendant contended that this was a case arising under the patent laws, of which the courts of the United States have exclusive jurisdiction. Rev. Stat. § 629, cl. 9; § 711, cl. 5. But it is clearly established by a series of decisions of this court that an action upon such an agreement as that here sued on is not a case arising under the patent laws.

It has been decided that a bill in equity in the Circuit Court of the United States by the owner of letters patent, to enforce a contract for the use of the patent right, or to set aside such a contract because the defendant has not complied with its terms, is not within the Acts of Congress, by which an appeal to this court is allowable in cases arising under the patent laws, without regard to the value of the matter in controversy. Act of July 4, 1836, chap. 357, § 17, 5 Stat. at L. 124; Rev. Stat. § 699; Wilson v. Sandford, 51 U. S. 10 How. 99 [13:344]; Brown v. Shannon, 61 U. S. 20 How. 55 [15: 826].

Following those decisions, it was directly adjudged in Hartell v. Tilghman, 99 U. S. 547 [25: 357], that a bill in equity by a patentee, alleging that the defendants had broken a contract by which they had agreed to pay him a certain royalty for the use of his invention and to take a license from him, and thereupon he forbade them to use it, and they disregarded the prohibition, and he filed this bill charging them as infringers, and praying for an injunction, an account of profits, and damages, was not a case arising under the patent laws, and therefore, the parties being citizens of the same State, not within the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States. And the judges who dissented from that conclusion admitted it to be perfectly well settled "that where a suit is brought on a contract of which a patent is the subject matter, either to enforce such contract, or to annul it, the case arises on the contract, or out of the contract, and not under the patent laws." 99 U. S. 558 [25: 361].

In the still later case of Albright v. Teas, 106 U. S. 613 [27: 295], a patentee filed a bill in equity in a state court, setting up a contract by which he agreed to assign his patent to the defendants and they agreed to pay him certain royalties, and alleging that the defendants had refused to account for or pay such royalties to him, and had fraudulently excluded him from inspecting their books of account. The defendants answered that the plaintiff had been paid all the royalties to which he was entitled, and that, if he claimed more, it was because he insisted that goods made under another patent were an infringement of his. This court held that it was not a case arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, removable as such into the circuit court under the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, § 2, 18 Stat. at L. 470.

It was said by Chief Justice Taney in Wilson v. Sandford, and repeated by the court in Hartell v. Tilghman, and in Albright v. Teas: "The dispute in this case does not arise under any Act of Congress; nor does the decision depend upon the construction of any law in relation to patents. It arises out of the contract stated in the bill; and there is no Act of Congress providing for or regulating contracts of this kind. The rights of the parties depend altogether upon common-law and equity principles." 10 How. 101, 102 [13: 345]; 99 U. S. 552 [25: 359]; 106 U. S. 619 [27:298].

Those words are equally applicable to the present case, except that, as it is an action at law, the principles of equity have no bearing. This action, therefore, was within the jurisdiction, and, the parties being citizens of the same State, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the state courts; and the only federal question in the case was rightly decided.

Upon the merits of the case, it follows from what has been already said, that no question is presented, of which this court, upon this writ of error, has jurisdiction. Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590 [22: 429]. The grounds of the judgment below appear in the opinion of the court of appeals, to which, under the existing Acts of Congress, this court is at liberty to refer. Philadelphia Fire Asso. v. New York, 119 U. S. 110 [30: 342]; Kreiger v. Shelby R. R. Co. 125 U. S. 39 [ante, 675].

Whether that court was right in its suggestion that it would have no jurisdiction to determine the validity of the second reissue if incidentally drawn in question in an action upon an agreement between the parties, we need not consider; inasmuch as it expressly declined to pass upon any such question, because it held that, in this action to recover royalties due under the agreement, the defendant, while continuing to enjoy the privileges of the license, was estopped to deny the validity of the patent, or of any reissue thereof. The decision was based upon the contract between the parties; and the court did not decide, nor was it necessary for the determination of the case that it should decide, any question depending on the construction or effect of the Patent Laws of the United States. Kinsman v. Parkhurst, 59 U. S. 18 How. 289 [15: 385]; Brown v. Atwell, 92 U. S. 327 [23: 511].

Judgment affirmed.

BENJAMIN F. FELIX, Plff. in Err.,
v.
WILLIAM SCHARNWEBER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 54–60.)

Federal question, what is—certificate allowing writ of error.

1. An action upon a contract in writing between joint owners of a patent to recover royalties, by which it was agreed that defendant should have control of the manufacture and sale of the patented article, paying to the plaintiff a certain royalty on each article sold, is not a case within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal court, and does not present any federal question, no ruling upon the validity or the construction of the patent having been made.

2. The certificate of the Chief Justice of the state court allowing the writ of error, that a federal question arose and was decided against the plaintiff in error, cannot supply the want of all evidence to that effect in the record.

[No. 1255.]

Submitted Jan. 16, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois, to review a judgment of that court affirming a judgment of the Appellate Court, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court of Cook County for the plaintiff, in an action of assumpsit to recover royalties.

On motion to dismiss. Dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Reported below, 7 West. Rep. 441, 119 Ill. 445.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action of assumpsit, brought in the Circuit Court of Cook County in the State of Illinois by Scharnweber against Felix to recover royalties under the following contract signed by both parties:

"Memorandum of agreement between Benjamin F. Felix and William Scharnweber, both of the City of Chicago, made this 12th day of February, 1878, witnesseth: That, whereas, the said Benjamin F. Felix and William Scharnweber are joint proprietors of a certain patent for an improved rope reel, and it is mutually decided between them that the interests of both are best subserved by one of them having exclusive control of the manufacture and sale of said reel: It is hereby agreed that the said Benjamin F. Felix shall make such arrangements as may appear most desirable to him for their manufacture, and supervise and direct solely their sale. On each and every rope reel sold, the said William Scharnweber is to receive a royalty of one dollar, to be paid to him on the last business day of each and every month. The said William Scharnweber agrees not to manufacture any rope reels whatever, or cause them to be manufactured, but can make sales and report the same to Benjamin F. Felix, or Felix, Marston & Blair, who will deliver and collect for the same."

The defendant pleaded nonassumpsit, with notice that he would prove a failure of consideration by the plaintiff's manufacturing rope reels and selling them to third persons.

At the trial, the plaintiff offered evidence that at first the reels made under the contract worked satisfactorily, but afterwards the defendant complained to him that they had too many coils and needed larger rolls; that thereupon, in January, 1879, he made and showed to the defendant a model of a reel with little pieces of cast iron on the wooden roller, so as to form a screw to hold the flanges; and that reels subsequently sold by the defendant, made from a later model furnished by one Mason, were of the same construction, except in being wholly of iron, and that there was no difference in principle between them. The defendant objected to the admission of this evidence, as going to show that the plaintiff invented the new style of reel, and as collaterally attacking another patent. The court admitted the evidence, and the defendant excepted to its admission.

The defendant afterwards offered in evidence a patent issued to Mason on June 10, 1879, for the iron reel, "for the purpose of showing, or tending to show, that this reel was not the same reel as that patented on January 29, 1878, and referred to in the contract." The plaintiff objected to its admission, on the ground that it had nothing whatever to do with this suit on the contract. But the court admitted it.

The defendant also put in evidence the patent of January 29, 1878, to Felix and Scharnweber, as well as evidence tending to show that the old style of reel did not work well, and was unsatisfactory to purchasers, and called Mason as a witness, who testified that he invented the reel described in his patent.

It was admitted on both sides that the defendant had made and sold 335 of what he called the old style or original style of rope reels, on which he had paid the plaintiff a royalty of one dollar each, and 2164 of what the defendant called the new style, on which no royalty had been paid.

The court instructed the jury that if they should find from the evidence that the plaintiff and defendant executed the contract sued on, and that the defendant thereafter sold rope reels such as or substantially like the rope reel mentioned in the contract, the plaintiff was entitled to recover under the contract for all such rope reels sold by the defendant, if any.

The defendant excepted to this instruction, and requested the court to instruct the jury as follows:

"This is an action on a contract for royalty claimed upon the sale of certain rope reels invented by the plaintiff and sold by defendant or his firm. Under this contract, as alleged in the declaration, the defendant is liable only for royalty unpaid, if any, on such reels sold by him or his said firm as are contemplated or covered by the terms of the contract. He is not liable in this suit for royalty on any other [and] different reels, whether invented by him, by the plaintiff, or anyone else."

The court at first refused to give this instruction; and the defendant excepted to the refusal. The court then modified the instruction requested, by inserting the word "and," as above printed in brackets, and gave the instruction so modified. The bill of exceptions contained these further statements:

"To which action of the court in modifying said instruction the defendant duly excepted.

"Thereupon the court further charged the jury for the defendant as follows: Therefore, unless you find from the evidence that the defendant owes to the plaintiff royalty upon a sale of the original Scharnweber reels made substantially as these reels were made at the date of the contract between the parties, then your verdict should be for the defendant.

"No other instructions were given to the jury by the court."

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,255. The defendant moved for a new trial; but, upon the plaintiff's remitting the sum of $91 from the verdict, the court overruled the motion. The defendant excepted to this ruling, and judgment was rendered upon the verdict.

The defendant appealed to the Appellate Court for the First District of Illinois, assigning for error the admission of incompetent evidence for the plaintiff, and the charge to the jury. The appellate court affirmed the judgment.

The defendant then appealed to the Supreme Court of Illinois, which affirmed the judgment of the appellate court, and in the opinion filed with its clerk held that the charge of the court to the jury was as full and favorable to the defendant as the law would warrant, inasmuch as it confined the issue to the number of reels sold under the contract; and the question of fact how many machines were sold by the defendant under the contract was conclusively settled by the findings of the lower courts; and that in the admission of the testimony objected to by the defendant there was no error, certainly none that could affect the merits of the case under the instructions given to the jury. 119 Ill. 445.

A writ of error was allowed by the acting Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Illinois, upon the petition of the defendant, representing that in said case in that court the defendant set up and relied on the patent granted by the United States to Mason on June 10, 1879, the validity of that patent was assailed, and the decision was against the rights and privileges set up by the defendant under it; and also that in said proceedings he alleged that the jurisdiction to try the questions so involved was exclusively in the courts of the United States, and the decision of the court was against him. The plaintiff moved to dismiss the writ of error for want of jurisdiction.

Mr. Henry Decker, for defendant in error in support of motion:

The following cases refer to contracts relating to patents and hold that where the suit is brought on such a contract no question arises under the Constitution and Laws of the United States which gives the federal court jurisdiction.

Wilson v. Sandford, 51 U. S. 10 How. 99 (13:344); Hartell v. Tilghman, 99 U. S. 547 (25:357); Merserole v. Union Paper Collar Co. 6 Blatchf. 356; Goodyear v. Day, 1 Blatchf. 565; Goodyear v. Union India Rubber Co. 4 Blatchf. 63; Blanchard v. Sprague, 1 Cliff. 298; Ingalls v. Tice, 14 Fed. Rep. 352; Kelly v. Porter, 17 Fed. Rep. 519; Teas v. Albright, 13 Fed. Rep. 406; Rich v. Atwater, 16 Conn. 409; Middlebrook v. Broadbent, 47 N. Y. 443; Brooks v. Stolley, 3 McLean, 525.

Motions similar to this were entertained by this court in the cases of Evans v. Brown, 109 U. S. 180 (27:898); Foster v. Kansas, 112 U. S. 206 (28:697).

Messrs. Burton C. Cook and John A. Jameson, for plaintiff in error in opposition:

To give a construction to a patent means to determine its principle and its scope.

Wilson v. Sandford, 51 U. S. 10 How. 99 (13:344).

It is sufficient to confer jurisdiction that the question was decided adversely to the plaintiff in error and that the court was induced by it to make the judgment which it did.

Furman v. Nichol, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 56 (19:375).

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This record does not present any federal question. No such question is stated in the pleadings, involved in the rulings at the trial or in the final judgment, or mentioned in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois.

The action was brought upon a contract in writing between the parties, being the joint owners of a patent for an improved rope reel, by which it was agreed that the defendant should have the exclusive control of the manufacture and sale of the reel, paying to the plaintiff a certain royalty on each reel sold. This was not a case arising under the Patent Laws of the United States, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts; Dale Tile Mfg. Co. v. Hyatt, 125 U. S. 46 [ante, 683]; and no suggestion that it was appears by the record to have been made in either of the courts of the State.

The only exceptions taken by the defendant at the trial were to the admission of evidence offered by the plaintiff, and to the instructions given by the court to the jury.

But that evidence does not appear to have been admitted for any other purpose than to show that the reels made and sold by the defendant were substantially like those mentioned in the agreement sued on. At the time of its admission, no letters patent were in the case. The question at issue was not of priority of invention, or of the validity or construction of any patent, but simply whether the reels made and sold by the defendant were such as, or substantially like, those mentioned in his contract with the plaintiff; and in the instructions to the jury the plaintiff's right of recovery was carefully limited to such reels. The patent to Mason was introduced in evidence afterwards, and by the defendant himself, against the plaintiff's objection; and no ruling upon the validity or the construction of either patent, or upon the legal effect of the evidence, was requested by the defendant, or made by the court.

The petition, upon which the writ of error was allowed by the acting Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Illinois, does indeed represent that the patent to Mason was set up by the defendant and its validity assailed, and that the defendant also alleged that the jurisdiction to try the questions involved was exclusively in the courts of the United States, and that the decision of the state court was against him on both of these points.

But in allowing a writ of error from this court to the highest court of a State, and in issuing a citation, the Chief Justice of that court does but exercise an authority vested by Congress in him concurrently with each of the justices of this court. Rev. Stat. § 999; Gleason v. Florida, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 779 [19: 780]; Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 26 [20: 792]. When counsel applying for the allowance of a writ of error insist that a federal question has been decided against the plaintiff in error, the Chief Justice of the state court may feel bound to allow the writ, for the purpose of submitting to the final determination of this court whether such a question was necessarily involved in the judgment sought to be reviewed. But his certificate that such a question arose and was decided against the plaintiff in error cannot supply the want of all evidence to that effect in the record. As has been more than once observed by this court, "the office of the certificate, as it respects the federal question, is to make more certain and specific what is too general and indefinite in the record, but is incompetent to originate the question." Parmelee v. Lawrence, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 36, 39 [20: 48, 49]; Brown v. Atwell, 92 U. S. 327, 330 [23: 511, 513]. See also Adams County v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co. 112 U. S 123, 129 [28: 678, 680].

Writ of error dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

NATIONAL BANK OF REDEMPTION,

Plff. in Err.,

v.

CITY OF BOSTON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 60-70.)

Taxation of national bank shares—savings banks—bank owning shares of other banks.

1. However much may be the amount of deposits in savings banks which the State exempts from taxation, that exemption does not affect the rule for the taxation of shares in national banks, provided they are taxed at a rate no greater than other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens, otherwise subject to taxation.

2. Savings banks, organized for the purpose of investing the savings of small depositors, are not banking institutions in the commercial sense of that phrase.

3. The Massachusetts law permits the taxation of a national bank, owning shares of the capital stock of another national bank, by reason of that ownership, on the same footing with all other shares.

[No. 1824.]

Argued Feb. 14, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action by a national bank to recover a tax alleged to have been illegally assessed. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated by the court.

Messrs. George S. Hale, Chas. W. Wells and Willard Brown, for plaintiff in error:

Under the provisions of the Act of March 3, 1875, Circuit Courts of the United States have original cognizance. In this class of cases the residence of the parties is immaterial.

Osborn v. Bank of U. S. 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 818, 818–823 (6:222–224); Trebilcock v. Wilson, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 687 (20:460).

Shares of national banking associations are subject to taxation at no greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital.

People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 539, 543 (25:705, 706); Mercantile Nat. Bank v. Mayor of N. Y. 121 U. S. 154 (30:901).

By Statutes of 1866, chapter 184, 14 Stat. at L. 188, the dividends of banks, trust companies and savings institutions were taxed.

Oulton v. German Sav. & L. Society, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 109 (21:618).

Savings banks are not benevolent or charitable institutions.

Sheren v. Mendenhall, 23 Minn. 92.

Corporations created by statute can exercise no powers and have no rights except such as are expressly given, or necessarily implied.

Huntington v. National Sav. Bank, 96 U. S. 388 (24:777); First Nat. Bank of Manhattan v. Citizens Bank of Topeka, 21 Int. Rev. Rec. 382.

The taxation in question is disproportionate and unequal.

People v. Weaver, supra; Pelton v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 143 (25:901); Cummings v. Merchants Nat. Bank, Id. 153 (25:903).

A corporation is a "person."

Louisville, C. & C. R. R. Co. v. Letson, 43 U. S. 2 How 497 (11:353); Osborn v. Bank of U. S. 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 739 (6:204); Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168 (19:357); U. S. v. Amedy, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 392 (6:502); Boyer v. Boyer, 113 U. S. 689 (28:1089); Otis Co. v. Ware, 8 Gray, 509.

Shares in banks are to be taxed in the city valuation like the property of residents.

Tappan v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 490 (22:189).

Franchise tax is not a tax on property.

Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 255; Commonwealth v. People's Savings Bank, 5 Allen, 428; Commonwealth v. Provident Sav. Inst. 12 Allen, 312; Oliver v. Washington Mills, 11 Allen, 268; Commonwealth v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 12 Allen, 298; Manufacturers Ins. Co. v. Loud, 99 Mass. 146; Commonwealth v. Lancaster Sav. Bank, 123 Mass. 493; Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 632 (18:904).

The capital of the Bank cannot be taxed.

Van Allen v. Albany Assessors, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 573 (18:229); Austin v. Boston, 14 Allen, 359; First Nat. Bank v. Kentucky, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 353 (19:701.)

The earnings and moneys of a corporation are not the separate property of the stockholders.

Morawetz, Corp. §§ 450, 451, 465; Minot v. Paine, 99 Mass. 101, 106; Rand v. Hubbell, 115 Mass. 461, 474; Hyatt v. Allen, 56 N. Y. 553.

The proper form of action in Massachusetts to recover back a tax illegally assessed is assumpsit.

Lincoln v. Worcester, 8 Cush. 55 and cases cited; U. S. Bank v. Bank of Washington, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 8 (8:299).

A state statute might compel a national bank to pay a legal tax assessed to its shareholders on their shares.

First Nat. Bank v. Kentucky, supra.

If such a tax is illegal, the bank is entitled to recover it back.

Cummings v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153 (25:903); Hill v. National Albany Exchange Bank, 105 U. S. 319 (26:1052); Allen v. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. 114 U. S. 311 (29:200); Albany City Nat. Bank v. Maher, 20 Blatchf. 341.

Payment under protest to a collector holding a warrant is compulsory.

Preston v. Boston, 12 Pick. 7; Boston & S. Glass Co. v. Boston, 4 Met. 181; Joyner v. Egremont Third School Dist. 8 Cush. 567; Lee v. Templeton, 13 Gray, 476; Goodrich v. Lunenburg, 9 Gray, 88; Erskine v. Van Arsdale, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 75 (21:63); Carleton v. Ashburnham, 102 Mass. 343; Wilson v. Shearer, 9 Met. 504; Sherwin v. Mudge, 127 Mass. 547; Knowles v. Boston, 129 Mass. 551; Hunnewell v. Charlestown, 106 Mass. 350; Norton v. Boston, 119 Mass. 194.

An application for abatement is the proper remedy when the taxpayer complains only of an excessive valuation.

Osborn v. Danvers, 6 Pick, 98; Bates v. Boston, 5 Cush. 98; Lincoln v. Worcester, 8 Cush. 55; Bourne v. Boston, 2 Gray, 494; Davis v. Macy, 124 Mass. 193.

This rule does not apply to assessments on distinct subjects of taxation (as real or personal estate), on one only of which the taxpayer is legally liable to assessment.

Preston v. Boston, 12 Pick. 7.

Messrs. George F. Hoar and Andrew J. Bailey, for defendant in error:

The Bank cannot maintain a suit to recover back the amount paid for tax on its shares.

Albany County v. Stanley, 105 U.S. 305 (26: 1044); Williams v. Albany County, 122 U. S. 154 (30:1088); Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 13, § 9.

The payment was voluntary. Plaintiff cannot make such payment the foundation of a suit.

Wabaunsee County v. Walker, 8 Kan. 431; Preston v. Boston, 12 Pick. 14; Union Pac. R. R. Co. v. Dodge County, 98 U. S. 541, 545 (25: 196, 197); Elliott v. Swartwout, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 137 (9:373); Lamborn v. Dickinson County, 97 U. S. 181 (24:926); U. S. v. Lawson, 101 U. S. 164 (25:860); U. S. v. Ellsworth, Id. 170 (25: 863); Swift & C. & B Co. v. U. S. 111 U. S. 22 (28:341); Boston & S. Glass Co. v. Boston, 4 Met. 181; Forbes v. Appleton, 5 Cush. 115; Benson v. Monroe, 7 Cush. 125; Lee v. Templeton, 13 Gray, 476; Barrett v. Cambridge, 10 Allen, 48; Marriot v. Hampton, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 400; Brown v. McKinally, 1 Esp. 279; Cooley, Tax. 2d ed. 809; Loud v. Charlestown, 99 Mass. 208.

The plaintiff in error had a clear and sufficient remedy by an application to the assessors for abatement.

Osborn v. Danvers, 6 Pick. 100; Boston Water Power Co. v. Boston, 9 Met. 204; Bates v. Boston, 5 Cush. 98; Howe v. Boston, 7 Cush. 273; Lincoln v. Worcester, 8 Cush. 55; Wright v. Boston, 9 Cush. 233; Bourne v. Boston, 2 Gray, 494; Chapel of Good Shepherd v. Boston, 120 Mass. 212; Davis v. Macy, 124 Mass. 193; Stanley v. Albany County, 121 U. S. 535 (30: 1000); Williams v. Albany County, 122 U. S. 154 (30:1088).

The purpose which controlled the enactment has been recently stated.

Mercantile Nat. Bank v. Mayor of N. Y. 121 U. S. 138 (30.895); National Newark Bkg. Co. v. Newark, Id. 168 (30:904); Davenport Nat. Bank v. Davenport Equalization Board, 128 U. S. 83 (ante, 94).

National banks cannot be taxed without the consent of Congress. Consent may be given upon condition.

Van Allen v. Albany Assessors, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 573 (18:229).

The condition is violated if there is unfair discrimination against bank capital.

Boyer v. Boyer, 113 U. S. 689 (28:1089); Pelton v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 143 (25: 901); People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 539 (25:705); Albany County v. Stanley, 105 U. S. 305 (26: 1044); Hill v. National Albany Exchange Bank, Id. 319 (26:1052); Evansville Bank v. Britton, Id. 322 (26:1053); Cummings v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153 (25:903); Commonwealth v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 12 Allen, 298; Manufacturers Ins. Co. v. Loud, 99 Mass. 146.

If impartiality of result be obtained, the application of different methods of procedure to different kinds of property is unobjectionable.

Kentucky R. R. Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321 (29: 414); Lionberger v. Rouse, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 468 (19:721); Adams v. Nashville, 95 U. S. 19 (24: 369).

It is competent for the States, under the permission of Congress to tax the shares of national bank stock.

People v. Tax Comrs. 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 244 (18:344); Hepburn v. Carlisle School Directors, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 480 (23:112); Delaware R. R. Tax, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 206 (21:888); Tappan v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 490 (22:189); First Nat. Bank v. Kentucky, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 353 (19:701).

The State may make exemptions.

Adams v. Nashville, 95 U. S. 19 (24:369); Bradley v. Illinois, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 459 (18: 433); Austin v. Boston, 14 Allen, 359.

There is nothing to show that there were any shareholders of the plaintiff Bank who had any debts they were entitled to deduct from the value of their shares.

Stanley v. Albany County, 121 U. S. 535 (30: 1000); Austin v. Boston, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 694 (19:224); Hill v. National Albany Exchange Bank, and Evansville Bank v. Britton, supra.

The decisions of state courts interpreting their own Constitutions or laws will ordinarily be held to be binding on the supreme court.

Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425 (30: 178); Fairfield v. Gallatin County, 100 U. S. 47

(25:544); Chambers County v. Clews, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 317–324 (22:517–520); Rowan v. Runnels, 46 U. S. 5 How. 139 (12:87); Richmond v. Smith, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 429 (21:200); State R. R. Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575 (23:663); Green v. Neal, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 291 (8:402); U. S. v. Morrison, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 134 (7:807); Kibbe v. Ditto, 93 U. S. 674 (23:1005); Moores v. Citizens Nat. Bank, 104 U. S. 625 (26:870); Williams v. Kirtland, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 306 (20:683); Walker v. State Harbor Comrs. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 648 (21:744).

The Fourteenth Amendment was framed for the purpose of protecting the negro race.

Slaughter House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36 (21:394); Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 306 (25:665); Ex parte Virginia, Id. 344 (25: 678); Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S. 94 (28:643).

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law, brought by the plaintiff in error, a national bank located in Boston, to recover from the City of Boston the amount of $14,464, paid to the tax collector of the City, upon demand, he then holding a tax list and warrant for its collection, after a protest in writing; being an amount which it alleges was illegally assessed on its shares at $12.80 per $1,000 of valuation, in violation of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes, of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution, and of the provisions of the Constitution of the State of Massachusetts. The cause was submitted to the court without the intervention of a jury. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant upon an agreed statement of facts. That judgment is brought here upon this writ of error.

The tax in question was levied under chapter 13 of the Public Statutes of Massachusetts, relative to the taxation of bank shares, as follows:

"Sec. 8. All the shares of stock in banks, whether of issue or not, existing by authority of the United States or of the Commonwealth and located within the Commonwealth, shall be assessed to the owners thereof in the cities or towns where such banks are located, and not elsewhere, in the assessment of all state, county, and town taxes, imposed and levied in such place, whether such owner is a resident of said city or town or not; all such shares shall be assessed at their fair cash value on the first day of May, first deducting therefrom the proportionate part of the value of the real estate belonging to the bank, at the same rate and no greater than that at which other moneyed capital in the hand of citizens and subject to taxation is by law assessed. And the persons or corporations who appear from the records of the banks to be owners of shares at the close of the business day next preceding the first day of May in each year, shall be taken and deemed to be the owners thereof for the purposes of this section.

"Sec. 9. Every such bank or other corporation shall pay to the collector, or other person authorized to collect the taxes of the city or town in which the same is located, at the time in each year when other taxes assessed in the said city or town become due, the amount of the tax so assessed in such year upon the shares in such bank or other corporation. If such tax is not so paid, the said bank or other corporation shall be liable for the same; and the said tax, with interest thereon, at the rate of twelve per cent per annum from the day when the tax became due, may be recovered in an action of contract brought by the treasurer of such city or town.

"Sec. 10. The shares of such banks or other corporations shall be subject to the tax paid thereon by the corporation or by the officers thereof, and the corporation and the officers thereof shall have a lien on all the shares in such bank or other corporation, and on all the rights and property of the shareholders in the corporate property for the payment of said taxes."

From these sections it appears that:

1. The shares in national banks are to be assessed at their fair cash value, after deducting therefrom the proportionate part of the value of the real estate belonging to the bank.

2. They are to be assessed at the same rate and no greater than that at which other moneyed capital in the hands of citizens and subject to taxation is by law assessed.

3. The bank itself, as a corporation, is made liable in the first instance for the payment of the taxes so assessed upon its shares belonging to its shareholders.

4. If not paid when due, the bank is liable to an action for the recovery of the same, brought by the treasurer of the city or town in which it is located, with interest thereon at the rate of twelve per cent per annum from the day when the tax became due.

5. For the payment of said taxes the corporation has a lien on all the shares in the bank and on all the rights and property of the shareholders in the corporate property, as an indemnity.

It further appears, from a comparison of the statutes on the subject, that the action given by section 9, for the recovery of the taxes, with interest at twelve per cent per annum, is the only mode of collection provided in case of default, no power being given to any collecting officer to proceed by distraint or other seizure of the property of the bank or the shares of the stock for that purpose.

Chapter 11 of the Public Statutes of Massachusetts provides that personal property, for the purposes of taxation, shall include goods, chattels, money, and effects wherever they are, money at interest, and other debts due the persons to be taxed more than they are indebted or pay interest for, but not including in such debts or indebtedness any loan on mortgage of real estate taxable as real estate, except the excess of such loan above the assessed value of the mortgaged real estate; public stocks and securities; stocks in turnpikes, bridges and moneyed corporations within or without the State; the income from an annuity, from ships and vessels engaged in the foreign carrying trade, and so much of the income from a profession, trade, or other employment as exceeds the sum of $2,000 a year; but no income shall be taxed derived from property subject to taxation, and no taxes shall be assessed upon the shares in the capital stock of a corporation organized or chartered in the Commonwealth which pays a tax upon its corporate franchises, except for school, district, and parish purposes.

It is not disputed but that under these and other provisions of the law all personal estate included within this enumeration and real estate are taxable and were taxed upon their fair cash value at the same rate of $12.80 for each $1,000 of value levied during the same period upon shares of capital stock of national banks located in Boston. The amount of personal property in the City of Boston taxed during that period and at that rate is stated to be $189,605,672. The aggregate value of shares in national banks in that City for the same year was $60,428,000.

Corporations chartered by the Commonwealth or organized under general laws, for purposes of business or profit, having a capital stock divided into shares, excepting banks, are subject to a tax upon their corporate franchises. For purposes of taxation, the law requires the corporate franchise in each case to be estimated at a valuation thereof equal to the aggregate value of the shares in its capital stock. The rate of taxation is determined by an apportionment of the whole amount of money to be raised by taxation upon property in the Commonwealth during the same current year, as returned by the assessors of the several cities and towns, upon the aggregate valuation of all the cities and towns for the preceding year. From the valuation of the corporate franchise, there is to be deducted, in case of railroad and telegraph companies whose lines extend beyond the limits of the Commonwealth, such a portion of the whole valuation of their capital stock as is proportional to the length of that part of their line without the Commonwealth, and also an amount equal to the value of their real estate and machinery located and subject to local taxation within the Commonwealth; the same deduction as to real estate and machinery being made in case of other corporations.

Savings banks are required to pay to the treasurer of the State a tax on account of their depositors of one half of one per cent per annum on the amount of their deposits, excluding so much of the deposits as are invested in real estate used for banking purposes, or in loans secured by mortgages on taxable real estate, and also for a certain period so much of the deposits as are invested in real estate, the title to which has been acquired by the completion of foreclosure or by purchase; and such deposits so taxed are otherwise exempt from taxation in the hands of their owners.

Life insurance companies are required to pay an excise tax at the rate of one quarter of one per cent per annum upon a valuation equal to the aggregate net value of all policies, in force on the last day of the year next preceding, held by residents of the Commonwealth. All other insurance companies pay a tax by way of excise of one per cent on all premiums received during the year for insurance, and one per cent on all assessments made by such companies upon policy holders.

The Massachusetts Hospital Life Insurance Company is required to pay a tax upon all deposits, trust funds, or funds held for purposes of investment, except upon deposits invested in loans secured by mortgages on taxable real estate, the same rate of tax imposed upon savings banks on account of deposits; and the same rule applies to all trust companies, safe deposit and trust companies, banking and trust companies, loan and trust companies, and other moneyed corporations incorporated in the Commonwealth. The American Bell Telephone Company is subjected to a franchise tax, based upon an apportionment made upon the number of telephones in use by it, or under its authority, or with its permission, or under letters patent owned or controlled by it, within and without the Commonwealth, respectively, deducting the market value of all stocks in other corporations held by it upon which a tax has been assessed and actually paid, either in Massachusetts or in other States, for the preceding year.

Savings banks, under the laws of the Commonwealth, are authorized to receive deposits from any person until they amount to $1,000, and to allow interest thereon to be compounded until the principal with the accrued interest amounts to $1,000, no interest to be paid on any greater sum. The deposits are to be invested only as follows: 1. In first mortgages of real estate situated in the Commonwealth to an amount not to exceed 60 per cent of the valuation of such real estate, but not exceeding 70 per cent of the whole amount of deposits. 2. In public funds of the United States and of certain enumerated States and municipal corporations, or in the notes of any citizen of the Commonwealth secured by a pledge of any such securities at their par value. 3. In the first mortgage bonds of certain descriptions of railroad companies, or in the notes of any citizen of the Commonwealth, secured by a pledge of any such securities at not less than 80 per cent of the par value thereof. 4. In certain bank stocks, including the stocks of national banks located in the New England States, or on the notes of any citizen with such bank stocks as collateral security, at not more than 80 per cent of the market value thereof, and not exceeding the par value thereof, but the amount of such investments in such bank stocks is specifically limited. 5. In loans upon the personal notes of depositors of the corporation, not exceeding one half of the amount of the deposit, in which case the deposit is held as collateral security for the payment of the loan. 6. If the deposits cannot be conveniently invested in the modes heretofore named, not exceeding one third part thereof may be invested in bonds or other personal securities payable at a time not exceeding one year, with at least two sureties, all of whom are to be citizens of the Commonwealth and residents therein. 7. Ten per cent of the deposits of any such corporation, not exceeding $200,000, may be invested in the purchase of a suitable site and building for the transaction of its business. 8. Any such corporation may hold real estate acquired by the foreclosure of any mortgage owned by it or by purchase at sales made under the provisions of any such mortgage, or for the satisfaction of debts due to it, but all such real estate shall be sold within five years after the title is vested in the corporation.

The particular in which the plaintiff in error chiefly insists that the tax imposed upon its shares is at a greater rate than that assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of Massachusetts, is the alleged inequality existing in favor of that imposed upon savings banks. The contrast of which this inequality is the result is stated to be as follows; viz., that in 1885 a tax of $1,564,995 was collected upon national bank shares in Massachusetts of the value of $118,000,000, while upon $163,000,000 of savings bank deposits in the same year there was collected as a tax only $815,930.

In view of the state of the question, as fixed by the previous decisions of this court, it is not perhaps very material now to inquire whether this alleged contrast between the taxation of national bank shares and of savings banks in Massachusetts is real or only apparent. There are several particulars which might be mentioned, and which, when properly allowed for, would certainly reduce the apparent inequality. There is only one, however, which we deem it important to notice. The tax on savings banks is based upon deposits merely. This is because deposits furnish the only capital which is invested and employed. The institutions themselves, although corporations, have no capital stock, and are managed by trustees not selected by the depositors, but by public authority. The whole amount of the deposits, with the exceptions noted, are subjected to a tax of one half of one per cent. On the other hand the national banks pay a tax assessed upon the market value of the shares as personal property, upon a valuation and at a rate exactly equal to that of all other personal property subject to taxation in the State. But shares of the national banks, while they constitute the capital stock of the corporations, do not represent the whole amount of the capital actually employed by them. They have deposits, too, shown in the present record to amount, in Massachusetts, to $132,042,332. The banks are not assessed for taxation on any part of these, although these deposits constitute a large part of the actual capital profitably employed by the banks in the conduct of their banking business. But it is not necessary to establish the exact equality in result of the two modes of taxation. The question of the exemption from taxation of deposits in savings banks, as affecting the rule for the state taxation of national bank shares, was very deliberately considered by this court in the case of Mercantile Nat. Bank v. Mayor of N. Y. 121 U. S. 138, 160 [30: 895,903]; and the conclusion reached in that case was reaffirmed in the case of Davenport Nat. Bank v. Davenport Equalization Board, 128 U. S. 88 [ante, 94]. In the former case deposits in savings banks in the State of New York to the amount of $487,107,501, with an accumulated surplus in addition of $68,669,001, were exempted by the laws of the State from all taxation, neither the bank itself nor the individual depositor being taxed on account thereof. It was said in that case, p. 161 [903]: "However much, therefore, may be the amount of moneyed capital in the hands of individuals in the shape of deposits in savings banks as now organized, which the policy of the State exempts from taxation for its own purposes, that exemption cannot affect the rule for the taxation of shares in national banks, provided they are taxed at a rate not greater than other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens, otherwise subject to taxation."

It is impossible, in our judgment, to distinguish the present from the case of the New York savings banks, or of those of Iowa considered in the case of the Davenport Bank. The principal distinction, indeed, between the case of the New York savings banks and those of Massachusetts, involved in the present inquiry, is that the latter pay a tax of one half of one per cent on the amount of their deposits, while the New York banks were exempt from all taxation whatever.

The argument on behalf of the plaintiff in error, indeed, seeks to establish another distinction. It is alleged that in Massachusetts savings banks are permitted to transact a banking business in the way of loans upon personal securities, which assimilates them more closely to national banks, and takes away the reason for the application of the rule to them which was applied to the case of the saving banks of New York. But the difference mentioned, if it exists at all, is immaterial; the main purpose and chief object of savings banks, as organized under the laws of Massachusetts, are the same as those in New York, as considered in the case of the Mercantile Bank. They are substantially institutions under public management, in pursuance of a great and beneficial public policy, organized for the purpose of investing the savings of small depositors, and not as banking institutions in the commercial sense of that phrase. We adhere to the rule as declared in the cases heretofore decided, which forecloses further discussion as to the present point in this case.

A similar objection to the tax in question, founded on a comparison of the taxation of national bank shares with that of insurance companies and trust companies, the American Bell Telephone Company, and the Massachusetts Hospital Life Insurance Company, is equally untenable. Within the definition of that phrase, established in the case of the Mercantile Nat Bank v. Mayor of N. Y. 121 U. S. 138 [30:895], the interest of individuals in these institutions is not moneyed capital. The investments made by the institutions themselves, constituting their assets, are not moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the State. People v. Tax Comrs. 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 244 [18: 344].

It is further contended, however, on the part of the plaintiff in error, that the taxation in question is not only at a greater rate than that imposed upon other moneyed capital held by individual citizens, but that it is repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, because it operates to deny to the taxpayer the equal protection of the laws, and also that it is disproportionate and unequal, in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of Massachusetts. The two branches of this proposition are equivalent; if the tax is not disproportionate and unequal, within the meaning of the Constitution of the State, the taxpayer is not denied the equal protection of the laws within the sense of the Fourteenth Amendment. The point is fully met by the reasoning and judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in the cases of the Providence Sav. Institution v. Boston, and Jewell v. Boston, 101 Mass. 575, 585.

Another point to be noticed arises upon the third count of the declaration. It is therein alleged that other national banking associations, some located in Massachusetts and others in the several New England States, are the owners of 1,448 shares of the capital stock of the National Bank of Redemption, on which the amount of tax paid was $2,051. It is urged in argument that these shares are not taxable by virtue of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes. The language of the section is: "Nothing herein shall prevent all the shares in any association from being included in the valuation of the personal property of the owner or holder of such shares, in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the State within which the association is located; but the Legislature of each State may determine and direct the manner and place of taxing all the shares of national banking associations located within the State, subject only to the two restrictions that the tax shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State, and that the shares of any national banking association owned by nonresidents of any State shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located, and not elsewhere."

It is contended that no tax is thereby authorized upon the national bank itself as a corporation, nor upon the personal property of any such, and that, therefore, these shares in the National Bank of Redemption are exempt from taxation by virtue of their ownership. This, however, is not a reasonable interpretation of the language of the section. The manifest intention of the law is to permit the State in which a national bank is located to tax, subject to the limitations prescribed, all the shares of its capital stock without regard to their ownership. The proper inference is that the law permits, in the particular instance, the taxation of the national banks owning shares of the capital stock of another national bank by reason of that ownership, on the same footing with all other shares.

Other questions have been raised by counsel for the defense. The right of the plaintiff to sue is denied, on the ground that the right of action belongs to the owners of the shares taxed; the right of recovery is denied, on the ground that the payment by the plaintiff was voluntary, and the right of action, if it exists, it is alleged is against the collecting officer, and not the City of Boston. These questions we have not considered it necessary to examine or decide, preferring to rest our judgment upon the validity of the tax.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is accordingly affirmed.

Mr. Justice Bradley, Mr. Justice Gray, and Mr. Justice Blatchford did not sit in this case or take any part in the decision.

RUSSELL SAGE, Appt.,
v.
MEMPHIS AND LITTLE ROCK RAILROAD COMPANY (as Reorganized).

MEMPHIS AND LITTLE ROCK RAILROAD COMPANY (as Reorganized), Appt.,
v.
RUSSELL SAGE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 361-381.)

Receiver, when appointed—order of appointment—execution—mortgagor of railroad, when entitled to earnings—earnings when not applied to discharge mortgage, but to a judgment.

1. Whether a receiver shall be appointed is always a matter of discretion, to be exercised with caution in the case of quasi public corporations operating a public highway, and always with reference to the special circumstances of each case.

2. Where, under the circumstances of a case, the appointment of the receiver is within the power of the court, the order appointing him is not a nullity.

3. Where the railroad company made no objection, at the time the receiver was appointed, that an execution was not sued out and returned "nulla bona" before the suit was commenced, that point may be afterwards disregarded.

4. The mortgagor of a railroad, even though the mortgage covers income, cannot be required to account to the mortgagee for earnings, while the property remains in his possession, until a demand has been made therefor or for a surrender of the possession under the provisions of the mortgage.

5. Trustees in a railroad mortgage, who have not asked possession, nor intervened in the suit, are not entitled to have the net earnings of the property, while it was in the hands of a receiver (appointed in a suit instituted by a judgment creditor for the protection of his own interests, and not of the interests of the trustees or of the bondholders or of other creditors), applied in discharge of the bonds secured by the mortgage.

[Nos. 126, 127.]

Argued Jan. 6, 9, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

APPEALS from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas, directing the distribution of a fund in the registry of that court, arising from the operation by its Receiver of the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company, as reorganized. Reversed.

Opinion below, 18 Fed. Rep. 571.

Statement by Mr. Justice Harlan:

The decree from which these appeals are taken relates to the distribution of a fund in the registry of the circuit court arising from the operation, by its receiver, of the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company (as reorganized). The decree directed it to be paid to the surviving trustees in a certain mortgage executed by that Company, for distribution among the beneficiaries under said mortgage. Sage and the Railroad Company each complain of that decree; the former insisting that the money should have been applied in satisfaction of a judgment obtained by him against the Company, while the latter insisted that it was entitled to receive it.

The history of the claims of the respective parties is as follows:

On the 24th day of June, 1882, the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company (as reorganized) in an action brought by Russell Sage, on that day, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas, confessed judgment in his favor for the sum of $125,921.18, that sum being the aggregate amount, principal and interest, of a demand note for $115,479.08 executed by that Company, June 20, 1882, to the President of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, and indorsed by him to Sage, and of another note of $10,000 held by the latter against the same defendant.

On the same day on which this judgment was entered, Sage commenced in the Chancery Court of Pulaski County, Arkansas, a suit in equity against the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company (as reorganized). The bill, after setting out the judgment, alleged that the entire tangible property of the Company consisted of its railroad—extending from its junction with the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railroad, through the Counties of Pulaski, Lonoke, Prairie, Monroe, St. Francis and Crittenden to the Mississippi River—an inclined track used to transfer its rolling stock across that river to Memphis, a steamboat, certain lands and depot in that city, locomotives, cars, and other property, such as are usually employed in the management of a railroad; that the defendant by deed of May 1, 1877, duly recorded, mortgaged its property to trustees to secure the payment of bonds, amounting to $250,000, and maturing in installments of $50,000 each, on the first day of May in the years 1879 to 1883, inclusive, of which installments four were then due and unpaid; that by deed of May 2, 1877, duly recorded, defendant mortgaged its property, rights, and franchises of every description to secure the payment of other bonds with coupons attached, amounting to $2,600,000, payable July 1, 1907, and bearing interest, after July 1, 1882, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum; that both of said mortgages authorized the trustees to take possession of and sell the mortgaged property upon the nonpayment of any of the bonds or interest at maturity; that the aggregate amount of the mortgages exceeded the salable value of the property and franchises of every description owned by the Company, or, at least, the sum for which they would sell under execution; that by reason of the existence of the mortgages no bidders could be found at more than nominal amounts for the property; that a large part of the bonds secured by the mortgages being due and unpaid, the trustees would interfere with the sale of any part of the property under execution if the plaintiff should attempt, in that mode, to enforce payment of this judgment; and that for these reasons the suing out of execution upon such judgment would cause useless expense and delay, and result in no benefit whatever to plaintiff.

The plaintiff also alleged that if the Company's property was held together, and carefully used in the transportation of passengers and freight, it would produce a large income, sufficient to pay all operating expenses and necessary repairs, leaving each year a large surplus to pay off and discharge plaintiff's debt; that such income could be made only by working the property as a unit, for purposes of transportation; consequently, the seizure and sale of it, or of any material part thereof, would destroy its capacity to produce such income, without benefit to the plaintiff, and at the same time incommode the public by destroying the use of the road in the manner contemplated by the State.

The bill further alleged that the Company had hitherto failed and refused to apply its surplus income to the payment of its debts, and unless prevented would continue in that course, and apply its surplus to other uses to his great injury and loss.

The relief asked was that the court take possession of and operate the road, by a receiver, and, in that manner, seize upon the only means in reach of the law for satisfying the plaintiff's demands; such relief to be subject to all the rights and equities of the holders of bonds or of said trustees.

The Railroad Company appeared and waived notice, and the court being of opinion that the relief asked was necessary for the protection of the plaintiff's interests and rights, E. K. Sibley was appointed receiver. He was directed to take possession of the entire railroad, with the inclines, connections, tracks, depots, rolling stock, books, papers, and all other property of the Company of every kind. The Company was ordered to surrender possession and the receiver directed to operate the railroad, in the usual manner, in the carriage of passengers, freights and express matter, keeping account of all receipts and expenses, and making report of all his acts and doings, as might be required. Such surrender was made, and possession was taken by the receiver.

John L. Farwell and Robert K. Dow, as stockholders of the Company, respectively intervened, October 14, 1882, and November 1, 1882, as defendants, and assailed the proceeding in which the receiver was appointed as being merely a financial expedient, by which Sage and others could make a successful speculation in the stocks and securities of the Company. They charged that the Company was not really indebted to Sage in any sum, and, among other things, they asked that he be enjoined from prosecuting his judgment, and that the receiver be discharged. On the 10th of November, 1882, they filed their respective petitions for the removal of the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States, and it was so removed.

On the 1st of December, 1883, Dow and many others, holding judgments rendered by default upon preferred mortgage and general mortgage coupons, filed their claims. These judgments aggregated nearly $200,000. Two days thereafter, December 8, 1883, an order was entered requiring the receiver at once to surrender to the Railroad Company all the property of whatever kind in his custody as receiver; to pay out of the money in his hands all sums and dues authorized by the order appointing him; to retain the balance subject to the order of the court; and to make full report of his acts, showing what moneys he had received and for what purpose they had been expended. The order declared that the railroad and other property in the hands of the receiver were delivered to the defendant only upon the condition—to which it assented—that it assume all the liabilities of the receiver and agree to pay and discharge, out of the property or its income, all demands which might be legally established by judgment against the receiver; in default whereof the court might retake possession, and, by proper order, enforce the payment of such judgments.

On the 12th day of February, 1884, the receiver filed a report of his administration of the property, from which it appeared that there were a few unsettled accounts for traffic balances due to and from him, which he was unable to adjust. The Company assuming in open court to pay such balances as were due from the receiver, it was, by consent of the parties, ordered that the receiver transfer to it all balances due to him, and that it receive and retain them for its own use. Thereupon the complainant filed a petition praying that the receiver, out of the funds in his hands, pay his judgment in the bill mentioned. The defendant filed a motion to strike from the files sundry claims of H. Sanford and other creditors of the defendant, and that the money in the hands of the receiver, after paying the amount due the complainant, be paid to the defendant and to certain named creditors.

Upon the hearing, February 14, 1884, of the motion to strike out the claims of H. Sanford and others, said creditors respectively amended their claims by adding the following: "Claimant says that the bill filed in this suit, and all the subsequent proceedings therein, have been simulated, collusive, and fraudulent, and intended to cheat, hinder, and delay this claimant, and others in like cases, in the collection of their just debts, one of which is evidenced by said judgment in favor of claimant; wherefore he prays that his said claim be paid out of said fund in preference to all unsecured debts against said defendant." The court, thereupon, overruled the motion to strike out the claims of Sanford and others.

The cause was then referred to the master to report upon the charges of fraud and collusion made in the amended claims. By subsequent order, the master was directed to show by his report the total amount of money which came to the hands of the receiver; the amount expended by him in new construction and improvement of the road; the operating expenses of the road while in his hands; the amount paid out by him in costs and attorneys' fees in this suit, to whom paid, and for what services; and the total amount of money with which the receiver should be charged in a final settlement of his accounts.

On the 23d of February, 1884, Dow and Matthews, trustees in the mortgage of May 1, 1877, filed their claim and petition of intervention, they having previously brought suit to foreclose. In that petition they prayed that the moneys in the hands of the receiver be applied in discharge of the bonds secured by such mortgage. April 15, 1884, Dow, Matthews, and Moran, trustees in the mortgage of May 2, 1877 (the latter being successor of Pierson), filed their claim of intervention praying that if the fund in court was not paid out on the claim and intervention theretofore filed by Dow and Matthews, it be paid in discharge of overdue interest on the bonds secured by the latter mortgage.

On the 22d of May, 1884, the master made a report, embodying among others the following findings: 1. That the total amount which came to the hands of the receiver during his term of office, was $1,675,919.78. 2. That the amount expended, during his administration, for new construction, was $310,992.92, not including certain sums expended for bridge repairs, cross ties, repairs to locomotives, and maintenance of cars. 3. That the amount chargeable to the receiver on final settlement of his accounts was $218,998.98, which he had deposited as required by the court, and that he was thereby fully acquitted. 4. That the suit instituted by Sage was collusive in that it was brought with the connivance of the Railroad Company, for the purpose of shielding it, by means of a receivership, against suits by the Company's creditors. 5. That during the receivership, the railroad was largely improved by the receiver out of the income of the property, and that the receiver was honest, competent, and faithful. 6. That Dow, one of the trustees in both the preference and general mortgages of the Company, was the managing trustee, having or seeming to have the chief direction of all litigation involving either the trustees or the holders of bonds secured by the general mortgage. 7. That the intervenors were holders of bonds secured by the general mortgage, and that at no time during the continuance of the receivership did the trustees, as trustees of either mortgage, seek to intervene in the cause, or to take any action in regard to the property, or to cause its restoration to the defendant Company, or to take any steps to put an end to the receivership. 8. That before the failure of the Company to pay any installment of interest, Dow stated and threatened that in case any default in the payment of such interest occurred, the bondholders would not take any steps to foreclose the mortgage, but would bring as many separate suits at law in the United States Circuit Court as could be separarately brought upon coupons taken from the bonds secured by the mortgages every six months.

Exceptions by Sage and the Company to the master's report having been overruled, it was adjudged that the money in the registry of the court be paid to Robert K. Dow and Watson Matthews, surviving trustees in what is called the preference mortgage of May 1, 1877, for distribution by them among the beneficiaries under that mortgage, and that plaintiff pay all the costs of this suit. From that decree Sage and the Railroad Company have separately appealed. No appeal was prosecuted by bondholders having judgments at law, and who, by the decree, were placed upon an equality with other bondholders secured by the same mortgage, who had not obtained judgments for the amount of their unpaid coupons.

Mr. Wager Swayne, for appellant Sage, and for R. R. Co. against Intervening Trustees and Judgment Creditors.

To procure a receiver if not hindering and delaying creditors.

Brassey v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 19 Fed. Rep. 668; Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 117 U. S. 434 (29:968); Wallace v. Loomis, 97 U. S. 146 (24:895); Miltenberger v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 106 U. S. 286 (27:117); Long Dock Co. v. Mallery, 12 N. J. Eq. 481.

The Sage judgment should have been paid from the net earnings of the receivership. The course to be pursued with that fund was not discretionary and was reviewable upon appeal.

Forgay v. Conrad, 47 U. S. 6 How. 201 (12: 404); Thompson v. Dean, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 342 (19:94); Stovall v. Banks, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 583 (19:1036); Whiting v. Bank of U. S. 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 15 (10:87); 8th Eq. Rule, U. S. Supreme Ct. (20:910).

Sage is entitled to be first paid, because he who first files his bill is entitled to satisfaction.

Beach, Receivers, § 628; Parks v. Sprinkle, 64 N. C. 687; Corning v. White, 2 Paige, 567; U. S. Bank v. Burke, 4 Blackf. 141; Storm v. Waddell, 2 Sandf. Ch. 508; Edgell v. Haywood, 3 Atk. 352; Lynch v. Johnson, 48 N. Y. 33; Hills v. Sherwood, 48 Cal. 393; Pullis v. Robison, 78 Mo. 201; Day v. Washburn, 65 U. S. 24 How. 355 (16:714); Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 392; 2 Hoff. Ch. Pr. 114; Burt v. Keyes, 1 Flipp. 72; Douglass v. Huston, 6 Ohio, 156; Miers v. Zanesville & M. Turnpike Co. 18 Ohio, 197.

The creditor who first files his bill obtains a priority.

Weed v. Pierce, 9 Cow. 722; Beck v. Burdett, 1 Paige, 305; Edmeston v. Lyde, Id. 637.

The filing of the creditor's bill creates eo instante an equitable lien upon the fund sought to be reached.

Miller v. Sherry, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 249 (17:880); George v. Williamson, 26 Mo. 190; Brown v. Nichols, 42 N. Y. 26; Perego v. Bonesteel, 5 Biss. 66; Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 68.

That Sage did not issue an execution before filing his bill does not impair his rights.

Wright v. Campbell, 27 Ark. 641; Royer Wheel Co. v. Fielding, 31 Hun, 277; Buswell v. Lincks, 8 Daly, 518.

To affirm the decree of the court below is to violate an established and necessary rule of equity by which the marshaling of liens has always been controlled.

Lanoy v. Duke of Athol, 2 Atk. 446; Aldrich v. Cooper, 8 Ves. Jr. 388; Ex parte Kendall, 17 Ves. Jr. 520; Trimmer v. Bayne, 9 Ves. Jr. 209; Cheesebrough v. Millard, 1 Johns. Ch. 413; Averall v. Wade, Lloyd & G. 252; Gwynne v. Edwards, 2 Russ. 289, note; Cradock v. Piper, 15 Sim. 301; Atty-Gen. v. Tyndall, Amb. 614; Selby v. Selby, 4 Russ. 336; Greenwood v. Taylor, 1 Russ. & M. 185; Wiggin v. Dorr, 3 Sumn. 410, 414.

Mr. U. M. Rose, for Dow et al., trustees:

Parties dealing with corporations have the right not only to sue, but also to secure themselves by means of the remedies provided for in like cases between natural persons.

Smith v. Eastern R. R. Co. 124 Mass. 157.

Between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, the surplus must be awarded to the latter.

Pullan v. Cincinnati & C. A. L. R. R. Co. 5 Biss. 247.

The fund should go to the insolvent company.

Dow v. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. 20 Fed. Rep. 768.

A court of chancery had jurisdiction to apply the fund to the payment of the bonds whose holders were represented by the trustees, though no judgments at law had been recovered on them.

Case v. Beauregard, 101 U. S. 688 (25:1004); King v. Payan, 18 Ark. 588.

Every attempt by a debtor to violate or evade the law is fraudulent and void as against creditors.

Kimball v. Thompson, 4 Cush. 447; Robinson v. Elliott, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 523 (22:762).

A deed fraudulent in fact is absolutely void.

Bean v. Smith, 2 Mason, 252.

Another creditor who has participated in the fraud will not be allowed to share with the plaintiff in the proceeds of the litigation.

Smith v. Craft, 11 Biss. 351.

Fraud may always be proved by parol.

Hill v. Elliot, 12 Mass. 31; Harris v. Sumner, 2 Pick. 137; Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns. 571.

Where a creditor has been guilty of actual fraud he cannot participate in the fund.

Millington v. Hill, 47 Ark. 311; Milwaukee & M. R. R. Co. v. Soutter, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 525 (20:545); Beers v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 26 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 458; Blair v. St. Louis, H. & K. R. Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 37; Ruckman v. Conover, 37 N. J. Eq. 588.

The bondholders being very numerous, the trustees properly represented them in the court below.

Kerrison v. Stewart, 93 U. S. 155 (23:843); Carey v. Brown, 92 U. S. 172 (23:469); Boyd v. Jones, 44 Ark. 316; Dickenson v. Harris, 48 Ark. 358; Shaw v. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. 100 U. S. 611 (25:758).

Sage cannot complain of a decree establishing the superior claim of the trustees.

Little Rock Water Works Co. v. Barrett, 103 U. S. 516 (26:523); Pacific R. R. Co. v. Ketchum, 101 U. S. 289 (25:937); U. S. v. Babbitt, 104 U. S. 767 (26:921).

The right of the trustees to intervene was clear.

Day v. Washburn, 65 U. S. 24 How. 352 (16:712); Wiswall v. Sampson, 55 U. S. 14 How. 66 (14:328); American Bridge Co. v. Heidelbach, 94 U. S. 798 (24:144); Williams v. Gibbs, 58 U. S. 17 How. 256 (15:141); Ex parte Boyd, 105 U. S. 652 (26:1202); Re Howard, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 175 (19:634); Galveston, H. & H. R. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 478 (20:205).

The property of the Railroad Company could not be sold under execution.

Tice v. Annin, 2 Johns. Ch. 130; 2 Jones, Mort. § 1229; Gus v. Tide Water Canal Co. 65 U. S. 24 How. 257 (16:635); Milwaukee & M. R. R. Co. v. James, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 750 (18:854); Jackson v. Ludeling, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 623 (22:495).

Where an execution can accomplish nothing, its issue is not a prerequisite to the filing of a creditor's bill.

Wright v. Campbell, 27 Ark. 641; Russell v. Clark, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 89 (3:279).

This court will not reverse for any alleged error not indicated in the exceptions filed to the master's report.

Terry v. Commercial Bank, 92 U. S. 456 (23:621).

When a railroad company or other corporation is using its earnings and will not pay its debts with them, a court of chancery will appoint a receiver.

Covington Draw Bridge Co. v. Shepherd, 62 U. S. 21 How. 125 (16:41); Lawrence v. Greenwich Fire Ins. Co. 1 Paige, 587; Beach, Receivers, § 252; Weed v. Pierce, 9 Cow. 724.

Equity treats a mortgage of property to be afterwards acquired as a contract, binding in conscience, to execute a mortgage.

Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Page, 35 Ark. 304; S. C. 7 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 36; Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 255 (25:343); Hale v. Frost, Id. 389 (25:419); Gilman v. Illinois & M. Tel. Co. 91 U. S. 617 (23:410).

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

We do not understand upon what principle the court below held that the trustees in the mortgage of May 1, 1877, were entitled, as against both the mortgagor Company and Sage, to claim the net earnings of the road during the receivership. The latter was a judgment creditor of the Company, and it was at his instance, in a suit commenced by him, that its property was put in the hands of a receiver. This was done because in the opinion of the court the appointment of a receiver was necessary "to protect plaintiff's interests and rights." If the grounds set forth in the bill were not sufficient to justify the appointment of a receiver, they were ample to give a court of equity jurisdiction to do so. In Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 117 U. S. 434, 458 [29:963, 971] the court said: "The co-plaintiffs with Hervey were judgment creditors of the Paris and Decatur Company, with executions returned unsatisfied. The bill set out the precarious condition of all the property held and used by the Illinois Midland Company, and the necessity for a receiver, in the interest of all the creditors of all four of the corporations, to prevent the levy of executions on such property; and it prayed for a judicial ascertainment and marshaling of all the debts of all the corporations and their payment and adjustment as the respective rights and interests of the creditors might appear, and for general relief. The plaintiffs set forth that they represented a majority of the stock in all the corporations. This bill was quite sufficient to enable a court of equity to administer the property and marshal the debts, including those due the mortgage bondholders, making proper parties before adjudging the merits."

In the present case, it is true, Sage did not sue out execution upon his judgment and have a return of nulla bona. But that point has become immaterial. The Railroad Company made no such objection at the time the receiver was appointed. Besides, suing out an execution would, according to the facts and the admission of the parties, have been an idle ceremony, causing useless expense, and bringing no real benefit to the plaintiff. It is true, also, that Sage did not sue in behalf of all the creditors of the Company or of such as might come in and contribute to the expense of the litigation. He was not bound to pursue that course. It was his privilege, under the law, to sue for his own benefit, and it was within the power of the court, for his protection as a judgment creditor, to place the property of the debtor Company in the hands of a receiver, for administration under its orders. We do not mean to say that a single judgment creditor or any number of such creditors of a railroad company are entitled, as matter of right, to have its property put in the hands of a receiver, merely because of its failure or refusal to pay its debts. Whether a receiver shall be appointed is always a matter of discretion, to be exercised sparingly and with great caution in the case of quasi public corporations operating a public highway, and always with reference to the special circumstances of each case as it arises. All that we say in this connection is that, under the circumstances presented in this case, the appointment of the receiver was within the power of the court. The order appointing him and directing him to operate and manage the property was not a nullity.

But it is contended that the suit instituted by Sage was collusive and an imposition upon the court; that, as held by the circuit judge, when the receiver was discharged, after having served seventeen months, and the property was turned over to the Company, the process of the court was not used "in good faith to collect complainant's judgment, but as a means of placing the property and business of a railroad company in the hands of the court, to be managed through a receiver, to the end that the defendant may not be subject to suits in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, and in order to enable the plaintiff and defendant, by agreement between them, through the receiver, to apply all the earnings of the road during a series of years to the improvement and betterment of the property;" and that, consequently, the proceeding was not, in fact, an adversary one. 5 McCrary, 643; 18 Fed. Rep. 571, 573. Whether this characterization of that proceeding be just or not, it is not necessary in the present case, and in the view we take of it, to determine. For if it be just, the court below applied the proper remedy for the abuse of its process; that is, it discharged the receiver and turned the property back to the possession and control of the Company, which, in the view taken of the facts by the circuit judge, ought never to have been disturbed. And the court proceeded, as was its duty, to dispose of the net earnings of the property, while under the management of its officer, acting under its directions.

But did the imposition, if any, practiced upon the court, inducing it to appoint a receiver when one would not have been appointed had it been aware of the exact situation, add anything to the legal or equitable rights of the trustees in the mortgage executed by the Railroad Company? Had the receiver never been appointed, and had the Railroad Company operated the property just as the receiver did, producing the same amount of net earnings that were in the hands of the receiver, at the time of his discharge, would the trustees in the mortgage of May 1, 1877, have been entitled to demand that such earnings be paid over to them? Clearly not. "It is well settled," this court said in Dow v. Memphis & L. R. R. R. Co. 124 U. S. 652, 654 [ante, 565] "that the mortgagor of a railroad, even though the mortgage covers income, cannot be required to account to the mortgagee for earnings, while the property remains in his possession, until a demand has been made on him therefor, or for a surrender of the possession under the provisions of the mortgage. That is the effect of what was decided by this court in Galveston, H. & H. R. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 459, 483" [20: 199, 207]. See also Gilman v. Illinois & M. Tel. Co. 91 U. S. 603 [23:405]; American Bridge Co. v. Heidelbach, 94 U. S. 798 [24:144]; Kountze v. Omaha Hotel Co. 107 U. S. 378 [27: 609]; Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 242, 250 [28: 415, 418].

The trustees filed their bill of foreclosure June 26, 1883, but they did not intervene as trustees in this suit until February 28, 1884, some time after the discharge of the receiver, and after the property had been surrendered to the Company. Their claim and intervention shows upon its face that no part of the interest accruing upon the bonds secured by their mortgage subsequent to January 1, 1882, had been paid at the time they so intervened. By the terms of that mortgage it was provided that, in case of continuous default by the Railroad Company, for thirty days, after maturity, in paying any of the sums specified in the interest coupons, the principal sums in all the bonds "shall immediately become due and payable," and, thereupon, the trustees, upon the written request of the holders of a majority of said bonds, "shall enter upon and take possession of all and singular the charter, franchises, and property hereby conveyed, and shall and may sell the same to the highest bidder for cash in hand," etc. There was no moment pending the receivership when these trustees, upon the request of the holders of a majority of the bonds, might not have appeared in this suit, or in a separate suit in the same court, and asked that the receiver hold for them as well as Sage, or that he be discharged and they put in possession of the mortgaged property, for the purposes of sale, pursuant to the mortgage. Neither they nor the bondholders elected to pursue that course. It may be that their action was dictated in part by the fact, found by the master, that the railroad, the principal security for their debts, was being largely improved during the receivership out of the income of the property, and that no part of that income was being diverted to pay Sage's judgment or the debts of the Company. If the trustees, pending the receivership, had intervened and asked possession of the property, they might perhaps have been entitled, as against general creditors, to the income of the property thereafter accruing, upon the principles announced by this court in Dow v. Memphis & L. R. R. R. Co. (as reorganized), 124 U. S. 652 [ante, 565]. But we do not perceive any legal ground upon which they are entitled to the net earnings of the property, while it was in the hands of the receiver, in a suit instituted by a judgment creditor for the protection of his own interests, and not of the interests of the trustees, or of the bondholders, or of other creditors. His suit was, in effect, an equitable levy for his benefit, upon the net income of the property. Other creditors, who filed their claims, based upon judgments, gain nothing, as between themselves and Sage, by the fact that their judgments were rendered upon coupons which were secured by lien upon the mortgaged property. Neither they nor their trustees, prior to the termination of the receivership, chose to assert this lien. Nor did they, pending the receivership, ask that the receiver should, from and after their appearance, hold for them as well as for Sage. They took action as simple contract creditors, whose claims were reduced to judgment. If the bondholders, when intervening simply as judgment creditors, acquired an interest in the fund, they could not, upon any recognized principles of equity, deprive the creditor, at whose instance and for whose benefit the receiver was appointed, of his priority of right, arising from the institution of suit for the purpose of reaching the income of the debtor's property. The judgments at law obtained by bondholders upon their coupons were all rendered after the receiver took possession of the property; some in the spring of 1888, the larger part of them in October and November of that year, just before the receiver was discharged.

These conclusions are not affected by the fact that Sage, in his bill, alleges that he seeks relief, subject to all the rights and equities of the holders of bonds and of their trustees. It was only meant by this to give assurance that he had no purpose, in asking the relief he did, to affect injuriously their security, or the liens created in their behalf by the mortgages referred to. Taking the allegations of his bill to be true, he sought only, by means of a receivership, to reach the net income of the Railroad Company in satisfaction of his debt.

But it was insisted in argument that the judgment which Sage obtained against the Railroad Company was fraudulent, in that the debt for which it was rendered was fictitious; that he never in fact owned a real note executed by that Company, based upon any valuable consideration whatever. The record not containing the note or a copy of it, some question was also made, in argument, if we did not misunderstand counsel, whether any such note was ever in existence. We could not sustain these propositions without reaching the conclusion that there had been the most shocking perjury upon the part of witnesses in this cause; a conclusion which the evidence does not warrant. The judgment which Sage obtained by confession of the defendant Company, in the Circuit Court of the United States, recites that it appeared to the court, "as well from the promissory notes with the complaint filed as from the said confession and consent, that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum aforesaid," etc. The record shows that Sage, under date of June 20, 1882, addressed to the president of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company a communication, offering to give fifty cents on the dollar, payable in ninety days, for its debt and note "against the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company (as reorganized), amounting, as I am informed, to the sum of $115,479.08, your company guaranteeing that the said amount is justly due to it from the Memphis and Little Rock R. R. Co." The records of the former company recite that on motion of Mr. Dillon, seconded by Mr. Eckert, that offer was accepted, and that said debt and note "are hereby transferred and assigned to said Sage, and that the president be and he is hereby authorized to execute any further assignment of said debt that counsel may advise, and also to indorse and deliver said note to the said Sage." Sage swears in his deposition that he purchased, held, and brought suit upon said note. The treasurer of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company testifies that his company did, in June 1882, hold the note of the Memphis and Little Rock Company (as reorganized) for $115,479.08, given by the latter Company for advances made by the Missouri Pacific Railway Company to meet coupons of the former company. It is true that, independently of the evidence furnished by the note, it does not clearly appear that the advances made by the Missouri Pacific Railway Company to the other Company aggregated the full amount of the note. But this deficiency in the proof is more than made good by the fact that the note was given and that the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company (as reorganized) confessed judgment for its amount, and does not now dispute the debt; although, by its appeal, it claims that the fund in court should be paid to it rather than applied to Sage's judgment.

It is contended that Sage does not show that he has ever paid to the Missouri Pacific Railway Company the amount he agreed to give for the note of the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company (as reorganized). Proof of that fact was not vital in the case. After the acceptance of his offer to purchase the note, and after it had been transferred by indorsement to him, he came under a legal obligation, which he recognizes, to pay what he agreed to pay. He cannot escape that obligation.

For the reasons stated we are of opinion that the decree below was erroneous in that it did not, in the order directing the distribution of the fund remaining in court, give a preference to the judgment at law obtained by the appellant Sage.

The decree is reversed and cause remanded, with directions for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

GEORGE A. BOWMAN ET AL., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

CHICAGO AND NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 465–524.)

Iowa law, forbidding bringing in intoxicating liquors, unconstitutional—defense to action.

1. Section 1553 of the Iowa Code, as amended by the Act of April 5, 1886, forbidding any common carrier to bring within that State any intoxicating liquors, from any other State or Territory, without first having the certificate therein required, is a regulation of commerce among the States and is void, as repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

2. Such statute is not an inspection law, nor a quarantine or sanitary law, and is not a legitimate exercise of police power by the State.

3. Such statute constitutes no defense to an action brought against a railroad company for refusing to carry beer into the State of Iowa from another State.

[No. 798.]

Submitted Jan. 10, 1887. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, to review a judgment against the plaintiffs, in an action brought for a refusal to receive for transportation at Chicago and to carry certain barrels of beer into the State of Iowa. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Matthews:

This action was begun in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, June 15, 1886, on which day the plaintiffs filed their declaration as follows:

"George A. Bowman, a citizen of the State of Nebraska, and Fred. W. Bowman, a citizen of the State of Iowa, copartners, doing business under the name, firm and style of Bowman Bros., at the City of Marshalltown, State of Iowa, plaintiffs in this suit, by Blum & Blum, their attorneys, complain of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company, a citizen of the northern district of the State of Illinois, having its principal office at the City of Chicago, in said State, defendant in this suit, of a plea of trespass on the case.

"For that, whereas the defendant, on May 20, 1886, and for a long time previous thereto and thereafter, was possessed of and using and operating a certain railway, and was a common carrier of goods and chattels thereon for hire, to wit, from the City of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, to the City of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa.

"That said defendant was at said time and is now a corporation existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Illinois, and that it was and is the duty of said defendant to carry from and to all stations upon its line of railway all freight tendered it for shipment.

"That upon May 20, 1886, the plaintiffs offered to said defendant for shipment over its line of railway, and directed to themselves at Marshalltown, Iowa, five thousand barrels of beer, which they had procured in the City of Chicago, to be shipped from said city to the City of Marshalltown, in the State of Iowa, which is a station lying and being on said defendant's line of railroad between said Cities of Chicago and Council Bluffs, but the defendant then and there refused to receive said beer, or any part thereof, for shipment, to the damage of the plaintiffs of ten thousand dollars, and therefore they bring their suit, etc.

"And for that the plaintiffs, neither of whom is a hotel keeper, a keeper of a saloon, eating house, grocery, or confectionery, on the 7th day of July, 1884, and upon several occasions thereafter, presented to the board of supervisors of Marshall County, Iowa, a certificate signed by a majority of the legal electors of Marshalltown, Marshall County, Iowa, which stated that said Fred. W. Bowman is a citizen of said county; that both of said plaintiffs possess a good moral character, and that they (said electors) believe said plaintiffs to be proper persons, and each of them to be a proper person, to buy and sell intoxicating liquors for the purposes named in section 1526 of the Iowa Code; that at said time and upon several occasions thereafter they and each of them, the said plaintiffs, filed a bond in the sum of three thousand dollars with two sureties, which bond was approved by the auditor of said county, as is provided by section 1528 of the Code of Iowa; that thereupon said board of supervisors refused to grant such permission to either of said plaintiffs, or to them jointly.

"And for that whereas the defendant, on May 20, 1886, and for a long time previous thereto and thereafter, was possessed of and using and operating a certain railroad and was a common carrier of goods and chattels thereon for hire, to wit, from the City of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, to the City of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa.

"That said defendant is a corporation existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Illinois; that it was the duty of the said defendant to carry from and to all stations upon its line of railway all freight that might be intrusted to it, and that it was the duty of said defendant to transport from said City of Chicago to said City of Marshalltown the five thousand barrels of beer hereinbefore and hereinafter mentioned, which plaintiffs requested it so to transport; that in the commencement of May, 1886, the plaintiffs purchased, at the City of Chicago, five thousand barrels of beer, at $6.50 per barrel, which beer they intended to send to Marshalltown, Iowa, at which place and vicinity they could have sold said beer at eight dollars per barrel, as the defendant was then and there informed; that on May 20, 1886, said plaintiffs offered for shipment to said defendant Railway Company said five thousand barrels of beer, directed to said plaintiffs, at the City of Marshalltown, in the State of Iowa, and requested said defendant to ship said beer over its road, with which request the defendant refused to comply, and declined to ship or receive said beer or any part thereof for shipment as aforesaid, the said defendant, by its duly authorized agent, then and there stating that the said defendant Company declined to receive said goods for shipment and would continue to decline to receive said goods or any goods of like character for shipment into the State of Iowa; that on said day, to wit, May 20, 1886, and for a long time theretofore and since, the plaintiffs were unable to purchase beer in the State of Iowa; that said plaintiffs, at said time, could procure no other means of transportation for said beer than said defendant, and that, by reason of the defendant's refusal to transport said beer, plaintiffs were compelled to sell said beer in the City of Chicago at $6.50 per barrel.

"That by reason of said refusal of said defendant to ship said beer plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of ten thousand dollars, and therefore they bring their suit," etc.

To this declaration the defendant filed the following plea:

"Now comes the said defendant, by W. C. Goudy, its attorney, and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says actio non, etc., because it says that the beer in said five thousand barrels in the plaintiffs' declaration and in each count thereof mentioned was, at the several times in said declaration mentioned, and still is, intoxicating liquor, within the meaning of the Statute of Iowa hereinafter set forth; that the City of Marshalltown in said declaration mentioned is within the limits of the State of Iowa; that the said City of Chicago in the said declaration mentioned is in the State of Illinois; that the said beer in said declaration mentioned was offered to this defendant to be transported from the State of Illinois to the State of Iowa.

"That heretofore, to wit, on the 5th day of April, A. D. 1886, the General Assembly of the State of Iowa passed an Act entitled 'An Act Amendatory of Chapter 143 of the Acts of the Twentieth General Assembly Relating to Intoxicating Liquors and Providing for the More Effectual Suppression of the Illegal Sale and Transportation of Intoxicating Liquors and Abatement of Nuisances,' which Act is chapter 66 of the laws of Iowa, passed at the Twenty-First General Assembly of said State, and which is printed and published in the laws of Iowa for the year 1886, at page—; to which Act this defendant hereby refers and makes the same a part of this plea.

"That in and by the tenth section of said Act it was and is provided as follows, to wit:

" 'That section 1558 of the Code, as amended and substituted by chapter 143 of the Acts of the Twentieth General Assembly, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the following enacted in lieu thereof:

" 'Sec. 1558. If any express company, railway company, or any agent or person in the employ of any express company or railway company, or if any common carrier or any person in the employ of any common carrier, or any person, knowingly bring within this State for any person or persons or corporation, or shall knowingly transport or convey between points or from one place to another in this State for any other person or persons or corporations, any intoxicating liquors without first having been furnished a certificate from and under the seal of the county auditor of the county to which said liquor is to be transported or is consigned for transportation, or within which it is to be conveyed from place to place, certifying that the consignee or person to whom said liquor is to be transported, conveyed, or delivered is authorized to sell such intoxicating liquors in such county, such company, corporation or person so offending, and each of them, and any agent of such company, corporation or person so offending, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in the sum of one hundred dollars for each offense, and pay costs of prosecution; and the costs shall include a reasonable attorney fee, to be assessed by the court, which shall be paid into the county fund, and stand committed to the county jail until such fine and costs of prosecution are paid. The offense herein defined shall be held to be complete, and shall be held to have been committed in any county of the State through or to which said intoxicating liquors are transported, or in which the same is unloaded for transportation, or in which said liquors are conveyed from place to place or delivered. It shall be the duty of the several county auditors of this State to issue the certificate herein contemplated to any person having such permit; and the certificate so issued shall be truly dated when issued, and shall specify the date at which the permit expires, as shown by the county records.'

"And the defendant avers that at the several times mentioned in said declaration, and each of them, the aforesaid section was the law of the State of Iowa in full force and wholly unrepealed, and that the said plaintiffs did not at any time furnish this defendant with a certificate from and under the seal of the county auditor of the County of Marshall, the same being the county in which said City of Marshalltown is located, and the county to which said beer was offered to be transported, certifying that the person for or to whom the said beer was to be transported was authorized to sell intoxicating liquors in said County of Marshall; nor was this defendant furnished with any such certificate by any person whatsoever.

"And the defendant avers that it could not receive said beer for transportation in the manner named and specified in the plaintiffs' declaration without violating the law of the State of Iowa above specified, and without subjecting itself to the penalties provided in said Act, and that this defendant assigned at the time the said beer was offered to it for transportation as aforesaid, as a reason why it could not receive the same, the aforesaid Statute of Iowa, which prohibited this defendant from receiving said beer to be transported into the State of Iowa or from transporting the said beer into the State of Iowa.

"And this the said defendant is ready to verify. Wherefore it prays judgment," etc.

To this plea the plaintiffs filed a general demurrer, and for cause of demurrer assigned that the Statute of Iowa referred to and set out in the plea was unconstitutional and void. The demurrer was overruled, and judgment entered thereon against the plaintiffs, to reverse which this writ of error is prosecuted.

Messrs. Louis J. Blum and Edgar C. Blum, for plaintiffs in error:

The power conferred by the Iowa Act is vested exclusively in Congress. The States are precluded from the regulation of commerce of a national or an interstate character.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat, 1, (6: 23); N. Y. v. Miln, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 102, (9: 648); Groves v. Slaughter, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 511, (10: 823); Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 319, (12: 717); Cooley v. Port Wardens, 53 U. S. 12 How. 319, (13: 1004); Brown v. Md. 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 438, 446, (6: 685, 688); Crandall v. Nev. 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 35–49, (18: 745–749); State Freight Tax, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232, (21: 146); Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 560, (21: 710); Welton v. Mo. 91 U. S. 282, (23: 350); Henderson v. Mayor of N. Y. 92 U. S. 259, (23: 543); Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275, (23: 550); Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, (23: 819); Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 469, (24: 529); Guy v. Baltimore, 100 U. S. 434, (25: 743); Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 697, (26: 239); Western Union Tel. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, (26: 1067); Moran v. N. O. 112 U. S. 69, (28: 653); Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. 196, (29: 158); Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 632, (29: 260).

Section 5258, U. S. R. S., expressly authorizes defendant to ship the beer termed freight in that section.

One's will may be expressed either by action or inaction. The inaction of Congress is a declaration of its intention that commerce in commodities unrestricted shall remain free and unimpeded.

Mobile Co. v. Kimball, supra.

The power sought to be exercised by the Iowa Legislature in this behalf is not within the scope of the police power of the States.

Henderson v. Mayor of N. Y. supra.

Liquor is an article of commerce.

Monty v. Arneson, 25 Iowa, 385.

The intent of the Legislature, in enacting said law, was, like the effect of the law, to regulate commerce among the States.

Messrs. W. C. Goudy, Jas. E. Munroe and A. J. Baker, for defendant in error:

The States possess the sole power to adopt and enforce police regulations.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 203–205, 235, (6: 71, 72, 79); License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, 589, (12: 256, 294); Mayor of N. Y. v. Miln, 37 U. S. 11 Pet. 102, (9: 648); State Tax of Railway Gross Receipts, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 284, 293, (21: 164, 167); Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, (23: 819).

The police power of the States extends to the protection of the lives, health and property of its citizens, and to the preservation of good order and the public morals.

Boston Beer Co. v. Mass. 97 U. S. 25 (24: 989); Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 191; Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645, 650, (24: 302, 304); Stone v. Miss. 101 U. S. 814, (25: 1079).

State laws prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors are valid police regulations.

Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 129, (21: 929); Com. v. Intoxicating Liquors, 115 Mass. 153; People v. Hawley, 3 Gibbs (Mich.), 330; Lincoln v. Smith, 27 Vt. 328; Santo v. State, 2 Clarke (Iowa), 165; Littleton v. Fritz, 65 Iowa, 488; Preston v. Drew, 33 Maine, 559; State v. Paul, 5 R. I. 185; Perdue v. Ellis, 18 Ga. 586; Austin v. State, 10 Mo. 591; Metropolitan Excise Board v. Barrie, 34 N. Y. 657; Goddard v. Jacksonville, 15 Ill. 588; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 718–721.

The police power of the State may be exercised by refusing the admission into its territory of articles infected with disease, or that may corrupt the morals or endanger the health or lives of its citizens.

Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 400–410, 415, 457, (12: 751–755, 757, 775); License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 589, 592, 628, 631, 632, (12: 294, 296, 312, 314); Gilman v. Phila. 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 730, 731, (18: 101); Ex parte Ah Fook, 49 Cal. 403; Re Ah Fong, 3 Sawy. 144; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 471, (24: 530).

The laws of Iowa make no discrimination between the productions of the State of Iowa or the property of its people and the productions of other States or the property of people of other States.

Welton v. Mo. 91 U. S. 275, (23: 347); Austin v. State, 10 Mo. 591.

Mr. A. J. Baker, Atty-Gen. of Iowa, for defendant in error:

The several States have the sole power to enact police regulations.

Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 374, (27: 423); Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, (6: 23); Mayor of N. Y. v. Miln, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 102, (9: 648); Osborne v. Mobile, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 479, (21: 470); Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, (23: 819).

The police powers comprehend all those general powers of internal regulation necessary to secure peace, good order, health, comfort, morals and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property in the State. Congress cannot legislate on the internal police of a State, the power of a State over its police regulations being supreme.

N. O. Water Works Co. v. St. Tammany Water Works Co. 14 Fed. Rep. 202; Ex parte Shrader, 33 Cal. 279; Phila. W. & B. R. Co. v. Bowers, 4 Houst. 506; Munn v. Ill. 94 U. S. 113, (24: 77); Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 37; Davis v. Central R. & B. Co. 17 Ga. 328; Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 129, (21: 929).

The Statute of Nevada, imposing a tax upon merchandise brought into the State, was held constitutional.

Re Rudolph, 2 Fed. Rep. 66.

A tax imposed on sales of merchandise in Alabama was held constitutional.

Woodruff v. Parham, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 140, (19: 887); Hinson v. Lott, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 152, (19: 888).

The law of New York, requiring a report as to passengers brought into the State, is a police regulation.

N. Y. v. Miln, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 102, (9: 648.)

Statutes like the Statute of Iowa now under consideration are police regulations, established by the Legislature for the prevention of intemperance, pauperism and crime, and for the abatement of nuisances, and are constitutional.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 581; Com. v. Kendall, 12 Cush. 414; Com. v. Clapp, 5 Gray, 97; Com. v. Howe, 13 Gray, 26; Santo v. State, 2 Iowa, 202; Our House v. State, 4 Greene (Iowa) 172; Zum- hoff v. State, Id. 526; State v. Donahey, 8 Iowa, 396; State v. Wheeler, 25 Conn. 290; Reynolds v. Geary, 26 Conn. 179; Oviatt v. Pond, 29 Conn. 479; People v. Gallagher, 4 Mich. 244; Gill v. Parker, 31 Vt. 610; Meehmeier v. State, 11 Ind. 482; Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. 351.

A state law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor is not repugnant to any clause of the Constitution of the United States.

Boston Beer Co. v. Mass. 97 U. S. 33, (24:992); Foster v. Kan. 112 U. S. 205, (28: 680); Littleton v. Fritz, 65 Iowa, 488.

The Legislature cannot part with any of the police powers of the State.

Farmers L. & T. Co. v. Stone, 20 Fed. Rep. 270; Allerton v. Chicago, 6 Fed. Rep. 555; Re Wong Yung Quy, 2 Fed. Rep. 624.

States may exclude pestilence either to the body or mind.

Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 568, (10: 593); Gibbons v. Ogden, and Mayor of N. Y. v. Miln, supra.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not denied that the declaration sets out a good cause of action. It alleges that the defendant was possessed of and operated a certain railway, by means of which it became and was a common carrier of goods and chattels thereon for hire, from the City of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, to the City of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, and that, as such, it was its duty to carry from and to all stations upon its line of railway all goods and merchandise that might be entrusted to it for that purpose. This general duty was imposed upon it by the common law as adopted and prevailing in the States of Illinois and Iowa. The single question, therefore, presented upon the record, is whether the statute of the State of Iowa, set out in the plea, constitutes a defense to the action.

The section of the statute referred to, being section 1553 of the Iowa Code as amended by the Act of April 5, 1886, forbids any common carrier to bring within the State of Iowa, for any person or persons or corporation, any intoxicating liquors from any other State or Territory of the United States, without first having been furnished with a certificate, under the seal of the county auditor of the county to which said liquor is to be transported or is consigned for transportation, certifying that the consignee or person to whom said liquor is to be transported, conveyed, or delivered is authorized to sell intoxicating liquors in such county.

This statutory provision does not stand alone, and must be considered with reference to the system of legislation of which it forms a part. The Act of April 5, 1886, in which it is contained, relates to the sale of intoxicating liquors within the State of Iowa, and is amendatory of chapter 143 of the Acts of the Twentieth General Assembly of that State "relating to intoxicating liquors and providing for the more effectual suppression of the illegal sale and transportation of intoxicating liquors and abatement of nuisances." The original section 1553 of the Iowa Code contains a similar provision in respect to common carriers. By section 1523 of the Code, the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, except as thereinafter provided, is made unlawful; and the keeping of intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same within the State, contrary to the provisions of the Act, is prohibited; and the intoxicating liquor so kept, together with the vessels in which it is contained, is declared to be a nuisance, to be forfeited and dealt with as thereinafter provided. Section 1524 excepts from the operation of the law sales by the importer thereof of foreign intoxicating liquor, imported under the authority of the laws of the United States regarding the importation of such liquors and in accordance with such laws; provided that the said liquor at the time of said sale by said importer remains in the original casks or packages in which it was by him imported, and in quantities of not less than the quantities in which the laws of the United States require such liquors to be imported, and is sold by him in said original casks or packages and in said quantities only. The law also permits the manufacture, in the State, of liquors for the purpose of being sold, according to the provisions of the statute, to be used for mechanical, medicinal, culinary or sacramental purposes; and for these purposes only any citizen of the State, except hotel keepers, keepers of saloons, eating houses, grocery keepers, and confectioners, is permitted within the county of his residence to buy and sell intoxicating liquors, provided he shall first obtain permission from the board of supervisors of the county in which such business is conducted. It also declares the building or erection of whatever kind, or the ground itself in or upon which intoxicating liquor is manufactured or sold, or kept with intent to sell, contrary to law, to be a nuisance, and that it may be abated as such. The original provisions of the Code (section 1555) excluded from the definition of intoxicating liquors, beer, cider from apples, and wine from grapes, currants and other fruits grown in the State; but by an amendment that section was made to include alcohol, ale, wine, beer, spirituous, vinous and malt liquors, and all intoxicating liquors whatever. It thus appears that the provisions of the statute set out in the plea, prohibiting the transportation by a common carrier of intoxicating liquor from a point within any other State for delivery at a place within the State of Iowa, is intended to more effectually carry out the general policy of the law of that State with respect to the suppression of the illegal manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor within the State as a nuisance. It may, therefore, fairly be said that the provision in question has been adopted by the State of Iowa, not expressly for the purpose of regulating commerce between its citizens and those of other States, but as subservient to the general design of protecting the health and morals of its people, and the peace and good order of the State, against the physical and moral evils resulting from the unrestricted manufacture and sale within the State of intoxicating liquors.

We have had recent occasion to consider state legislation of this character in its relation to the Constitution of the United States. In the case of Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623 [31: 205], it was said: "That legislation by a State prohibiting the manufacture, within her limits, of intoxicating liquors, to be sold or bartered for general use as a beverage, does not necessarily infringe any right, privilege, or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States, is made clear by the decisions of this court rendered before and since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. * * * These cases rest upon the acknowledged right of the States of the Union to control their purely internal affairs, and in so doing to protect the health, morals, and safety of their people by regulations that do not interfere with the execution of the powers of the General Government or violate rights secured by the Constitution of the United States." In License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504 [12: 256], the question was whether certain Statutes of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire, relating to the sale of spirituous liquors, were repugnant to the Constitution of the United States by reason of an alleged conflict between them and the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign countries and among the several States. The Statutes of Massachusetts and of Rhode Island considered in those cases had reference to the sale within those States respectively of intoxicating liquor imported from foreign countries, but not sold or offered for sale within the State by the importer in original packages. The Statute of New Hampshire, however, applied to intoxicating liquor imported from another State; and the decision in that case upheld its validity in reference to the disposition by sale or otherwise of the intoxicating liquor after it had been brought into the State. That judgment, therefore, closely approached the question presented in this case. The Justices all concurred in the result, but there was not a majority which agreed upon any specific ground for the conclusion; and it is necessary to compare the several opinions which were pronounced in order to extract the propositions necessarily embraced in the judgment. Chief Justice Taney was of the opinion that Congress had clearly the power to regulate such importation and sale under the grant of power to regulate commerce among the several States; "Yet, as Congress has made no regulations on the subject," he said, "the traffic in the article may be lawfully regulated by the State as soon as it is landed in its territory; and a tax imposed upon it, or a license required, or the sale altogether prohibited, according to the policy which the State may suppose to be its interest or duty to pursue". Mr. Justice Catron and Mr. Justice Nelson agreed with the Chief Justice that the Statute of New Hampshire in question was a regulation of commerce, but lawful, because not repugnant to any actual exercise of the commercial power by Congress. Mr. Justice McLean seemed to think that the power of Congress ended with the importation, and that the sale of the article after it reached its destination was within the exclusive control of the State. He said: "If this tax had been laid on the property as an import into the State, the law would have been repugnant to the Constitution. It would have been a regulation of commerce among the States, which has been exclusively given to Congress. * * * But this barrel of gin, like all other property within the State of New Hampshire, was liable to taxation by the State. It comes under the general regulation, and cannot be sold without a license." Mr. Justice Daniel denied that the right of importation included the right to sell within the State, contrary to its laws. He impliedly admitted the exclusive power of Congress to regulate importation, and maintained, as equally exclusive, the right of the State to regulate the matter of sale. Mr. Justice Woodbury concurred in the same distinction. He said, p. 619 [308]: "It is manifest, also, whether as an abstract proposition or practical measure, that a prohibition to import is one thing, while a prohibition to sell without a license is another and entirely different." The first he thought was within the control of Congress, the latter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the State. He said: "The subject of buying and selling within a State, is one as exclusively belonging to the power of the State over its internal trade as that to regulate foreign commerce is with the General Government under the broadest construction of that power. * * * The idea, too, that a prohibition to sell would be tantamount to a prohibition to import does not seem to me either logical or founded in fact. For even under a prohibition to sell, a person could import, as he often does, for his own consumption, and that of his family and plantations; and also, if a merchant extensively engaged in commerce, often does import articles with no view of selling them here, but of storing them for a higher and more suitable market in another State or abroad." He also said, p. 625 [311]: "But this license is a regulation neither of domestic commerce between the States, nor of foreign commerce. It does not operate on either, or the imports of either, until they have entered the State, and become component parts of its property. Then it has by the Constitution exclusive power to regulate its own internal commerce and business in such articles, and bind all residents, citizens or not, by its regulations, if they ask its protection and privileges; and Congress, instead of being opposed and thwarted by regulations as to this, can no more interfere in it than the States can interfere in regulation of foreign commerce." Mr. Justice Grier concurred mainly in the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice McLean, and did not consider that the question of the exclusiveness of the power of Congress to regulate commerce was necessarily connected with the decision of the point that the States had a right to prohibit the sale and consumption of an article of commerce within their limits, which they believed to be pernicious in its effects, and the cause of pauperism, disease, and crime.

From a review of all the opinions the following conclusions are to be deduced as the result of the judgments in those cases:

1. All the Justices concurred in the proposition that the statutes in question were not made void by the mere existence of the power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations and among the States delegated to Congress by the Constitution.

2. They all concurred in the proposition that there was no legislation by Congress in pursuance of that power with which these statutes were in conflict.

3. Some, including the Chief Justice, held that the matter of the importation and sale of articles of commerce was subject to the exclusive regulation of Congress, whenever it chose to exert its power, and that any statute of the State on the same subject in conflict with such positive provisions of law enacted by Congress would be void.

4. Others maintained the view that the power of Congress to regulate commerce did not extend to or include the subject of the sale of such articles of commerce after they had been introduced into a State, but that when the act of importation ended, by a delivery to the consignee, the exclusive power over the subject belonged to the States as a part of their police power.

From this analysis it is apparent that the question presented in this case was not decided in the License Cases, supra. The point in judgment in them was strictly confined to the right of the States to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquor after it had been brought within their territorial limits. The right to bring it within the States was not questioned; and the reasoning which justified the right to prohibit sales admitted, by implication, the right to introduce intoxicating liquor, as merchandise, from foreign countries, or from other States of the Union, free from the control of the several States, and subject to the exclusive power of Congress over commerce.

It cannot be doubted that the Law of Iowa now under examination, regarded as a rule for the transportation of merchandise, operates as a regulation of commerce among the States. "Beyond all question, the transportation of freight, or of the subjects of commerce, for the purpose of exchange or sale, is a constituent of commerce itself. This has never been doubted, and probably the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was the prominent idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution when to Congress was committed the power to regulate commerce among the several States. A power to prevent embarrassing restrictions by any State was the thing desired. The power was given by the same words and in the same clause by which was conferred power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations. It would be absurd to suppose that the transmission of the subjects of trade from the State to the buyer, or from the place of production to the market, was not contemplated, for without that there could be no consummated trade, either with foreign Nations or among the States. * * * Nor does it make any difference whether this interchange of commodities is by land or by water. In either case the bringing of the goods from the seller to the buyer is commerce. Among the States it must have been principally by land when the Constitution was adopted." Case of the State Freight Tax, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232, 275 [21: 146, 161], per Mr. Justice Strong. It was, therefore, decided in that case that a tax upon freight transported from State to State was a regulation of interstate transportation, and for that reason a regulation of commerce among the States. And this conclusion was reached notwithstanding the fact that Congress had not legislated on the subject, and notwithstanding the inference sought to be drawn from the fact, that it was thereby left open to the legislation of the several States. On that point it was said by Mr. Justice Strong, speaking for the court, as follows, p. 279 [163]: "Cases that have sustained state laws, alleged to be regulations of commerce among the States, have been such as related to bridges or dams across streams wholly within a State, police or health laws, or subjects of a kindred nature not strictly of commercial regulations. The subjects were such as in Gilman v. Philadelphia, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 713 [18: 96], it was said 'can be best regulated by rules and provisions suggested by the varying circumstances of different localities and limited in their operation to such localities respectively.' However this may be, the rule has been asserted with great clearness that whenever the subjects over which a power to regulate commerce is asserted are in their nature national, or admitting of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. Cooley v. Port Wardens, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299 [13: 996]; Crandall v. Nev. 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 42 [18: 746]. Surely transportation of passengers or merchandise through a State, or from one State to another, is of this nature. It is of national importance that over that subject there should be but one regulating power, for if one State can directly tax persons or property passing through it, or tax them indirectly by levying a tax upon their transportation, every other may; and thus commercial intercourse between States remote from each other may be destroyed. The produce of Western States may thus be effectually excluded from eastern markets, for though it might bear the imposition of a single tax, it would be crushed under a load of many. It was to guard against the possibility of such commercial embarrassments, no doubt, that the power of regulating commerce among the States was conferred upon the Federal Government."

The distinction between the cases in which Congress has exerted its power over commerce, and those in which it has abstained from its exercise, as bearing upon state legislation touching the subject was first plainly pointed out by Mr. Justice Curtis in the case of Cooley v. Port Wardens, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299, 318, [13: 996, 1004], and applies to commerce with foreign Nations as well as to commerce among the States. In that case, speaking of commerce with foreign Nations, he said, p. 319 [1005]: "Now, the power to regulate commerce embraces a vast field, containing not only many but exceedingly various subjects quite unlike in their nature; some imperatively demanding a single uniform rule operating equally on the commerce of the United States in every port; and some, like the subject now in question, as imperatively demanding that diversity which alone can meet the local necessities of navigation." It was, therefore, held in that case that the laws of the several States concerning pilotage, although in their nature regulations of foreign commerce, were, in the absence of legislation on the same subject by Congress, valid exercises of power. The subject was local and not national, and was likely to be best provided for, not by one system or plan of regulations, but by as many as the legislative discretion of the several States should deem applicable to the local peculiarities of the ports within their limits; and to this it may be added that it was a subject imperatively demanding positive regulation. The absence of legislation on the subject, therefore, by Congress, was evidence of its opinion that the matter might be best regulated by local authority, and proof of its intention that local regulations might be made.

It may be argued, however, that, aside from such regulations as these, which are purely local, the inference to be drawn from the absence of legislation by Congress on the subject excludes state legislation affecting commerce with foreign Nations more strongly than that affecting commerce among the States. Laws which concern the exterior relations of the United States with other Nations and governments are general in their nature, and should proceed exclusively from the legislative authority of the Nation. The organization of our state and federal system of government is such that the people of the several States can have no relations with foreign powers in respect to commerce or any other subject, except through the Government of the United States and its laws and treaties. Henderson v. Mayor of N. Y. 92 U. S. 259, 273 [23: 543, 549].

The same necessity perhaps does not exist equally in reference to commerce among the States. The power conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce among the States is indeed contained in the same clause of the Constitution which confers upon it power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations. The grant is conceived in the same terms, and the two powers are undoubtedly of the same class and character and equally extensive. The actual exercise of its power over either subject is equally and necessarily exclusive of that of the States, and paramount over all the powers of the States; so that state legislation, however legitimate in its origin or object, when it conflicts with the positive legislation of Congress, or its intention reasonably implied from its silence, in respect to the subject of commerce of both kinds, must fail. And yet in respect to commerce among the States, it may be for the reason already assigned that the same inference is not always to be drawn from the absence of congressional legislation as might be in the case of commerce with foreign Nations. The question, therefore, may be still considered in each case as it arises, whether the fact that Congress has failed in the particular instance to provide by law a regulation of commerce among the States is conclusive of its intention that the subject shall be free from all positive regulation, or that, until it positively interferes, such commerce may be left to be freely dealt with by the respective States.

We have seen that in the case of the State Freight Tax, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 282 [21: 146], a tax imposed by one State upon freight transported to or from another State was held to be void as a regulation of commerce among the States, on the ground that the transportation of passengers or merchandise through a State, or from one State to another, was in its nature national, so that it should be subjected to one uniform system or plan of regulation under the control of one regulating power. In that case the tax was not imposed for the purpose of regulating interstate commerce, but in order to raise a revenue, and would have been a legitimate exercise of an admitted power of the State if it had not been exerted so as to operate as a regulation of interstate commerce. Any other regulation of interstate commerce, applied as the tax was in that case, would fall equally within the rule of its decision. If the State has not power to tax freight and passengers passing through it, or to or from it, from or into another State, much less would it have the power directly to regulate such transportation, or to forbid it altogether. If in the present case the law of Iowa operated upon all merchandise sought to be brought from another State into its limits, there could be no doubt that it would be a regulation of commerce among the States and repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. In point of fact, however, it applies only to one class of articles of a particular kind, and prohibits their introduction into the State upon special grounds. It remains for us to consider whether those grounds are sufficient to justify it as an exception from the rule which would govern if they did not exist.

It may be material also to state in this connection that Congress had legislated on the general subject of interstate commerce by means of railroads prior to the date of the transaction on which the present suit is founded. Section 5258 of the Revised Statutes provides that "Every railroad company in the United States whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to carry upon and over its road, boats, bridges, and ferries, all passengers, troops, government supplies, mails, freight, and property on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor, and to connect with roads of other States so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of the same to the place of destination." In the case of Railroad Company v. Richmond, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 584, [22: 173], this section, then constituting a part of the Act of Congress of June 15, 1866, was considered. Referring to this Act and the Act of July 25, 1866, authorizing the construction of bridges over the Mississippi River, the court says: "These Acts were passed under the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, and were designed to remove trammels upon transportation between different States which had previously existed, and to prevent a creation of such trammels in future, and to facilitate railway transportation by authorizing the construction of bridges over the navigable waters of the Mississippi; and they were intended to reach trammels interposed by state enactments or by existing laws of Congress. * * * The power to regulate commerce among the several States was vested in Congress in order to secure equality and freedom in commercial intercourse against discriminating state legislation."

Congress had also legislated on the subject of the transportation of passengers and merchandise in chapter 6, title 48 of the Revised Statutes; sections 4252 to 4289, inclusive, having reference, however, mainly to transportation in vessels by water. But sections 4278 and 4279 relate also to the transportation of nitro-glycerine and other similar explosive substances by land or water, and either as a matter of commerce with foreign countries or among the several States. Section 4280 provides that "The two preceding sections shall not be so construed as to prevent any State, Territory, district, city or town within the United States from regulating or from prohibiting the traffic in or transportation of those substances between persons or places lying or being within their respective territorial limits, or from prohibiting the introduction thereof into such limits for sale, use or consumption therein."

So far as these regulations made by Congress extend they are certainly indications of its intention that the transportation of commodities between the States shall be free, except where it is positively restricted by Congress itself, or by the States in particular cases by the express permission of Congress. On this point the language of this court in the case of Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 697 [26: 238, 239], is applicable. Repeating and expanding the idea expressed in the opinion in the case of Cooley v. Port Wardens, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299 [13: 996], this court said: "The subjects, indeed, upon which Congress can act under this power are of infinite variety, requiring for their successful management different plans or modes of treatment. Some of them are national in their character, and admit and require uniformity of regulation, affecting alike all the States; others are local, or are mere aids to commerce, and can only be properly regulated by provisions adapted to their special circumstances and localities. In the former class may be mentioned all that portion of commerce with foreign countries or between the States which consists in the transportation, purchase, sale and exchange of commodities. Here there can of necessity be only one system or plan of regulations, and that Congress alone can prescribe. Its nonaction in such cases with respect to any particular commodity or mode of transportation is a declaration of its purpose that the commerce in that commodity, or by that means of transportation, shall be free. There would, otherwise, be no security against conflicting regulations of different States, each discriminating in favor of its own products and against the products of citizens of other States. And it is a matter of public history that the object of vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations and among the States was to insure uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminating state legislation." Also 102 U. S. 702 [26: 241]: "Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale and exchange of commodities. For the regulation of commerce as thus defined, there can be only one system of rules, applicable alike to the whole country; and the authority which can act for the whole country can alone adopt such a system. Action upon it by separate States is not, therefore, permissible."

The principle thus announced has a more obvious application to the circumstances of such a case as the present, when it is considered that the law of the State of Iowa under consideration, while it professes to regulate the conduct of carriers engaged in transportation within the limits of that State, nevertheless materially affects, if allowed to operate, the conduct of such carriers, both as respects their rights and obligations, in every other State into or through which they pass in the prosecution of their business of interstate transportation. In the present case, the defendant is sued as a common carrier in the State of Illinois, and the breach of duty alleged against it is a violation of the law of that State in refusing to receive and transport goods which, as a common carrier, by that law, it was bound to accept and carry. It interposes as a defense a law of the State of Iowa, which forbids the delivery of such goods within that State. Has the law of Iowa any extraterritorial force which does not belong to the law of the State of Illinois? If the law of Iowa forbids the delivery, and the law of Illinois requires the transportation, which of the two shall prevail? How can the former make void the latter? In view of this necessary operation of the law of Iowa, if it be valid, the language of this court in the case of Hall v. DeCuir, 95 U. S. 485, 488 [24: 547, 548], is exactly in point. It was there said: "But we think it may safely be said that state legislation, which seeks to impose a direct burden upon interstate commerce, or to interfere directly with its freedom, does encroach upon the exclusive power of Congress. The statute now under consideration, in our opinion, occupies that position. It does not act upon the business through the local instruments to be employed after coming within the State, but directly upon the business as it comes into the State from without or goes out from within. While it purports only to control the carrier when engaged within the State, it must necessarily influence his conduct to some extent in the management of his business throughout his entire voyage. His disposition of passengers taken up and put down within the State, or taken up within to be carried without, cannot but affect in a greater or less degree those taken up without and brought within, and sometimes those taken up within and put down without. A passenger in the cabin set apart for the use of whites without the State must, when the boat comes within, share the accommodations of that cabin with such colored persons as may come on board afterwards, if the law is enforced. It was to meet just such a case that the commercial clause in the Constitution was adopted. The River Mississippi passes through or along the borders of ten different States, and its tributaries reach many more. The commerce upon these waters is immense, and its regulation clearly a matter of national concern. If each State was at liberty to regulate the conduct of carriers while within its jurisdiction, the confusion likely to follow could not but be productive of great inconvenience and unnecessary hardship.

Each State could provide for its own passengers and regulate the transportation of its own freight, regardless of the interests of others. Nay, more, it could prescribe rules by which the carrier must be governed within the State, in respect to passengers and property brought from without. On one side of the river or its tributaries he might be required to observe one set of rules, and on the other another. Commerce cannot flourish in the midst of such embarrassments. No carrier of passengers can conduct his business with satisfaction to himself, or comfort to those employing him, if on one side of a state line his passengers, both white and colored, must be permitted to occupy the same cabin, and on the other be kept separate. Uniformity in the regulations by which he is to be governed from one end to the other of his route is a necessity in his business, and to secure it Congress, which is untrammeled by state lines, has been vested with the exclusive legislative power of determining what such regulations shall be."

It is impossible to justify this Statute of Iowa by classifying it as an inspection law. The right of the States to pass inspection laws is expressly recognized in article I, § 10, of the Constitution, in the clause declaring that "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws. * * * And all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress." The nature and character of the inspection laws of the States, contemplated by this provision of the Constitution, were very fully exhibited in the case of Turner v. Maryland, 107 U. S. 38 [27:370]. "The object of inspection laws," said Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 203 [6: 23, 71], "is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labor of a country; to fit them for exportation or, it may be, for domestic use. They act upon the subject, before it becomes an article of foreign commerce, or of commerce among the States, and prepare it for that purpose." They are confined to such particulars as, in the estimation of the Legislature and according to the customs of trade, are deemed necessary to fit the inspected article for the market, by giving to the purchaser public assurance that the article is in that condition, and of that quality, which makes it merchantable and fit for use or consumption. They are not founded on the idea that the things, in respect to which inspection is required, are dangerous or noxious in themselves. As was said in Turner v. Maryland, 107 U. S. 38, 55 [27: 370, 376]. "Recognized elements of inspection laws have always been quality of the article, form, capacity, dimensions, and weight of package, mode of putting up, and marking and branding of various kinds, all these matters being supervised by a public officer having authority to pass or not pass the article as lawful merchandise, as it did or did not answer the prescribed requirements. It has never been regarded as necessary, and it is manifestly not necessary, that all of these elements should coexist in order to make a valid inspection law. Quality alone may be the subject of inspection, without other requirement, or the inspection may be made to extend to all of the above matters." It has never been regarded as within the legitimate scope of inspection laws to forbid trade in respect to any known article of commerce, irrespective of its condition and quality, merely on account of its intrinsic nature and the injurious consequences of its use or abuse.

For similar reasons the Statute of Iowa under consideration cannot be regarded as a regulation of quarantine or a sanitary provision for the purpose of protecting the physical health of the community, or a law to prevent the introduction into the State of disease, contagious, infectious or otherwise. Doubtless the States have power to provide by law suitable measures to prevent the introduction into the States of articles of trade, which, on account of their existing condition, would bring in and spread disease, pestilence, and death, such as rags or other substances infected with the germs of yellow fever or the virus of smallpox, or cattle or meat or other provisions that are diseased or decayed, or otherwise, from their condition and quality, unfit for human use or consumption. Such articles are not merchantable; they are not legitimate subjects of trade and commerce. They may be rightly outlawed as intrinsically and directly the immediate sources and causes of destruction to human health and life. The self protecting power of each State, therefore, may be rightfully exerted against their introduction, and such exercises of power cannot be considered regulations of commerce prohibited by the Constitution. Upon this point, the observations of Mr. Justice Catron in the License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, 599 [12: 256, 299] are very much to the point. Speaking of the police power, as reserved to the States, and its relation to the power granted to Congress over commerce, he said: "The assumption is that the police power was not touched by the Constitution, but left to the States, as the Constitution found it. This is admitted; and whenever a thing, from character or condition, is of a description to be regulated by that power in the State, then the regulation may be made by the State, and Congress cannot interfere. But this must always depend on facts subject to legal ascertainment, so that the injured may have redress. And the fact must find its support in this: whether the prohibited article belongs to, and is subject to be regulated as a part of, foreign commerce, or of commerce among the States. If, from its nature, it does not belong to commerce, or if its condition, from putrescence or other cause, is such, when it is about to enter the State, that it no longer belongs to commerce, or in other words is not a commercial article, then the state power may exclude its introduction. And as an incident to this power, a State may use means to ascertain the fact. And here is the limit between the sovereign power of the State and the federal power. That is to say, that which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State; and that which does belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States. And to this limit must all the general views come, as I suppose, that were suggested in the reasoning of this court in the cases of Gibbons v. Ogden, Brown v. Maryland, and New York v. Miln. What, then, is the assumption of the state court? · Undoubtedly, in effect, that the State had the power to declare what should be an article of lawful commerce in the particular State; and having declared that ardent spirits and wines were deleterious to morals and health, they ceased to be commercial commodities there, and that then the police power attached, and consequently the powers of Congress could not interfere. The exclusive state power is made to rest, not on the fact of the state or condition of the article, nor that it is property usually passing by sale from hand to hand, but on the declaration found in the state laws, and asserted as the state policy, that it shall be excluded from commerce. And by this means the sovereign jurisdiction in the State is attempted to be created in a case where it did not previously exist. If this be the true construction of the constitutional provision, then the paramount power of Congress to regulate commerce is subject to a very material limitation; for it takes from Congress, and leaves with the States, the power to determine the commodities, or articles of property, which are the subjects of lawful commerce. Congress may regulate, but the States determine what shall or shall not be regulated. Upon this theory the power to regulate commerce, instead of being paramount over the subject, would become subordinate to the state police power; for it is obvious that the power to determine the articles which may be the subjects of commerce, and thus to circumscribe its scope and operation, is, in effect, the controlling one. The police power would not only be a formidable rival, but, in a struggle, must necessarily triumph over the commercial power, as the power to regulate is dependent upon the power to fix and determine upon the subjects to be regulated. The same process of legislation and reasoning adopted by the State and its courts could bring within the police power any article of consumption that a State might wish to exclude, whether it belonged to that which was drank, or to food and clothing; and with nearly equal claims to propriety, as malt liquors and the produce of fruits other than grapes stand on no higher ground than the light wines of this and other countries, excluded, in effect, by the law as it now stands. And it would only be another step to regulate real or supposed extravagance in food and clothing."

This question was considered in the case of Railroad Company v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465 [24: 527], in which this court declared an Act of the Legislature of Missouri, which prohibited driving or conveying any Texas, Mexican or Indian cattle into the State, between the first day of March and the first day of November in each year, to be in conflict with the constitutional provision investing Congress with power to regulate commerce among the several States, holding that such a statute was more than a quarantine regulation, and not a legitimate exercise of the police power of the State. In that case it was said, p. 472 [530]. "While we unhesitatingly admit that a State may pass sanitary laws, and laws for the protection of life, liberty, health, or property within its borders; while it may prevent persons and animals suffering under contagious or infectious diseases, or convicts, etc., from entering the State; while for the purpose of self protection it may establish quarantine and reasonable inspection laws, it may not interfere with transportation into or through the State, beyond what is absolutely necessary for its self protection. It may not, under the cover of exerting its police powers, substantially prohibit or burden either foreign or interstate commerce. * * * The reach of the statute was far beyond its professed object, and far into the realm which is within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress. * * * The police power of a State cannot obstruct foreign commerce or interstate commerce beyond the necessity for its exercise; and, under color of it, objects not within its scope cannot be secured at the expense of the protection afforded by the Federal Constitution. And as its range sometimes comes very near to the field committed by the Constitution to Congress, it is the duty of the courts to guard vigilantly against any needless intrusion."

The same principles were declared in Henderson v. Mayor of New York, 92 U. S. 259 [23: 543], and Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275 [23: 550]. In the latter case, speaking of the right of the State to protect itself from the introduction of paupers and convicted criminals from abroad, the court said: "Such a right can only arise from a vital necessity for its exercise, and cannot be carried beyond the scope of that necessity." "It may also be admitted," as was said in the case of Railroad Company v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 471 [24: 527, 530], "that the police power of a State justifies the adoption of precautionary measures against social evils. Under it a State may legislate to prevent the spread of crime or pauperism, or disturbance of the peace. It may exclude from its limits convicts, paupers, idiots, and lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge, as well as persons afflicted by contagious or infectious diseases; a right founded, as intimated in the Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 283 [12: 702], by Mr. Justice Grier, in the sacred law of self-defense. Vide, 3 Sawy. 144. The same principle, it may also be conceded, would justify the exclusion of property dangerous to the property of citizens of the State; for example, animals having contagious or infectious diseases. All these exertions of power are in immediate connection with the protection of persons and property against noxious acts of other persons, or such a use of property as is injurious to the property of others. They are self defensive. But whatever may be the nature and reach of the police power of a State, it cannot be exercised over a subject confided exclusively to congress by the Federal Constitution. It cannot invade the domain of the National Government. * * * Neither the unlimited powers of a State to tax, nor any of its large police powers, can be exercised to such an extent as to work a practical assumption of the powers properly conferred upon Congress by the Constitution."

It is conceded, as we have already shown, that for the purposes of its policy a State has legislative control, exclusive of Congress, within its territory of all persons, things, and transactions of strictly internal concern. For the purpose of protecting its people against the evils of intemperance it has the right to prohibit the manufacture within its limits of intoxicating liquors; it may also prohibit all domestic commerce in them between its own inhabitants, whether the articles are introduced from other States or from foreign countries; it may punish those who sell them in violation of its laws; it may adopt any measures tending, even indirectly and remotely, to make the policy effective until it passes the line of power delegated to Congress under the Constitution. It cannot, without the consent of Congress, expressed or implied, regulate commerce between its people and those of the other States of the Union in order to effect its end, however desirable such a regulation might be.

The Statute of Iowa under consideration falls within this prohibition. It is not an inspection law; it is not a quarantine or sanitary law. It is essentially a regulation of commerce among the States within any definition heretofore given to that term, or which can be given; and although its motive and purpose are to perfect the policy of the State of Iowa in protecting its citizens against the evils of intemperance, it is none the less on that account a regulation of commerce. If it had extended its provisions so as to prohibit the introduction into the State from foreign countries of all importations of intoxicating liquors produced abroad, no one would doubt the nature of the provision as a regulation of foreign commerce. Its nature is not changed by its application to commerce among the States.

Can it be supposed that by omitting any express declarations on the subject, Congress has intended to submit to the several States the decision of the question in each locality of what shall and what shall not be articles of traffic in the interstate commerce of the country? If so, it has left to each State, according to its own caprice and arbitrary will, to discriminate for or against every article grown, produced, manufactured, or sold in any State and sought to be introduced as an article of commerce into any other. If the State of Iowa may prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors from all other States, it may also include tobacco, or any other article, the use or abuse of which it may deem deleterious. It may not choose, even, to be governed by considerations growing out of the health, comfort, or peace of the community. Its policy may be directed to other ends. It may choose to establish a system directed to the promotion and benefit of its own agriculture, manufactures or arts of any description, and prevent the introduction and sale within its limits of any or of all articles that it may select as coming into competition with those which it seeks to protect. The police power of the State would extend to such cases, as well as to those in which it was sought to legislate in behalf of the health, peace, and morals of the people. In view of the commercial anarchy and confusion that would result from the diverse exertions of power by the several States of the Union, it cannot be supposed that the Constitution or Congress have intended to limit the freedom of commercial intercourse among the people of the several States. "It cannot be too strongly insisted upon," said this court in Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557, 572 [30: 244, 249], "that the right of continuous transportation from one end of the country to the other is essential in modern times to that freedom of commerce from the restraints which the States might choose to impose upon it, that the commerce clause was intended to secure. This clause, giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, as this court has said before, was among the most important of the subjects which prompted the formation of the Constitution. Cook v. Pa. 97 U. S. 566, 574 [24: 1015, 1018]; Brown v. Md. 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 446 [6: 678, 688]. And it would be a very feeble and almost useless provision, but poorly adapted to secure the entire freedom of commerce among the States, which was deemed essential to a more perfect union by the framers of the Constitution, if, at every stage of the transportation of goods and chattels through the country, the State, within whose limits a part of the transportation must be done, could impose regulations concerning the price, compensation, or taxation, or any other restrictive regulation interfering with and seriously embarrassing this commerce."

In Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 630 [29: 257, 260], it was declared that the power of Congress over commerce among the States "is certainly so far exclusive that no State has power to make any law or regulation which will affect the free and unrestrained intercourse and trade between the States, as Congress has left it, or which will impose any discriminating burden or tax upon the citizens or products of other States, coming or brought within its jurisdiction. All laws and regulations are restrictive of natural freedom to some extent; and, where no regulation is imposed by the government which has the exclusive power to regulate, it is an indication of its will that the matter shall be left free. So long as Congress does not pass any law to regulate commerce among the several States, it thereby indicates its will that that commerce shall be free and untrammeled; and any regulation of the subject by the States is repugnant to such freedom. This has frequently been laid down as law in the judgments of this court."

The present case is concluded, we think, by the judgment of this court in Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 446 [29: 691]. In that case an Act of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, which imposed a tax upon persons who, not residing or having their principal place of business within the State, engaged there in the business of selling or soliciting the sale of intoxicating liquors to be shipped into the State from places without it, but did not impose a similar tax upon persons selling or soliciting the sale of intoxicating liquors manufactured in the State, was declared to be void on the ground that it was a regulation in restraint of commerce repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. In that case it was said, p. 459 [695]: "It is suggested by the learned judge, who delivered the opinion of the Supreme Court of Michigan in this case, that the tax imposed by the Act of 1875 is an exercise, by the Legislature of Michigan, of the police power of the State for the discouragement of the use of intoxicating liquors, and the preservation of the health and morals of the people. This would be a perfect justification of the Act, if it did not discriminate against the citizens and products of other States as a matter of commerce between the States, and thus usurp one of the prerogatives of the National Legislature. The police power cannot be set up to control the inhibitions of the Federal Constitution, or the powers of the United States Government created thereby."

It would be error to lay any stress on the fact that the statute passed upon in that case made a discrimination between citizens and products of other States in favor of those of the State of Michigan, notwithstanding the intimation on that point in the foregoing extract from the opinion. This appears plainly from what was decided in the case of Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing District, 120 U. S. 489 [30: 694]. It was there said, p. 497 [697]: "It is strongly urged, as if it were a material point in the case, that no discrimination is made between domestic and foreign drummers—those of Tennessee and those of other States; that all are taxed alike. But that does not meet the difficulty. Interstate commerce cannot be taxed at all, even though the same amount of tax should be laid on domestic commerce, or that which is carried on solely within the State. This was decided in the case of the State Freight Tax, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232 [21: 146.]"

In answer to another suggestion in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Michigan, that the regulation contained in the Act did not amount to a prohibition, this court said: "We are unable to adopt the views of that learned tribunal as here expressed. It is the power to regulate commerce among the several States which the Constitution in terms confers upon Congress; and this power, as we have seen, is exclusive in cases like the present, where the subject of regulation is one that admits and requires uniformity, and where any regulation affects the freedom of traffic among the States."

The relation of the police powers of the State to the powers granted to Congress by the Constitution over foreign and interstate commerce, was stated by this court in the opinion in the case of Robbins v. Shelby Taxing District, 120 U. S. 489, 493 [30: 694, 696], as follows: "It is also an established principle, as already indicated, that the only way in which commerce between the States can be legitimately affected by state laws is when, by virtue of its police power, and its jurisdiction over persons and property within its limits, a State provides for the security of the lives, limbs, health and comfort of persons, and the protection of property; or when it does those things which may otherwise incidentally affect commerce, such as the establishment and regulation of highways, canals, railroads, wharves, ferries and other commercial facilities; the passage of inspection laws to secure the due quality and measure of products and commodities; the passage of laws to regulate or restrict the sale of articles deemed injurious to the health or morals of the community; the imposition of taxes upon persons residing within the State or belonging to its population, and upon avocations and employments pursued therein, not directly connected with foreign or interstate commerce, or with some other employment or business exercised under authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States; and the imposition of taxes upon all property within the State mingled with and forming part of the great mass of property therein. But in making such internal regulations the State cannot impose taxes upon persons passing through the State, or coming into it merely for a temporary purpose, especially if connected with interstate or foreign commerce; nor can it impose such taxes upon property imported into the State from abroad or from another State, and not yet become a part of the common mass of property therein; and no discrimination can be made by any such regulations adversely to the persons or property of other States; and no regulations can be made directly affecting interstate commerce. Any taxation or regulation of the latter character would be an unauthorized interference with the power given to Congress over the subject. * * * In a word, it may be said that in the matter of interstate commerce the United States are but one country, and are and must be subject to one system of regulations, and not to a multitude of systems. The doctrine of the freedom of that commerce, except as regulated by Congress, is so firmly established that it is unnecessary to enlarge further upon this subject."

The section of the Statute of Iowa, the validity of which is drawn in question in this case, does not fall within this enumeration of legitimate exertions of the police power. It is not an exercise of the jurisdiction of the State over persons and property within its limits. On the contrary, it is an attempt to exert that jurisdiction over persons and property within the limits of other States. It seeks to prohibit and stop their passage and importation into its own limits, and is designed as a regulation for the conduct of commerce before the merchandise is brought to its border. It is not one of those local regulations designed to aid and facilitate commerce; it is not an inspection law to secure the due quality and measure of a commodity; it is not a law to regulate or restrict the sale of an article deemed injurious to the health and morals of the community; it is not a regulation confined to the purely internal and domestic commerce of the State; it is not a restriction which only operates upon property after it has become mingled with and forms part of the mass of the property within the State. It is, on the other hand, a regulation directly affecting interstate commerce in an essential and vital point. If authorized, in the present instance, upon the grounds and motives of the policy which have dictated it, the same reason would justify any and every other state regulation of interstate commerce upon any grounds and reasons which might prompt in particular cases their adoption. It is, therefore, a regulation of that character which constitutes an unauthorized interference with the power given to Congress over the subject. If not in contravention of any positive legislation by Congress, it is nevertheless a breach and interruption of that liberty of trade which Congress ordains as the national policy, by willing that it shall be free from restrictive regulations.

It may be said, however, that the right of the State to restrict or prohibit sales of intoxicating liquor within its limits, conceded to exist as a part of its police power implies the right to prohibit its importation, because the latter is necessary to the effectual exercise of the former. The argument is that a prohibition of the sale cannot be made effective, except by preventing the introduction of the subject of the sale; that if its entrance into the State is permitted, the traffic in it cannot be suppressed. But the right to prohibit sales, so far as conceded to the States, arises only after the act of transportation has terminated, because the sales which the State may forbid are of things within its jurisdiction. Its power over them does not begin to operate until they are brought within the territorial limits which circumscribe it. It might be very convenient and useful in the execution of the policy of prohibition within the State to extend the powers of the State beyond its territorial limits. But such extraterritorial powers cannot be assumed upon such an implication. On the contrary, the nature of the case contradicts their existence; for if they belong to one State, they belong to all, and cannot be exercised severally and independently. The attempt would necessarily produce that conflict and confusion which it was the very purpose of the Constitution by its delegations of national power to prevent.

It is easier to think that the right of importation from abroad, and of transportation from one State to another, includes, by necessary implication, the right of the importer to sell in unbroken packages at the place where the transit terminates; for the very purpose and motive of that branch of commerce which consists in transportation, is that other and consequent act of commerce which consists in the sale and exchange of the commodities transported. Such, indeed, was the point decided in the case of Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat, 419 [6:678], as to foreign commerce, with the express statement, in the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, that the conclusion would be the same in a case of commerce among the States. But it is not necessary now to express any opinion upon the point, because that question does not arise in the present case. The precise line which divides the transaction, so far as it belongs to foreign or interstate commerce, from the internal and domestic commerce of the State, we are not now called upon to delineate. It is enough to say that the power to regulate or forbid the sale of a commodity, after it has been brought into the State, does not carry with it the right and power to prevent its introduction by transportation from another State.

For these reasons, we are constrained to pronounce against the validity of the section of the Statute of Iowa involved in this case.

The judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to sustain the demurrer to the plea, and to take further proceedings therein in conformity with this opinion.

Mr. Justice Lamar was not present at the argument of this case and took no part in its decision.

Mr. Justice Field concurring:

I concur in the judgment of the court in this case, and in the greater part of the opinion upon which it is founded. The opinion clearly shows, as I think, that the law of Iowa prohibiting the importation into that State of intoxicating liquors is an encroachment on the power of Congress over interstate commerce. That commerce is a subject of vast extent. It embraces intercourse between citizens of different States for purposes of trade in any and all its forms, including the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. The power to regulate it, which is vested in Congress in the same clause with the power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations, is general in its terms. And to regulate this commerce is to prescribe the conditions under which it shall be conducted; that is, how far it shall be free, and how far subject to restrictions. The defendant is a common carrier engaged in the transportation of freight by railway, not only between places in the State of Illinois, but also between places in different States. In the latter business it is, therefore, engaged in interstate commerce. Whatever is an article of commerce it may carry, subject to such regulations as may be necessary for the convenience and safety of the community through which its cars pass, and to insure safety in the carriage of the freight. The law of Iowa prescribing the conditions upon which certain liquors may be imported into that State is, therefore, a regulation of interstate commerce. Such regulation, where the subject, like the transportation of goods, is national in its character, can be made only by Congress, the power which can act for the whole country. Action by the States upon such commerce is not, therefore, permissible. Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 697 [26: 238, 239].

What is an article of commerce is determinable by the usages of the commercial world, and does not depend upon the declaration of any State. The State possesses the power to prescribe all such regulations with respect to the possession, use, and sale of property within its limits as may be necessary to protect the health, lives, and morals of its people; and that power may be applied to all kinds of property, even that which in its nature is harmless. But the power of regulation for that purpose is one thing, and the power to exclude an article from commerce by a declaration that it shall not thenceforth be the subject of use and sale is another and very different thing. If the State could thus take an article from commerce, its power over interstate commerce would be superior to that of Congress, where the Constitution has vested it. The language of Mr. Justice Catron on this subject in The License Cases, quoted in the opinion of the court, is instructive. 46 U.S. 5 Howard, 600 [12: 299]. Speaking of the assumption by the State of power to declare what shall and what shall not be deemed an article of commerce within its limits, and thus to permit the sale of one and prohibit the sale of the other, without reference to congressional power of regulation, the learned justice said: "The exclusive state power is made to rest, not on the fact of the state or condition of the article, nor that it is property usually passing by sale from hand to hand, but on the declaration found in the state laws, and asserted as the state policy, that it shall be excluded from commerce. And by this means the sovereign jurisdiction in the State is attempted to be created in a case where it did not previously exist. If this be the true construction of the constitutional provision, then the paramount power of Congress to regulate commerce is subject to a very material limitation; for it takes from Congress, and leaves with the States, the power to determine the commodities or articles of property which are the subjects of lawful commerce. Congress may regulate, but the States determine what shall or shall not be regulated. Upon this theory the power to regulate commerce, instead of being paramount over the subject, would become subordinate to the state police power; for it is obvious that the power to determine the articles which may be the subjects of commerce, and thus to circumscribe its scope and operation, is, in effect, the controlling one. The police power would not only be a formidable rival, but, in a struggle, must necessarily triumph over the commercial power, as the power to regulate is dependent upon the power to fix and determine upon the subjects to be regulated."

In Mugler v. Kansas, recently decided, 123 U. S. 623 [31:205], this court held a statute of that State to be valid which prohibited the manufacture and sale within its limits of intoxicating liquors except for medical, scientific, or mechanical purposes, and made a violation of its provisions a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment. I agreed to so much of the opinion of the court in that case as asserted that there was nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States which affected the validity of the statute prohibiting the sale of such liquors manufactured in the State, except under proper regulations for the protection of the health and morals of the people. But, at the same time, I stated, without expressing any opinion on the subject, that I was not prepared to say that the State could prohibit the sale of such liquors within its limits under like regulations, if Congress should authorize their importation; observing that the right to import an article of merchandise, recognized as such by the commercial world, whether the right be given by Act of Congress or by treaty with a foreign Nation, would seem necessarily to carry the right to sell the article when imported. Where the importation is authorized from one State to another a similar right of sale of the article imported would seem to follow. The question upon which I was then unwilling to express an opinion is presented in this case, not in a direct way, it is true, but in such a form as, it seems to me, to require consideration.

A Statute of Iowa contains a prohibition, similar to that of the Kansas Statute, upon the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors within its limits, with the additional exception of permission to use them for culinary purposes, and to sell foreign liquors imported under a law of Congress, in the original casks or packages in which they are imported. The law under consideration in this case, prohibiting the importation into Iowa of such liquors from other States, without a license for that purpose, was passed to carry out the policy of the State to suppress the sale of such liquors within its limits. And the argument is pressed with much force that if the State cannot prohibit the importation its policy to suppress the sale will be defeated; and if legislation establishing such policy is not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, this additional measure to carry the legislation into successful operation must be permissible. The argument assumes that the right of importation carries with it the right to sell the article imported, a position hereafter considered.

The reserved powers of the States in the regulation of their internal affairs must be exercised consistently with the exercise of the powers delegated to the United States. If there be a conflict, the powers delegated must prevail, being so much authority taken from the States by the express sanction of their people; for the Constitution itself declares that laws made in pursuance of it shall be the supreme law of the land. But those powers which authorize legislation touching the health, morals, good order, and peace of their people were not delegated, and are so essential to the existence and prosperity of the States that it is not to be presumed that they will be encroached upon so as to impair their reasonable exercise.

How can these reserved powers be reconciled with the conceded power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce? As said above, the State cannot exclude an article from commerce, and consequently from importation, simply by declaring that its policy requires such exclusion; and yet its regulations respecting the possession, use, and sale of any article of commerce may be as minute and strict as required by the nature of the article, and the liability of injury from it for the safety, health and morals of its people.

In the opinion of the court it is stated that the effect of the right of importation upon the asserted right, as a consequence thereof, to sell the article imported is not involved in this case, and therefore it is not necessary to express any opinion on the subject. The case, it is true, can be decided, and has been decided, without expressing an opinion on that subject; but with great deference to my associates, I must say that I think its consideration is presented, and to some extent required, to meet the argument that the right of importation, because carrying the right to sell the article imported, is inconsistent with the right of the State to prohibit the sale of the article absolutely, as held in the Kansas Case. With respect to most subjects of commerce, regulations may be adopted touching their use and sale when imported, which will afford all the protection and security desired, without going to the extent of absolute prohibition. It is not found difficult, even with the most dangerous articles, to provide such minute and stringent regulations as will guard the public from all harm from them. Arsenic, dynamite powder, and nitro-glycerine are imported into every State under such restrictions as to their transportation and sale as to render it safe to deal in them. There may be greater difficulty in regulating the use and sale of intoxicating liquors; and I admit that whenever the use of an article cannot be regulated and controlled so as to insure the health and safety of society, it may be prohibited and the article destroyed.

That the right of importation carries with it the right to sell the article imported does not appear to me doubtful. Of course I am speaking of an article that is in a healthy condition, for when it has become putrescent or diseased it has ceased to be an article of commerce, and it may be destroyed or its use prohibited. To assert that, under the Constitution of the United States, the importation of an article of commerce cannot be prohibited by the States, and yet to hold that when imported its use and sale can be prohibited, is to declare that the right which the Constitution gives is a barren one, to be used only so far as the burden of transportation is concerned, and to be denied so far as any benefits from such transportation are sought. The framers of the Constitution never intended that a right given should not be fully enjoyed. In Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 447, [6: 688], Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, speaking of the commercial power of Congress, and after observing that it is coextensive with the subject on which it acts, and cannot be stopped at the exterior boundary of a State, but must enter its interior, said: "If this power reaches the interior of a State, and may be there exercised, it must be capable of authorizing the sale of those articles which it introduces. Commerce is intercourse;—one of its most ordinary ingredients is traffic. It is inconceivable that the power to authorize this traffic, when given in the most comprehensive terms, with the intent that its efficacy should be complete, should cease at the point when its continuance is indispensable to its value. To what purpose should the power to allow importation be given, unaccompanied with the power to authorize a sale of the thing imported? Sale is the object of importation, and is an essential ingredient of that intercourse of which importation constitutes a part. It is as essential an ingredient, as indispensable to the existence, of the entire thing, then, as importation itself. It must be considered as a component part of the power to regulate commerce. Congress has a right, not only to authorize importation, but to authorize the importer to sell. * * * The power claimed by the State is, in its nature, in conflict with that given to Congress; and the greater or less extent in which it may be exercised does not enter into the inquiry concerning its existence. We think, then, that if the power to authorize a sale exists in Congress, the conclusion that the right to sell is connected with the law permitting importation, as an inseparable incident, is inevitable." And the Chief Justice added: "We suppose the principles laid down in this case to apply equally to importations from a sister State." 449. [689.]

Assuming, therefore, as correct doctrine that the right of importation carries the right to sell the article imported, the decision in the Kansas Case may perhaps be reconciled with the one in this case by distinguishing the power of the State over property created within it, and its power over property imported—its power in one case extending, for the protection of the health, morals, and safety of its people, to the absolute prohibition of the sale or use of the article, and in the other extending only to such regulations as may be necessary for the safety of the community until it has been incorporated into and become a part of the general property of the State. However much this distinction may be open to criticism, it furnishes, as it seems to me, the only way in which the two decisions can be reconciled.

There is great difficulty in drawing the line precisely where the commercial power of Congress ends and the power of the State begins. The same difficulty was experienced in Brown v. Maryland, in drawing a line between the restriction on the States to lay a duty on imports and their acknowledged power to tax persons and property. In that case the court said that the two, the power and the restriction, though distinguishable when they did not approach each other, might, like the intervening colors between white and black, approach so nearly as to perplex the understanding as colors perplex the vision, in marking the distinction between them; but as the distinction existed, it must be marked as the cases arise. And after observing that it might be premature to state any rule as being universal in its application, the court held as sufficient for that case that when the importer had so acted upon the thing imported, that it had become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, it had lost its distinctive character as an import, and had become subject to the taxing power of the State; but that while remaining the property of the importer, in his warehouse in the original form or package in which it was imported, a tax upon it was plainly a duty on imports.

So in the present case it is perhaps impossible to state any rule which would determine in all cases where the right to sell an imported article under the commercial power of the Federal Government ends and the power of the State to restrict further sale has commenced. Perhaps no safer rule can be adopted than the one laid down in Brown v. Maryland, that the commercial power continues until the articles imported have become mingled with and incorporated into the general property of the State, and not afterwards. And yet it is evident that the value of the importation will be materially affected, if the article imported ceases to be under the protection of the commercial power upon its sale by the importer. There will be little inducement for one to purchase from the importer, if immediately afterwards he can himself be restrained from selling the article imported; and yet the power of the State must attach when the imported article has become mingled with the general property within its limits, or its entire independence in the regulation of its internal affairs must be abandoned. The difficulty and embarrassment which may follow must be met as each case arises.

In The License Cases, reported in 5 Howard, this court held that the States could not only regulate the sales of imported liquors, but could prohibit their sale. The judges differed in their views in some particulars, but the majority were of opinion that the States had authority to legislate upon subjects of interstate commerce until Congress had acted upon them; and as Congress had not acted, the regulation of the States was valid. The doctrine thus declared has been modified since by repeated decisions. The doctrine now firmly established is that where the subject upon which Congress can act under its commercial power is local in its nature or sphere of operation, such as harbor pilotage, the improvement of harbors, the establishment of beacons and buoys to guide vessels in and out of port, the construction of bridges over navigable rivers, the erection of wharves, piers, and docks, and the like, which can be properly regulated only by special provisions adapted to their localities, the State can act until Congress interferes and supersedes its authority; but where the subject is national in its character, and admits and requires uniformity of regulation, affecting alike all the States, such as transportation between the States, including the importation of goods from one State into another, Congress can alone act upon it and provide the needed regulations. The absence of any law of Congress on the subject is equivalent to its declaration that commerce in that matter shall be free. Thus the absence of regulations as to interstate commerce with reference to any particular subject is taken as a declaration that the importation of that article into the States shall be unrestricted. It is only after the importation is completed, and the property imported has mingled with and become a part of the general property of the State, that its regulations can act upon it, except so far as may be necessary to insure safety in the disposition of the import until thus mingled. Cooley v. Board of Wardens of the Port of Philadelphia, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299, 319 [13:996, 1004]; State Freight Tax Cases, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232, 271 [21:146, 160]; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275–282 [23:347–350]; R.R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 469 [24:527, 529]; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 697 [26:238, 239]; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 203 [29:158, 161]; Brown v. Houston, Id. 622, 631 [29:257, 260]; Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 446, 455 [29: 691, 694]; Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34 [29:785]; Wabash etc. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557 [30:244]; Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489 [30:694].

It is a matter of history that one of the great objects of the formation of the Constitution was to secure uniformity of commercial regulations, and thus put an end to restrictive and hostile discriminations by one State against the products of other States, and against their importation and sale. "It may be doubted," says Chief Justice Marshall, "whether any of the evils proceeding from the feebleness of the Federal Government contributed more to that great revolution which induced the present system than the deep and general conviction that commerce ought to be regulated by Congress. It is not, therefore, matter of surprise that the grant should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States. To construe the power so as to impair its efficacy would tend to defeat an object, in the attainment of which the American Government took, and justly took, that strong interest which arose from a full conviction as to its necessity." Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 446 [6:688]. To these views I may add that if the States have the power asserted, to exclude from importation within their limits any articles of commerce because in their judgment the articles may be injurious to their interests or policy, they may prescribe conditions upon which such importation will be admitted, and thus establish a system of duties as hostile to free commerce among the States as any that existed previous to the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. Justice Harlan, dissenting:

Mr. Chief Justice Waite, Mr. Justice Gray, and myself are unable to assent to the opinion and judgment of the court.

The effect of the Statutes of Iowa is to forbid the introduction of intoxicating liquors from other States for sale, except for medicinal, mechanical, culinary, or sacramental purposes. They may be brought in for such purposes, by any person, or carrier, for another person or corporation, if consigned to some one authorized by the laws of Iowa to buy and sell intoxicating liquors. And these statutes permit the sale of foreign intoxicating liquors, imported under the laws of the United States, provided such sale is by the importer, in the original casks or packages, and in quantities not less than those in which they are required to be imported.

It appears upon the face of the declaration that the plaintiffs—one of whom is a citizen of Iowa—made application to the board of supervisors of Marshall County, in that State, for permission, under the statute, to buy and sell in that county intoxicating liquors for medicinal, culinary, mechanical, and sacramental purposes, and that their application was rejected. They then resorted to the expedient of buying five thousand barrels of beer in Chicago, and tendering them to the Railroad Company for transportation to the same county, without furnishing the certificate required by the laws of Iowa. The refusal of the Company to transport this beer into Iowa, in violation of her laws, is the basis of the present suit. The plaintiffs claim damages upon the ground that they could have sold this beer in that State at a price in advance of what it cost them. As they do not allege that the beer was to be delivered in Iowa to a person authorized by her laws to sell it there, no wrong was done, of which the plaintiffs can complain, unless it be their right, not only to have their beer carried into the State, but to sell it there, in defiance of her laws.

The fundamental question, therefore, is whether Iowa may lawfully restrict the bringing of intoxicating liquors from other States into her limits, by any person or carrier for another person or corporation, except such as are consigned to persons authorized by her laws to buy and sell them for the special purposes indicated. In considering this question, we are not left to conjecture as to the motives prompting the enactment of these statutes; for it is conceded that the prohibition upon common carriers bringing intoxicating liquors from other States, except under the foregoing conditions, was adopted as subservient to the general design of protecting the health and morals and the peace and good order of the people of Iowa against the physical and moral evils resulting from the unrestricted manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors.

In Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623 [ante, 205], it was adjudged that state legislation prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, to be sold or bartered for general use as a beverage, did not necessarily infringe any right, privilege, or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States; and that the former decisions to that effect—License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504 [12: 256]; Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 129 [21: 929]; Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 33 [24: 989, 992]; and Foster v. Kansas, 112 U. S. 201, 206 [28: 629, 697]—"rest upon the acknowledged right of the States of the Union to control their purely internal affairs, and, in so doing, to protect the health, morals and safety of their people by regulations that do not interfere with the execution of the powers of the General Government, or violate rights secured by the Constitution. The power to establish such regulations, as was said in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 203 [6: 23, 71], reaches everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the National Government." 123 U. S. 659 [ante, 210]. Referring to the suggestion that no government could lawfully prohibit a citizen from manufacturing for his own use, or for export or storage, any article of food or drink, not endangering or affecting the rights of others the court said: "But by whom, or by what authority, is it to be determined whether the manufacture of particular articles of drink, either for general use or for the personal use of the maker, will injuriously affect the public? Power to determine such questions, so as to bind all, must exist somewhere; else society will be at the mercy of the few, who, regarding only their own appetites or passions, may be willing to imperil the peace and security of the many, provided only they are permitted to do as they please. Under our system that power is lodged with the legislative branch of the government. It belongs to that department to exert what are known as the police powers of the State, and to determine, primarily, what measures are appropriate or needful for the protection of the public morals, the public health, or the public safety." 123 U. S. 660, 661 [ante, 210].

But it is contended that a statute forbidding the introduction of intoxicating liquors from other States does infringe rights secured by the Constitution of the United States; and that view is sustained by the opinion and judgment in this case. The decision is placed upon the broad ground that intoxicating liquors are merchantable commodities, or known articles of commerce, and that, consequently, the Constitution, by the mere grant to Congress of the power to regulate commerce operates, in the absence of legislation, to establish unrestricted trade, among the States of the Union, in such commodities or articles. To this view we cannot assent. In Mugler's Case [supra] the court said that it could not "shut out of view the fact, within the knowledge of all, that the public health, the public morals, and the public safety may be endangered by the general use of intoxicating drinks; nor the fact, established by statistics accessible to every one, that the idleness, disorder, pauperism, and crime existing in the country, are, in some degree at least, traceable to this evil." The court also said, that "If, in the judgment of the Legislature [of a State] the manufacture of intoxicating liquors for the maker's own use, as a beverage, would tend to cripple, if not defeat, the effort to guard the community against the evils attending the excessive use of such liquors, it is not for the courts, upon their view as to what is best and safest for the community, to disregard the legislative determination of that question. * * * Nor can it be said that government interferes with or impairs anyone's constitutional rights of liberty or of property, when it determines that the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks for general or individual use, as a beverage, are or may become hurtful to society, and constitute therefore, a business in which no one may lawfully engage." 123 U. S. 662, 663 [ante, 211].

In Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 203, 205 [6: 71, 72], Chief Justice Marshall said that "Inspection laws, quarantine laws, and health laws of every description" were component parts of that mass of legislation "not surrendered to the General Government," which "can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves;" that such laws "are considered as flowing from the acknowledged power of a State to provide for the health of its citizens." To this doctrine the court has steadily adhered. In Gilman v. Philadelphia, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 730 [18: 101], after observing that a state law, requiring an importer to pay for and take out a license before he should be permitted to sell a bale of goods imported from a foreign country, is void—Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419 [6: 677],—and that a state law which requiring the master of a vessel, engaged in foreign commerce, to pay a certain sum to a state officer on account of each passenger brought from a foreign country, is also void—Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 283 [12: 702],—the court said: "But a State, in the exercise of its police power, may forbid spirituous liquor, imported from abroad or from another State, to be sold by retail or to be sold at all without a license; and it may visit the violation of the prohibition with such punishment as it may deem proper. Under quarantine laws, a vessel registered, or enrolled and licensed, may be stopped before entering her port of destination, or be afterwards removed and detained elsewhere for an indefinite period; and a bale of goods, upon which the duties have or have not been paid, laden with infection, may be seized under 'health laws,' and, if it cannot be purged of its poison, may be committed to the flames." In Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 103 [23: 819, 820], it was said that "In conferring upon Congress the regulation of commerce, it was never intended to cut the States off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country." In Hannibal & St. J. Railroad Company v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 471 [24: 527, 530], the court adjudged that a Statute of Missouri, prohibiting the introduction into that State of all Texas, Mexican or Indian cattle between May 1 and November 1 of each year, whether diseased or not, and which imposed burdensome conditions upon their transportation through the State, was void because a regulation of interstate commerce. But it was distinctly declared that the delegation to Congress of the power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations and among the States "was not a surrender of that which may properly be denominated police power," which included, the court said, the power in each State, to adopt "precautionary measures against social evils;" to "prevent the spread of crime or pauperism, or disturbance of the peace;" to "exclude from its limits convicts, paupers, idiots and lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge, as well as persons afflicted by contagious or infectious diseases;" and to exclude "property dangerous to the property of citizens of the State; for example, animals having contagious or infectious diseases." "All these," it was said, "are in immediate connection with the protection of persons and property against noxious acts of other persons, or such use of property as is injurious to the property of others; they are self defensive." It was only because the Missouri Statute embraced cattle that were free from disease, that it was declared unconstitutional. In Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 505 [24: 1115, 1117], the principle was affirmed that the police power of the States was not surrendered, when authority was conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce with foreign Nations and among the States.

It seems to us that the decision just rendered does not conform to the doctrines of the foregoing cases, and may impair, if it does not destroy the power of a State to protect her people against the injurious consequences that are admitted to flow from the general use of intoxicating liquors. It was said in Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 439, 441 [6: 678, 685, 686]: "There is no difference, in effect, between the power to prohibit the sale of an article and a power to prohibit its introduction into the country. * * * When the importer has so acted upon the thing imported that it has become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, it has, perhaps, lost its distinctive character as an import, and has become subject to the taxing power of the State; but while remaining the property of the importer, in his warehouse, in the original form or package in which it was imported, a tax upon it is too plainly a duty on imports to escape the prohibition in the Constitution." Considering the question in that case, under the power of Congress to regulate commerce, the court said: "Sale is the object of importation, and is an essential ingredient in that intercourse of which importation constitutes a part. It is as essential an ingredient, as indispensable to the entire thing, then, as importation. It must be considered as a component part of the power to regulate commerce." p. 447 [688]. Although there was no question in that case as to commerce among the States the court further said: "We suppose the principles laid down in this case to apply equally to importations from a sister State." If therefore, as the court now decides, the Constitution gives the right to transport intoxicating liquors into Iowa from another State, and if that right carries with it, as one of its essential ingredients, authority in the consignee to sell or exchange such articles, after they are so brought in, and while in his possession, in the original packages, it is manifest that the regulation forbidding sales of intoxicating liquors within the State, for other than medicinal, mechanical, culinary or sacramental purposes, and then only under a permit from a board of supervisors, will be of little practical value. In this view, anyone—even a citizen of Iowa—desiring to sell intoxicating liquors in that State, need only arrange to have them delivered to him from some point in another State, in packages of varying sizes, as may suit customers. Or, he may erect his manufacturing establishment, or warehouse, just across the Iowa line, in some State having a different public policy, and thence, with wagons, transport liquors into Iowa, in original packages. If the State arraigns him for a violation of her laws, he may claim—and, under the principles of the present decision, it may become difficult to dispute the claim—that, although such laws were enacted solely to protect the health and morals of the people, and to promote peace and good order among them, and although they are fairly adapted to accomplish those objects, yet the Constitution of the United States, without any action upon the part of Congress, secures to him the right to bring or receive from other States intoxicating liquors in original packages, and to sell them, while held by him in such packages, to all choosing to buy them. Thus, the mere silence of Congress upon the subject of trade among the States in intoxicating liquors is made to operate as a license to persons doing business in one State to jeopard the health, morals and good order of another State, by flooding the latter with intoxicating liquors, against the expressed will of her people.

It is admitted that a State may prevent the introduction, within her limits, of rags or other goods infected with disease, or of cattle or meat or other provisions which, from their condition, are unfit for human use or consumption; because, it is said, such articles are not merchantable or legitimate subjects of trade and commerce. But suppose the people of a State believe, upon reasonable grounds, that the general use of intoxicating liquors is dangerous to the public peace, the public health and the public morals; what authority has Congress or the judiciary to review their judgment upon that subject, and compel them to submit to a condition of things which they regard as destructive of their happiness and the peace and good order of society? If, consistently with the Constitution of the United States, a State can protect her sound cattle by prohibiting altogether the introduction within her limits of diseased cattle, she ought not to be deemed disloyal to that Constitution when she seeks by similar legislation to protect her people and their homes against the introduction of articles which are, in good faith, and not unreasonably, regarded by her citizens as "laden with infection" more dangerous to the public than diseased cattle, or than rags containing the germs of disease.

It is not a satisfactory answer to these suggestions to say that if the State may thus outlaw the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, as a beverage, and exclude them from her limits, she may adopt the same policy with reference to articles that confessedly have no necessary or immediate connection with the health, the morals, or the safety of the community, but are proper subjects of trade the world over. This possible abuse of legislative power was earnestly dwelt upon by the counsel in Mugler's Case. The same argument can be, as it often is, made in reference to powers that all concede to be vital to the public safety. But it does not disprove their existence. This court said that the judicial tribunals were not to be misled by mere pretenses, and were under a solemn duty to look at the substance of things whenever it became necessary to inquire whether the Legislature had transcended the limits of its authority; and that "If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the Constitution." 123 U. S. 661 [ante, 210]. In view of these principles, the court said it was difficult to perceive any ground for the judiciary to declare that the prohibition by a State of the manufacture or sale, within her limits, of intoxicating liquors for general use there as a beverage, is not fairly adapted to the end of protecting the community against the evils which confessedly result from the excessive use of ardent spirits. Id. 662 [210]. In the same case the court sustained, without qualification, the authority of Kansas to declare, not only that places where such liquors were manufactured, sold, bartered or given away, or were kept for sale, barter or delivery, in violation of her statutes, should be deemed common nuisances, but to provide for the forfeiture, without compensation, of the intoxicating liquors found in such places and the property used in maintaining said nuisances.

Now, can it be possible that the framers of the Constitution intended—whether Congress chose or not to act upon the subject—to withhold from a State authority to prevent the introduction into her midst of articles or commodities, the manufacture of which, within her limits, she could prohibit, without impairing the constitutional rights of her own people? If a State may declare a place where intoxicating liquors are sold for use as a beverage to be a common nuisance, subjecting the person maintaining the same to fine and imprisonment, can her people be compelled to submit to the sale of such liquors, when brought there from another State for that purpose? This court has often declared that the most important function of government was to preserve the public health, morals, and safety; that it could not devest itself of that power, nor, by contract, limit its exercise; and that even the constitutional prohibition upon laws impairing the obligation of contracts does not restrict the power of the State to protect the health, the morals, or the safety of the community, as the one or the other may be involved in the execution of such contracts. Stone v. Miss. 101 U. S. 814, 816 [25:1079]; Butchers Union Co. v. Crescent City Co. 111 U. S. 746, 751 [28: 585, 587]; N. O. Gas Co. v. La. Light Co. 115 U. S. 650, 672 [29:516, 524]; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 664 [ante, 211]. Does the mere grant of the power to regulate commerce among the States invest individuals of one State with the right, even without the express sanction of Congressional legislation, to introduce among the people of another State articles which, by statute, they have declared to be deleterious to their health and dangerous to their safety? In our opinion these questions should be answered in the negative. It is inconceivable that the well being of any State is at the mercy of the liquor manufacturers of other States.

These views are sustained by Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 446 [29:691]. It was there held that a Statute of Michigan which imposed a tax upon persons who, not residing or having their principal place of business in that State, engaged there in the business of selling or soliciting the sale of intoxicating liquors to be shipped into Michigan from other States, but which did not impose a similar tax upon persons selling or soliciting the sale of intoxicating liquors manufactured in that State, was a discrimination against the products of other States, and void as a regulation in restraint of commerce. In reference to the suggestion by the state court that the statute was an exercise by the Legislature of the police power for the discouragement of the use of intoxicating liquors, and the preservation of the health and morals of the people, this court said: "This would be a perfect justification of the Act if it did not discriminate against the citizens and products of other States in a matter of commerce between the States, and thus usurp one of the prerogatives of the National Legislature." The clear implication from this language is that the state law would have been sustained if it had applied the same rule to the products of Michigan which it attempted to apply to the products of other States.

At the argument it was insisted that the contention of the plaintiffs was supported by Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 436 [6: 678, 684], where the question was whether the Legislature of a State could constitutionally require an importer of foreign articles or commodities to take out a license from the State before he should be permitted to sell a bale or package so imported. The indictment in that case charged Brown with having sold one package of foreign "dry goods" without having such a license. The court held the State regulation to be repugnant to that clause of the Constitution declaring that no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws, as well as to that clause which clothes Congress with power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes. Among other things, it said that the right to sell articles imported from foreign countries is connected with the law permitting importation, as an inseparable incident; observing, at the close of the opinion that it supposed the principle laid down to apply equally to importations from a sister State. It is however, clear from the whole opinion that the court in that observation had reference to commerce in articles having no connection whatever with the health, morals, or safety of the people, and that it had no purpose to withdraw or qualify the explicit declaration, in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1 [6: 23], that the health laws of the States were a component part of that mass of legislation, the power to enact which remained with the States, because never surrendered to the General Government. In behalf of Maryland it was insisted that the constitutional prohibition of state imposts or duties upon imports ceased the instant the goods entered the country; otherwise, it was argued, the importer "may introduce articles, as gunpowder, which endanger a city, into the midst of its population; he may introduce articles which endanger the public health, and the power of self preservation is denied." To this argument Chief Justice Marshall replied: "The power to direct the removal of gunpowder is a branch of the police power, which unquestionably remains, and ought to remain, with the States. If the possessor stores it himself out of town, the removal cannot be a duty on imports, because it contributes nothing to the revenue. If he prefers placing it in a public magazine, it is because he stores it there, in his own opinion, more advantageously than elsewhere. We are not sure that this may not be classed among inspection laws. The removal or destruction of infectious or unsound articles is undoubtedly an exercise of that power, and forms an express exception to the prohibition we are considering. Indeed, the laws of the United States expressly recognize the health laws of a State." This, we understand to have been a distinct readjudication that the police power, so far as it involves the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, remains with the States, and is not overridden by the National Constitution.

In Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 211 [6: 78], it was said by counsel that the Constitution does not confer the right of intercourse between State and State, and that such right has its source in those laws whose authority is acknowledged by civilized man throughout the world. Chief Justice Marshall said: "This is true. The Constitution found it an existing right, and gave to Congress the power to regulate it." In the same case he said that this power is "the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed." p. 196 [70]. It may be said, generally, that free commercial intercourse exists among the several States, by force of the Constitution. But as, by the express terms of that instrument, the powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people; and as, by the repeated adjudications of this court, the States have not surrendered, but have reserved, the power to protect by police regulations the health, morals and safety of their people, Congress may not prescribe any rule to govern commerce among the States which prevents the proper and reasonable exercise of this reserved power. Even if Congress, under the power to regulate commerce, had authority to declare what shall or what shall not be subjects of commerce among the States, that power would not fairly imply authority to compel a State to admit within her limits that which, in fact is, or which, upon reasonable grounds, she may declare to be, destructive of the health, morals and peace of her people. The purpose of committing to Congress the regulation of commerce was to insure equality of commercial facilities, by preventing one State from building up her own trade at the expense of sister States. But that purpose is not defeated when a State employs appropriate means to prevent the introduction into her limits of what she lawfully forbids her own people from making. It certainly was not meant to give citizens of other States greater rights in Iowa than Iowa's own people have.

But if this be not a sound interpretation of the Constitution; if intoxicating liquors are entitled to the same protection by the National Government as ordinary merchandise entering into commerce among the States; if Congress, under the power to regulate commerce, may, in its discretion, permit or prohibit commerce among the States in intoxicating liquors; and if, therefore, state police power, as the health, morals and safety of the people may be involved in its proper exercise, can be overborne by national regulations of commerce, the former decisions of this court would seem to show that such laws of the States are valid, even where they affect commercial intercourse among the States, until displaced by federal legislation, or until they come in direct conflict with some Act of Congress. Such was the doctrine announced in Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 250 [7: 414]. That case involved the validity of an Act of the Legislature of Delaware, authorizing a dam to be built across a navigable stream, in which the tide ebbed and flowed, and in which there was a common and public way in the nature of a highway. The court, speaking by Chief Justice Marshall, said: "The Act of Assembly, by which the plaintiffs were authorized to construct their dam, shows plainly that this is one of those many creeks, passing through a deep level marsh adjoining the Delaware, up which the tide flows for some distance. The value of the property on its banks must be enhanced by excluding the water from the marsh, and the health of the inhabitants probably improved. Measures calculated to produce these objects, provided they do not come into collision with the powers of the General Government, are undoubtedly within those which are reserved to the States. But the measure authorized by this Act stops a navigable creek, and must be supposed to abridge the rights of those who have been accustomed to use it." The counsel having insisted that the statute came in conflict with the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign Nations and among the several States, the court said: "If Congress had passed any Act which bore on this case, any Act in execution of the power to regulate commerce, the object of which was to control state legislation over small navigable creeks into which the tide flows, and which abound throughout the Middle and Southern States, we should not feel much difficulty in saying that a state law coming in conflict with such Act would be void. But Congress has passed no such Act. The repugnancy of the law of Delaware to the Constitution is placed entirely on its repugnancy to the power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations and among the several States; a power which has not been so exercised as to affect the question." The same principle is announced in many other cases. Gilman v. Phila. 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 713 [18: 96]; Escanaba Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678 [27:442]; Cardwell v. Am. Bridge Co. 113 U. S. 205 [28: 959]; Hamilton v. Vicksburg R. Co. 119 U. S. 281 [30: 394]; Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 543 [30: 489.] These were all cases of the erection of bridges and other structures within the limits of States, and under their authority, across public navigable waters of the United States. They were held not to be forbidden by the Constitution, although such structures actually interfered with interstate commerce. In Gilman v. Philadelphia and Cardwell v. American Bridge Co. the bridges were without draws, entirely preventing the passage of boats to points, in one case, where the tide ebbed and flowed, and, in both cases, to points where commerce had been previously carried on. In Hamilton v. Vicksburg R. Co. the court said: "What the form and character of the bridges should be, that is to say, of what height they should be erected, and of what materials constructed, and whether with or without draws, were matters for the regulations of the State, subject only to the paramount authority of Congress to prevent any unnecessary obstruction to the free navigation of the streams. Until Congress intervenes in such cases, and exercises its authority, the power of the State is plenary. When the State provides for the form and character of the structure its directions will control, except as against the action of Congress, whether the bridge be with or without draws, and irrespective of its effect upon navigation."

But, perhaps, the language of this court—all the judges concurring—which most directly bears upon the question before us is found in County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 701 [26: 238, 241], reaffirming Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Company. It was there said: "In the License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504 [12: 256], which were before the court in 1847, there was great diversity of views in the opinions of the different judges upon the operation of the grant of the commercial power of Congress in the absence of congressional legislation. Extreme doctrines upon both sides of the question were asserted by some of the judges; but the decision reached, so far as it can be viewed as determining any question of construction, was confirmatory of the doctrine that legislation of Congress is essential to prohibit the action of the States upon the subject thus considered." This language is peculiarly significant in view of the fact that in one of the License Cases—Pierce v. New Hampshire, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, 557, 578 [12: 256, 280, 289]—the question was as to the validity of an Act of that State, under which Pierce was indicted, convicted, and fined, for having sold, without a local town license, a barrel of gin, which he purchased in Boston, transported to Dover, New Hampshire, and there sold in the identical cask in which it was carried to that State from Massachusetts.

In harmony with these principles the court affirmed at the present term, in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465 [ante, 508], the validity of a Statute of that State, making it unlawful for a locomotive engineer, even when his train is employed in interstate commerce, to drive or operate any train of cars upon a railroad in that State, used for the transportation of persons, passengers or freight, without first undergoing an examination by, and obtaining a license from, a board of engineers appointed by the Governor of Alabama. If a train of cars passed through that State to New Orleans, the engineer, however well qualified for his station, if not licensed by that local board, was subject to be fined not less than $50 nor more than $500, and sentenced to hard labor for the county, for not more than six months. The court held that this statute "is not, considered in its own nature, a regulation of interstate commerce;" that "It is properly an Act of legislation within the scope of the admitted power reserved to the States to regulate the relative rights and duties of persons, being and acting within its territorial jurisdiction, intended to operate so as to secure for the public safety of person and property;" and that "So far as it affects transactions of commerce among the States, it does so only indirectly, incidentally, and remotely, and not so as to burden or impede them; and in the particulars on which it touches those transactions at all it is not in conflict with any express enactment of Congress on the subject, nor contrary to any intention of Congress to be presumed from its silence." Until Congress, by legislation, prescribed the qualification of locomotive engineers employed by railroad companies engaged in the transportation of passengers and goods among the States, Alabama, it was adjudged, could fix the qualifications of such engineers, even when running in that State trains employed in interstate commerce.

It would seem that if the Constitution of the United States does not, by its own force, displace or annul a state law, authorizing the construction of bridges or dams across public navigable waters of the United States, thereby wholly preventing the passage of vessels engaged in interstate commerce upon such waters, the same Constitution ought not to be held to annul or displace a law of one of the States, which, by its operation, forbids the bringing within her limits, from other States, articles which that State, in the most solemn manner, has declared to be injurious to the health, morals and safety of her people. The silence of Congress upon the subject of interstate commerce, as affected by the police laws of the States, enacted in good faith to promote the public health, the public morals and the public safety, and to that end prohibiting the manufacture and sale, within their limits, of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage, ought to have, at least, as much effect as the silence of Congress in reference to physical obstructions placed, under the authority of a State, in a navigable water of the United States. The reserved power of the States to guard the health, morals and safety of their people is more vital to the existence of society than their power in respect to trade and commerce having no possible connection with those subjects.

For these reasons we feel constrained to dissent from the opinion and judgment of the court.

IRA T. CLEMENT, Plff in Err.,
v.
ELISHA A. PACKER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 309–336.)

Exception, when not sustained—declarations of surveyors—state decisions control real property—error in charge—surveys—original landmarks—later survey—presumption, how rebutted.

1. Where copies of patents offered in evidence are not in the record, and the court is therefore left uninformed as to their contents or as to their materiality, an exception to a refusal to admit them in evidence cannot be sustained.

2. In Pennsylvania, the declarations of deceased surveyors, in cases of boundaries between private estates, are admissible in evidence, where they spoke from personal knowledge.

3. In a question involving the ownership of real property in Pennsylvania, this court will be controlled by Pennsylvania decisions.

4. It is error for the court to give a charge to the jury, the direct tendency of which is to withdraw from their consideration a very considerable amount of pertinent and important testimony.

5. In Pennsylvania, surveys, constituting a block, are not to be treated as separate and individual surveys; nor can each tract be located independently of the rest by its own individual lines or calls or courses and distances; but such surveys are to be located together as a block, or one large tract. All the lines and corners, marked upon any part of the block, belong to each and every tract of which it is composed.

6. When the original landmarks of a survey have disappeared, the original and well established marks, found upon a later survey, made by the same surveyor, about the same time and adjoining the one in dispute, are admissible to aid the jury in ascertaining the exact location of the older survey.

7. After the lapse of twenty-one years from the return of a survey to the land office, the presumption is that the warrant was located as returned by the surveyor.

8. But this presumption is not conclusive and may be rebutted by proof of the existence of marked lines and monuments, and other facts tending to show that the actual location on the ground was different from the official courses and distances.

[No. 148.]

Argued Jan. 23, 24, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment for the plaintiff in an action of ejectment. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Lamar.

The plaintiff below, Packer, brought an action of ejectment to recover from the defendant below, Clement, 120 acres of land located in Mount Carmel Township, Northumberland County, Pennsylvania. He claimed this 120 acres as part of a tract of land surveyed in October, 1794, under a warrant dated 26th of November, 1793, issued in the name of William Elliott, the title to which was in him, the plaintiff. On the trial he adduced evidence, showing that this William Elliott tract was one of six tracts of a block of surveys—a term which, under the Pennsylvania land system, means a series of surveys made by one surveyor at the same time upon warrants issued upon the same day, owned by the same person, dependent upon each other in succession, calling for each other, and returned to the land office at the same time, and so located on the ground that the tracts each adjoin the other side by side as a body. In that State the warrant and survey thereon and the return of the survey constituted the legal mode of acquiring lands from the Commonwealth. The block just mentioned was know as the La Fevre block, and the tracts composing it were designated by the names of the persons to whom they were warranted, as follows: The Ebenezer Branham, Nathaniel Brown, Lewis Walker, William Shannon, William Elliott, and the Joseph Tyson, all of which were dated November 26, 1793, surveyed on the 21st and 22d days of October, 1794, and returned into the land office by William Gray, deputy surveyor, February 28, 1795.

The plaintiff claimed that the northern boundary of this tract was identical with the southern line of the defendant's tracts, and that such southern boundary was about sixty rods further north than that claimed by the defendant, and down to which he was in actual possession. The question in the case, as exhibited by the record, is one of location, the burden of proof being on the plaintiff below to show the location of the northern boundary of the William Elliott tract, and that the 120 acres in dispute are within the limits of that tract.

The plaintiff below produced evidence showing that the tracts claimed and possessed by the defendant lying directly north of the William Elliott tract were known as the Mary Myers and Charlotte Ruston tracts, and were two of a block of eleven tracts, surveyed under warrants, all dated June 11, 1793, granted in the name of Daniel Reese, Charlotte Ruston, Mary Myers, John Reynolds, Thomas Billington, Mary Ruston, Thomas Ruston, Mary Ruston, Jr., John Young, Joshua Bean, and Samuel Lobdil, surveyed on the 2d and 3d of October, 1793, and returned to the land office by William Gray, deputy surveyor, as one block, on the 8d of March, 1794; and that these eleven tracts of land (which were known as the Brush Valley block) extended along the La Fevre block on the north, and were especially named in the official returns of the surveys of the latter as adjoining on the north.

He contended that the northern line of the William Elliott tract was identical with the southern line of the Charlotte Ruston and Mary Myers tracts; that his right, therefore, extended as far north as the southern line described in the official returns of those tracts; and that the true mode of ascertaining such southern line was to run out the lines of said tracts according to courses, distances, and calls, in the official returns of the original surveys. He showed by the returns and by the evidence of surveyors that the southern line thus located by official courses, distances, and calls would leave the land in dispute outside of the defendant's tracts, and therefore within the limits of the William Elliott tract belonging to the plaintiff below. He produced A. B. Cochran, a surveyor, who in the winter of 1881 and the spring of 1882 had made an examination of the Brush Valley land in connection with that of the La Fevre block.

This witness testified that he found the northern boundary of the Brush Valley block well defined by marks still existing on the ground made at the time of the original survey in 1798, and many of the living corners (trees) standing in the places designated in the official return; and that the lines of the different tracts corresponded pretty nearly with the official courses and distances, "sometimes a little bit long, and sometimes a little bit short," in one instance as many as 18 rods difference. He stated, very positively, that along the entire southern side of the block there were no marks upon the ground; no living corners, except one hereafter noted; no indication of any work, whatever, by the deputy surveyor in 1798; and that the official returns of the survey called only for posts for corners, with the exception just mentioned, which fact he stated was regarded by surveyors as evidence that the line had never been actually located on the ground, but simply protracted on paper. He stated further that there were no division lines actually run between any of the tracts of this Brush Valley block, except one, and that line was between the John Reynolds and the Thomas Billington tracts, which he stated was well marked upon the ground to a stone heap, which very nearly corresponded by course and distance with the corner called for in the official return of the surveys of these two tracts, and designated therein as a small maple tree, at the southeast corner of the Reynolds tract, and the southwest corner of the Billington tract. This stone heap had been made as a mark in 1847, and located as the maple corner thus called for, by David Rockefeller, a surveyor, since deceased.

The deposition of David Rockefeller, taken on a former trial, was then read in evidence to show the location of this small maple tree called for as the common corner of the Reynolds and Billington tracts (southeast of the one and southwest of the other), in which Rockefeller testifies that in surveying these lands in 1847 he found the line between these two tracts (the Reynolds and the Billington) well defined upon the ground by marks made at the time of the original survey in 1798, and that he found in running from the northern corner, according to the official courses, at the end of the official distance, a small maple stump and maple sprouts growing around it, and a small maple tree lying on the ground, the trunk of which was burned entirely away for 6 or 7 feet, so that no surveyor's mark could be found upon it. The testimony of Cochran and others was to the same effect, and they all gave it as their opinion that this was the true location of the maple tree called for as the common corner of the Reynolds and Billington tracts.

He also showed, by the testimony of these and other witnesses, that if this maple stump was the true location of the maple tree called for as the southeast corner of the Reynolds and the southwest of the Billington, it would establish the southern line of the whole Brush Valley block; and by running it east and west from that point, according to the courses and distances, the land in controversy would be outside of the Mary Myers and Charlotte Ruston tracts owned by the defendant below, and within the limits of the Elliott tract belonging to the plaintiff below.

The plaintiff below further contended that in case the maple stump, which he claimed to have proved to be the maple tree called for in the official return, was not proved to be such corner, then the whole southern boundary was protracted on paper without any actual survey being done upon the ground; and in the absence of any marks whereby such southern boundary could be definitely fixed, the true mode of ascertaining its location, as determined by the deputy surveyor in 1793, was to start from the well marked boundary on the north, and run out the lines according to the official courses and distances.

In reply, the defendant contended that the true mode of ascertaining the lines of a survey was to run them according to the marks and monuments on the ground made by the surveyor at the time of the survey, along with the lines and distances of the official return, when these latter corresponded with such marks and monuments upon the ground; but in case of a conflict or variance, the original marks and monuments were to prevail and determine the location of the survey.

He denied that the southern line of the Brush Valley block had been platted on paper, and alleged, on the contrary, that it was run at the time of the original survey, and marked upon the ground far enough south of the line contended for by the plaintiff to include the 120 acres in dispute within the limits of the Charlotte Ruston and Mary Myers tracts. He introduced M. B. Trescott, and several other surveyors, who testified that the point located by Rockefeller, as the maple tree corner called for at the end of the Reynolds and Billington dividing line, was several perches north of the official distance, and several perches outside of of the official courses. He had read from the deposition of Rockefeller, already offered by the plaintiff, the statement that he, Rockefeller, had been county surveyor of Northumberland County for sixteen or eighteen years, and that he knew from the official papers in his hands, during that period, that one Henry Donnel was at the time these surveys were made a regular deputy surveyor of William Gray, and that his (Donnel's) district embraced all this side of the river, including the Shamokin and Mount Carmel coal regions, where the surveys are that are involved in this controversy.

To show the true location of the maple at the common corner of the Reynolds and Billington tracts to be 60 rods south of where Rockefeller had claimed to locate it, he offered in evidence the deposition of John Fisher, deceased, taken in several cases pending in the Common Pleas Court of Northumberland County, between the plaintiff in error and the Northumberland Coal Company in 1878, it having been admitted that John Fisher was dead. This deposition was offered to prove by John Fisher that in 1815 Henry Donnel was surveying the Brush Valley lines, and he, Fisher, was with him as chain carrier. That when they were running the line between the Billington and Reynolds tracts, and were at a point about 60 rods south of the stump located by Rockefeller at a swamp, they found a stone corner—"stones piled up." Donnel said: "This is the corner; here is where we located these warrants 21 or 22 years ago."

The plaintiff below objected to the admission of these declarations of Henry Donnel. The court sustained the objections and rejected those portions of the deposition embraced in brackets, and sealed the bill of exceptions at the instance of the defendant.

The portions rejected are as follows: Donnel said: ["While there at the corner, 21 or 22 years ago, we located these warrants." When we got to the corner, Mr. Donnel said: "Here is the corner," pointing to it.] [All Donnel said was: "This is the corner; here is where we located these warrants 21 or 22 years ago." This was when we were running the line between the Billington and Reynolds. Donnel said it was the line. I knew it was the line.] And again: [At the time Henry Donnel said he located these warrants, 21 or 22 years ago, he was surveying the Brush Valley lands—I mean the Ira Clement lands.]

The defendant also introduced several surveyors who testified to the fact of original marks east of and in a direct line with the point at which he claimed the maple stood, and also to two other line trees bearing the marks of the survey of 1793, showing that the southern boundary of the Brush Valley lands is from thirty to sixty rods below that contended for by the plaintiff below.

In confirmation of this being the true location of the line in question, the defendant below showed from the evidence elicited on cross examination of a witness for the plaintiff, and also by numerous surveyors who appeared as witnesses for the defendant, that the Ebenezer Branham (which was the extreme eastern and controlling warrant of the La Fevre block) had still existing on its northern boundary authentic and original marks and monuments made at the time of the survey, and answering to the official calls thereof; nearly all of whom testified that these marks thus defining the northern boundary of the Ebenezer Branham tract were sufficient to establish the entire northern boundary of the La Fevre block, which northern boundary, they stated, would be identical with the southern line of the Brush Valley block, located as claimed by the defendant.

To give additional support to his theory of constructing the dividing line in question he put in evidence the location of two surveys outside of the Brush Valley block, made by the same surveyor about the same time, whose established lines and corners he proposed to show were in perfect harmony with the location of the Brush Valley block contended for by the defense. It appeared in evidence that the first of these surveys was warranted to one Francis West, surveyed on the 10th day of September, 1793, located east and within a mile of the Brush Valley block, and that its lines, boundaries, corners, and calls were established by original undisputed monuments on the ground. It was also proved that the other tract was warranted to one Richard Martin, and surveyed on the 23d day of February, 1794, and called to adjoin the Francis West on the east and the Samuel Lobdil on the west; this last being the extreme eastern track of the Brush Valley block. It also appeared in evidence that the eastern line of the Lobdil and the western of the Martin were reported by the return to be of the same length.

The surveyors, hereinbefore referred to as witnesses for the plaintiff, state that the Francis West and the Richard Martin have a common corner the southwest of the former, and southeast of the latter; that this corner is also called for as a mark on the northern line of the Ebenezer Branham, as above noted; that, starting from this recognized corner, called for by the three surveys (the Francis West, the Richard Martin, and the Ebenezer Branham), and following the southern line of the Richard Martin (which is also the northern line of the Ebenezer Branham tract, and which all the surveyors, on both sides, testify is marked by monuments counting back to 1793, for a distance of 150 perches), in its official courses and distances, it intersects the common line between the Lobdil and Martin tracts extended 32 perches south of its official length: that at this point of intersection there is a well established corner common to the Martin and Lobdil tracts; that if the southern line of the Brush Valley block was run, starting from this southeast corner of the Lobdil tract, according to the official courses and distances, it would be carried actually upon the line claimed by the defendant below, indicated by the marked line trees and monuments, and strike the point at which he claimed the maple corner was located in the edge of the swamp; and therefore would place the land in controversy without the Elliott tract, and within the Charlotte Ruston and Mary Myers surveys.

He also introduced evidence to show that the eleven surveys of the Brush Valley block and the Richard Martin survey were all in the hands of the deputy surveyor at the same time, and that the deputy returned the Richard Martin into the land office before the return of the Brush Valley lands, stating that its western line was 320 rods in length, and three days after returned the Samuel Lobdil, giving it the same course and length of line.

These witnesses expressed the opinion, from their experience as surveyors, that the northern line of the Richard Martin was run on the ground at the same time as the Brush Valley block of surveys; that the dividing line between the Brush Valley block and the La Fevre block of surveys should be located from the work done by the same deputy surveyor on the adjoining surveys; and that these monuments pointed out the line run by the deputy surveyor in 1793. The defendant below therefore contended that what the surveyor did, in locating the Richard Martin and the Francis West surveys, should be considered with all the other evidence in the case, in determining the question whether the southern line of the Brush Valley block was actually run upon the ground or not, and, if so, where it was run.

The plaintiff below offered rebutting testimony tending to show that the trees relied on by the defendant below, as line trees and original monuments of the survey in 1793, bore no such marks, and that no such monuments for the southern boundary of the Brush Valley block could be found, or ever existed on the ground. He contended also that the Martin, being a junior survey to that of the Brush Valley block, could not be used for the purpose of locating the southern line of the latter.

Numerous exceptions were taken during the trial, and exceptions were also taken to the charge of the court. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff below, upon which judgment was rendered. The defendant below then sued out this writ of error.

Messrs. S. P. Wolverton and Franklin B. Gowen, for plaintiff in error:

When the location of a tract of land or a block of surveys is in dispute the declarations of a deceased surveyor, made while running the lines, are always admissible.

Kennedy v. Lubold, 88 Pa. 246; Kramer v. Goodlander, 98 Pa. 366; Bender v. Pitzer, 27 Pa. 365; Caufman v. Cedar Spring Congregation, 6 Binn. 59; Hamilton v. Menor, 2 Serg. & R. 70; McCausland v. Fleming, 68 Pa. 38; Penny Pot Landing v. Philadelphia, 16 Pa. 91; Sample v. Robb, Id. 319; 1 Whart. Ev. § 191; Birmingham v. Anderson, 40 Pa. 506.

The opinions of expert surveyors are constantly received.

Northumberland Coal Co. v. Clement, 95 Pa. 126; Whart. Ev. § 444; Davis v. Mason, 4 Pick. 156; Forbes v. Caruthers, 3 Yeates, 527; Ormsby v. Ihmsen, 34 Pa. 462; Peterborough v. Jaffrey, 6 N. H. 464; Ardesco Oil Co. v. Gilson, 68 Pa. 146; Price v. Powell, 3 N. Y. 322; Fowler v. Middlesex County, 6 Allen, 92; Detweiler v. Groff, 10 Pa. 378; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 440; Jameson v. Drinkald, 12 Moore, 148; S. C. 22 Eng. C. L. 636; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Henderson, 51 Pa. 315; Kellogg v. Krauser, 14 Serg. & R. 137; Brown v. Corey, 43 Pa. 495.

Where several tracts of land were originally made and returned into the land office in a block, they must be located on the ground in a block.

Northumberland Coal Co. v. Clement, 95 Pa. 126; Hagerty v. Mathers, 31 Pa. 348, 355; Darrah v. Bryant, 56 Pa. 69; Walters v. Hagarty, 37 Pa. 64; Boynton v. Urian, 55 Pa. 151; Fritz v. Brandon, 78 Pa. 351; Mock v. Astley, 18 Serg. & R. 382; Stevens v. Hughes, 3 Watts & S. 465; Collins v. Barclay, 7 Pa. 78; Hole v. Rittenhouse, 25 Pa. 491; Malone v. Salada, 48 Pa. 425; Pruner v. Brisbin, 98 Pa. 202; Christ v. Thompson, 2 Cent. Rep. 528.

However well marked these lines may have been in 1793 and 1794, or even in 1814, at the time of the trial few original marks would have been expected to be found by any surveyor.

Kennedy v. Lubold, 88 Pa. 255; Glass v. Gilbert, 58 Pa. 291.

Slight evidence of marks found upon the ground corresponding with the date of survey ought to have great weight in repelling the charge of its being a mere chamber survey.

Lambourn v. Hartwick, 13 Serg. & R. 121; Marte v. Hartley, 4 Watts, 263, 264; Sergeant's Land Law of Pa. 128.

A practical surveyor may testify whether, in his opinion, certain marks on trees, piles of stones, or other marks on the ground were intended as monuments or boundaries.

Whart. Ev. § 444; Davis v. Mason, 4 Pick. 156; Forbes v. Caruthers, 3 Yeates, 527; Ormsby v. Ihmsen, 34 Pa. 462; Sweigart v. Richards, 8 Pa. 436; Caul v. Spring, 2 Watts, 394; Covert v. Irwin, 3 Serg. & R. 288.

A survey made under legal authority is presumed to be correctly made.

Eister v. Paul, 54 Pa. 196; Dreer v. Carskadden, 48 Pa. 38.

A deputy surveyor in locating a junior warrant should adopt the marks of an older survey.

Caul v. Spring, 2 Watts, 390; Martz v. Hartley, 4 Watts, 261; Schnable v. Doughty, 3 Pa. 392; McBarron v. Gilbert, 42 Pa. 279; Bellas v. Cleaver, 40 Pa. 267; Pennsylvania Canal Co. v. Kunkel, 38 Leg. Int. 339; Hughes v. Stevens, 43 Pa. 202.

The work of the same deputy surveyor on adjoining surveys made about the same time, and the declarations of the deputy surveyor who located these tracts, as to where he had originally established the southern line, were clearly evidence of location.

Messrs. James Ryon and John W. Ryon, for defendant in error:

The warrant, when made out, was dated on the day the application for it was entered.

Brown v. Galloway, Pet. C. C. 291; Lewis v. Meredith, 3 Wash. 81; Oliphant v. Ferren, 1 Watts, 57; Boynton v. Urian, 55 Pa. 152.

Even if the patents were competent evidence, the warrant would have been cumulative only, and this court would not reverse for excluding the evidence.

Cannon v. Pratt, 99 U. S. 619 (25: 446).

If the wrong party receives the patent, he is always treated as holding in trust for the warrantee or the true party under him.

Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Dimock, 47 Pa. 397; Manhattan Coal Co. v. Green, 78 Pa. 310.

A patent which embraces land not included in the survey is void for the excess.

Kelly v. Graham, 9 Watts, 116.

Though a patent conveys the legal estate against the Commonwealth, it will not prevail over a prior estate by warrant and survey.

Maclay v. Work, 5 Binn. 154; Gonzalus v. Hoover, 6 Serg. & R. 118; Woods v. Wilson, 37 Pa. 379; Hagerty v. Mathers, 31 Pa. 348; Urket v. Coryell, 5 Watts & S. 60.

A patent is not operative against the rights of a third person existing before the issuing of the patent.

Balliot v. Bauman, 5 Watts & S. 155; Smith v. Vasbinder, 77 Pa. 180; Woods v. Wilson, 37 Pa. 382; Lewis v. Bradford, 10 Watts, 76; Duer v. Boyd, 1 Serg. &. R. 203; Maclay v. Work, supra; Gingrich v. Foltz, 19 Pa. 40.

The rule that allows the proof that a public officer has acted notoriously, as a public officer, without the proof of his appointment is applicable only to the case of public officers as such.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 83; 1 Phill. Ev. 4 Edw. ed. 592 and note; Wilcox v. Smith, 5 Wend. 231; Short v. Lee, 2 Jac. & W. 464.

In Barclay v. Howell, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 504 (8: 479) this court held that the declarations of a surveyor which contradict his official return are clearly not evidence.

Woods v. Ege, 2 Watts, 333.

Declarations respecting a private boundary are only admissible as res gestæ.

Ellicott v. Pearl, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 412 (9: 475); Hunnicutt v. Peyton, 102 U. S. 333 (26: 118).

To be admissible, such declarations must have been made by persons in possession of land and in the act of pointing out their boundaries.

Bartlett v. Emerson, 7 Gray, 174; Daggett v. Shaw, 5 Met. 223; Long v. Colton, 116 Mass. 414; Mima Queen v. Hepburn, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 290 (3: 348); Bonnet v. Devebaugh, 3 Binn. 175; Sample v. Robb, 16 Pa. 319; McCausland v. Fleming, 63 Pa. 38; Caufman v. Cedar Spring Congregation, 6 Binn. 62, 63; Buchanan v. Moore, 10 Serg. & R. 281; Bender v. Pitzer, 27 Pa. 335.

This court, in passing upon the questions presented in a bill of exceptions, will not look beyond the bill itself.

Norris v. Jackson, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 125 (19: 603); Lincoln v. Claflin, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 186 (19: 108); Leftwitch v. Lecanu, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 187 (18: 388); Russell v. Ely, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 580 (17: 260).

An abstract proposition of law this court is not required to consider.

Jones v. Buckell, 104 U. S. 554 (26: 841); Dunlop v. Monroe, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 270 (3: 339); Worthington v. Mason, 101 U. S. 149 (25: 848); Zeller v. Eckert, 45 U. S. 4 How. 289 (11: 979); McNair v. McLennan, 24 Pa. 384.

Calls for adjoiners and other fixed boundaries invariably govern the calls for courses and distances.

Brolaskey v. McClain, 61 Pa. 163; Mackentile v. Savoy, 17 Serg. & R. 104; Murphy v. Campbell, 4 Pa. 485; Cox v. Couch, 8 Pa. 147; Petts v. Gaw, 15 Pa. 218; Mathers v. Hegarty, 37 Pa. 64; Speakman v. Forepaugh, 44 Pa. 372; Bellas v. Cleaver, 40 Pa. 260; Manhattan Coal Co. v. Green, 78 Pa. 310; Watson v. Jones, 85 Pa. 125.

Lines of older surveys, adopted by the surveyor for the younger, become the line and boundary of the younger.

Elster v. Paul, 54 Pa. 198; Parshall v. Jones, 55 Pa. 158; Dreer v. Carskadden, 48 Pa. 88; Caul v. Spring, 2 Watts, 390.

After the lapse of twenty-one years, the presumption of law is conclusive that the surveys were actually made upon the ground as returned by the deputy surveyor.

Nieman v. Ward, 1 Watts & S. 79; Mock v. Astley, 13 Serg. & R. 382; Lambourn v. Hartswick, Id. 113; Bellas v. Levan, 4 Watts, 300; Schnable v. Doughty, 3 Pa. 395; Mathers v. Hegarty, supra; Covert v. Irwin, 3 Serg. & R. 283; Quinn v. Heart, 43 Pa. 337; Cosby v. Buchanan, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 420 (23: 138).

Evasive answers afford strong presumptive evidence against the respondent.

Agawam Woolen Co. v. Jordan, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 583 (19: 177); Bryant v. Stilwell, 24 Pa. 314.

The lines actually marked upon the ground constitute the survey.

Hall v. Tanner, 4 Pa. 244; Thompson v. McFarland, 6 Pa. 478; Thomas v. Mowrer, 15 Pa. 139.

The lines marked on the ground control the return of the surveyor, even where that calls for a natural or fixed boundary.

Walker v. Smith, 2 Pa. 43; Burkholder v. Markley, 98 Pa. 40; Manhattan Coal Co. v. Green, 78 Pa. 310.

It is sufficient evidence of an actual survey that any part of it was made on the ground.

Lambourn v. Hartswick, 13 Serg. & R. 113; Quin v. Brady, 8 Watts & S. 139.

Courses and distances constitute the survey where no lines are found on the ground, except in case of calls for adjoiners.

Boynton v. Urian, 55 Pa. 142.

A call for adjoiners will overrule the lines returned by courses and distances, where there are no lines upon the ground.

Caldwell v. Holler, 40 Pa. 160; Darrah v. Bryant, 56 Pa. 69; Younkin v. Cowan, 84 Pa. 198; Ormsby v. Ihmsen, Id. 462; Manhattan Coal Co. v. Green, supra; Pruner v. Brisbin, 98 Pa. 208.

A survey unimpeached for twenty-one years is conclusively presumed to have been regular.

Strimpfler v. Roberts, 18 Pa. 299; Caul v. Spring, 2 Watts, 390; Nieman v. Ward, 1 Watts & S. 68; Younkin v. Cowan, and Caldwell v. Holler, supra; Wagner v. Wagner, 68 Pa. 394.

Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court:

The first assignment of error is to the effect that the court below erred in rejecting the offer of the plaintiff in error of six patents issued by the Commonwealth to Peter Graul for the Joseph Tyson, William Elliott, Lewis Walker, William Shannon, Nathaniel Brown, and Ebenezer Branham surveys, bearing date the 12th, 13th and 17th of April, 1797, respectively, for the purpose of locating, and showing that the Commonwealth confirmed the location of said surveys as a block, by granting patents to each one of them, and for the purpose of showing how much land the Commonwealth granted in pursuance of these several surveys.

Objection by plaintiff below to this was sustained, and exception taken. The plaintiff in error, however, has not embodied copies of these patents in the record returned. The court is therefore left uninformed as to the contents of the patents, or as to their materiality. What effect might have been given to this assignment of errors, had evidence of the contents of the patents mentioned been sent up with the record, we need not consider in disposing of this case. It is sufficient to say that this assignment of error is fatally defective for the reason given above, and it cannot be sustained.

The second specification relates to the rejection by the court of a portion of the deposition of John Fisher, referred to in the above statement. We gather from the brief of counsel that the ground on which these declarations were ruled out was that they were not within any of the exceptions to the general rule that hearsay evidence is inadmissible to establish any specific fact which in its nature is capable of being proved by the testimony of a person who speaks from his own knowledge.

In Mima Queen v. Hepburn, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 290, 296 [3: 348, 350], Chief Justice Marshall says: "To this rule there are some exceptions which are said to be as old as the rule itself. These are cases of pedigree, of prescription, of custom, and in some cases of boundary. * * * Also matters of general and public history."

Upon the subject of boundary there is a general agreement that, by the English rule, evidence of the declarations of deceased persons as to the boundary of parishes, manors, and the like, which are of public interest, is admissible, but that such evidence is inadmissible for the purpose of proving the boundary of a private estate, unless such boundary is identical with another of public interest. In many of the States this strict rule has been extended, and these declarations have been admitted to prove the boundaries of lands of private persons. This extension of the rule has, we think, been sustained by the weight of authority in the American State Courts, as justified upon grounds as strong as those on which the original rule rests.

In Boardman v. Reed, Mr. Justice McLean states one of these grounds. He says, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 328, 341 [8:415,420]: "That boundaries may be proved by hearsay testimony is a rule well settled, and the necessity or propriety of which is not now questioned. Some difference of opinion may exist as to the application of this rule, but there can be none as to its legal force. Landmarks are frequently formed of perishable materials. * * * By the improvement of the country, and from other causes, they are often destroyed. It is therefore important, in many cases, that hearsay or reputation should be received to establish ancient boundaries." This was a case of private boundaries purely; and the declarations were rejected, not upon the ground of hearsay, but because they were considered as immaterial, and not tending to elucidate any question before the jury.

The limitations upon this extension of the original rule are different in different States. We do not deem it necessary, in the present case, to lay down any definite rule applicable to all cases, as to when declarations of deceased persons constitute valid evidence to establish private boundaries.

The question is one involving the ownership of real property in Pennsylvania, and it becomes our duty to ascertain the rule established in that State, especially as respects the admissibility of the declarations of deceased surveyors in cases of boundaries between private estates.

In the case of Caufman v. Cedar Spring Congregation, 6 Binn. 59, the plaintiff claimed a certain number of acres which were surveyed by one Wilson, an assistant of the deputy surveyor, since deceased. The deputy surveyor returned to the land office a smaller quantity than was contained in Wilson's actual survey. On the trial of the case evidence of what was said by Wilson was objected to by the defendant upon the ground that the official return of the survey was the best evidence of the survey. The evidence was held by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania to have been rightly received. Chief Justice Tilghman said: "It will be recollected that Wilson is dead; otherwise, nothing less than his own oath could have been received. Where boundary is the subject, what has been said by a deceased person is received as evidence. It forms an exception to the general rule. It was necessary for the plaintiffs to show their possession of the lands. * * * It was impossible for the plaintiffs to show the extent of their possession without showing the lines run by Wilson. Those lines were the plaintiffs' boundaries; at least such was their claim. It appears to me, therefore, that what was said by Wilson came within the exception which admits the words of a deceased person to be given in evidence in a matter of boundary."

In Kennedy v. Lubold, 88 Pa. 246, the declarations of a deceased surveyor, made thirty-five years before the trial, were allowed to go to the jury, but the court below, in charging the jury as to the nature and force of this evidence, used the following language: "There is evidence of what Herrington, or some surveyor said when he went to this tract corner. That is hearsay evidence, and we admitted that with a good deal of reluctance. We hardly believe it is evidence. We say to you in determining that evidence, it is weak evidence. It is not as strong evidence as that of witnesses who come here upon the witness stand and submit to cross examination, in testifying to what is the true corner from the very necessity of the case." The case being carried up by a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Chief Justice Agnew delivered the opinion of the court, and said: "These two cases were argued together. They seem to have been tried upon the doctrine of leaving first principles, and going on to perfection. But old surveys are not to be so tested. Most perfect in the beginning, they are constantly undergoing change and decay, until by wind, fire, rottenness, and the acts and frauds of men, their evidences lie only in memory and hearsay. Hence, when the learned judge said of the acts of the surveyors, who forty years before went upon the ground, ran the lines, blocked the trees, counted the growths, found original marks, and pronounced the hickory the numbered corner of donation lot No. 1260, it was mere hearsay, he hardly believed it evidence, admitted it with reluctance, and it was weak evidence in determining, he clearly misled the jury. The reverse is true —the evidence was strong, and ought to prevail unless clearly rebutted, by showing either a mistake of the witness relating the facts, or error in the surveyors making the declaration. * * * The declarations as to the corners when found, blocked, and counted were a part of the res gestæ, and so far from being doubtful evidence were competent and always admitted when the transaction is old and the surveyor dead."

In Kramer v. Goodlander, 98 Pa. 366, the witness having testified that he had owned the land in dispute thirty years before the trial, and employed one Ferguson, a surveyor since dead, to trace the lines, it was offered to prove what Goodlander said as to the lines whilst he was on the ground searching for them. This was rejected as purely hearsay. Justice Trunkey, in delivering the opinion of the court said: "From an early day in this State, in litigation respecting boundaries, it has been competent to prove, after the death of a surveyor who had examined a line, what he said respecting it at the time and on the ground. The offer should have been admitted."

In McCausland v. Fleming, 63 Pa. 38, Justice Agnew, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Pedigree and boundary are the excepted cases, wherein reputation and hearsay of deceased persons are received as evidence. The statements of deceased persons relative to boundaries of which they spoke from actual personal knowledge have been frequently received as evidence in this State."

There is one case in which the principles of this rule of hearsay evidence in respect to boundaries were fully considered in the Circuit Court of the United States. Conn v. Penn, 1 Pet. C. Ct. 496. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Washington, and the substance of it is as follows, p. 511: The courses and distances laid down in a survey, especially if it be ancient, are never, in practice, considered as conclusive, but are liable to be materially changed by oral proof, or other evidence, tending to prove that the documentary lines are those not actually run. Reputed boundaries are often proved by the testimony of aged witnesses, and the hearsay evidence of such witnesses has been admitted to establish such lines, in opposition to the calls of an ancient patent. It is not the lines reported, but the lines which have been actually run by the surveyor, which vests in a patentee a title to the area included within those lines.

These decisions clearly require the admission of the testimony rejected by the court below, and the decisions cited by the counsel for defendant in error also seem to us in harmony with the tenor and effect of them.

The case of Bender v. Pitzer, 27 Pa. 335, is an interesting case in its examination of the qualifications and some of the aspects of this rule. The declarations of a deceased surveyor who had not made the original survey, nor subsequently examined it, nor run the lines upon the ground, and who was not an adjoining owner, and did not point out the lines at the time of those declarations, were held to be rightfully rejected. But Justice Knox, while rejecting the evidence, took especial care to reiterate the principles laid down in the cases heretofore cited. In delivering the opinion of the court he said: "It has long since been settled, both in this country and in England, that ancient boundaries are provable by general reputation, in a question involving public rights. In Pennsylvania a still greater latitude has been allowed in questions of boundary. Here the declarations of a deceased person touching the locality of boundary between adjoining owners have been admitted where the survey was made by the person making the declaration, or where the declaration was made by an adjoining owner who pointed out the boundary line between the tracts to the witness at the time the declarations were made." Caufman v. Cedar Spring Congregation, 6 Binn. 59; Hamilton v. Menor, 2 Serg. & R. 70.

To sustain the rejection of the evidence much reliance is placed on the decisions of this court in the cases of Hunnicutt v. Peyton, 102 U. S. 333 [26: 113], and Ellicott v. Pearl, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 412 [9: 475]. But as the question is one of Pennsylvania law, to be controlled by Pennsylvania decisions, the observations of the court in the cases cited are not pertinent.

The first of these cases states the English rule, and summarizes some of the results to be deduced from the decisions of the state tribunals. The court concedes that had the Supreme Court of Texas decided differently, it would have felt constrained to apply the Texas rule to the case in question; but even under the summary of the general law in this country, as it was conceived to exist on the subject at that time, the evidence rejected in the present case ought to have been received. It is not necessary for us to approve or disapprove the departures from the original rule, because the court held that the evidence there offered was not admissible under any well established exceptions to the rule. The court is particular to say the declarations of Moore were made, not when he was pointing out the boundaries of the Basquez survey, but when he was at a distance from the place of beginning of that survey and from its upper line. That Moore had made the survey, or had ever been upon its upper line, or on the upper line of the reserve, was proved only by his assertion, which the court allowed to be given in evidence. There was no such proof aliunde.

The case of Ellicott v. Pearl, supra, was brought to this court by a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky. And in the decision here, this court adhered to the English rule, and rejected the evidence of the declaration of a deceased surveyor, as to the boundary of a private estate. In so doing, this court was simply enforcing the rule as it existed in Kentucky at that time. In Cherry v. Boyd, Litt. Sel. Cas. 8, decided by the Supreme Court of that State in 1800, it was held that evidence of the parol declarations of a surveyor concerning the marks or lines of a private estate were inadmissible. This being the settled law of Kentucky, this court could not have decided otherwise than it did in Ellicott v. Pearl. But even in that case the court uses the following guarded language: "The doctrine in America, in respect to boundaries, has gone further, and has admitted of general reputation as to boundaries between contiguous private estates."

The remaining assignments of error relate to the answers to the requests by the counsel of the respective parties for instructions to the jury, and to the general charge of the court below. They are so many in number that it would greatly protract this opinion to review them seriatim, and in the order of their presentation.

At the request of the plaintiff, the court below said to the jury, "that in the absence of marks on the north made for the William Elliott in 1794, by the deputy surveyor, the William Elliott must go to its calls for adjoiners on the north; that as there is no evidence of any such original marks, the William Elliott must go to its northern calls for the Daniel Reese, Mary Myers, Charlotte Ruston, and John Reynolds, and, therefore, the William Elliott will embrace the land in dispute by locating the Mary Myers and Charlotte Ruston, according to the official courses and distances from their northern line, or from the Rockefeller maple corner."

We think the learned judge in giving this charge fell into error. If it was not a positive and imperative direction to the jury to find for the plaintiff, it would be difficult to convince them that this was not the manifest intention of the court. In its logical effect it is a syllogism, the conclusion of which is that the land in dispute is within the limits of the William Elliott, and belongs, therefore, to the plaintiff. Its terms are, first, that in the absence of any original marks on the north of the William Elliott, made by the surveyor at the date of the survey, the William Elliott will go to its northern adjoining tracts, to wit, the Mary Myers and Charlotte Ruston; second, that there is no evidence of any such original marks on the north of the William Elliott; third, that, therefore, the William Elliott must go to its adjoining tracts on the north (the Myers and Ruston), and thus embrace the land in dispute. The direct tendency, if not the avowed purpose, of the statements contained in this charge, is to withdraw from the consideration of the jury a very considerable amount of pertinent and important testimony for the defense. It should be borne in mind that the William Elliott is not a single separate tract, but one of a block of several tracts surveyed at the same time, by the same surveyor, under warrants of the same date, and for the same owner, and returned into the land office as one body.

By the settled law of Pennsylvania, applicable to the location of surveys, original marks and living monuments on the ground constitute the survey, and they are the highest proof of its true location. The next most important evidence of location is the calls for adjoining surveys; and in the absence of both of them, and then only, the lines according to courses and distances, returned by the surveyor into the land office, determine the location. But it is equally well settled, by an unbroken current of decisions in that State, that the surveys constituting a block are not to be treated as separate and individual surveys; nor can each tract be located independently of the rest, by its own individual lines or calls or courses and distances; but such surveys are to be located together as a block or one large tract. If lines and corners made for such a block of surveys can be found upon the ground, this fixes the location of the block, even to the disregard of the call for adjoiners. The lines and corners found upon any part of the block of surveys belong to each and every tract of the block, as much as they do to the particular tract which they adjoin.

In Pruner v. Brisbin the question came before the court below, and the principles just laid down were enunciated in that court; and upon a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Mr. Justice Sterrett said: "The thirteen tracts having been surveyed in a block and so returned must be located upon the ground as a block; neither of them can be arbitrarily located in disregard of the lines and corners found upon other parts of the block. All the lines and corners marked upon the ground and returned must be considered in ascertaining the proper location of the block. Those found upon any part of the block belong to each and every tract of which it is composed; and if sufficient lines and corners can be found they determine the location of the entire block, without regard to its calls for adjoiners or for waters, if such calls conflict with the lines actually run upon the ground and returned." He added: "It requires neither argument nor citation of authority to show that the learned judge was clearly right in thus instructing the jury." 98 Pa. 210.

In Fritz v. Brandon, 78 Pa. 351, Chief Justice Agnew says: "When one person is owner of all the warrants, they may be surveyed together in a single block by exterior lines, leaving the interior lines to be settled by the owner himself. Mock v. Astley, 13 Serg. & R. 382; Stevens v. Hughes, 8 Watts & S. 465; Collins v. Barclay, 7 Pa. 73; Hagerty v. Mathers, 31 Pa. 348. The legal effect is that the entire block is viewed is one tract. Hence, Chief Justice Lewis said in Hole v. Rittenhouse, 25 Pa. 491: 'Under these circumstances it is evident that the whole fifteen surveys adjoining each other in a single block, without interior lines, all made at one time and owned by the same party, were essentially but one tract.' * * * This principle was in the mind of Chief Justice Woodward when he said in Malone v. Sallada, 48 Pa. 425: 'And when we are dealing with blocks of surveys we must remember that the marks on any part of the block belong to each tract in the block.' So Judge Strong said, in Darrah v. Bryant, 56 Pa. 75: 'And if they were surveyed as a block, they must be located as a block.'"

In Malone v. Sallada, 48 Pa. 419, Chief Justice Woodward says: "Located by these adjoiners, Isaac Miller would take the land in dispute, but several of its courses and distances and the configuration of the survey as returned into the land office would essentially be changed. Notwithstanding these consequences, however, the defendants insisted upon its location by its calls. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contended that the whole block of twenty-five surveys should be located by the marks on the ground, with no other reference to calls for adjoiners than such as would be consistent with the marks on the ground; and that it is immaterial that no marks are found on the Miller survey, since authentic marks are found on other tracts of the block sufficient to locate the whole block, and that these marks apply with decisive effect to Isaac Miller. They deny also that Merrick Starr was called for on the west of Isaac Miller; but if it was, they say it was a mistake, and must be rejected in favor of the courses and distances as returned. In a word, the plaintiffs would locate the Isaac Miller by the marks on the ground of other tracts, in connection with which it was surveyed and returned. * * * And when we are dealing with blocks of surveys we must remember that the marks on any part of the block belong to each tract of the block. Interior lines were never run and marks are not to be looked for on them; but if marks are found upon the ground to establish an exterior line of a particular tract of the block, and we find other tracts returned with that same line, we are to presume it was adopted as the boundary of these tracts, no less than of the tracts which bear the marks. When the surveyor, for instance, ran from the pine corner of Gilbert and Brooks to the stone corner of Lomison and Paul, his course for more than three hundred perches was south ten degrees east, and his only other course for 89 perches was south 4½° east, and these two courses carried him the whole width of the Gilbert and Miller tracts, and formed the western boundary of these respective tracts. No marks are found on these lines, but the pine and stones are sufficient to locate them."

In Northumberland Coal Co. v. Clement, 95 Pa. 126, it was held: "When original surveys have been made and returned as a block into the land office, the location of each tract therein may be proved by proving the location of the block. In ascertaining the location of a tract the inquiry is not where a tract should or might have been located, but where it actually was located. Every mark on the ground tending to show the location of any tract in the block is some evidence of the location of the whole block, and therefore of each tract therein."

We think these authorities are conclusive upon this point. The principle itself was invoked by the defendant in error and by the judge below, when, at the request of the former, the judge charged the jury that if the actual position upon the ground of one single maple corner could be established, this would fix the southern line of the whole block of eleven surveys and of every member of the block. If, therefore, any original marks could be found called for and established on the northern line of any tract of the La Fevre Block, that would fix the northern line of the whole block of six surveys.

It was conceded by the plaintiff and defendant below, and stated by the learned judge in his charge to the jury, that the William Elliott was a member of the La Fevre Block, of which the Ebenezer Branham was the leading warrant and controlling survey.

A. B. Cochran, a surveyor produced by the plaintiff below as a witness in his own behalf, testified that the "post by a pine," called for by the Ebenezer Branham as a monument on its northern line, was a well recognized mark on that line; and that he found three other trees on that line west of the "post by a pine" in the line of official courses, for 150 perches. And there were not less than five surveyors, who, as witnesses produced by the defendant, testified that they found five or six trees on the northern line of the Ebenezer Branham, in the official courses of the same line. These marks, if the jury believed the witnesses, must be regarded, according to the authorities, marks and monuments sufficient, if not overcome by the force of rebutting evidence, to fix the entire northern line of the La Fevre block and of each tract composing it, including the William Elliott. For these reasons we consider that the inevitable effect of that portion of the charge in question was to mislead the jury.

In regard to the Francis West and Richard Martin tracts, the location of which the defendant below offered in evidence for the purpose of showing that the southern line of the Brush Valley Block was run at the time of the original survey and marked upon the ground far enough south of the official courses and distances to include the land in dispute, the court charged the jury in these words:

"The Richard Martin, being a junior survey, cannot control or enlarge the dimensions of the Samuel Lobdil and the other members of the Brush Valley Block, which are earlier surveys. The location of a junior warrant may throw some light upon the location of a senior survey which it calls to adjoin. Hence, what the deputy surveyor did in locating the Richard Martin has been admitted in evidence, and may be considered by the jury in connection with all the other evidence in determing the question whether or not the chestnut oak and the gums relied on by the defendant are trees marked by the surveyors in 1793 to define the southern line for the Brush Valley Block; but should the jury find that none of those trees were marked for the survey of 1793, then the Richard Martin can have no weight in determining the location of the Brush Valley Block, but the eleven surveys of that block must then be located from their fixed corners upon the northern line according to the official courses and distances (unless, indeed, the jury should find in favor of David Rockfeller's location of the maple corner.")

We cannot concur with this charge as a correct application of the general law of the State of Pennsylvania to the facts of this case. It is unquestionably true that a junior survey cannot control or enlarge the dimensions of a senior survey. We understand this to mean that when the location of a survey is or can be ascertained and determined by its own marks upon the ground, its own calls and courses and distances, it cannot be changed or controlled or enlarged or diminished by the marks or lines of an adjoining junior survey; but when, from the disappearance of these original landmarks, caused by time and other agencies, from the senior survey, the location of a particular line, or the identity of a corner, is left in uncertainty or becomes the subject of controversy, then the original and well established marks found upon a later survey made by the same surveyor about the same time, and adjoining the one in dispute, are regarded as legitimate evidence, not to contest or control, but to elucidate, throw light upon, and thus aid the jury in discovering, the exact location of the older survey. In stating to the jury that such marks on the junior survey (the Richard Martin) might be considered in determining the single question whether or not the chestnut oak and gums, relied on by the defendant, were marked by the surveyors in 1798 to define the line for the Brush Valley block, "and that no weight can be attached to the Richard Martin," if the jury find that none of these trees were so marked, the judge committed error. In restricting the operation of this evidence to this one single question, to the exclusion of all other questions connected with the location of the southern boundary of the Brush Valley block, we are of the opinion that he was in direct conflict with the rule laid down by the Pennsylvania courts.

In Clement v. Northumberland Coal Co. 87 Pa. 291, this very question came up as to the effect of the "post by a pine," and the pitch-pine upon the southern line of the Richard Martin, in fixing the southern line of the Mary Myers. The court below allowed this evidence to go to the jury to be considered in determining the southern line of the Mary Myers. The supreme court affirmed the well established rule that marks upon an adjoining junior survey cannot control or enlarge the dimensions of an earlier survey (even though the junior survey adopts the lines of the older), but that such marks may be submitted to the jury as evidence tending to discover the actual location of the older survey. The court said: "The point, though made in the oral argument against the instruction of the learned court below, we think, is without a sufficient foundation in the charge. The judge very correctly held that a subsequent survey could not control the lines of a former, but he did not leave the case upon this single instruction, by omitting to inform the jury that the subsequent acts of the deputy surveyor in locating a junior warrant and the marks left by him on the ground, might be considered as evidence tending to disprove the actual location of the older survey. On the contrary, he answered the third point of the plaintiff below, which raised the question very plainly, so as to bring the true distinction fairly before the minds of the jury. The point is clear, and he replied: 'Marks found upon adjoining surveys made about the time of the survey are evidence upon the subject of location, but they cannot control or enlarge the dimensions of an earlier survey, even though they may adopt its lines.' Thus the jury was left to locate the earlier survey by those marks, if they should conclude that they indicated the true place of the earlier location; and were at the same time informed that the lines of a later survey cannot alter or enlarge the lines of a former survey, although the courses and distances of these former lines may be adopted. Certainly, this was a fair instruction and brought the charge within the precedents cited. The difference between that which is evidence of a fact and an effect which controls the fact is plain. Then, when the judge came to state the evidence of the marks found, he most distinctly referred to the pitch pine on the southern line of the Martin tract, and the 'post by a pine' as the material matter in determining the question as to the southern boundary of Mary Myers. In the next paragraph he refers to his answers to the points and leaves the question of the boundary, as indicated by those marks, to the jury."

The phraseology employed in this opinion of the court seems to have been adopted for the special purpose of excluding, by anticipation, the qualification added to the rule in the general charge of the court below. The case just cited says that the marks ("post by a pine" and the pitch pine) on the Martin line were rightly submitted to the jury as material matter in determining the question of the southern boundary of the Mary Myers. But the learned judge below in this case said that the Richard Martin can have no weight in determining the location of the Brush Valley block, and, therefore, of the Mary Myers, unless the jury finds that certain trees relied on by the defendant bore certain marks.

In the case of the Northumberland Coal Co. v. Clement, 95 Pa. 126, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania passed upon this same question as to the effect of marks upon the southern line of the Richard Martin (which marks were "post by a pine" and the pitch pine), as evidence to fix the location of the line that divides the Billington tract from the Walker tract, defining the southern limit of the former and the northern limit of the latter. The court said: "The official survey of the Thomas Billington calls for a small maple as its southwest corner. Maple sprouts are found at the place claimed by the defendant in error to be the southwest corner of the tract. The original surveys of all these tracts were made by Henry Donnel, acting as a deputy surveyor. It is shown that the same Donnel, in 1814, in running the northern line of the Lewis Walker tract, fixed the line between it and the Thomas Billington to be where it is now claimed by the defendant in error. The official survey of the Richard Martin calls for a white pine tree in its south line. That tree is standing and identified. That warrant was located by the same surveyor, and the return of survey was made three days before the survey of the Billington tract was returned. It calls for the Samuel Lobdil on the west, and the line between the tracts is of the same length in each survey. He had the warrants in his hands at the same time. The location of the latter throws light on the former. The location claimed by the defendant in error for the Billington is not only in harmony with the block of surveys of which it forms a part, but also with the location of the Richard Martin made by the same surveyor soon thereafter." The counsel for the plaintiff below, in their able brief, say that there are some errors of fact in that case which detract very much from it as an authority. We do not discover in it any material errors of fact, but it is hardly necessary to consider the suggesti in view of the general concurrence of authorities in the principle therein laid down. See Pennsylvania Canal Co. v. Kunkel, 33 Leg. Int. 389. See also Sweigart v. Richards, 8 Pa. 486; Bellas v. Cleaver, 40 Pa. 260.

Counsel for defendant in error say in their brief: "This admitted principle of evidence, that the call of the younger was some evidence upon the subject of boundaries upon the location of the older, when both were indicated by the same deputy surveyor, never did have much weight in our court." We see nothing in the cases cited and especially relied on to sustain this assertion, but much to confirm the authority of the rule. The brief cites Pruner v. Brisbin, 98 Pa. 203, and says "The attempt was made, as was done in the present case, to avoid the conclusiveness of the official return of survey by the calls of a junior survey, and to locate the older surveys by such junior calls." This is not an exact statement of the issue in the case. It is just the reverse. The attempt was made to avoid the conclusiveness of the original marks of a survey upon the ground by the calls of its own leading warrant and by the calls of a junior survey. In that case there were original marks sufficient to establish the line of the older survey that was in dispute, and the only contest about that line arose, not from the absence of original marks upon it, but from the marks and calls of junior surveys, and also the marks of older surveys. The court decided that "The jury was properly instructed that the block of 1793, as returned to the land office, must be located by its own marks, and not by calls of later surveys, or by marks found upon the ground younger than 1793." The construction put by counsel upon this language would bring the decision of the court into direct conflict with its own holding made at the same term and reported in the same volume.

The learned counsel for the defendant in error argue with great force and ingenuity that the rule is firmly established as the law of Pennsylvania, that after a survey has been returned into the land office for the period of twenty-one years unchallenged by any adverse claimants in the mode required by law, it is a conclusive presumption that the survey was actually made and marked upon the ground as shown by the official return. After a careful examination of the decisions of the supreme court cited by counsel, and some others relating to the subject, we are convinced that they are all in harmony with the conclusions herein announced. After the lapse of twenty-one years from the return of a survey the presumption is that the warrant was located as returned by the surveyor to the land office; and in the absence of rebutting facts the official courses and distances determine the location of the tract warranted. But this presumption is not conclusive, and is rebutted by proof of the existence of marked lines and monuments, and other facts tending to show that the actual location on the ground was different from the official courses and distances. Where younger surveys of fixed lines called for the older the fact is admissible, in the language of the authorities, "to aid the jury in discovering the actual location of the survey."

There are other assignments of error by the counsel for plaintiff in error; but inasmuch as they involve somewhat the principles of the points already passed upon, we do not deem it necessary to consider them further.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to grant a new trial.

HANNIBAL AND ST. JOSEPH RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err., v. MISSOURI RIVER PACKET COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 260-273.)

Act of Congress providing for a bridge across the Missouri—construction of—rule of.

1. Under the Act of Congress of July 25, 1866, providing for the erection of a bridge across the Missouri River at Kansas City, the distance of 160 feet between the piers of the bridge required by said Act should be obtained by measuring along a line between said piers drawn perpendicularly to the faces of the piers and the current of the river.

2. In construing said Act the spirit and reason of it must be regarded; and it must be construed with reference to its evident purpose to connect with the exercise of the privileges therein granted such limitations as will guaranty protection to the navigating interests affected by the proposed legislation.

3. A statute which is a grant of a privilege must be construed most strongly in favor of the grantor.

4. An instruction by a state court to the jury which does not present any federal question will not be considered by this court.

[No. 163.]

Argued Feb. 6, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri, to review a judgment of that court affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court of Jackson County in said State, in favor of plaintiff below, for damages for injuries to plaintiff's steamboats, by a railroad bridge erected and maintained by defendant over the Missouri River at Kansas City, Missouri, the piers of which unlawfully obstructed the navigation of said river. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wirt Dexter and John J. Herrick, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John C. Gage and Sanford B. Ladd, for defendant in error:

The bridge as run was not a compliance with the Act.

Columbus Ins. Co. v. Peoria Bridge Asso. 6

McLean, 70; Missouri River Packet Co. v. Hannibal & St. J. R. R. Co. 1 McCrary, 281; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 544 (9:822); Stourbridge Canal Co. v. Wheeley, 2 Barn. & Ad. 793; Binghamton Bridge, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 75 (18:143).

The rule of construction in this class of cases is that it shall be most strongly against the corporation.

Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 666 (24:1038); Rice v. Minnesota & N. W. R. R. Co. 66 U. S. 1 Black, 380 (17:153).

Grants of this nature are to be construed strictly.

Newark Pl. Road Co. v. Elmer, 9 N. J. Eq. 789; Commonwealth v. Erie & N. E. R. R. Co. 27 Pa. 351; Webb v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 4 Mylne & C. 120.

Every technical rule, as to the construction or force of particular terms, must yield to the clear expression of the paramount will of the Legislature.

Wilkinson v. Leland, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 662 (7:554); Oates v. First Nat. Bank, 100 U S. 244 (25:582); Holmes v. Carley, 31 N. Y. 289.

A thing which is within the letter of the statute is not within the statute, unless within the intention of the makers.

Jersey Co. v. Davison, 29 N. J. L. 423; Smith v. People, 47 N. Y. 336.

Rules for the construction of statutes look to the whole and every part of a statute, to the apparent intention derived from the whole, to the subject matter, to the effects and consequences, and to the reason and spirit of the law.

Ryegate v. Wardsboro, 30 Vt. 749; State v. Paterson, 35 N. J. L. 197; State v. Clark, 29 N. J. L. 99; Lake v. Caddo Parish, 37 La. Ann. 789; State v. Nicholls, 30 La. Ann. 982; Jackson v. Collins, 3 Cow. 96; People v. Davenport, 91 N. Y. 584; State v. Clarksville & R. T. P. Co. 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 89; Potter, Dwarr Stat. 144.

If the only federal question in the case—that of the construction of the Act of Congress—was properly decided by the state court, no other questions arising upon the record should be considered.

Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590 (22:429); Allen v. McVeigh, 107 U. S. 433 (27:572).

A vessel navigating a river has a right to the unobstructed use of all its natural width.

Newark Pl. Road Co. v. Elmer, 9 N. J. Eq. 790; Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co. 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 97 (9:1015); Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co. 54 U. S. 13 How. 564 (14:268); Arundel v. McCulloch, 10 Mass. 70.

By a violation of the law, the protection of the law has been forfeited.

Dugan v. Bridge Co. 27 Pa. 318; Commonwealth v. Church, 1 Pa. 105; Commonwealth v. Nashua & L. R. R. Corp. 2 Gray, 54; Commonwealth v. Vermont & M. R. R. Corp. 4 Gray, 22; Waring v. Clarke, 46 U. S. 5 How. 464 (12:287).

Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri to review a judgment of that court affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court of Jackson County in said State against the plaintiff in error. The action was brought in February, 1875, in the Circuit Court of Jackson County, by the Missouri River Packet Company, plaintiff below, against the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, defendant below, to recover damages for injuries done to two of the plaintiff's steamboats by a railroad bridge which had been erected and maintained by defendant over the Missouri River at Kansas City, Missouri, the piers of which and two certain structures connected therewith, it is alleged, unlawfully obstructed the navigation of said river.

The petition contained two counts, the first of which was as follows:

"Plaintiff states that it is, and for the five years last past has been, a corporation organized and created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Missouri, and during said period has been and still is the owner and proprietor of numerous steamboats, including the steamboat named 'Alice,' hereinafter mentioned, with which it has, as such corporation, during said period been engaged in navigating the waters of the Missouri River, and conveying and transporting, by means thereof, passengers and freight between the various towns and cities situated on the banks of said river in the States of Missouri and Kansas.

"That the defendant is and for the last twenty years has been a railroad corporation, organized under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Missouri.

"That the Missouri River, for a long distance above the City of Kansas, in the County of Jackson and State of Missouri, and below said city to the mouth of said river, is a navigable stream; that prior to the 4th day of March, 1874, the defendant had erected, and prior thereto and on said day did keep and maintain, in the said river and the channel thereof, near the southern bank thereof and near the foot of the street known as Broadway, in said City of Kansas, a certain structure composed of heavy timbers and lumber fastened together; and long prior to said day the defendant had erected, kept, and maintained, and did on said day keep and maintain, in the channel of said river, in a point in said Jackson County and opposite said City of Kansas, nearer the center of said river than the structure first above named, a certain other structure to wit, a crib or box built of heavy timbers filled with stone, which said crib or box extended from the bed of said river upward to a height of 30 feet or more above the surface thereof; that both of said structures were and always have been obstacles in the way of vessels passing by the same up and down said river, and have prevented and rendered the navigation of said river dangerous and unsafe; that said structures were so erected, kept, and maintained by the defendant wrongfully, willfully, and in flagrant disregard and violation of the rights of plaintiff and others, to the free and unobstructed use of said river as a highway of commerce; that before the erection of said structures the current of said river, at and above and below the point where the same were located and erected, had been in a line nearly parallel to the faces of said structure, and the navigation of the same easy and safe.

"But plaintiff states that the structure first above mentioned had, on said 4th day of March, 1874, caused the current of the river at that point, to change, so that it rushed with great velocity from the point of the location of said structure in a direction nearly at right angles to its former course towards and against said crib or box.

"And plaintiff states that on said 4th day of March, 1874, it was, in the course of its business, navigating said river with its said steamboat 'Alice,' and while attempting, in the exercise of due care and caution, to run said boat by and between said structures, said boat was, without any fault of this plaintiff, by the current of the river, so changed as aforesaid, hurled violently against said crib or box, and the waterwheel, wheelhouse and other parts of of said boat broken, injured and damaged.

"That plaintiff was compelled to and did expend large sums of money in repairing said injuries to said boat, and was, on account of the injuries thereto, wholly deprived of the use of the same and of the earnings thereof for the period of thirteen days, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, for which, with interest from the 1st day of April, 1874, plaintiff prays judgment against the defendant."

The second count was in substantially the same form, and alleged an injury to the "St. Luke," another of plaintiff's vessels, occurring on the 15th day of September, 1874, and prayed judgment on account thereof in the sum of $3,000.

To this petition the defendant below first interposed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, alleging that the structures complained of, and each of them, were, at the time of the injuries alleged in plaintiff's petition, and still are, a part of a bridge across the Missouri River at Kansas City, authorized by the Act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, and constructed under and in accordance with the terms and provisions of said Act by the Kansas City and Cameron Railroad Company, of which the defendant Company below is the successor; that said bridge was wholly situated at the time of the injuries alleged in plaintiff's petition, and still is wholly situated, within the jurisdiction of the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri, and that, by reason of the premises stated, said district court has exclusive jurisdiction over the subject matter of this action.

This plea having been overruled by the court, and exceptions duly saved, the defendant answered. The answer consisted of (1) a general denial, and (2) a special defense, which latter was pleaded as a full and complete bar to the cause of action alleged in the petition, and is in substance as follows: That at the time of the injury complained of in plaintiff's petition, the defendant was, for a long time prior thereto had been, and still is, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, and, as such corporation, acting as it was authorized to do by the terms of its charter, it had constructed a railroad from the Town of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri, to the Town of St. Joseph, in said State, and has been ever since maintaining and operating said railroad; that the Kansas City and Cameron Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, as it was authorized to do by the terms of its charter, had constructed a railroad from the north bank of the Missouri River, opposite said City of Kansas, to Cameron, on the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad; that Congress, by an Act approved July 25, 1866, authorized the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Kansas City, and the Kansas City and Cameron Railroad Company, availing itself of this privilege, between the passage of said Act of Congress and the 4th day of July, 1869, did construct such bridge at Kansas City; that the Kansas City and Cameron Railroad Company afterwards, to wit, on the 4th day of February, 1870, consolidated with the defendant company, whereby the defendant became the owner and proprietor of said bridge; that said bridge was and is a pivot drawbridge, with a draw over the main channel of said Missouri River, at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans of 160 feet in the clear on each side of the pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining spans to the draw were and are 80 feet above low water mark and 10 feet above high water mark, measuring to the bottom chord of said bridge, and the piers of said bridge were, at the times of location and construction thereof, parallel with the current of the said river; that the obstacles and obstructions (the structures) described in plaintiff's petition, and each of them, were at that time, and still are, parts and parcels of said bridge, and were and are necessary to the safe and secure maintenance of said bridge; that said bridge, ever since its completion, has been a post route; and that, by reason of the premises aforesaid, said bridge, ever since its completion, has been and still is a lawful structure, and, if plaintiff has sustained any damage in consequence thereof, it has been without any fault on the part of defendant, and the defendant is not legally liable therefor.

Plaintiff in its reply specifically denied every material allegation set up in the special defense of the defendant, and upon this state of the pleadings the case was tried by a jury, resulting in a verdict for plaintiff below on the first count in its petition, for $2,400, and on the second, for $2,900—in all $5,300—upon which judgment was rendered.

Plaintiff [in error] thereupon excepted and appealed to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri, relying mainly upon the question of jurisdiction in the court below, and upon certain alleged improper and illegal instructions given to the jury. The Supreme Court of the State, upon the questions material to a review of the case by this court, held: (1) That the Circuit Court of Jackson County, in which this action was commenced, had concurrent jurisdiction with the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri in the case, and that therefore the plea to the jurisdiction was properly overruled by the circuit court; (2) That, while the piers of the bridge were constructed parallel with the current of the river as required by the Act of Congress, in determining whether the spans of the bridge on each side of the pivot pier were 160 feet in length in the clear, as required by the Act, the measurement should be made at right angles with the current, and not along the structure itself or on the line of the structure, and, inasmuch as the spans so measured were but 153 feet and a fraction in length, that therefore the structure causing the accident was not a lawful one.

The Act of Congress, approved July 25, 1866, giving permission for the construction of the bridge under consideration, is found in volume 14 of the Statutes at Large, page 244, and the sections thereof material to a correct determination of the issue here are quoted in full below.

Section 1 provides for the erection of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Quincy, Illinois, and for the laying of railroad tracks on and over the same, etc. "And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction to the free navigation of said river, the cause may be tried before the District Court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any bridge built under the provisions of this Act may, at the option of the company building the same, be built as a drawbridge, with a pivot or other form of draw, or with unbroken or continuous spans; Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than 250 feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river, and not less than 300 feet in length; And provided also, That if any bridge built under this Act shall be constructed as a drawbridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot drawbridge with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans of not less than one hundred and sixty feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining spans to the draw shall not be less than 250 feet; and said spans shall not be less than 80 feet above low water mark, and not less than 10 above extreme high water mark, measuring to the bottom chord of the bridge, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river; And provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats whose construction shall not be such as to admit of their passage under the permanent spans of said bridge, except when trains are passing over the same; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening the said draw during or after the passage of trains.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That any bridge constructed under this Act, and according to its limitation, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route; upon which, also, no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to the said bridge.

"Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That any company authorized by the Legislature of Missouri may construct a bridge across the Missouri River, at the City of Kansas, upon the same terms and conditions provided for in this Act."

The material facts in this case, as set forth clearly and distinctly in the frank and able brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, are as follows:

"The undisputed evidence showed that the bridge was a pivot drawbridge; that its piers were parallel with the current of the river, but that they were not at right angles with the current, and ranged diagonally across it; that as a consequence the superstructure of the bridge, erected on the piers, ran diagonally across the current of the river at an angle of 18 degrees; that measuring the spans between the piers, along the line or chord of the bridge, gave a distance of over 160 feet; that the open space between the piers, at low water mark, measured on the line of the bridge structure, was also over 160 feet; but that a line measured at right angles with the current was only 153 feet and a fraction. It also appeared that the draw bridge, when swinging open to permit the passage of boats, rested upon two timber structures, called upper and lower draw rests, which had for their foundation cribs sunk in the river and filled with rock. There was also an ice breaker in front of the upper draw rest, and forming a part of it. The draw rests were connected with the pivot pier by cribs sunk in the water. These draw rests, thus connected with the pivot pier, were situated near the middle of the river, parallel with the current, and all taken together extended up and down the river about the length of the draw, and were necessary parts of the structure. The upper draw rest, with its ice breaker attached, was what the petition designated as 'a certain other structure, to wit, a crib or box, built of heavy timbers filled with stone,' and was the structure with which the steamer came in collision. The evidence also tended to show that near the river bank, on the south side of the south draw opening, a row of pontoons was placed, extending from pier No. 1, up the river about 340 feet to the shore; pier No. 1 being about sixty-five feet from the Kansas City shore, and being the pier on which the south end of the draw rested when in position. These pontoons were constructed of a number of flat boats from fifty-three to sixty-five feet in length, and from eighteen to twenty feet in width, chained together, so that their outer edge presented a straight line next to the channel. On the trial it was not claimed that these pontoons were any part of the bridge. They constituted what the petition called 'a certain structure composed of heavy timbers and lumber fastened together,' near the southern bank of the river. It further appeared that the pontoons remained floating and in position until the latter part of the winter of 1873-4, when they sank. The evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that they sank transversely, or in a direction quartering out into the river; that there was a cross current, starting from near the south shore, above the head of the pontoons and running diagonally across the river, in the direction of the upper draw rest; and that while the boats were attempting to pass the drawbridge, in charge of skillful pilots, exercising ordinary care and skill, they were caught by the cross current and hurled against the upper draw rest and injured thereby. On the other hand, the testimony for the defendant tended to show that no such cross current existed, and that the injury to the boats occurred solely by reason of want of due care and skill of the pilots in the management of the boats."

The Supreme Court of the State of Missouri, in affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court of Jackson County, also ruled clearly that the distance of 160 feet between the piers of the bridge required by the Act of Congress should be obtained by measuring along a line between said piers drawn perpendicular to the faces of the piers, and the current of the river; and that as such line would measure but 153 feet and a fraction, instead of 160 feet as required, the bridge was not a lawful structure within the meaning of the Act.

The substance of the errors assigned and relied on here, relate (1) to the construction given by the state court to the second section of the Act of July 25, 1866; and (2) to the ruling of the Supreme Court of the State, approving the giving of plaintiff's instruction No. 1. The plaintiff in error makes no contention here as to the question of jurisdiction urged in its behalf in the state courts, but, on the contrary, expressly states that it agrees with the decision of the Supreme Court of the State upon that question.

The sole question, therefore, for our decision relates to the construction given by the state court to that part of the Act of Congress defining the manner in which the bridge should be built; i. e., that the distance of 160 feet between the piers of the bridge, required by said Act, should be obtained by measuring along a line between said piers, drawn perpendicularly to the faces of the piers and the current of the river, and that as such line would measure but 153 feet and a fraction, instead of 160 feet as required, the bridge was not a lawful structure.

It is strenuously urged by the counsel for plaintiff in error that the bridge we are considering meets the express requirements of the statute; that the word "spans," as used in the statute, means the structures or parts of the bridge which span the river on each side of the pivot pier, and it is these spans which the statute says shall measure 160 feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw; and that the bridge having been constructed according to the requirements of the statute, in its own words, is therefore a legal structure; that the Supreme Court of Missouri, in declaring that "We must look to the spirit and reason of the Act, the purpose of which manifestly was to reserve for the purposes of navigation 160 feet of open space in the clear, wholly unobstructed, and available for the passage of vessels," ignored the plain language of the provision, and inferred an intention contrary to that language; that there was nothing whatever in the statute to show any intention on the part of Congress to reserve "160 feet of open space in the clear, wholly unobstructed;" and that the Act nowhere defines the precise direction of the bridge, but entrusted that direction to the discretion of the Company.

We do not consider this sound reasoning. The statement that there is nothing whatever in the statute to show any intention on the part of Congress to reserve "160 feet of open space in the clear wholly unobstructed," is repelled by every provision in the Act specifying the dimensions of the various parts of the structure. The fact that Congress prescribed in said Act such minute details concerning the manner in which the proposed bridge should be built,—the requirement that it should be constructed with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, the provision that the piers of said bridge should be parallel with the current of the river, that prescribing the height of the spans above the surface of the water,—and the very rigid directions as to the opening of the draw upon reasonable signals, without delay, for the passage of boats, show how careful Congress was in preserving these navigable rivers as highways of commerce, and in guarding the interests of the public, and especially of those engaged in navigating the rivers that would be spanned by the structures authorized by said Act.

We concur with the court below that we must look to the spirit and reason of this provision of the law, and construe it with reference to its evident purpose to connect with the exercise of the privileges therein granted such limitations as will guarantee protection to the navigating interests affected by the proposed legislation. Can it be said that the object and purpose of the law was simply that a bridge should be built across the Missouri River at Kansas City for the benefit of the Railroad Company alone? Manifestly not, for in that case it would have been only necessary to grant the privilege of building a bridge at the place designated without any limitation or condition as to its mode of construction, except such as the discretion of the Company might determine.

In what we have said we do not wish to be understood as assenting to the proposition that the strict letter of the statute supports the contention of the plaintiff in error. The word "span" does not, even in architecture, always means a part of a structure. It is, perhaps, as often used to denote the distance or space between two columns. Such is the obvious import of the term as used in the Act under consideration, not merely as a part of the structure itself, but the measure of the distance between the piers of the bridge—the measure of the space left open for navigation purposes. A similar provision to this may be found in an Act of the Illinois Legislature authorizing the construction of a bridge across a river, and the word "space" is used, where in this Act we have the word "span."

It is said that the Act nowhere defines the precise direction of the bridge, but leaves that to the discretion of the company. The answer to this is that by the express terms of the Act of Congress the piers of the bridge across the river are required to be placed parallel with the current. To the word "across," unless it is qualified by some prefix as diagonally or obliquely, there is attached, in ordinary use, but one meaning, and that is a direction opposite to length. This is especially true when it is used in connection with parallel lines. When the piers are placed parallel with the current of the river they are parallel with one another, and the faces of the piers may properly be considered as so many parallel planes. The spans of the bridge are to be not less than 160 feet in length, in the clear on each side of the pivot pier of the draw—that is, from the face of the central pier to the face of the next adjacent pier must be a distance of not less than 160 feet in the clear. Now, it is an elementary principle of mathematics that "the distance between two parallel planes is measured on a perpendicular to both."

But if there be any doubt as to the proper construction of this statute (and we think there is none), then that construction must be adopted which is most advantageous to the interests of the government. The statute, being a grant of a privilege, must be construed most strongly in favor of the grantor. Gildart v. Gladstone, 12 East, 668; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 544 [9:822]; Dubuque & P. R. R. Co. v. Litchfield, 64 U. S. 23 How. 66 [16: 500]; Binghamton Bridge, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 75 [18: 143]; Rice v. Minnesota & N. W. R. R. Co. 66 U. S. 1 Black, 380 [17: 153]; Leavenworth, L. & G. R. R. Co. v. U. S. 92 U. S. 733 [23: 634]; Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 660 [24: 1036].

As persuasive authority in support of the conclusion we have reached with reference to this bridge, may be cited the case of Columbus Ins. Co. v. Peoria Bridge Asso. 6 McLean, 70; also the case of Missouri River Packet Co. v. Hannibal & St. J. R. R. Co. 1 McCrary, 281, the latter being a decision of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri in a case between the identical parties to this suit and concerning this identical bridge.

In this last case Judge McCrary says: "If it be granted that a measurement along a line which deviates from a course directly across the channel is the proper one, then it would follow that the actual passage way might be less than that required by the Act. The greater the deviation from such a direct line, the less would be the available space between the piers. Such a construction of the Act would defeat the main purpose which Congress had in view in its enactment."

We are therefore of the opinion that the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri committed no error in its construction of the Act of Congress under consideration.

A reversal of the judgment brought here for review is also asked upon the ground that the Supreme Court of Missouri erred in sustaining the Circuit Court of Jackson County in giving to the jury what is called "Plaintiff's Instruction No. 1." This instruction is as follows:

"The jury are instructed that unless the bridge mentioned in the answer had piers which were parallel with the current of the river, and spans of not less than 160 feet in the clear on each side of the pivot pier, then said bridge is an illegal structure and an unlawful obstruction to the navigation of the Missouri River; and if the jury believe from the evidence that it was not such a bridge, and further believe that the plaintiff's boats, Alice and St. Luke, or either of them, while attempting to pass through the draw of the bridge in charge of pilots exercising usual and ordinary care, struck the draw rest of the bridge, and were thereby damaged, then the jury will find their verdict for the plaintiff as to such boat or boats."

It is said that by sustaining this instruction the Supreme Court of Missouri held that the mere fact that the bridge had not been constructed as required by the statute rendered the Railroad Company liable, irrespective of the question whether the improper construction caused the accident; and it is urged that such holding is erroneous.

This, however, does not present any federal question for the consideration of this court, and therefore we decline to examine into its merits. Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590 [22: 429]; Allen v. McVeigh, 107 U. S. 433 [27: 572].

Upon the only questions in this case cognizable by this court, the judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri is affirmed.

AUGUSTA FRIEDENSTEIN, Claimant of Package of Diamonds, Plff. in Err.,

v.

UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 224-240.)

Declarations of agent, when evidence—objections, when waived—information—allegations in—general verdict.

1. In a suit, brought by the United States, to condemn goods seized as forfeited under the customs revenue laws, declarations in regard to the goods, made by a person having them in possession and offering them for sale, at the time a special agent of the Treasury Department was making an official investigation as to whether they should be seized for forfeiture, were a part of the res gestæ, and admissible in evidence as against the person claiming to be the owner of the goods.

2. Objections to the form of the information, not taken in the court below by demurrer, or exception, or motion in arrest of judgment, or by motion to dismiss, must be regarded as having been waived or cured by the verdict.

3. Informations of seizure for forfeitures are civil proceedings in rem, and the statute providing that no judgment or other proceedings in civil causes shall be arrested or reversed for any defect or want of form is applicable to them.

4. It is not necessary to aver in such an information that the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States; but a finding to that effect is required to be made on the trial under section 16 of the Act of June 22, 1874, chap. 391, 18 Stat. at L. 189.

5. A general verdict for the informants against the claimant, for the condemnation of the goods mentioned in the information, will be supported if any count of the information is good, against objections which are formal, where the Government was not required to elect on which count it claimed a verdict.

[No. 178.]

Argued Feb. 10, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, to review a decree of that court affirming a decree of the District Court, of condemnation of goods, as forfeited under the customs revenue laws. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Leopold Wallach and Edwin B. Smith, for plaintiff in error:

The libel is too defective to found a decree upon.

The Hoppet v. U. S. 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 391–395 (3: 381, 382); The Caroline v. U. S. Id. 500 (3: 418); The Anne v. U. S. Id. 570 (3: 442); U. S. v. 90 Demijohns of Rum, 4 Woods, 637; The Edward, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 269 (4: 88); The Mabey v. Atkins, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 420 (19: 963); U. S. v. Weed, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 68 (18: 538).

The prosecution is quasi criminal.

Boyd v. U. S. 116 U. S. 634 (29: 752); Coffey v. U. S. Id. 436 (29: 684); Fisher v. McGirr, 1 Gray, 27; U. S. v. 3 Trunks, 7 Sawy. 366.

Under previous legislation actual fraud was not necessary to be proved, to sustain a forfeiture for breach of the customs revenue laws.

Sinn v. U. S. 14 Blatchf. 552, 554; U. S. v. McKim, 3 Pittsb. L. J. 155; U. S. v. 2117 Bushels of Malt, 8 Fed. Rep. 224; U. S. v. Curtis, 16 Fed. Rep. 184; U. S. v. Barnes, 6 Ben. 188.

No fraudulent intent is charged.

Cloutman v. Tunison, 1 Sumn. 375; U. S v. Wentworth, 11 Fed. Rep. 54; U. S. v. 1 Oil Painting, 31 Fed. Rep. 881, 882; The Snow Drop, 30 Fed. Rep. 80; The Purissima Concepcion, 24 Fed. Rep. 360; U. S. v. Simmons, 96 U. S. 364 (24: 820); Commonwealth v. Shaw, 7 Met. 56; People v. Lohman, 2 Barb. 218; State v. Card, 34 N. H. 515; Cragin v. Lovell, 109 U. S. 199 (27: 905); U.S. v. Jackson, 104 U. S. 43 (26: 652).

Indictment defective unless intent is averred.

U. S. v. Staats, 49 U. S. 8 How. 44 (12: 981); U. S. v. Jackson, 2 Fed. Rep. 504; U. S. v Corbin, 11 Fed. Rep. 242; People v. Lohman, and State v. Card, supra; Gabe v. State, 6 Ark. 519; Commonwealth v. Morse, 2 Mass. 128.

Whatever is implied in a penal statute must be alleged.

Commonwealth v. Slack, 19 Pick. 304; U. S. v. Brindle, 110 U. S. 694 (28: 288); U. S. v. Noelke, 17 Blatchf. 560; The Hoppet v. U. S. 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 392 (3: 381); Moes v. Riddle, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 357, 358 (3: 124, 125); Commonwealth v. Morse, supra.

Where the law makes fraud an element, it is error to admit evidence of it unless it has been alleged.

Faure v. Martin, 7 N. Y. 218; Addington v. Allen, 11 Wend. 375; Star Steamship Co. v. Mitchell, 1 Abb. Pr. N. S. 396; Noonan v. Lee, 67 U S. 2 Black, 500 (17: 278); Woodcock v. Bennet, 1 Cow. 734; U. S. v. Jackson, and Cragin v. Lovell, supra.

It is not sufficient to set forth the offense in the words of the statute, unless those words of themselves fully, directly and expressly, without any uncertainty or ambiguity, set forth all the elements of the offense intended to be punished.

U. S. v. Carll, 105 U. S. 612 (26: 1135); U. S. v. Simmons, 96 U. S 360 (24: 819); U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542 (23: 588); Commonwealth v. Clifford, 8 Cush. 217; U. S. v. Mills, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 142 (8: 637); U. S. v. 78 Cases Books, 2 Bond, 278; People v. Wilber, 4 Park. Cr. Cas. 21; Commonwealth v. Chase, 125 Mass. 202; Commonwealth v. Miller, 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 480; Pearce v. State, 1 Sneed (Tenn.) 67; Commonwealth v. Thurlow, 24 Pick. 374; Bates v. State, 31 Ind. 74; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. §§ 154, 220, 221; U. S. v. Crosby, 1 Hughes, 454; Given v. Webb, 7 Robt. 65; Scofield v. Whitlegge, 49 N. Y. 261.

Plaintiff can recover only according to his allegation as well as his proofs.

The Rhode Island, Olc. 511; Davis v. Leslie, 1 Abb. Adm. 129; Dunlap, Adm. Pr. 112, 119, 120; State v. Packard, 4 Oreg. 160; State v. Perham, Id. 188; State v. Simpson, 73 N. C. 271; Commonwealth v. Stout, 7 B. Mon. 248; State v. Jackson, 7 Ind. 270; Bates v. State, 31 Ind. 74; Quinn v. State, 35 Ind. 485; State v. Record, 56 Ind. 109; Anthony v. State, 29 Ala. 28; Danner v. State, 54 Ala. 130.

The first count states no particular vessel, but does say it was by some vessel, name unknown.

White v. People, 32 N. Y. 471; People v. White, 55 Barb. 606; State v. Wilson, 30 Conn. 507; U. S. v. Stetson, 3 Wood. & M. 167; Cameron v. State, 13 Ark. 718; Reed v. State, 16 Ark. 502; Blodget v. State, 3 Ind. 404; Stone v. State, 30 Ind. 116; Cheek v. State, 38 Ala. 234, 235; Rex v. Robinson, 1 Holt, N. P. 595; S. C. 3 Eng. C. L. 233; Rex v. Walker, 3 Campb. 264; Commonwealth v. Moore, 11 Cush. 600.

As to the defective allegation of time.

Rex v. Holland, 5 T. R. 607; Roberts v. State, 19 Ala. 526; Sanders v. State, 26 Tex. 119; State v. Slack, 30 Tex. 354; State v. Baker, 34 Me. 52; State v. Hanson, 39 Me. 337.

The averments should exclude the idea of the possibility of the goods having been landed in conformity with law.

State v. Godfrey, 24 Me. 232; State v. Philbrick, 31 Me. 401; People v. Gates, 13 Wend. 311; U. S. v. Britton, 107 U. S. 670 (27: 525).

The second count states no offense.

U. S. v. Reese, 92 U. S. 221 (23: 565); U. S. v. Cruikshank, Id. 542 (23: 588); U. S. v. Fox, 95 U. S. 672, 673 (24: 539, 540).

It cannot be presumed, in the face of the record, that an illegal seizure was made, or that some act was done that did not amount to a seizure.

Miller v. U. S. 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 294 (20: 141); Gould v. Ray, 18 Wend. 637; Winter v. U. S. Hemp. 344; Watson v. Dunlap, 2 Cranch, C. C. 14; Lincoln v. Fitch, 42 Me. 467; Hartley v. Hartley, 8 Met. (Ky.) 60; Owen v. Jones, 14 Ark. 502.

When the want of jurisdiction is apparent upon the face of the declaration, the defendant may take advantage of such omission at any time before judgment.

Donaldson v. Hazen, Hemp. 425; Hope Ins. Co. v. Boardman, 9 U S. 5 Cranch, 57 (3: 36); Abercrombie v. Dupuis, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 343 (2: 129); Mollan v. Torrance, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 537 (6: 154); Jackson v. Twentyman, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 136 (7: 374); Lanning v. Dolph, 4 Wash. 628; Harris v. Harris, 10 Wis. 467.

Mrs. Sussman's agency was terminated by the forcible taking from her of these diamonds. With the termination of the agency ends all the power of the agent to affect the principal by declarations.

Story, Ag. § 134; Dunlap, Paley's Ag. 270; Northwestern Union Packet Co. v. Clough, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 540, 541 (22: 408); American L. Ins. Co. v. Mahone, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 157 (22: 595); Luby v. Hudson River R. R. Co. 17 N. Y. 133; Wilson v. Bowden, 118 Mass. 422.

Mrs. Sussman's statements must be taken together.

U. S. v. Jewelry, 13 Blatchf. 60; Dodge v. Freedman's Sav. & T. Co. 93 U. S. 379 (23: 920); Whetmore v. Murdock, 3 Wood. & M. 385; Many v. Jagger, 1 Blatchf. 372; Millick v. Peterson, 2 Wash. 31; Sherman v. Delaware L. & W. R. R. Co. 9 Cent. Rep. 432, 106 N. Y. 546, 547.

She could not prevent any sale by disparaging or destroying the title of her principal by any statement of a past event.

Bynum v. Southern Pump & Pipe Co. 63 Ala. 462; Henry v. Northern Bank, Id. 537; Grimshaw v. Paul, 76 Ill. 164.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for the United States:

The verdict cures every defect.

Lincoln Twp. v. Cambria Iron Co. 103 U. S. 415 (26: 519); Confiscation Cases, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 104 (22: 322); The Palmyra, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 12 (6: 534); Stockton v. Bishop, 45 U. S. 4 How. 167 (11: 923); The Emily and The Caroline, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 381 (6: 116).

Everything required to warrant the forfeiture was passed upon and found by the jury.

U. S. v. Curtis, 16 Fed. Rep. 190.

As to the continuity of the several steps resulting in a seizure, see Four Packages v. U. S. 97 U. S. 411 (24: 1031).

In case the information in a cause should be found deficient, and the evidence sufficient to show breach of the law, the practice has been to remand it to the court below for amendment.

The Caroline v. U. S. 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 500 (3: 418); The Edward, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 261 (4: 86); Garland v. Davis, 45 U. S. 4 How. 131 (11: 907); U. S. v. Weed, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 62 (18: 531).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit brought by the United States, in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, to condemn forty-three diamonds, seized as forfeited under the customs revenue laws. The information contains five counts.

The first count is based on sections 2872 and 2874 of the Revised Statutes, and alleges that the goods were brought in a vessel, name unknown, from ———, a foreign port or place, and were, on the —— day of ———, 1882, unladen and delivered from such vessel within the port and collection district of the City of New York, without a permit from the collector and naval officer for such unlading or delivery, contrary to those two sections, and that the value of the goods, according to the highest market price of the same at the said port and district, amounts to $400.

The second count is based on section 3066, and avers that the collector, having cause to suspect a concealment of goods in the building No. 66 Nassau Street, in the City of New York, did, on the 27th of February, 1883, with due warrant therefor, enter the said building, in the daytime, and there search for such goods, and did then and there find the same concealed, and did seize and secure the same for trial, and that the duties had not been paid or secured to be paid thereon, contrary to said section.

The third count is based on section 2802, and avers that the said goods, being articles subject to duty, were, on the 27th of February, 1883, found in the baggage of a person arriving in the United States, and were not, at the time of making entry for such baggage, mentioned to the collector before whom such entry was made by the person making the same, contrary to said section.

The fourth count is based on section 2809, and avers that the said goods were, on the —— day of ———, one thousand eight hundred and ——, imported into the United States in the vessel, name unknown, belonging in whole or in part to a citizen or citizens, inhabitant or inhabitants of the United States, from a foreign port or place, and were not included in the manifest, and belonged or were consigned to the master, mate, officers, and crew of such vessel, contrary to said section.

The fifth count is based on section 3082, and avers that on or about the —— day of ———, one thousand eight hundred and ——, an unknown person did fraudulently and knowingly import and bring into the United States, and assist in so doing, the said goods, contrary to law, and did receive, conceal, buy, sell, and in some manner facilitate the transportation, concealment, and sale of such goods after their importation, knowing the same to have been imported contrary to law, contrary to said section.

One Augusta Friedenstein put in a claim to the goods as owner, and answered the information, denying the forfeiture. The case was tried by a jury in the district court, which rendered "a verdict for the informants and against the claimant for the condemnation of the goods mentioned in the information, and that the acts complained of therein were done with intent to defraud the United States." A decree of condemnation was entered thereon, and the claimant took the case by writ of error to the circuit court, which affirmed the decree of the district court and remanded the case thereto for execution of the decree. The claimant has brought the case to this court by a writ of error.

The bill of exceptions shows the following state of facts in regard to the seizure of the goods: On the 27th of February, 1883, one Brackett, a special agent of the Treasury Department, went with two subordinates to the store of Goldsmith & Kuhn, No. 66 Nassau Street, where they found a man and a woman and the package of diamonds. The woman was a Mrs. Sussman. When Brackett reached the store, the diamonds were in the possession of Goldsmith & Kuhn. They told Brackett that Mrs. Sussman had handed the diamonds to them. Mr. Kuhn, who was behind the counter, had the package and handed it to Brackett upon his demand for it. Brackett took it, and requested Mrs. Sussman to accompany him to the custom house, as he wished to make some inquiries about the diamonds. He took them to the custom house, Mrs. Sussman accompanying him. In answer to a question put to Brackett by the counsel for the claimant, on his examination as a witness, as to when he took the diamonds, he said: "I took them at the store and took her down to the custom house with them. If her explanation was satisfactory I did not intend to seize them." The package was opened at the custom house, and the diamonds were examined and appraised, and were then placed in the hands of the officer in charge of the seizure room at the custom house. Brackett was then asked by the district attorney: "When and where did you make the seizure of these diamonds?" To this question the claimant objected, as calling for a conclusion of law; but the court overruled the objection, and the claimant excepted. The witness replied: "The seizure of the diamonds was made at the custom house in this city after I was through with my investigation."

It appeared that after Brackett and Mrs. Sussman arrived at the custom house, and before the package was there opened, a conversation took place there between him and her. The bill of exceptions says:

"The witness Brackett was recalled, and asked this question by the district attorney: 'Now state the conversation between Mrs. Sussman and yourself which occurred prior to the actual seizure of those diamonds in the custom house, and on the same day when she went in company with you to the custom house with the diamonds.'

"The claimant objected to this question, because Mrs. Sussman's statement, under the circumstances and at that time, could not affect the claimant; also, because the question involved a conclusion of law as to the time when 'actual seizure' took place. The court overruled the objection, admitting the question, and the claimant excepted.

"The witness Brackett, in reply to this inquiry, testified as follows: 'Well, I asked Mrs. Sussman from whom she got the diamonds. She said they belonged to another party, but she could not give the name of the party, neither would she give her own proper name. I told her, 'If you can give a satisfactory explanation, and if these goods have been brought into the port properly, and duties paid, the United States Government don't want them; why do you object?' 'Well,' she says, 'I can't mention the name of the lady to whom these stones belong.' Well, she finally said to me, after some twenty minutes, perhaps, of conversation—there were two other parties in the room, Mr. Cohen sitting outside, and the door open—she said, 'I would like to see you in private.' 'Well,' said I, 'these are my offices here; this is all private—these offices.' 'No,' said she, 'I want to speak to you alone.' Well, I went into the adjoining room with her, and she then said to me, 'These diamonds belong to a lady, as I said before, whose name I won't give. The duty has not been paid on these diamonds. I am ready to go now before the collector and make arrangements to have the duties paid.' 'Well,' said I, 'I cannot do that, madam.' 'Well,' she says, 'I am ready; it can't be over $400.' I then went back to the room and told her that I could not make any such arrangement with her as that; the diamonds were then [not?] under seizure; then I made up my mind to seize them after this conversation. She said the duty would not be over $400; she was ready to go before the collector and make arrangements to pay that duty.' The witness also testified that he sent for Gen. Palmer, and that Mrs. Sussman reiterated to Gen. Palmer what she had said to him, the witness.

"To further sustain the issues the Government then called George W. Palmer, who, after testifying that he was the deputy collector in charge of the seventh division or law department of the custom house, proceeded, under the objection of claimant's counsel, which objection was overruled and an exception to such ruling duly taken, to give in detail a conversation which he had with Mrs. Sussman at that time, of a similar nature to that testified to by Captain Brackett.

"It was also proved for the Government, and acknowledged by Mrs. Sussman, when on the stand on behalf of the claimant, that she, Mrs. Sussman, had been to Europe and had returned from thence and landed at the Port of New York in the latter part of August, 1882."

The ground urged against the admissibility of the conversation with Mrs. Sussman is that, she not being the owner of the diamonds, evidence as to her declarations was not admissible in derogation of the title to them, especially because such declarations were made after she had ceased to have the custody of them; and that it was error to permit Brackett to swear that, although he took physical possession of the property at 66 Nassau Street, before the conversation with Mrs. Sussman, he did not make the actual seizure until he made it at the custom house, after the conversation with Mrs. Sussman.

But we see no objection to the evidence. It is plain, on the testimony, that the goods were not seized for forfeiture until after the conversation, and that the seizure took place at the custom house, after the investigation and examination there, and did not take place at 66 Nassau Street. See Four Packages v. U. S. 97 U. S. 404, 411 [24:1081]. The second count of the information does not allege that the seizure took place at 66 Nassau Street. Its fair import is that the collector, with a warrant, entered those premises and searched for the goods and there found them, and that he afterwards seized and secured them for trial.

Mrs. Sussman, as appears from other evidence, in the bill of exceptions, had carried the diamonds to the store of Goldsmith & Kuhn for the purpose of selling them to that firm. If they really belonged to the claimant, they had been put by her into the custody of Mrs. Sussman, for the purpose of selling them. Under these circumstances, Mrs. Sussman's declarations to Brackett, in regard to the goods, while he was making an official investigation and examination as to whether they should be seized for forfeiture, were part of the res gestæ, and admissible in evidence as against the person claiming to be the owner of the goods in a suit in rem for their forfeiture. It was competent for the claimant to contradict the facts stated to Brackett by Mrs. Sussman, in regard to the diamonds; but the minutes of the trial show that although Mrs. Sussman was examined as a witness for the claimant, the claimant herself did not testify as a witness.

We see no objection to the evidence shown by the bill of exceptions to have been admitted under the exceptions of the claimant.

The claimant raises a point as to the sufficiency of the information. The record shows a full compliance with the statute in regard to the finding by the jury that the acts complained of in the information were done with intent to defraud the United States. It does not show that any motion in arrest of judgment was made; nor that any motion was made on the part of the claimant to dismiss the cause for any defect in the information. It is stated in the minutes of trial, which are contained in a paper aside from the bill of exceptions and forming no part of it, that, after the evidence for the United States had been put in, the counsel for the claimant moved to dismiss the case, and the motion was denied; but it is not stated on what ground the motion was made. Under these circumstances, any defect in the information which could have been availed of by demurrer, or by exception, or by a motion to dismiss at the trial, made on the ground of such defect, or by a motion in arrest of judgment, must be regarded as having been waived, or as having been cured by the verdict. Coffey v. U. S. 116 U. S. 436 [29:684].

Among the objections covered by the above observations are those to the first count, that it does not name any vessel, that it does not name the foreign port or place or state that its name was unknown, that it does not state any day or month of the unlading, and that it does not state that there was then a naval officer at the port of unlading; that to the second count, that it does not allege that the goods were dutiable or imported; those to the third count, that it does not name the person arriving in the United States, nor allege that his name was unknown, nor when he arrived, nor at what port he arrived, nor who was the collector, nor that these things were unknown, nor, affirmatively, that any entry was made of the baggage in which the goods were found; those to the fourth count, that it avers no day, month, or year, no port, domestic, or foreign, no vessel, no owner, no consignee, and does not affirmatively state the existence of any manifest in which the goods should have been included; those to the fifth count, that it does not name time, place, person, or circumstance in regard to the importation, that it is bad for duplicity, because the importation is distinct from the subsequent dealing with the imported goods, and that it does not state what the illegality was in the importation.

This is a civil cause. In Snyder v. U. S. 112 U. S. 216 [28:697], it is said that informations under the revenue laws for the forfeiture of goods, seeking no judgment of fine or imprisonment against any person, are civil actions, although so far in the nature of criminal proceedings that a general verdict on several counts in an information is upheld if one count is good. This latter rule was also applied in Locke v. U. S. 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 339 [3:364], in Clifton v. U. S. 45 U. S. 4 How. 242, 250 [11:957, 961], and in Coffey v. U. S. 116 U. S. 427, 433, 434, 436, 442 [29:681, 683, 684, 686]. In The Palmyra, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 1, 12 [6:531, 534], it is said that informations of seizure for forfeitures "are deemed to be civil proceedings in rem," and the existence of Rule 22 of the Rules of Practice adopted by this court for the courts of the United States, in admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, on the instance side of the court, prescribing the contents of informations on seizures for a breach of the laws of the United States, shows that such seizure cases are regarded as civil suits. The authority to make the Rule was conferred by section 6 of the Act of August 23, 1842, chap. 188, 5 Stat. at L. 518, which relates wholly to the making of rules in suits at common law and in admiralty and equity. The case of U. S. v. Three Parcels of Embroidery, 3 Ware, 75, relied on by the plaintiff in error, is distinguishable from the present case. There the statute required, in order to forfeit goods, that they should not have been invoiced according to their actual cost, and that that should have occurred with a design to evade the duties thereon; and it was held, on a motion in arrest of judgment, that an information was bad which only alleged the making of an entry with a design to evade the duties, and did not allege the making of a false invoice with such design.

Section 954 of the Revised Statutes, which was always in force as section 32 of the Act of September 24, 1789, chap. 20, 1 Stat. at L. 91, provides, that no judgment or other proceedings in civil causes, in any court of the United States, shall be arrested or reversed for any defect or want of form; but such court shall proceed and give judgment according as the right of the cause and matter in law shall appear to it, without regarding any such defect or want of form, except those which, in cases of demurrer, the party demurring specially sets down, together with his demurrer, as the cause thereof. This statutory provision applies to many of the objections urged to the information in the present case. These and the other objections mentioned were not taken in the court below by demurrer or exception or motion in arrest of judgment, and there has been a verdict of condemnation. As was said in Lincoln Twp. v. Cambria Iron Co. 103 U. S. 412, 415 [26:518, 519], if the issue joined be such as necessarily required on the trial proof of the facts defectively stated or omitted, and without which it is not to be presumed that the judge would have directed the jury to give the verdict, such defect or omission is cured. See also Stockton v. Bishop, 45 U. S. 4 How. 155, 167 [11:918, 923].

There is, however, one objection made to the information which it is proper to notice, as the question is an important one, and arises now for the first time in this court. It is provided as follows by section 16 of the Act of June 22, 1874, chap. 391, 18 Stat. at L. 189: "That in all actions, suits, and proceedings, in any court of the United States now pending, or hereafter commenced or prosecuted, to enforce or declare the forfeiture of any goods, wares, or merchandise, or to recover the value thereof, or any other sum alleged to be forfeited by reason of any violation of the provisions of the customs revenue laws, or any of such provisions, in which action, suit, or proceeding, an issue or issues of fact shall have been joined, it shall be the duty of the court, on the trial thereof, to submit to the jury, as a distinct and separate proposition, whether the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States, and to require, upon such proposition, a special finding by such jury; or, if such issues be tried by the court without a jury, it shall be the duty of the court to pass upon and decide such proposition as a distinct and separate finding of fact; and in such cases, unless intent to defraud shall be so found, no fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be imposed."

It is contended by the claimant that it is necessary to aver, in an information filed since that statute, that the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States; and that, as no such averment is found in the information in this case, the judgment cannot be supported. But we are of opinion that such averment is not necessary. The section relates only to the duty of the court, on a trial by a jury or a trial without a jury, to require or make a special and separate finding as to the actual intention to defraud the United States. This is to be done in every suit of the character specified in the section, in which "an issue or issues of fact shall have been joined;" and the provision applies to suits then pending as well as to those thereafter to be commenced. The fair meaning of the section is that the issue or issues of fact shall have been framed, or shall be framed, in the usual manner theretofore in use. No one of the sections on which the counts of this information are founded prescribes any intent to defraud as an element of the forfeiture denounced in it; and if section 16 of the Act of 1874 is complied with, as it was in this case, at the trial of the cause before the jury, that is all that is required. We do not concur in the view taken in U. S. v. 90 Demijohns of Rum, 4 Woods, 637, so far as such view conflicts with our opinion herein.

Besides, with the knowledge on the part of the claimant and her counsel of the necessity that the United States should prove on the trial that the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States, and that the jury should so find, or no forfeiture could be imposed, it is impossible for the claimant to allege that she did not come to the trial with the understanding that such actual intention was matter to which proof, on the trial, was to be addressed, although there was no allegation to that effect in the information.

It is also objected that the judgment of the district court recites, as its basis, only the verdict of the jury, that it found for the United States, condemning the goods, and that it does not recite the finding by the jury that the acts complained of in the information were done with intent to defraud the United States. But we think that this was not necessary. As it appears by the minutes of the trial that the jury made the finding of the intent to defraud required by the 16th section of the Act of 1874, as a necessary condition precedent to the imposition of the forfeiture, the judgment of forfeiture is justified.

The verdict was a general one, for the informants and against the claimant, for the condemnation of the goods mentioned in the information, and is supported, if any count of the information is good, against the objections now made. Clifton v. U. S. 45 U. S. 4 How. 242, 250 [11:957, 961]; Snyder v. U. S. 112 U. S. 216 [28:697]; Coffey v. U. S. 116 U. S. 427, 433, 436, 442 [29:681, 683, 684, 686]. The bill of exceptions does not state that it sets forth all the testimony given on the trial, and the names of witnesses on both sides are given in the minutes of the trial as having been sworn whose testimony does not appear in the bill of exceptions. There is nothing to show that any motion was made by the claimant that the Government should elect on which of the five counts it claimed a verdict. The third count alleges that the diamonds were articles subject to duty, and is a good count.

On the whole case, we see no error in the record, and the decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Bradley was not present at the argument of this case and took no part in its decision.

Mr. Justice Field, dissenting:

I am not able to concur in the judgment of the court in this case. The proceeding is a libel of information for the forfeiture of forty-three diamonds by reason of alleged violations of provisions of the customs revenue statute. The several acts for which a forfeiture is sought are not alleged to have been committed with any actual intent to defraud the United States, and yet the Statute of June 22, 1874, declares that in all actions, suits, and proceedings then pending or thereafter commenced to enforce the forfeiture of any goods, wares, or merchandise, or to recover the value thereof, or any other sum alleged to be forfeited, by reason of any violation of the provisions of the customs revenue laws, in which issues have been joined, "It shall be the duty of the court on the trial thereof to submit to the jury, as a distinct and separate proposition, whether the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States, and to require upon such proposition a special finding by such jury; or if such issues be tried by the court without a jury, it shall be the duty of the court to pass upon and decide such proposition as a distinct and separate finding of fact; and in such cases, unless intent to defraud shall be so found, no fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be imposed." 18 Stat. at L. 189, § 16.

The statute thus makes the actual intent to defraud the gist of the offense, and an essential element of it, without proof of which no forfeiture can be adjudged. What must be found ought, according to well settled rules of pleading, to be averred. In every suit for penalties or forfeitures what must be proved to entitle the complaining party to judgment against either person or property must be averred in the libel; and its omission will not be cured by any verdict in the case. Defects in matters of substance are not thus cured. U. S. v. Hess, 124 U. S. 488 [ante, 516]. It may be that libels of information for the forfeiture of goods do not require such fullness and particularity of averment as an information for the punishment of a criminal offense, but there is no decision, or even dictum, I have been able to find, that an entire omission of all averment, as to the essential fact to be established, to justify a forfeiture or conviction, is not fatal. If any different rule has prevailed in any portions of the country, I do not think it should be sustained. This singular result would follow: that a defendant or claimant, admitting all the allegations of the libel, would escape forfeiture or punishment, for without proof of something not alleged, neither could be imposed.

In the case of The Hoppet v. U. S., decided as far back as 1813, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 389, 393 [3:380, 382], a libel of information was held insufficient which contained a general reference to the provisions of the statute alleged to have been violated. And the court, speaking by Chief Justice Marshall, said that "A rule so essential to justice and fair proceeding as that which requires a substantial statement of the offense upon which the prosecution is founded, must be the rule of every court where justice is the object, and cannot be satisfied by a general reference to the provisions of a statute." It was accordingly held in that case that, the information being defective in that respect, the defect was not cured by evidence of the facts omitted to be averred, the court stating that "The accusation on which the prosecution is founded should state the crime which is to be proved and state such a crime as would justify the judgment to be pronounced. The reasons for this rule are: 1. That the party accused may know against what charge to direct his evidence. 2. That the court may see with judicial eyes that the fact alleged to have been committed is an offense against the laws, and may also discern the punishment annexed by law to the specific offense. These reasons apply to prosecutions in courts of admiralty with as much force as to prosecutions in other courts. It is therefore a maxim of the civil law that a decree must be secundum allegata as well as secundum probata. It would seem to be a maxim essential to the due administration of justice in all courts."

In the U. S. v. Three Parcels of Embroidery, 3 Ware, 75, it was held that the omission in a libel of information for the forfeiture of those articles for violation of the 66th section of the Collection Act of 1799, 1 Stat. at L. chap. 22, p. 627, to allege that the goods were falsely invoiced with a design to evade the duties was a fatal defect in the proceeding, and was not cured by the verdict of the jury. In considering the omission in that case in arrest of the judgment on the ground that the offense was not set out in the information with that clearness and distinctness which is required by the rules of pleading and practice, the court said: "It was long ago held by the Supreme Court that an information to recover a penalty under the Collection Act of 1799 is in the nature of a criminal proceeding. Locke v. U. S. 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 339 [3: 364]; Clifton v. U. S. 45 U S. 4 How. 242 [11: 957]. The description of the offense for which the penalty is demanded must have the same kind and degree of certainty that is ordinarily required in other criminal proceedings; and although it may be true, as is argued by the district attorney, that in the practice of our courts all that technical accuracy of description may not be required, which is held to be essential in indictments, and even in the exchequer practice in England, and that niceties need not be observed which rest on dry precedent, the reason of which has either ceased to exist or cannot now be discovered, it is still indispensable that every circumstance constituting the offense be clearly and distinctly set out in plain and direct averments."

The language of the 66th section of the Act of 1799, under which the libel in that case was filed, declared "that if any goods, wares or merchandise, of which entry shall have been made in the office of a collector, shall not be invoiced according to the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation, with a design to evade the duties thereupon, or any part thereof, all such goods, wares, or merchandise, or the value thereof, to be recovered of the person making the entry, shall be forfeited." And the court held that from this language three facts must concur to complete the offense. First, an entry must be made of the goods. Second, they must be invoiced not according to their actual cost. Third, they must be invoiced with a design to evade the duties thereupon, or upon some part thereof. And that each of these facts must be found in order to entitle the plaintiffs to a verdict, and all of them being necessary to constitute the offense, each should be plainly and distinctly charged in the information. It was charged that the entry of the goods was made with a design to evade the duties, but it was nowhere distinctly and plainly charged that a false invoice was made with that design; and the court said: "Under this section of the statute it appears to me that this design in making the invoice is an essential part of the offense. If it is so, the rules of pleading require that it be distinctly alleged. If it be said that the jury, under the direction of the court, found the fact, it is still true that, by the strict rules of pleading in penal clauses, the plaintiff can recover only according to his allegation, as well as his proofs," and the judgment was arrested. This case, it is true, comes from a district court, and is therefore not a controlling authority here; but the great learning of the district judge, and the ability which marked all his opinions, have deservedly entitled them to great weight and consideration in all the federal courts; and the doctrine declared is sustained by a multitude of decisions.

Much stress is laid upon the fact that an information or other proceeding for the forfeiture of goods for a violation of provisions of the customs revenue Acts is in form a civil action; but I do not perceive that this fact changes the necessity of alleging, as well as proving, the material facts upon which alone a forfeiture can be adjudged. Though the same strictness in pleading is not required in civil as in criminal actions, in neither can that which is essential to be proved be omitted to be averred. As Chief Justice Marshall indicates in the quotation above, adherence to this rule would seem to be essential to the due administration of justice in all courts; and it may be added in all proceedings before them, civil or criminal, upon which their judgment is asked.

In the recent case of Boyd v. U. S. 116 U. S. 634 [29: 752] this court held "that proceedings instituted for the purpose of declaring the forfeiture of a man's property by reason of offenses committed by him, though they may be civil in form, are in their nature criminal."

Nor do I perceive that the question of pleading is affected by the fact that the statute, requiring the fraudulent intent to be proved, applied as well to pending actions and proceedings as to such as might be subsequently commenced. That fact, it is true, might in some cases have compelled an amendment of the pleadings in pending actions and proceedings to make their allegations embrace the essential element of the offense for which the forfeiture was sought; and such an amendment, where a fraudulent intent was not already alleged, was, as I think, contemplated. I cannot believe that Congress intended, by making the law applicable to pending cases, to change a long and well established rule of pleading, one founded upon manifest principles of justice, so as to allow a conviction of an offense upon which a forfeiture could be adjudged, without averring the fraudulent intent upon proof of which alone such forfeiture could be claimed.

A jury should not be allowed to find as to any material fact not alleged. Evidence upon such a fact would be evidence upon something out of the case presented. Even in ordinary civil cases such evidence is not admissible. Much more strictly should the rule be enforced in penal cases like this one. In U. S. v. 90 Demijohns of Rum, 4 Woods, 639, the libel of information was for the forfeiture of those goods for a violation of provisions of the customs revenue law. It made no allegation of actual intent to defraud the United States, and it was held that the libel was fatally defective. Referring to section 16 of the Act of June 22, 1874, the court said: "I think it perfectly clear that this section makes intent to defraud the United States a necessary condition to the forfeiture of any goods, etc., for the violation of the customs revenue laws. A libel of information, therefore, which undertakes to state a case for the forfeiture of goods should aver an intent to defraud the United States. Without such averment no case for forfeiture is made. The claimant might well decline to answer a libel in which such averment was wanting, trusting to the court to dismiss the libel for want of necessary averments, when it came to hear the case ex parte, and to adjudge thereon as to law and justice should appertain. * * * The libel must set up all the facts necessary to a forfeiture. If it fails to do this it is the duty of the court to dismiss it, whether issue is joined or not."

Concurring fully in these views, I dissent from the judgment of the court.

ARTHUR ORIGET, Claimant, etc., Plff. in Err.,

v.

UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 240-247.)

Initials, when not signature—violation of Revenue Act—forfeiture of goods.

1. The initials "A. B." cannot be regarded as the signature of a judge, or as a sufficient authentication of a bill of exceptions, or as sufficient evidence of its allowance by the judge or the court.

2. In a suit in rem for forfeiture of merchandise for violation of the 12th section of the Revenue Act of June 22, 1874, a finding of a jury "that the goods were brought in with intent to defraud the United States" is a sufficient finding that the acts alleged in the counts founded on section 12 were done with such intent to defraud.

3. Under said section 12, the forfeiture of the goods for the causes therein mentioned accrues to the United States on the commission or omission of the acts specified, and is no part of the punishment for the offense therein mentioned; the goods are to be forfeited irrespective of any criminal prosecution.

[No. 186.]

Argued Feb. 16, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, to review a decree of that court affirming a decree of the District Court condemning goods as forfeited to the United States for violation of the customs revenue laws. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stanley, Clarke, and Edwin B. Smith, for claimant:

Sections 2839, 2864, R. S., are repealed by the Act of June 22, 1874.

U. S. v. Auffmordt, 19 Fed. Rep. 893-909; affirmed in 122 U. S. 197 (30: 1182).

It is only similar, contemporaneous fraudulent transactions that are admissible, as tending to support the charge of fraudulent intent as affecting the subject of litigation.

Clarke v. White, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 198 (9: 1053); Castle v. Bullard, 64 U. S. 23 How. 186 (16: 428); Lincoln v. Claflin, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 138 (19: 109).

The mere amendment of the April invoices would not imply fraud, even if unexplained.

Elizabethport Mfg. Co. v. Campbell, 13 Abb. Pr. 92.

The invoices, as originally presented, must not only have been false but fraudulently so.

Hall v. Naylor, 18 N. Y. 588; Rev. Stat. § 2900.

The United States is subject to the same rules of law and evidence that affect any other party.

U. S. v. Throckmorton, 4 Sawy. 43; 98 U. S. 61 (25: 93); U. S. v. White, 17 Fed. Rep. 561; 9 Sawy. 125; U. S. v. Beebe, 17 Fed. Rep. 40, 41; 4 McCrary, 12; U. S. v. Smith, 94 U. S. 217 (24: 115); Clark v. U. S. 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 546 (18: 917); Smoot's Case, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 47 (21: 110); Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. U. S. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 592 (21: 715); U. S. v. Barker, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 559 (6: 728); Mitchel v. U. S. 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 711 (9: 283); Pierce v. U. S. 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 675 (19: 178); The Siren, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 154 (19: 130); U. S. v. Bostwick, 94 U. S. 66 (24: 66); U. S. v. State Bank, 96 U. S. 36 (24: 648); State v. Taylor, 28 La. Ann. 462; State v. Ober, 34 La. Ann. 361; Union Depot Co. v. St. Louis, 76 Mo. 393.

The United States is bound by the same principles as individuals.

Cooke v. U. S. 91 U. S. 398 (23: 243); U. S. v. Barker, supra; U. S. v. Behan, 110 U. S. 345-6 (28: 170, 171); Gilbert v. U. S. 1 Ct. Cl. 37; S. C. 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 358 (19: 303).

It is estopped to deny regular action of its designated agent.

Shirley, Lead. Cas. (Am. ed. 1888); Oneale v. Thornton, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 53 (3: 150); Alvord v. U. S. 8 Ct. Cl. 369.

What is an estoppel in pais.

Dezell v. Odell, 3 Hill. 219; Hill v. Epley, 31 Pa. 334; Welland Canal Co. v. Hathaway, 8 Wend. 483; Niven v. Belknap, 2 Johns. 589; Gregg v. Von Phul, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 281 (17: 587); Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Exch. 663; Roe v. Jerome, 18 Conn. 153; Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & El. 469; Gregg v. Wells, 10 Ad. & El. 90; Frost v. Saratoga Mut. Ins. Co. 5 Denio, 157; Swain v. Seamens, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 274 (19: 560); Bronson v. Chappell, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 682 (20: 437).

He who leads another to do what he would not otherwise have done shall not subject such person to loss or injury by disappointing the expectations upon which he acted.

Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 580 (25: 619); Baker v. Humphrey, 101 U. S. 499 (25: 1067); Wallace v. Loomis, 97 U. S. 155 (24: 898); Fleischmann v. Stern, 90 N. Y. 115, 116, citing Roe v. Jerome, 18 Conn. 138; O'Leary v. N. Y. Board of Education, 93 N. Y. 5; Curnen v. Mayor of N. Y. 79 N. Y. 514; Clarke v. Clarke, 6 Esp. 61.

An estoppel is to preclude one from setting up as a fact that which is contrary to what he has once deliberately accepted, and acted upon, as true, and permitted the other party to act upon as true.

Voorhees v. Olmstead, 3 Hun, 754; Voorhis v.

Olmstead, 66 N. Y. 113; Continental Nat. Bank v. National Bank, 50 N. Y. 581, 582; Blair v. Wait, 69 N. Y. 116; Gillespie v. Carpentier, 25 How. Pr. 207; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 208.

Admissions are conclusive.

Hawley v. Griswold, 42 Barb. 23; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 207; Calanan v. McClure, 47 Barb. 210; Banks v. American Tract Society, 4 Sandf. Ch. 438.

Mr. Origet had the right to add whatever he pleased to the invoice value of his entry.

Rev. Stat. § 2900; Manhattan Gas Light Co. v. Maxwell, 2 Blatchf. 405; Marriott v. Brune, 50 U. S. 9 How. 619, 685 (13: 282, 289).

If these April invoices were false the articles specified therein were forfeited.

U. S. v. Auffmordt, 19 Fed. Rep. 901; Caldwell v. U. S. 49 U. S. 8 How. 366 (12: 1115); U. S. v. 100 Barrels of Distilled Spirits, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 44 (20: 815); U. S. v. York St. Flax Spinning Co. 17 Blatchf. 140; U. S. v. Cigars, 18 Fed. Rep. 147.

The United States is estopped by this act of its agent.

U. S. v. White, 17 Fed. Rep. 565; Mills v. Hoffman, 92 N. Y. 182, 191.

The very act to which the collector knowingly assented is sought to be proved against us.

McAleer v. McMurray, 58 Pa. 135; Douglass v. Mitchell, 35 Pa. 446; Wheelton v. Hardisty, 8 El. & Bl. 232; Kerr v. Wonderlich, 8 Cent. Rep. 422.

Evidence showing previous good character should have been received.

Burton v. Driggs, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 136 (22: 302); 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 98, 55; People v. Rector, 19 Wend. 569; Carter v. People, 2 Hill, 317; Lewis v. State, 35 Ala. 380; Prentiss v. Roberts, 49 Me. 137, 138; Isler v. Dewey, 71 N. C. 14; State v. Roe, 12 Vt. 93; George v. Pilcher, 28 Gratt. 299.

Where character is attacked by extrinsic facts, the party so attacked may repel the assault by like evidence.

Stacy v. Graham, 14 N. Y. 492; People v. Hulse, 3 Hill, 309; Paine v. Tilden, 20 Vt. 554; Hadjo v. Gooden, 18 Ala. 718; State v. Cherry, 68 N. C. 495; March v. Harrell, 1 Jones, L. 329; Richmond v. Richmond, 10 Yerg. 343; People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 195.

The verdict departs from the issue.

Patterson v. U. S. 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 225 (4: 225); McFerran v. Taylor, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 270 (2: 436); Chesapeake Ins. Co. v. Stark, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 278 (3: 220); U. S. v. Buzzo, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 128, 129 (21: 813); Miller v. People, 25 Hun, 474.

The error is palpable upon the record.

Suydam v. Williamson, 61 U. S. 20 How. 427 (15: 978); England v. Gebhardt, 112 U. S. 505 (28: 812); Clinton v. Missouri P. R. Co. 122 U. S. 474 (30: 1214); Casey v. Dwyre, 15 Hun, 153; Clay v. State, 43 Ala. 350; State v. Custer, 65 N. C. 339; Barnes v. Williams, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 416 (6: 508); Pensacola Ice Co. v. Perry, 120 U. S. 319 (30: 663); Prentice v. Zane, 49 U. S. 8 How. 484 (12: 1166); Graham v. Bayne, 59 U. S. 18 How. 63 (15: 267); Hodges v. Easton, 106 U. S. 408 (27: 169).

No forfeiture can be decreed.

The Purissima Concepcion, 24 Fed. Rep. 360.

An importation may be complete without an entry.

U. S. v. Arnold, 1 Gall. 354; Arnold v. U. S. 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 104 (3: 671); U. S. v. Vowell, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 368 (3: 128); Meredith v. U. S. 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 494 (10: 262.

The verdict, by finding some intent to defraud in the importation, negatives intent to defraud in the subsequent entry.

1 Chit. Cr. L. 645; Clay v. State, and State v. Custer, supra; Settle v. Alison, 8 Ga. 208, [7]; Biggs v. Barry, 2 Curt. 261.

A special verdict must contain all the facts necessary to sustain a judgment.

Casey v. Dwyre, 15 Hun, 153; Seward v. Jackson, 8 Cow. 413; Hill v. Covell, 1 N. Y. 522; Langley v. Warner, 3 N. Y. 329; Henderson v. Allen, 1 Hen. & M. 249; Miller v. State, 4 Tex. App. 251; State v. Stewart, 91 N. C. 566, Tancred v. Christy, 12 Mees. & W. 323.

The verdict is irresponsive.

Sage v. Evins, 32 La. Ann. 1271; State v. Peters, 37 La. Ann. 730; State v. Blue, 84 N. C. 807; Twigg v. Treacy, 104 Pa. 498; Clay v. State, 43 Ala. 350; State v. Custer, 65 N. C. 339; The Purissima Concepcion, 24 Fed. Rep. 358.

Importer had the benefit of the locus pœnitentiæ.

U. S. v. 28 Packages of Pins, Gilp. 306; U. S. v. Riddle, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 311 (3: 110); The Robert Edwards, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 187 (5: 238); Lewey v. U. S. 15 Blatchf. 2; U. S. v. Diamonds, 30 Fed. Rep. 364; Patterson v. U. S. 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 225 (4: 225).

The judgment is wrong, as the verdict now stands.

Allen v. St. Louis Bank, 120 U. S. 40 (30: 578); Fort Scott v. Hickman, 112 U. S. 150 (28: 686); Clinton v. Missouri P. R. Co. 122 U. S. 474 (30: 1214).

Judgment should have been given for the claimant.

Commonwealth v. Grimes, 8 Cent. Rep. 810, 116 Pa. 450; Allen v. St. Louis Bank, Clay v. State and State v. Custer, supra; Nelson v. Neely, 68 Ind. 194.

No prosecuting officer has any right to determine upon confiscation.

U. S. v. Morin, 4 Biss. 95, 96; U. S. v. The Reindeer, 2 Cliff. 68; U. S. v. Grundy, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 338 (2: 459).

The Government can only act through its official agents.

U. S. v. 1960 Bags of Coffee, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 398 (3: 602); U. S. v. The Mars, Id. 417 (3: 609); Fontaine v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 11 Johns. 300; Caldwell v. U. S. 49 U. S. 8 How. 382 (12: 1122).

The forfeiture depends upon the conviction.

Dobbin's Distillery v. U. S. 96 U. S. 399 (24: 688); 1 Bish. Cr. L. 6th ed. § 835, note 1; U. S. v. Three Tons of Coal, 6 Biss. 379; U. S. v. Ebner, 4 Biss. 119.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for the United States:

Where fraud is of the essence of the charge, the law allows a resort to circumstances.

Castle v. Bullard, 64 U. S. 23 How. 187 (16: 428); 1 Stark. Ev. 58; Green v. Van Buskirk, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 139 (19: 109); Baldorff v. Farmers Nat. Bank, 61 Pa. 182; Simons v. Vulcan Oil & M. Co. Id. 218.

Where a forfeiture is given by a statute, the thing forfeited may either vest immediately or upon the performance of some particular act, at the will of the Legislature.

U. S. v. Grundy, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 351 (2: 463); U. S. v. 1960 Bags of Coffee, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 398 (8:602): Coffey v. U.S. 116 U. S. 442 (29:686); The Palmyra, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 1 (6: 531).

The forfeiture imposed by section 12 of the Act of June 22, 1874, is recoverable by this proceeding in rem.

U. S. v Auffmordt, 122 U. S. 208 (30:1184).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in rem, brought by the United States, in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, against four cases of merchandise, seized for forfeiture for violations of the customs revenue laws. One of them was imported into the Port of New York on the 6th of March, 1882, and the other three were imported on the 10th of March, 1882. The information proceeds against them for violations of sections 2839 and 2864 of the Revised Statutes, and of the 12th section of the Act of June 22, 1874, chap. 391, 18 Stat. at L. 188. The latter section is in these words: "Sec. 12. That any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make, any entry of imported merchandise, by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, shall, for each offense, be fined in any sum not exceeding five thousand dollars nor less than fifty dollars, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both; and, in addition to such fine such merchandise shall be forfeited; which forfeiture shall only apply to the whole of the merchandise in the case or package containing the particular article or articles of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates; and anything contained in any act which provides for the forfeiture or confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued, be, and the same is hereby repealed." As the material questions in the case arise in respect to section 12 of the Act of 1874, it will not be necessary to refer particularly to the counts founded on the sections of the Revised Statutes.

One count, in regard to three of the cases, alleges that on or about the 10th of March, 1882, the owner, importer, consignee or agents of the merchandise, or some other person or persons now unknown to the collector and to the attorney for the United States, with intent to defraud the revenue, made or attempted to make an entry of the merchandise, which was then and there subject to duties, and had been imported into the United States, within the district of the City of New York, from Paris, a foreign place, by way of Havre, in the vessel Amerique, by means of false and fraudulent invoices, affidavits, letters, and papers, and by means of false statements, written and verbal, by means whereof the United States were deprived of the lawful duties or a portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or a portion thereof, embraced and referred to in such invoices, affidavits, letters, and papers, and such false statements, the cases whose contents are proceeded against for forfeiture containing particular articles of merchandise to which said alleged frauds related, contrary to said 12th section.

Another count, in regard to the three cases, alleges that on or about the 10th of March, 1882, the owner, importer, consignee or agents of the merchandise, or some other person or persons now unknown to the collector and to the said attorney, with intent to defraud the revenue, made or attempted to make an entry of the merchandise, which was then and there subject to duties, and had been imported into the United States within said district, from Paris, a foreign place, by way of Havre, in the ship Amerique, and that the said owner, importer, consignee or agents and other person or persons unknown, was and were guilty of certain acts and omissions, whereby the United States were deprived of the lawful duties, or a portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or a portion thereof, affected by said acts and omissions, the cases whose contents are proceeded against for forfeiture containing particular articles of merchandise to which said alleged frauds and said acts and omissions related, contrary to said 12th section.

There were two similar counts in regard to the fourth case.

The counts founded on section 2839 of the Revised Statutes allege a failure to invoice the goods according to their actual cost at the place of exportation, with design to avoid the duties thereon; and those founded on section 2864 allege an entry of, or attempt to enter, the goods by means of false invoices and papers.

A claim was interposed by one Origet, as owner of the goods, and an answer denying that the goods became "forfeited in manner and form as in said information is alleged."

The case was tried by a jury, and the minutes of the trial show that the jury rendered "a verdict for the informants and against the claimant for the condemnation of the goods mentioned in the information, and that the goods were brought in with intent to defraud the United States." Thereupon a decree was entered which set forth that, the jury having "by their verdict found for the United States, condemning the said goods," they were "accordingly condemned as forfeited to the United States." On a writ of error sued out by the claimant from the circuit court, that court affirmed the decree of the district court, and remanded the case to the latter court for the execution of its decree. The claimant has brought the case to this court by a writ of error.

The counsel for the claimant seeks to raise objections to the admission of certain evidence at the trial, and to the exclusion of certain other evidence, upon what appears in a paper found in the record and headed "Bill of Exceptions." But the paper does not bear the signature of the district judge. The trial took place on the 8th of June, 1883. At the foot of the paper referred to appears the following: "Allowed and ordered on file November 22, '83. A. B." This cannot be regarded as a proper signature by the judge to a bill of exceptions, nor can the paper be regarded for the purposes of review as a bill of exceptions. To make it clear that a seal to a bill of exceptions was not necessary to its validity, Congress, by section 4 of the Act of June 1, 1872, chap. 255, 17 Stat. at L. 197, now section 953 of the Revised Statutes, enacted as follows: "A bill of exceptions allowed in any cause shall be deemed sufficiently authenticated if signed by the judge of the court in which the cause was tried, or by the presiding judge thereof, if more than one judge sat on the trial of the cause, without any seal of court or judge being annexed thereto." This provision merely dispensed with the seal. The necessity for the signature still remains. We cannot regard the initials "A. B." as the signature of the judge, or as a sufficient authentication of the bill of exceptions, or as sufficient evidence of its allowance by the judge or the court. Therefore, the questions purporting to be raised by the paper cannot be considered.

An objection is made to the verdict, founded upon section 16 of the Act of June 22, 1874, chap. 391, 18 Stat. at L. 189, which is in these words: "Sec. 16. That in all actions, suits, and proceedings in any court of the United States, now pending or hereafter commenced or prosecuted, to enforce or declare the forfeiture of any goods, wares, or merchandise, or to recover the value thereof, or any other sum alleged to be forfeited by reason of any violation of the provisions of the customs revenue laws, or any of such provisions, in which action, suit, or proceeding an issue or issues of fact shall have been joined, it shall be the duty of the court, on the trial thereof, to submit to the jury, as a distinct and separate proposition, whether the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States, and to require upon such proposition a special finding by such jury; or, if such issues be tried by the court without a jury, it shall be the duty of the court to pass upon and decide such proposition as a distinct and separate finding of fact; and in such cases, unless intent to defraud shall be so found, no fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be imposed."

The objection made is that the verdict states "that the goods were brought in with intent to defraud the United States," and does not state, in the language of section 16, that the acts alleged in the information were done with such intent. But we are of opinion that this objection has no force. It is evident that, under the information and the answer, the question of intent to defraud, submitted to the jury and passed upon by them, must have been as to the intent to defraud in the respects set forth in the information and denied by the answer; and the finding "that the goods were brought in with intent to defraud the United States" must, in respect to the counts founded on section 12 of the Act of 1874, be regarded as a finding that the acts alleged in those counts were done with such intent to defraud. The words "brought in" may fairly be construed as having reference to the entering or attempting to enter the goods by the means specified in those counts, as the entry of the goods is the necessary means, provided by law, for bringing the goods within the control of the importer, so that they may be employed by him for the purposes for which they were imported. There is no count in the information founded upon an unlawful importation or bringing in of the merchandise, in any other sense than that it was entered or attempted to be entered by means of the false papers mentioned in the information.

It is also objected that the judgment of the district court only recites that the jury "found for the United States condemning the said goods," and does not recite any special finding as to an intent to defraud. This objection is overruled for the reasons set forth in the opinion in the case of Friedenstein v U. S. just decided [ante, 736].

It is also made a point, in the brief of the counsel for the claimant, that the district court had no jurisdiction of the cause of action set forth in the information, because the only method of obtaining a condemnation of goods for the causes mentioned in section 12 of the Act of 1874, is in the course of a proceeding by indictment against an offender; that a proceeding against the goods is only authorized by that section as an incident of the prosecution of an offender by an indictment; that the forfeiture of the goods, like the fine and the imprisonment prescribed, is a part of the punishment upon a conviction on a criminal prosecution; that the forfeiture is imposed only as an addition to a fine, where that is imposed, and that the merchandise cannot be forfeited independently of the imposition of the fine. But we are of opinion that this is not the proper construction of the section. The fine, or the imprisonment, or both, are to follow conviction on a criminal prosecution of the owner, importer, consignee, agent or other person who does the act forbidden by the section, with the intent therein mentioned. The section then goes on to say that "In addition to such fine, such merchandise shall be forfeited." The sole meaning of this is that the person owning the merchandise shall lose it by forfeiture, in addition to such possible loss as may come to him by the imposition, if he is the offender, of the pecuniary fine, on the criminal prosecution against him. But the merchandise is to be forfeited irrespective of any criminal prosecution. The forfeiture accrues to the United States on the commission or omission of the acts specified. No condition is attached to the imposition of the forfeiture. The section does not say that the merchandise shall be forfeited only on the conviction of some offender, whether the owner of the merchandise or one of the other persons named in the section. The person punished for the offense may be an entirely different person from the owner of the merchandise, or any person interested in it. The forfeiture of the goods of the principal can form no part of the personal punishment of his agent.

The construction contended for by the claimant would require the imposition of the forfeiture only when a fine was imposed; and not only could the forfeiture not be imposed where imprisonment was awarded, but the language would require that, on a criminal conviction of the agent, the merchandise of the principal should be forfeited, in order to allow of the imposition of any fine on the convicted agent. Again, two persons, a consignee and an agent, aside from the owner, might each of them be guilty and each of them be separately prosecuted criminally; and, if the first one convicted were fined and the goods were forfeited, the second one tried could not, on conviction, be punished by a fine, because, the merchandise having been already forfeited, it could not be a second time forfeited, and so the requirement of the statute that the merchandise should be forfeited, in addition to the imposition of the fine could not be carried out. We conclude, therefore, that the forfeiture imposed by the section is no part of the punishment for the offense.

In the case of Coffey v. United States, 116 U. S. 436, 443 [29:684, 686], where section 3257 of the Revised Statutes imposed on a distiller for forbidden acts the forfeiture of his distillery, and also a fine and imprisonment, this court held, on the authority of The Palmyra, 25 U.S. 12 Wheat. 1, 14, 15 [6: 581, 585], that the forfeiture was to be enforced by a civil suit in rem, and the fine and imprisonment in a criminal proceeding.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES, Appt., v. SAN JACINTO TIN COMPANY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 278-309.)

Suit by United States, to annul patent for land—power of attorney-general—when such suit may be brought—purpose of—official fraud—effect of—officers owning shares—evidence of—fraud must be convincing.

*1. A suit may be brought by the United States in any court of competent jurisdiction to set aside, cancel, or annul a patent for land issued in its name, on the ground that it was obtained by fraud or mistake.

2. The initiation and control of such a suit lies with the attorney-general as the head of one of the executive departments.

3. But the right to bring such a suit exists only when the Government has an interest in the remedy sought by reason of its interest in the land, or the fraud has been practiced on the Government and operates to its prejudice, or it is under obligation to some individual to make his title good by setting aside the fraudulent patent, or the duty of the Government to the public requires such action.

4. When it is apparent that the only purpose of bringing the suit is to benefit one of two claimants to the land, and the Government has no interest in the matter, the suit must fail.

5. In the case before us the alleged fraud, for which it is sought to annul the patent, is in the survey of a confirmed Mexican grant, on which the patent was issued; and it is charged that at the time the survey was made the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Surveyor-General for California, the chief clerk of the latter's office, and the deputy who made the survey, were interested in the ownership of the grant, and by fraud made a false location of the land to make it contain valuable ores of tin not within its limits if fairly surveyed.

6. Of all the officers here charged only Conway, the chief clerk, had any real interest in the claim, and he notified the surveyor-general of his interest, and refused to have anything to do with the survey; it is nowhere shown that he in any manner influenced the location of the survey, and it is denied under oath by all who took part in making it.

7. The fact is much relied on that some of these officers, after the patent was issued, took shares in a joint stock corporation organized to work the mine; but there is no proof that the shares were a voluntary gift, or were for services rendered in locating the survey, and the fairness of the purchase of these shares after the patent issued is sustained by affirmative testimony.

8. The fact that this survey was contested at every step by interested parties, and was returned to the surveyor's office for correction, was twice before that office and twice before the Commissioner in Washington, and finally decided after six months' consideration by the Secretary of the Interior, confirming the decision of the land office, affords very strong evidence of the correctness and honesty of the survey.

9. In the Maxwell Land Grant Case, 121 U. S. 325 [30:949], we expressed ourselves fully in regard to the testimony necessary to enable a court of chancery to set aside such a solemn instrument as a patent of the United States. It was there said, "that when in a court of equity it is proposed to set aside, to annul, or to correct a written instrument for fraud or mistake in the execution of the instrument itself, the testimony on which this is done must be clear, unequivocal, and convincing, and that it cannot be done upon a bare preponderance of evidence which leaves the issue in doubt." There is no such convincing evidence of fraud in the present case.

*Head notes by Mr. Justice MILLER.

[No. 887.]

Argued Jan. 26, 27, 30, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, dismissing a bill to set aside and declare void a patent for land issued by the United States. Affirmed.

Opinion below, 28 Fed. Rep. 279.

The facts are fully stated by the court.

Messrs. G. Wiley Wells and G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for the United States, appellant:

Laches is not to be imputed to the Government, and can at no time run so as to bar its rights.

Stoughton v. Baker, 4 Mass. 521; McNamee v. U. S. 11 Ark. 148; Orane v. Reeder, 21 Mich. 77; Lindsey v. Miller; 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 666 (8:538).

The fraud in the location and survey of the lands rendered everything connected with the formation and organization of the Company invalid and void.

Each certificate of stock was void, and all persons holding the same, not only took with notice of the fraud, but they acquired no title or rights in the lands in question.

Miller v. Barber, 66 N. Y. 558; Morgan v. Skiddy, 62 N. Y. 319.

The fraud consisted in the willful and wanton disregard of the calls of the grant, as finally confirmed by the decree of the district court, in locating the grant in question, by government officials, whose duty it was to properly locate the same; and this done for their private gain.

U. S. v. Fossatt, 62 U. S. 21 How. 445 (16: 186).

Where the grant is of a specified quantity within the exterior limits embracing a larger quantity, the Government is under no obligation to allow the quantity to be selected in accordance with the wishes of the grantee.

U. S. v. Armijo, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 445 (18: 492).

But the land, if selected by the grantee, must be within the limits of the grant; he cannot select himself, nor can the Government for him, outside of those prescribed limits.

Dodge v. Peres, 2 Sawy. 645.

Upon the evidence adduced the defendant is not an innocent purchaser in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, of the land now claimed by it as the sobrante San Jacinto.

Civ. Code, Cal. § 19; Robinson v. Williams, 22 N. Y. 387; Galland v. Jackman, 26 Cal. 79; Clark v. Troy, 20 Cal. 220.

Mr. William M. Stewart, for appellees:

There are no maxims of the law more firmly established, or of more value in the administration of justice, than the two which are designed to prevent repeated litigation between the same parties in regard to the same subject or controversy, namely, Interest reipublicæ, ut sit finis litium, and Nemo debet bis vexari pro una et eadem causa.

U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 65 (25:95).

When the United States enters a court as a litigant it waives its exemption from legal proceedings and stands upon the same footing with private individuals; and, therefore, if on consideration of all the circumstances of a given case it be inequitable to grant the relief prayed against a citizen, such relief will be refused by a court of equity, though the United States be the suitor.

U. S. v. Flint, 4 Sawy. 43.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

The suit in this case, which was a bill in chancery filed April 10, 1883, in the Circuit Court for the District of California, purports to be brought by the attorney-general on behalf of the United States against the San Jacinto Tin Company, the Riverside Canal Company, and the Riverside Land and Irrigating Company. These corporations are alleged to be in possession of a large body of land, nearly eleven square leagues in extent, for which a patent was issued by the United States on the 26th day of October, 1867, to Maria del Rosario Estudillo de Aguirre, and her heirs and assigns. The object of the bill is to set aside this patent, and have it declared void, upon the ground that the land described in the survey, which description is a part of the patent, is not the land granted by the Mexican Government to said Maria, nor that which was confirmed to her under the proceedings before the land commission, and by the judgment of the District Court of the United States, and by this court also on appeal. The essential feature of the grievance relied on by the complainant is that this survey was thus located by fraud to include different and more valuable land than that granted by Mexico and confirmed by the courts, and on account of this fraud it is prayed that the survey and patent be set aside and annulled.

Perhaps the nature of this proceeding cannot be better stated than in the language that heads the brief or printed argument of the appellant, who was plaintiff below. It is as follows:

"This brief is intended to establish the following general proposition, viz.: That the lands hereinafter described as patented to Maria de Rosario de Aguirre, and her heirs and assigns, on the 26th day of October, 1867, were obtained from the United States by a fraudulent survey of the lands described therein in violation of the decree of the court; and that the persons engaged in said fraudulent survey were the beneficiaries thereof; and that, by reason thereof, said patent to the same is void, and should be set aside, vacated, and annulled."

The case was heard in the circuit court on the bill, answer, replication, and voluminous testimony, by the circuit and district judges sitting together, who concurred in the decree dismissing the bill.

The bill sets out a grant to one Maria del Rosario Estudillo de Aguirre of the surplus or "sobrante" of the Ranchos of San Jacinto Viejo y Nuevo, or the overplus which remains in the Ranchos of Old and New San Jacinto, the survey thereof to commence from the boundaries of Don José Antonio Estudillo and Don Miguel Pedrorena. It alleges that this grant was afterwards confirmed by the District Court of California on appeal from the land commission. Upon an appeal taken from that court to the Supreme Court of the United States its judgment was affirmed. The decision of the land commission was to the effect that the claimant was entitled to five square leagues of land within this sobrante or surplus. The district court, however, held that the claimant was entitled to eleven square leagues, if so much should be found within the sobrante, and to all that was found therein if it were less than that amount.

The language of this decree, as set forth in the body of the bill, and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States at its December Term, 1868,—U. S. v. D'Aguirre, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 311 [17:595],—describes the land confirmed as "the sobrante or surplus lands remaining within the boundaries of the tract of land called San Jacinto, as the same are represented and described in the map of said tract contained in the expediente of Miguel Pedrorena filed in this case and referred to in the grant, over and above certain lands granted to José Antonio Estudillo, and certain other lands granted to Miguel Pedrorena, within the aforesaid boundaries, to the extent of eleven square leagues of land; and if said sobrante or surplus within said boundaries should be less than eleven square leagues, then such less quantity." The bill alleges that the location by survey of the lands confirmed by this decree was not at all within the sobrante of the San Jacinto grant, but that it was located upon other lands than those on which it should have been, because those which were embraced by the survey were valuable as containing ores of tin; and that nearly all the officers engaged in making or establishing it, from and including the Commissioner of the General Land Office down to the deputy surveyors, were interested in the claim at the time.

It is alleged that throughout the whole transaction, from the beginning of the effort to have this survey made until its final completion and the issue of the patent, all the proceedings were dictated by fraud, and all the officers of the Government below the Secretary of the Interior who had anything to do with it were parties to that fraud, and to be benefited by it.

The principal points upon which this fraud is said to rest are: that the land surveyed was not within the larger exterior boundaries out of which the sobrante of San Jacinto Viejo y Nuevo was to be taken, but that said survey described a tract of land of about the same extent, to wit, of about eleven square leagues, situated more than six miles at the nearest point, and more than twenty miles at the farthest point, away from the land in fact granted and conceded by Pio Pico, Governor, to the grantee; that the survey of said land was never made in the field, nor from any actual measurements of distances or observation or determination of courses in the field, as the law of the Land Department required, nor according to the directions of the decree confirming said grant; that the plat and survey were made arbitrarily and without any actual data in the office of the Surveyor-General of the United States for California, under the direction and dictation of that officer and one Edward Conway, then chief clerk in charge of that office, and performing the duties of surveyor-general, and by one George H. Thompson, a deputy surveyor acting under the surveyor-general and the chief clerk; that it was so made up without any reference to the expediente that accompanied the grant or juridical possession given at the time of the grant, or to the decree, but that it was made solely with reference to securing, surreptitiously and fraudulently, letters patent for the land included and described within the said survey and plat, although the same lies outside of the boundaries of the tract called San Jacinto; that the land so surveyed and platted was at that time supposed by said surveyor-general and Edward Conway to contain, and did in fact contain, valuable lodes of tin and other mineral ores, and that all this was well known to the defendant, or to persons composing its stockholders, at the time the patent was issued.

It is further alleged that Upson, the Surveyor-General, Conway, the chief clerk in his office, and Thompson, the deputy who was directed to make the survey and did make the plat, and Joseph H. Wilson, the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington, were all interested in and part owners of the claim at the time this survey was made, and at the very time they acted in reference to its final confirmation. Other persons are also said to be inculpated in this fraudulent proceeding, whose names it is not necessary at present to mention.

It will thus be seen that the entire foundation for the relief sought in this case rests upon a fraud alleged to have been committed upon the Government by its own officers, they being interested in the claim to be surveyed and patented. There is no pretense of any mere mistake in the matter, but on the contrary it is asserted that the parties knew exactly what they were doing, and that it was intended to cheat the United States out of valuable mineral ores for the benefit and advantage of those parties and their confederates. The issue is thus narrowed exclusively to the question of fraud.

Another question, however, is raised by counsel for the defendant, which is earnestly insisted upon by them, and which received the serious consideration of the judges in the circuit court, namely, the right of the Attorney-General of the United States to institute this suit.

The question as presented is one surrounded by some embarrassment. But as it is in some form or other of frequent recurrence recently, and if decided in favor of the appellees will require the dismissal of the case without a judgment by this court upon its merits, we feel called upon to give the matter our attention. It is denied that the attorney-general has any general authority under the Constitution and laws of the United States to commence a suit in the name of the United States to set aside a patent, or other solemn instrument issued by proper authority.

It is quite true that the Revised Statutes, in the title which establishes and regulates the Department of Justice, simply declares, in section 346 that "There shall be at the seat of government an executive department to be known as the Department of Justice, and an attorney-general, who shall be the head thereof." There is no very specific statement of the general duties of the attorney-general, but it is seen from the whole chapter referred to that he has the authority and it is made his duty to supervise the conduct of all suits brought by or against the United States, and to give advice to the President and the heads of the other departments of the Government. There is no express authority vested in him to authorize suits to be brought against the debtors of the Government, or upon bonds, or to begin criminal prosecutions, or to institute proceedings in any of the numerous cases in which the United States is plaintiff; and yet he is invested with the general superintendence of all such suits, and all the district attorneys who do bring them in the various courts in the country are placed under his immediate direction and control. And notwithstanding the want of any specific authority to bring an action in the name of the United States to set aside and declare void an instrument issued under its apparent authority, we cannot believe that where a case exists in which this ought to be done it is not within the authority of that officer to cause such action to be instituted and prosecuted. He is undoubtedly the officer who has charge of the institution and conduct of the pleas of the United States, and of the litigation which is necessary to establish the rights of the Government.

If the United States in any particular case has a just cause for calling upon the judiciary of the country, in any of its courts, for relief by setting aside or annulling any of its contracts, its obligations, or its most solemn instruments, the question of the appeal to the judicial tribunals of the country must primarily be decided by the Attorney-General of the United States. That such a power should exist somewhere, and that the United States should not be more helpless in relieving itself from frauds, impostures, and deceptions than the private individual, is hardly open to argument. The Constitution itself declares that the judicial power shall extend to all cases to which the United States shall be a party, and that this means mainly where it is a party plaintiff is a necessary result of the well established proposition that it cannot be sued in any court without its consent. There must, then, be an officer or officers of the Government to determine when the United States shall sue, to decide for what it shall sue, and to be responsible that such suits shall be brought in appropriate cases. The attorneys of the United States in every judicial district are officers of this character, and they are by statute under the immediate supervision and control of the attorney-general. How, then, can it be argued that if the United States have been deceived, entrapped, or defrauded into the making, under the forms of law, of an instrument which injuriously affects its rights of property, or other rights, it cannot bring a suit to avoid the effect of such instrument, thus fraudulently obtained, without a special Act of Congress in each case, or without some special authority applicable to this class of cases, while all other just grounds of suing in a court of justice concededly belong to the Department of Justice and are in use every day? The Judiciary Act of 1789, in its third section, which first created the office of attorney-general, without any very accurate definition of his powers, in using the words that "there shall be appointed a meet person, learned in the law, to act as Attorney-General for the United States" (1 U. S. Stat. at L. 93), must have had reference to the similar office with the same designation existing under the English law. And though it has been said that there is no common law of the United States, it is still quite true that when Acts of Congress use words which are familiar in the law of England, they are supposed to be used with reference to their meaning in that law. In all this, however, the attorney-general acts as the head of one of the Executive Departments, representing the authority of the President in the class of subjects within the domain of that department and under his control.

In the case of the U. S. v. Hughes, 52 U. S. 11 How. 552 [13: 809], one Godbee had entered and paid for land at the United States land office in New Orleans, but had not taken out his patent. Hughes, well knowing this fact, entered, paid for, and received a patent for the same land, the prior entry of Godbee being overlooked by the land officers. The United States having tendered Hughes his purchase money, the attorney-general filed an information on behalf of the United States to repeal the patent. The defendant, Hughes, demurred on the ground that no authority existed for bringing such a suit; but this court, saying that "It cannot be conceived why the Government should stand on a different footing from any other proprietor," overruled the demurrer. When the case afterwards came into this court on appeal from the decree on the final hearing, it said: "It was the plain duty of the United States to seek to vacate and annul the instrument, to the end that their previous engagement might be fulfilled by the transfer of a clear title, the only one intended for the purchaser by the Act of Congress." Hughes v. U. S. 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 236 [18: 804].

In U. S. v. Stone, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 525 [17: 765] Mr. Justice Grier, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "A patent is the highest evidence of title, and is conclusive as against the Government, and all claiming under junior patents or titles, until it is set aside or annulled by some judicial tribunal. In England this was originally done by scire facias, but a bill in chancery is found a more convenient remedy."

In the case of Mowry v. Whitney, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 440 [20: 859] which was an attempt by a private party to set aside by a bill in chancery a patent for an invention, the court considered the subject rather fully, and said that "The ancient method of doing this in the English courts was by scire facias, and three classes of cases are laid down in which this may be done." The court held that in England "The scire facias to repeal a patent was brought in chancery where the patent was of record; and though in this country the writ of scire facias is not in use as a chancery proceeding, the nature of the chancery jurisdiction and its mode of proceeding have established it as the appropriate tribunal for the annulling of a grant or patent from the Government," referring to U. S. v. Stone, above cited. The court denied the right of the private party to sustain a suit to annul the patent, and said: "The general public is left to the protection of the Government and its officers. * * * The reasons for requiring official authority for such a proceeding are obvious. The fraud, if one exists, has been practiced on the Government; and as the party injured it is the appropriate party to assert the remedy or seek relief."

In U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 70 [25: 96] the court said: "In the class of cases to which this belongs, however, the practice of the English and the American courts has been to require the name of the attorney-general as indorsing the suit before it will be entertained. The reason of this is obvious, namely, that in so important a matter as impeaching the grants of the Government under its seal, its highest law officer should be consulted, and should give the support of his name and authority to the suit. He should also have control of it in every stage, so that if at any time during its progress he should become convinced that the proceeding is not well founded, or is oppressive, he may dismiss the bill."

In Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 533 [24: 850] the court, speaking of the issuing of patents for land by the Government, said: "If a fraud, mistake, error, or wrong has been done, the courts of justice present the only remedy. These courts are as open to the United States to sue for the cancellation of the deed or reconveyance of the land as to individuals; and if the Government is the party injured, this is the proper course."

While the cases last cited did not involve directly the power of the attorney-general to institute a suit to set aside a patent of the United States, we have had before us quite recently three cases which did involve that power, brought by the United States for the express purpose of setting aside patents for land issued by the Government, on the ground of frauds or mistakes in their issue. In the first of these—Moffat v. U. S. 112 U. S. 24 [28: 623]—which was prosecuted by the attorney-general, who appeared in this court by the assistant attorney-general to argue the case, the decree of the circuit court setting aside the patent as having been obtained by the fraud of the officers, of the Land Department was affirmed. No question was made of the right of the attorney-general to institute the suit and conduct it to a successful termination.

In the second case, U. S. v. Minor, 114 U. S. 241 [29: 113], a suit was brought in the Circuit Court for the District of California to set aside a patent for land issued by the Government to Minor. The bill alleged that the patent was obtained by the fraud of Minor in making false affidavits and procuring others to be made before the officers of the Land Department, by which he obtained the patent for the land in question. Although the case was certified here by the judges sitting in that court on a division of opinion upon several points, one of which was whether a demurrer to the amended bill should be sustained, no question seems to have been made of the right of the Government by its attorney-general to institute this suit, the appeal on behalf of the United States being argued by the solicitor-general, an officer under the control of the attorney-general.

Some question was, however, made in the opinion in that case in regard to the right of the attorney-general to bring such a suit, where the only result would have been to take the land from Minor and give it to one Spence, who had a claim upon part of it, the court saying that "The Government in that case would certainly have no interest in the land when recovered, as it must go to Spence without any further compensation. And it may become a grave question, in some future case of this character, how far the officers of the Government can be permitted, when it has no interest in the property or in the subject of the litigation, to use its name to set aside its own patent, for which it has received full compensation, for the benefit of a rival claimant." The court said, however, that the question did not arise in that case, because Spence only had a claim to one half of the land covered by the patent. It will be seen that the only question thus suggested did not affect the right of the attorney-general in a proper case to institute and carry on such a suit; and the decree of the circuit court was reversed on the ground that the case presented was one which justified relief.

In the still later case of Colorado Coal & Iron Co. v. U. S. 123 U. S. 307 [ante, 182] the bill was filed in the name of the United States by the attorney-general, to declare void and cancel sixty-one patents for as many distinct pieces of land, situated at different places in Las Animas County, in the State of Colorado, amounting in the aggregate to over nine thousand acres. The allegation in that case was that the patent had been obtained by the fraudulent use of fictitious names as grantees of the land, and the case was fought through with great vigor on both sides. It was thoroughly and elaborately considered, and the court said, in regard to these transactions, that they "undoubtedly constituted a fraud upon the United States sufficient in equity as against the parties perpetrating it, or those claiming under them with notice of it, to justify the cancellation of the patents issued to them," quoting the following language from U. S. v. Minor, above cited: "Where the patent is the result of nothing but fraud and perjury, it is enough to hold that it conveys the legal title, and it would be going quite too far to say that it cannot be assailed by a proceeding in equity and set aside as void, if the fraud is proved and there are no innocent holders for value."

If the court had entertained the opinion in these cases that there existed in the attorney-general no right to institute these suits to set aside patents for lands obtained by fraud, it would have been saved the labor of a protracted investigation in each of them into the facts which were supposed to constitute the fraud; and in the two cases first mentioned the court violated its duty in sustaining the Government and setting aside the patents if there existed in its judgment no right in the attorney-general to institute such suits.

We are not insensible to the enormous power and its capacity for evil thus reposed in that department of the Government. Since the title to all of the land in more than half of the States and Territories of the Union depends upon patents from the Government of the United States, it is to be seen what a vast power is confided to the officer who may order the institution of suits to set aside every one of these patents; and if the doctrine that the United States in bringing such actions is not controlled by any Statute of Limitations, or governed by the rule concerning laches be sound, of which we express no opinion at present, then the evil which may result would seem to be endless as well as enormous. But it has often been said that the fact that the exercise of power may be abused is no sufficient reason for denying its existence, and if restrictions are to be placed upon the exercise of this authority by the attorney-general it is for the legislative body which created the office to enact them.

We do not think, therefore, that it can be successfully denied that there exists in the attorney-general, as the head of the Department of Justice, the right to institute, in the name of the United States, a suit to abrogate, annul, or set aside a patent for land which has been issued by the Government in a case where such an instrument if permitted to stand would work serious injury to the United States, and prejudice its interests, and where it has been obtained by fraud, imposture, or mistake.

One of the difficulties attending the present case and others of like character which have come before us, in which the authority of the attorney-general to institute the suit has been questioned, is that no specific plea has been filed denying this authority, or alleging that the suit as made by the bill, or established by the evidence, does not come within the class of cases in which that officer can exercise this power.

There is no plea in this case, and all that is said upon this subject in the answer is in the following language: "If said officers" [meaning the President, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who were such at the time this action was begun] "had consulted the records they would have been easily informed of the truth; but the said attorney-general is now informed and moved and instigated by the same parties who made the contest in the Land Department before the issuing of the said patent, and M. G. Cobb, the same attorney who drew the bill herein, and instigated the suit and conducts the same, was the attorney of said contestants in said proceedings, and has represented said parties as such attorney and counsel from the filing of said objections by said Stearns and Montalva down to the present time."

But we are of opinion that since the right of the Government of the United States to institute such a suit depends upon the same general principles which would authorize a private citizen to apply to a court of justice for relief against an instrument obtained from him by fraud or deceit, or any of those other practices which are admitted to justify a court in granting relief, the Government must show that, like the private individual, it has such an interest in the relief sought as entitles it to move in the matter. If it be a question of property a case must be made in which the court can afford a remedy in regard to that property; if it be a question of fraud which would render the instrument void, the fraud must operate to the prejudice of the United States; and if it is apparent that the suit is brought for the benefit of some third party, and that the United States has no pecuniary interest in the remedy sought, and is under no obligation to the party who will be benefited to sustain an action for his use; in short, if there does not appear any obligation on the part of the United States to the public, or to any individual, or any interest of its own, it can no more sustain such an action than any private person could under similar circumstances.

In all the decisions to which we have just referred it is either expressed or implied that this interest or duty of the United States must exist as the foundation of the right of action. Of course this interest must be made to appear in the progress of the proceedings, either by pleading or evidence; and if there is a want of it, and the fact is manifest that the suit has actually been brought for the benefit of some third person, and that no obligation to the general public exists which requires the United States to bring it, then the suit must fail. In the case before us the bill itself leaves a fair implication that if this patent is set aside the title to the property will revert to the United States, together with the beneficial interest in it. It is argued in the brief that this is not true; that in fact the Government is but the instrument of one Baker, who married the widow of Abel Stearns; and that Stearns contested the correctness of this survey with others before the Land Department very actively and energetically, because he had such an interest in the land covered by it that if it was defeated he would become the equitable or beneficial owner of the land. This view is supported by some pretty strong testimony and by the fact that Baker was the man at whose instance the action was begun.

When the attorney-general required that a bond should be given to save the United States harmless with regard to the costs of these proceedings, Baker was the man who furnished the security and signed the bond himself. The condition inserted in that obligation recited "that, whereas, the Attorney-General of the United States of America has this day filed, at the request of the above named R. S. Baker, a bill in equity in the name of and on behalf of the United States of America against the San Jacinto Tin Company: * * * Now, therefore, if the said Baker shall well and truly save the United States of America harmless from all costs and expenses which may be incurred by or against them in the prosecution of said suit to its final determination, and pay or cause to be paid on demand all such costs and expenses as may necessarily be incurred in such prosecution, then this obligation to be void." Taking all these circumstances together, it raises a very strong implication that Baker expected that if the patent was set aside his right to the land covered by it, or to a large part of it, would become paramount.

But we are not so entirely satisfied of the want of interest of the United States in the whole or a part of the land which is covered by this patent as to justify us in saying that the bill in the present case ought to be dismissed on that ground.

Coming to the merits of the case, which turn exclusively on the question of fraud in the location of the survey of the grant to the original claimant, we are to observe that the issue is, by the pleadings themselves, as well as by the explicit statement of counsel for appellant, limited to actual fraud in the execution of that survey. There is no denial of the validity of the original grant, nor of its confirmation by the land commission, as well as on appeal by the District Court of the United States for California and by this court. The justice of a claim for eleven square leagues of land within the surplus, technically called "sobrante," of the San Jacinto tract, is not questioned; nor does the decree which is to be carried out by this survey limit the location of the land otherwise than that it shall not be more than eleven leagues, and that it shall be within the outboundaries of this surplus.

There is a statement in the decree that the measurement of the land thereby confirmed is to be commenced from the line of the Estudillo grant as fixed by the act of judicial possession to him, to which reference is made. We consider this last description as nothing more than a statement that the land of Estudillo previously granted within the boundaries of the tract called San Jacinto shall be one of the boundaries of the claim thus confirmed, and that the survey must not cover the grant to Estudillo. Reference is also made to a map contained in the expediente among the papers before the court.

The question presented would naturally divide itself into two parts, if there had been any allegation of an unintentional or accidental mistake in the location of the grant; but the plaintiffs in this case place themselves outside of the benefit of this claim of mistake, except as it may be so gross as to aid the belief of an intentional fraud on the part of those who made it. The main issue, therefore, in the case is on the question of actual fraud committed by those who made and established the survey.

The principal foundation on which this fraud is rested by counsel is that all the officers of the Government, below the Secretary of the Interior, who had anything to do with the making, considering, confirming or ratifying of this survey were interested in the claim; that the motive of the fraud was to include within the survey certain lands which were then known to contain mineral ores, believed to be immensely valuable; and that for this purpose the survey was distorted and wrenched from its proper place in order to cover these mineral deposits. As will be shown hereafter, most of the persons charged with having such interest, and with being in position to influence the location of the land by the surveyor, never had any interest in it at all until after the survey was made and confirmed and the patent issued to the claimant. If this be true of course they were under no temptation to do wrong, and the fraudulent motive attributed to them could have had no existence.

Mr. Edward Conway, who had previously bought the property and received the conveyance of the title from the claimant before the patent issued, asserts in his testimony that at the time the survey was made and was pending before the land office he was the only owner of the property, and that no one had any interest, equitable or otherwise, in it but himself. After this he organized a corporation, to which the title of the property was conveyed, which undertook to work the tin mines found upon it; and most of these persons so liberally charged with fraud in the survey are those who became stockholders therein.

The main instrument of this fraud, according to the theory of plaintiff's counsel, was Conway, who it is charged owned the whole or at least the predominating interest in the grant at the time the survey was made. At that time he was chief clerk in the office of the Surveyor-General of the United States for California, and during the period when it was under consideration therein, as well as in the general land office and before the Secretary of the Interior. It is charged that he was often the acting surveyor-general, and that this survey was made under his control and direction while he was thus interested as owner of the claim.

It is also charged that George H. Thompson, a deputy surveyor, acting under the surveyor-general and said Conway, entrusted with the duty of making this particular survey, was also interested in the claim with Conway, as well as one Hancock, at some time a clerk in the surveyor-general's office. It is asserted further that the survey was not actually made upon the ground, but as a matter of fact in the office of the surveyor-general by said Conway, Thompson, and Hancock, solely for the purpose of surreptitiously securing letters patent upon the land described and included in the survey and plat, the motive in mislocating said land being that these parties believed that the land so surveyed contained valuable lodes of tin and other mineral ores.

The deposition of Conway was taken during the progress of the suit. He was then sixty years old. He states in that deposition that at the time it was given he had no interest whatever in the San Jacinto Tin Company, or in the lands which were the subject of controversy; that he had long since parted with his shares in the stock of that Company, some of which were sold for assessments which he was unable to pay. He gives a history of his connection with the claim, and with the land office during its pendency before it, and also states the connection that other parties sustained to this transaction who are asserted to have been interested in it during that time. It seems to be a fair and candid statement of all the facts about which he was interrogated. He contradicts himself nowhere during a long examination and cross examination, and he is not anywhere successfully contradicted by other testimony in the case. He appears to have been sincerely anxious to tell the whole truth, and if his statement is to be believed he had no interest to do otherwise.

Mr. Conway states that during the years 1864, 1865, and 1866 he was chief clerk in the office of the United States Surveyor-General for California, in San Francisco; that he entered that office in the fall of 1857, resigned in December, 1866, and again entered it on January 1, 1868, and remained there until December, 1869, his longest service being as chief clerk, although he commenced at a lower grade. He served under Surveyors-General Mandeville, Beale, and Upson, and during the entire terms of the two latter with the exception of the year stated. He testifies that the approval of surveys could only be made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who was furnished with the field notes and plats which were certified to be correct by the surveyor-general, who also made a report of his action for the approval or disapproval of that officer; that the first connection he had with the sobrante San Jacinto Viejo y Nuevo was in 1868; that he then told Surveyor-General Beale that he wished to resign his place as chief clerk, as he had offers of other business, amongst which was one from Mr. Hancock, then a major in the army of the United States, who informed him that he had control of this sobrante and also of the Rancho San Jacinto Nuevo—that is of the metals that were in those ranchos, and he wished him to take charge of the business.

Throughout the whole of this story the early connection of Hancock and Conway with the sobrante claim seems to have been under a right purchased by Hancock from Mrs. Aguirre, of the mineral products thereof, without any claim to a general grant of the land. The witness Conway says that Surveyor-General Beale told him, upon being informed of the above facts, that they constituted no objection to his remaining in the office, and that he did not wish to part with him. He says: "I told him I felt a little delicacy about it, and he answered that he would look out for the interest of the United States. When Surveyor-General Upson came into office I informed him of the circumstances; that I was interested, not in the rancho, but in the veins of metals that were supposed to be there; told him that I wished to have nothing to do with the survey—to have no connection with it—and any reports he wished on the matter he must get from other officers. In April, 1866, the owner of the sobrante offered it for sale for $8,000; I think it was $3,000 cash and $5,000 on time on a mortgage."

He then went on to state that he enlisted Mr. Charles Hosmer, who advanced him the money for the cash payment, and he, Conway, then agreed to hold in trust for him one eighth of the estate and repay him his advance out of the first proceeds; that the survey of the sobrante was made in 1864 at the request of the grantee, through her attorneys, Patterson and Stow, acting under the authority of Major Hancock, and in regard to this transaction he testifies as follows:

"Edward F. Beale was the Surveyor-General at the time, and he issued the instructions for the survey. The deputy who was directed to make the survey of the sobrante was George H. Thompson. Neither Surveyor-General Beale nor Thompson had any interest, present or contingent, in the sobrante at that time, or any promise of any interest. I know positively that they had no interest or promise of interest. Surveyor-General Beale has never owned any interest in the sobrante rancho, nor ever owned any stock in the San Jacinto Tin Company, either by himself or in trust, or in any other manner. The survey was made by Thompson in Beale's time and under his instructions."

It farther appears from his testimony that the survey having been forwarded to the department at Washington it was there decided that the Act of June 2, 1862, 12 U. S. Stat. at L. 410, under which the survey was made did not apply to California, and it was returned to the office in San Francisco, with instructions, the Act of July 1, 1864, 13 U. S. Stat. at L. 332, having been passed in the mean time, to have it advertised according to the provisions of that statute. By this Act the survey, with its plat and field notes, were to be open for public inspection for ninety days after the expiration of the four consecutive weeks of publication which was provided for; then if objections were made to the survey within that time by any party claiming to have an interest in the tract embraced by it, or in any part thereof, they were to be reduced to writing, stating distinctly the interest of the objector, and signed by him or his attorney, and filed with the surveyor-general, together with such affidavits or other proofs as he might produce in support of the objection; and at the expiration of said ninety days the surveyor-general was bound to transmit to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington a copy of the survey and plat, with the objections and proofs filed in support of them, and also copies of any proofs produced by the claimant, all of which the commissioner was to examine into, and approve the survey or return the same for correction. All this Conway testifies was done. He says: "Exceptions were taken to the survey by Abel Stearns, the owner of the Sierra Rancho on the north, and of the rancho that he claimed as the Temescal on the west. Surveyor-General Upson ordered the survey reformed in order to leave space on the north for the Sierra, according to the juridical possession, of one league in width from the Santa Ana River." In all this the witness is confirmed by the records of land offices.

The witness stated that he took no part whatever in these proceedings with reference to either survey, and upon being asked if he exercised any control with respect to this sobrante claim or the survey thereof, said: "I simply gave notice to the Surveyors-General, Beale and Upson, of my interest in this rancho, and after that I had nothing to do with it. The report was made by Mr. Hopkins, and I acted in the same manner as a judge would on the bench if he was interested in the case—step down and out." He also says that the instructions in regard to the mode of executing the survey came from the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The witness then proceeded to state the facts connected with his acquisition of this property, as follows:

"I made my first purchase of an interest in this sobrante on the 3d of April, 1866, the only purchase I made; * * * I purchased it from Manuel Ferrer and his wife, Maria del Rosario Estudillo de Aguirre. She was the original grantee of the rancho. Her husband joined with her in the deed. No person was interested with me in that purchase, either before or upon the receipt of the deed, except Mr. Hosmer, as I before stated. That was the only interest except my own. I had that deed recorded in the office of the county recorder of San Bernardino County on the 30th of April, 1866. From April 3, 1866, until April 30, 1866, I was in San Francisco. The deed was executed in San Diego and sent up to me, and I sent it down for record immediately. * * * In addition to myself and Mr. Hosmer, no person except Jeremiah S. Black and William H. Lowery, attorneys at law, of Washington, were interested in that sobrante subsequent to the date of that deed, April 3, 1866, and prior to the date of that patent."

This was the period during which the survey was pending in the office of the commissioner having charge of public lands, awaiting his approval; and witness says that during that period no interest in the sobrante was held in trust for any other person, to his knowledge, except those mentioned; that Black and Lowery were his attorneys in the case of the Rancho Sobrante San Jacinto before the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Secretary of the Interior, and the consideration which they paid for the interest which he, Conway, held for them was their service as attorneys in the matters mentioned. He further says that he resigned his position in the surveyor-general's office about December 10, 1866, and proceeded to Washington, returning in December, 1867. He then goes on to recount his acquaintance in that city with Joseph H. Wilson, Commissioner of the General Land Office, and several other persons mentioned, and to deny that either or any of them were interested with him in any manner whatever in the sobrante, by purchase or otherwise, directly or indirectly, before his return from Washington on that occasion. He proceeds to say in the further history of the matter that when he returned from Washington, in December, 1867, he thought it best to form a corporation for the purpose of working the ores in the mines, and offered interests to gentlemen whom he thought responsible, and calculated to further the joint interests of the Corporation; that on the 3d day of January, 1868, the Corporation was formed, and became the owner of the property; that it agreed to pay off the mortgage, assume the indebtedness to Hosmer and pay him, Conway, $7,500, and allow him to retain a certain number of the shares of its stock, which he afterwards states to be about one sixth of the sum at which it was capitalized; and that all this was done.

Mr. R. C. Hopkins, who is charged as interested in this property and contributing to the successful fraud in the location of the land in controversy, states in his deposition that he was then sixty-seven years of age; that he was in the office of the United States Surveyor-General for California from 1855 until 1879, having charge of the Spanish archives, which included the records of the grants made by the Governments of Spain and Mexico. Of this witness it may be generally stated that he was shown to be a man of very high character, exceedingly useful to the Government on account of his familiarity with and control of these valuable documents, and very much relied on by all persons interested in the location of surveys in that country or in the validity of Mexican grants.

In regard to this particular transaction he states that he was in that office, in the capacity of keeper of the archives, in 1864, when the survey was made which is the subject of controversy, at which time Mr. Beale was surveyor-general; that he saw the written application made by Hancock, through Patterson, for a survey of the rancho at that time, and probably wrote the instructions for it to be made. Upon being asked who was the deputy surveyor who made the survey, he said that it was George H. Thompson. He was then asked By whom was he selected?" to which he replied, "I don't know, but I presume that the surveyor-general appointed him on his own motion;" and proceeded to say that the instructions were signed by the surveyor-general. He was then asked, "Was there any person in the surveyor-general's office at that time who had any interest in this grant?" to which he replied, "To my knowledge, no." The inquiry was then made, "Do you know of any reason, object, or purpose in locating that grant on the part of anybody in the office other than to locate it according to the decree of confirmation?" to which he answered, "I do not." "Had you any interest in this matter before the issuance of patent?" To this he replied, "No, sir; neither directly nor indirectly." He was then asked if either Upson or Beale, the Surveyors-General, or Wilson, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or Thompson, the deputy who made the survey, or Whiting, had any interest in the claim prior to the issuance of the patent; to which he answered in each case that they had not.

He was afterwards interrogated about some shares of the stock of this Company, which, he said, he had accepted from Conway as a sort of compensation for previous losses in other speculation, and upon which he paid large assessments and finally gave them up because he was unable or unwilling to continue the payments required. Hancock, Upson, and Wilson, he states, are dead.

He also testifies that, with the fullest knowledge of the surveys and papers, and after an examination of the records in the office at San Francisco, it seems to him that it would be impossible to attempt to locate the rancho in any other way so as to conform to the decree of the court, and that this land is located within the general limits of the tract called San Jacinto, and did conform to that decree. Upon being asked if it was possible for him to be mistaken about this matter, he replied: "I don't think so; it is a question of landmarks that are unmistakable in their location, having historical names; it is hardly a matter in which judgment is to be much exercised, but is a matter of fact; at least, I looked upon it at that time as such, when I made this report." To the question "Was that location made arbitrarily, without reference to courses or distances, or under the direction or dictation of Conway?" he answered: "I think it was made under the instructions of the surveyor-general; I presume, without any dictation from anyone. There were probably some instructions to follow, when public lands were surveyed, the lines of the public surveys. * * * That survey, I presume, was made in accordance with the decree of the district court, and with all the data that could be obtained."

It appears also that Hopkins made the report of the survey to the surveyor general, and that he does not doubt that it was correctly made.

The deposition of Thompson, the deputy who made the survey, was taken, and his examination of several hundred pages is mainly confined to his acts in regard to it and the means which he had for making it correctly. On this branch of the subject it is sufficient to say that his statement is very clear to the effect that the survey was properly located, although he admits that he did not go upon the land but made the location, under directions from the surveyor general, from maps in his office showing the actual objects which constituted the outboundaries of the sobrante and the other locations which had priority to this.

During his examination he was asked what he knew about the ownership of the claim at the time the surveys were made. To this he replied in effect, that he did not know Conway was the owner; that he understood the request for the survey proceeded from Hancock, or from attorneys employed by Hancock, who represented the grantee in the decree of confirmation. He nowhere intimates, nor was he at any time asked, whether he had an interest in the survey at that time; and there is in fact a total failure to establish the allegation that he had any interest whatever, either present or prospective, in the claim when the survey was made by him, or was influenced by anybody who had.

Without going farther into the minutiæ of the testimony on this subject, we are of opinion that there is no evidence that establishes any interest in the claim under consideration prior to the issuance of the patent in any man who was connected with the Land Department of the Government, whether as surveyor-general, deputy surveyor, clerk or otherwise, except Conway; that Conway's interest was well known to the surveyors-general, who at different times had charge of this matter, as well as to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Secretary of the Interior who finally passed upon it, and that he abstained from any interference with the making of the survey or the officers who had it in charge, except that probably while he was in Washington he looked after its confirmation.

The attempt to deduce an inference of fraud, in the establishment of this survey and the final issue of the patent, from the circumstance that, after its issue, and when Conway had become the sole owner of the property, he, with many other persons of distinction, some of whom were engaged in other branches of the government service, and some connected with the Land Department, co-operated to organize a joint stock company for its development and improvement, the shares of which they took and upon which they paid many assessments, and from the further fact that a very few of them may have received such stock as compensation for aid rendered to Conway in his struggle to establish the title, is, we think, entirely repelled by the testimony, which shows that none of these persons had any interest in it at the time the fraudulent transactions are alleged to have occurred. It does not appear that the stock which they got was in any sense a compensation for services rendered in establishing the survey, except in the case of Black and Lowery, who were the attorneys employed for that purpose and received some of its shares as their compensation. To hold that these parties, such as Hopkins, Thompson, Upson, and perhaps others, when they found the stock of a corporation for sale which had promise of profit in it, by taking its shares became participes criminis in a conspiracy to defraud the government of which they knew nothing at the time the fraud is alleged to have been committed, and that the mere fact of their taking these shares of stock is evidence they took part in the conspiracy, is a species of logic on which patents granted by the United States should not be set aside.

We do not hesitate to say that there is a total failure of evidence to establish any participation in this fraud on the part of any of the persons in the service of the Government, who are charged with having been engaged in it. While we do not wish to give countenance to the idea that an officer of the Government, before whom any matter may come for his action, or to be acted upon in his office, should voluntarily acquire an interest in such matter, even though he disclose that interest, but, on the contrary, think that he should accept no such delicate position; nevertheless that circumstance alone should not be permitted to divest the rights of others, unless it be shown that such position was used in the aid of an actual fraud.

As to Conway, who had the principal, if not the sole, interest which could induce an effort to secure the false location of the grant, there is no sufficient evidence in the record to show that he undertook in any way to control the actual survey of this land. His testimony, given at a time when he could have had no pecuniary interest in the result of this suit, and delivered with a candor and apparent readiness to answer promptly all questions put to him, without any of the evasive expressions, such as, "I don't know," or "I cannot remember," so commonly used by false witnesses, commands our confidence.

The strongest argument against the commission of any fraud, and in favor of the correctness of the location of the grant by the survey, is to be found in the fact that it went through all the different offices in the Land Department to which it could possibly be taken from its being filed by Thompson in the office of the surveyor-general up to its consideration by the Secretary of the Interior himself; and in all these offices ample time was given for careful examination, and an actual scrutiny of the matter was made by reason of the contest of Stearns, who succeeded in having the lines of the survey changed, so as to exclude property in which he was interested. After this change was made, it was again brought before the commissioner and argued by counsel on both sides, and considered in the light of all the facts which either party chose to bring before the office, and abundant time was given for its investigation. Mr. Wilson, the commissioner, was a man of many years' experience in the class of cases to which this belongs, and which he was then called upon to decide. He made a full report, which is in the record, to the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. O. H. Browning, a lawyer of eminence and a man accustomed to weighing testimony, who, after having the case under consideration from May 22, 1867, to October 19 of the same year, made the following decision, which he referred back to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for execution:

"Sir: I have received your letter of the 22d May last, submitting for consideration the papers of the private land claim in California known as the 'Sobrante de San Jacinto,' and asking for instructions on the 'application for a patent to issue in accordance with the survey approved by the Surveyor-General of California.' A careful examination of the papers and consideration of the arguments of counsel have led me to concur in your opinion that all the requirements of the law have been complied with, and that a patent should issue in accordance with the survey."

We consider this examination of the case in the office of the commissioner and its re-examination by the Secretary of the Interior as possessing the very strongest probative force in regard to the question of fraud, which was mooted before them, as well as the question of the proper location of the grant. No stronger evidence could be given of the honesty of Commissioner Wilson and his belief in the correctness of the survey than the fact of his reference of the whole matter to the secretary, of his own motion, without any appeal by either party from his decision. They had in the land office abundant materials for the investigation of all the matters in dispute; they had before them the interested parties, with all the evidence which they could collect, the records, the Mexican archives and control of all the papers of the Government since the territory came into the possession of the United States, as well as ample time, more than this court has, to consider all these subjects. Very little that is new or that throws any light upon the questions at issue is now produced on the hearing of this case.

With regard to the question of fraud, we have no hesitation in saying that there is no such case made of intentional fraud, or actual fraud, committed upon the Government of the United States in this transaction as justifies the cancellation of the patent. We have quite recently given our views upon this subject very freely in the Maxwell Land Grant Case, 121 U. S. 325 [30:949] in regard to the character of the testimony necessary to set aside such a solemn instrument as a patent of the United States. It was there held, p. 381 [959], "that when in a court of equity it is proposed to set aside, to annul, or to correct a written instrument for fraud or mistake in the execution of the instrument itself, the testimony on which this is done must be clear, unequivocal, and convincing, and that it cannot be done upon a bare preponderance of evidence which leaves the issue in doubt. If the proposition, as thus laid down in the cases cited, is sound in regard to the ordinary contracts of private individuals, how much more should it be observed where the attempt is to annul the grants, the patents, and other solemn evidences of title emanating from the Government of the United States under its official seal."

So far from there being the satisfactory evidence here pointed out of a fraud against the Government having been perpetrated in this case, there is really little but suspicion, fierce denunciation, and a bitter use of such words as "fraud,"

"deceit" and "imposition." If the case stood alone upon the testimony introduced by the Government it would, so far as any fraudulent purpose is concerned, do but little more than raise a suspicion that the parties engaged in the transaction sought their own interest at the expense of the Government, and not always by the most appropriate means; but when the testimony for the defense is considered it refutes, not only the existence of any such fraudulent intent or dishonest acts, but it removes from the main actors in the matter even the suspicion of having used underhand and improper means for the accomplishment of their purposes.

As regards the correctness of the location by survey of the grant, whose validity and justice is not questioned, we do not known that we can do better than to copy the language of the circuit judge presiding when the decree was rendered. In his opinion delivered on that occasion, and concurred in by the district judge, he said: "It is confidently assumed on the part of complainant that the location of the lands patented is palpably wholly outside of the exterior limits described in the original petition, Mexican grant, and the decree of confirmation; that this is so obvious that the grant must have been willfully and fraudulently located where it is. This is an assumption that, in our judgment, is wholly without justification in the documentary and other evidence in the case. Upon a careful consideration of the subject we are of the opinion that the most that can be reasonably said against the location is that the record presents a fair case for an honest difference of opinion; that a plausible argument can honestly be made in support of either side of the proposition. An erroneous location is certainly not so obvious as to necessarily stamp it as a fraud."

When we consider the greater facilities possessed by the Land Department of the Government for ascertaining the true location, and their superior fitness for deciding questions pertaining thereto, over those of the judicial department, and when we also remember that this location underwent the scrutiny of the officers in the office of the Surveyor-General for California, as well as those of the General Land Office at Washington, and even of the Secretary of the Interior himself, and was finally approved by them all, we are not disposed to make further inquiry as to whether the location was in all respects in exact accordance with what it might possibly be if a resurvey were made under the additional light, if any, now thrown upon the subject.

The result of all these considerations is that the decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Separate opinion of Mr. Justice Field:

I concur in affirming the decree of the court below dismissing the bill in this case. The bill was filed to set aside a patent of the United States issued to Maria del Rosario Estudillo de Aguirre, and her heirs, for land situated in Southern California, in what is now known as San Bernardino County, granted to her by the Mexican Government. The grant was of the sobrante, or surplus lands remaining within the boundaries of a tract called San Jacinto, after satisfying two previous grants. The claim under it was presented to the board of land commissioners created by the Act of Congress of March 3, 1851, to ascertain and settle private land claims in California, and was adjudged to be valid to the extent of five leagues. On appeal to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, the claim was confirmed to the surplus land lying within the designated boundaries, not exceeding in extent eleven square leagues. The case being brought to this court, the latter decree was affirmed. The judgment here was rendered at the December Term, 1868. Then followed a protracted contest, accompanied with much feeling, for the location of the claim. There being within the San Jacinto tract a tin mine, then supposed to contain a rich body of metal, every step in the survey was contested. Witnesses were examined, and repeated arguments made by counsel representing the parties for and against the location sought. As there were no boundaries of the sobrante marked, by which the claim could be specifically designated, much was left to the judgment of the surveyor-general, after having examined the topography of the country, and heard the statements of witnesses familiar with it. The limitation made by the grant itself only required that the claim should be located within the exterior boundaries of the San Jacinto, and not encroach upon the land covered by the previous grants. In the determination of the survey and location several years were occupied. The matter was at different times before all officers of the Land Department whose judgment could control any of the several steps of the proceedings, the United States Surveyor-General for the State, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Secretary of the Interior. Every objection now urged against the survey as ground for revoking the patent was taken before them, fully argued, and held to be untenable. At length, on the 26th day of October, 1867, a patent was issued to the claimants, from whom the defendant, the San Jacinto Tin Company, derives its title.

In April, 1883, after the Company had been in possession of the property for nearly sixteen years, and after all the other land within the exterior boundaries of the San Jacinto tract had been patented to the previous grantees, or sold by the United States, so that if the location and survey, on which the patent was issued, could be set aside, there would be no land left to satify the grant without annulling titles which the United States had conveyed to other parties, this suit was brought. And it was not brought upon any new fact produced, nor any new reason assigned why the original survey should be disturbed. All the grounds of complaint presented for the new litigation had been urged, and fully considered before. And, as if convinced that no beneficial result could come to the United States from the reopening of the old controversy, as if afraid that the United States might be cast in the litigation, a bond was taken from one R. S. Baker, with sureties, to keep the United States harmless from all costs and expenses which might be incurred by or against them in the prosecution of the suit. The original contest upon the survey was carried on, and the expenses of it borne, by one Abel Stearns. Since his death, this R. S. Baker married the widow of Stearns, and has sought to retry the issues as to the survey which were decided and determined in the Land Department years before, when Abel Stearns was living. The bond recites that "The Attorney-General of the United States of America has this day filed, at the request of the above named R. S. Baker, a bill in equity in the name of and on behalf of said United States of America against the San Jacinto Tin Company" to vacate the patent. Not for the interest of the United States, not for the protection of their property, or to vindicate their honor, but at the request of a private litigant, the name and power of the United States are invoked by the attorney-general to set aside a patent issued after a protracted contest upon the survey with the predecessor of this litigant.

If this were a solitary instance where the name and power of the United States have been used to serve the interests of private parties, it might be passed by with the simple statement of the facts. But, unfortunately, it is not a solitary instance. The records of this court show that it has been a frequent practice of the Department of Justice in authorizing suits for the cancellation of patents. In U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61 [25: 93], which was here at the October Term, 1878, it appeared that the District Attorney of California was directed by the attorney-general to bring suits to vacate patents for lands in that State, upon security being given by one John B. Howard, or a deposit made by him of a sufficient sum to defray the expenses which might be incurred in the litigation; and the bills filed upon such authority were not sworn to, nor even authenticated by the signature of the attorney-general. In this case the bill bears the signature of the attorney-general in office at the time it was filed. His signature gives some assurance, which was wanting in the Throckmorton Case, of his belief in its alllegations, and that the suit is really brought by the United States to protect their rights, and not merely to promote the interests of private individuals. In that and other cases, brought on the authority of the attorney-general, the patents embraced many thousand acres of land, and one of the judges holding the circuit court observed that: "It is not to be supposed that if the attorney-general were persuaded that so large and valuable a property belonged to the United States he would have made the assertion of its rights to depend upon the willingness or ability of private individuals to defray the expense of the litigation." U. S. v. Flint, 4 Sawy. 88. In the present case the bill seeks, by setting aside a patent of the United States, to restore eleven leagues of land to the public domain. And yet, so doubtful did the attorney-general appear to consider the rights of the United States to this vast tract, that he required from the party, at whose instance the suit was brought, a bond of indemnity against the expenses of the proceeding.

In commenting upon a similar bond, when the case of Throckmorton was here, the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Miller, said: "It would be a very dangerous doctrine, one threatening the title to millions of acres of land held by patent from the Government, if any man who has a grudge or a claim against his neighbor can, by indemnifying the Government for costs, and furnishing the needed stimulus to a district attorney, institute a suit in chancery in the [name of the] United States to declare the patent void. It is essential, therefore, to such a suit, that, without special regard to form, but in some way which the court can recognize, it should appear that the attorney-general has brought it himself, or given such order for its institution as will make him officially responsible for it, and show his control of the cause." 98 U. S. 61, 71 [25: 93, 97]. And yet this requirement does not seem to have been potential enough to induce such an examination of the rights of the United States as to justify in the present case the attempt to enforce them without security from private parties.

I cannot admit that the attorney-general can, at the request of private parties, rightfully allow the use of the name and power of the United States in proceedings for the annulment of patents, upon such parties executing a bond as security for costs, or upon any other stipulation of indemnity to them. If the United States have not sufficient interest in property to justify the expenses of proper litigation for its maintenance, they had much better let it go. It would seem that Congress designed to put its mark of condemnation upon the practice of obtaining services from private parties, without incurring liabilities for them, such as was adopted in this case, when, on May 4, 1884, it declared that "Hereafter no department or officer of the United States shall accept voluntary service for the Government, or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law, except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property." 23 U. S. Stat. at L. 17. The language here used clearly indicates that the Government shall not, except in the emergencies mentioned, place itself under obligations to anyone. The principle condemned is the same, whether the party rendering the service does so without any charge or because paid by other parties. The Government is forbidden to accept the service in either case.

It is not to be supposed that any head of the Department of Justice has or would intentionally lend the name and power of the Government to further private ends, and yet there is no practical difference between that course of procedure and the one adopted in this case. The opinion of the court shows, above all controversy, the utter groundlessness of the charges upon which it is sought to set aside the survey. A very little attention to the proceedings had before the Land Department in the contest upon that survey would have satisfied the attorney-general of the futility of any attempt to disturb it, and it is not probable that he would have authorized any.

But independently of these considerations I cannot assent to the position announced in the opinion of the court, that the attorney-general has unlimited authority by virtue of his office to institute suits to set aside patents issued by the Government. He is the head of the Department of Justice, and as such he is charged with the superintendence and direction of all district attorneys of the United States, and generally of all litigation in which the United States are interested. He is also the legal adviser of the heads of the executive departments; and if they are fraudulently imposed upon in the discharge of their duties, or have mistaken the law, he may at their request take such legal proceedings as are necessary to correct their errors and revoke their action. The legislation of Congress points out the infinite variety of cases where legal proceedings may be taken on behalf of the United States in the enforcement of their rights, the protection of their property, and the punishment of offenses; and wherever no authority is conferred by statute express or implied for the institution of suits, none in my judgment exists. Whenever Congress has felt it important that patents for lands should be revoked, either because of fraud in their issue, or of breach of conditions in them, it has not failed to authorize legal proceedings for that purpose. In a multitude of cases titles to lands, upon which whole communities live, rest upon patents of the United States. In several instances, cities having more than a hundred thousand people residing within their limits are built on land patented by the Government. I cannot believe that it is within the power of the attorney-general, to be exercised at any time in the future, this generation or the next —as no Statute of Limitations runs against the Government—to institute suits to unsettle the title founded upon such patents, even where there are allegations of fraud in obtaining them. There must be a time when such allegations will not be heeded. The examination into alleged frauds, when the patents are applied for, ought to close all controversy respecting them; clearly so, unless, upon newly discovered evidence of the most convincing character, Congress should direct proceedings to be instituted to set aside the patents, and that result can be obtained without impairing the title of innocent parties. The power of the attorney-general, if admitted when a single person holds title under a patent, may be exercised in cases where a whole community holds under a similar instrument. If, without the authority of Congress, such proceedings may be instituted by him upon the repetition, as in this case, of old charges, or upon the unsupported statements of interested parties, a cloud may at any moment be cast upon the titles of a whole people, and there would be in his hands a tremendous weapon of vexation and oppression. I can never assent to the position that there exists in any officer of the Government a power so liable to abuse and so dangerous to the peace of many communities.

I do not recogize the doctrine that the attorney-general takes any power by virtue of his office, except what the Constitution and the laws confer. The powers of the executive officers of England are not vested in the executive officers of the United States Government, simply because they are called by similar names. It is the theory, and I may add the glory, of our institutions that they are founded upon law, that no one can exercise any authority over the rights and interests of others except pursuant to and in the manner authorized by law.

In the case of the Floyd Acceptances, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 676 [19: 178] speaking of the powers of an officer of the Government—in that case of the Secretary of War—this court said: "When this inquiry arises, where are we to look for the authority of the officer? The answer which at once suggests itself to one familiar with the structure of our Government, in which all power is delegated, and is defined by law, constitutional or statutory, is, that to one or both of these sources we must resort in every instance. We have no officers in this Government, from the President down to the most subordinate agent, who does not hold office under the law, with prescribed duties and limited authority."

If the attorney-general possesses the powers ascribed to him, in the absence of any law defining them, we have this singular condition presented, that the owner of property derived from the United States by the most solemn instruments, holds his possession subject to the liability that it may be disturbed at any time by a suit of the Government, brought at the will of that officer, a not very creditable commentary on our institutions; but if the owner can trace his title to some other source, he may have a reasonable degree of certainty that he will not be unnecessarily disturbed.

Aside from the qualifications thus expressed to the views of the court, there is much in the opinion which gives me great satisfaction. It holds that in suits brought by the Government for relief against an instrument alleged to have been obtained by fraud or deceit, or any practice which would justify a court in granting relief, the Government must show, like a private individual, that it has such an interest in the relief sought as entitles it to move in the matter. If it be a question of property, a case must be made in which the court can afford a remedy in regard to that property; if it be a question of fraud, which would render the instrument void, the fraud must operate to the prejudice of the United States; and if it is apparent that the suit is brought for the benefit of some third party, and that the United States have no pecuniary interest in the remedy sought, and are under no obligation to the party, who will be benefited, to sustain an action for his use; in short, if there does not appear any obligation on the part of the United States to the public, or to any individual, or any interest of their own, they can no more sustain such an action than any private person could under similar circumstances.

From this ruling some degree of peace and security may come to holders of titles derived by patent from the Government.

From the clear and full statement, in the opinion of the court, of the case and of the controversies before the Land Department, involving the same questions now presented, there can be but one conclusion, and that is that the decree below dismissing the bill was in consonance with justice and right.

RICHARD HOSKIN ET AL., Appts.,
v.
FRANK H. FISHER ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 217-224.)

Delay in reissue of patent—laches—expanded claims—claims when waived—omissions in record.

1. The question whether delay in applying for a reissue of a patent has been reasonable or unreasonable is a question of law for the determination of the court.
2. The action of the Patent Office in granting a reissue, and deciding that the applicant had not been guilty of laches, is not sufficient to explain a delay in the application which otherwise constitutes laches.
3. Where a reissue expands the claims of the original patent, and it appears that there was a delay in applying for it, the delay invalidates the reissue unless accounted for and shown to be reasonable.
4. Where it does not appear that any attempt has been made to secure by the original patent the inventions covered by the new claim in the reissue, those inventions must be regarded as having been abandoned or waived, so far as the reissue is concerned.
5. The appellees may bring before this court, by certiorari, any necessary part of the record which the appellants have omitted to bring before it.

[No. 169.]

Argued Feb. 7, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, awarding to plaintiffs a sum of money as profits derived by defendants from the infringement of reissued letters patent. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated by the court.

Mr. M. A. Wheaton, for appellants:

To make a combination patentable there must be a joint action of the devices, or elements, which action is different in kind from the individual or aggregate action of the devices when used separately.

Reckendorfer v. Faber, 92 U. S. 347 (23:719), and cases cited; Bump, Patents, 77, 78.

A ball and socket joint is defined in Knight's American Mechanical Dictionary: "Ball and Socket Joint." Vol. I, 219.

Complainant can recover the profits due to his invention alone. If the patent covers a part only of the machine which infringes, the recovery must be limited accordingly.

Philp v. Nock, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 460 (21:679); Bell v. Daniels, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 379, 380; Mowry v. Whitney, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 650-653 (20:865, 866); Littlefield v. Perry, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 228-230 (22:581, 582); Carter v. Baker, 1 Sawy. 527; Cass v. Brown, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 275; Wayne v. Holmes, Id. 29, 30; Cox v. Griggs, Id. 178; Buerk v. Imhaeuser, 2 Bann. & A. 452, 455-456; Furbush v. Bradford, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 317; Conover v. Mers, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 506; Cawood Patent, 94 U. S. 710 (24:243); Black v. Munson, 2 Bann. & A. 623-625; Ingels v. Mast, Id. 24; Jones v. Morehead, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 165 (17:664); Magic Ruffle Co. v. Elm City Co. 2 Bann. & A. 511-512; La Baw v. Hawkins, Id. 561; Webster v. New Brunswick Carpet Co. Id. 67-71; Garretson v. Clark, 4 Bann. & A. 536, 539; Star Salt Caster Co. v. Crossman, Id. 566-568; Ingersoll v. Musgrove, 3 Bann. & A. 304; Schillinger v. Gunther, Id. 498.

Damages must be proved.

Robertson v. Blake, 94 U. S. 733, 734 (24:246, 247).

Royalties paid for other patents by an infringer are allowed to him in the accounting.

Le Baw v. Hawkins, 2 Bann. & A. 565; American Nicholson Pavement Co. v. Elizabeth, 1 Bann. & A. 461, 462.

The same rule prevails when the infringer owns the patent which covers an invention that has increased the selling price of the infringing machine.

Steam Stone Cutter Co. v. Windsor Mfg. Co. 4 Bann. & A. 450.

A final decree for nominal damages only should be entered.

N. Y. v. Ransom, 64 U. S. 23 How. 490 (16:516).

Messrs. John H. Miller and J. P. Langhorne, for appellees:

To determine the extent of the invention secured by a reissued patent, the state of the art at the time the original patent was granted must be considered.

Garneau v. Dozier, 102 U. S. 234 (26:134); Eachus v. Broomall, 115 U. S. 434 (29:421).

It is within the scope of a reissue that it contain a fuller description than the original.

Robertson v. Seconbe Mfg. Co. 10 Blatchf. 481.

It will not do for the patentee to wait until other inventors have produced new forms of improvement, and then, with the new light thus acquired, under pretense of inadvertence and mistake, apply for such an enlargement of his claim as to make it embrace these new forms.

Miller v. Bridgeport Brass Co. 104 U. S. 350 (26:783); Campbell v. James, 104 U. S. 356 (26: 786); Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 360-362 (28: 667, 668).

Any unnecessary laches or delay affects the right to reissue the patent.

Wollensak v. Reiher, 115 U. S. 96 (29: 350); New v. Warren, 22 Off. Gaz. 588; Poppenhusen v. Falke, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 218.

A judicial interpretation of the specification or claim of a patent furnishes a proper occasion for a surrender and reissue, when the error was inadvertent.

Doughty v. West, 6 Blatchf. 429; Bliss v. Gaylord P. C. & M. Co. 7 Blatchf. 279.

Change of form is not a substantial change, unless the form is of the essence of the invention.

Winans v. Denmead, 56 U. S. 15 How. 330 (14:717); Murphy v. Eastham, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 306; Re Newall, 4 C. B. N. S. 269; Tatham v. Le Roy, 2 Blatchf. 486.

Reversal of parts, not accompanied by a change of function or mode of operation, does not avoid the charge of infringement.

Atlantic Works v. Brady, 107 U. S. 192 (27: 438).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, by Frank H. Fisher and Joshua Hendy against Richard Hoskin and others, for the infringement of reissued letters patent No. 8876, granted to Frank H. Fisher, September 2, 1879, on an application filed March 29, 1879, for an "improvement in hydraulic mining apparatus," the original patent, No. 110,222, having been granted to Fisher, December 20, 1870. This reissue was a second reissue, and it appears that there was a first reissue, No. 5193, dated December 17, 1872, granted on the surrender of the original patent, and that the second reissue was granted on the surrender of the first issue.

The bill of complaint sets forth the fact of the surrender of the original patent and the granting of the first reissue, and that the first reissued patent is "ready in court to be produced" by the plaintiffs, "or a duly authenticated copy thereof." The bill also sets forth that the second reissue "was issued for the same invention as that described in the original letters patent."

There was only one claim in the original patent, as follows: "The swivel-jointed nozzle and pipes A B D E, combined, as described, with the lever F, working through slotted post f, strap i, lever o, and pawl and ratchet j k, for the purpose specified."

The second reissue contains three claims, as follows: "1. The swivel-jointed sections A B and ball and socket jointed section D E, combined, as described, with the lever F, working through slotted posts f, strap i, lever C, and pawl and ratchet j K, for the purpose set forth. 2. A ball and socket joint for connecting the discharge pipe of a hydraulic mining apparatus with the end of a swivel section, B, substantially as above described. 3. The discharge pipe E, having a semi-cylindrical or ball shaped enlargement at its base, in combination with a corresponding cup shaped socket, D, on the end of the horizontally-swiveling section B, substantially as and for the purpose described."

The claim of the original patent and the first claim of the second reissue are substantially alike. It is not alleged that the defendants have infringed the first claim of the second reissue, or that their apparatus would have infringed the claim of the original patent. The contention is that they have infringed claims 2 and 3 of the second reissue.

The answer sets up that the second reissue contains new matter, which was not contained in the original patent, and which describes and claims that of which Fisher "was not the inventor;" that Fisher did not discover or invent or make any hydraulic machine which machine or combination included either a ball and socket joint, or ball and socket jointed sections, or a discharge pipe having a ball shaped enlargement at its base; that his original patent did not contain any description of either of those devices, and did not claim them in any combination or otherwise; that all that is said in the second reissue about a ball and socket jointed section, and ball and socket joints, and a discharge pipe with a ball shaped enlargement at its base, is new matter, which was not contained in the original patent, and was inserted in the second reissue by Fisher fraudulently and for the sake of deceiving and misleading the public, he well knowing that no part of it was his invention, and also knowing that it was not contained in the original patent; and that, by reason of such fraudulent insertion of such new matter, the second reissue is void.

Issue was joined and proofs were taken on both sides, and, on the 17th of March, 1882, the case having been heard by the circuit judge, an interlocutory decree was entered in favor of the plaintiffs, adjudging the second reissue to be valid, and that the defendants had infringed upon the 2d and 3d claims of it, and awarding a decree to the plaintiffs for profits and damages, and ordering a reference to a master to ascertain them, and a perpetual injunction in regard to the second and third claims. Afterward, a rehearing was ordered by the circuit judge to be had upon the same testimony. The rehearing was had before the circuit justice and the circuit judge, and, on the 4th of September, 1882, an interlocutory decree was entered in the same terms as the first interlocutory decree. On the report of the master, a final decree was entered, March 7, 1884, awarding to the plaintiffs a sum of money as profits derived by the defendants from the infringement.

It is to be gathered from the record that Fisher had at some time brought a suit against one or both of the present defendants named Craig, for the infringement of the first reissue, and at the commencement of the taking of evidence on the part of the plaintiffs in the present suit, the following stipulation is found entered on the record: "It is stipulated and agreed by and between the counsel for the respective parties herein, that the evidence taken and on file in this court in the case of Fisher v. Craig, number 1144, shall be considered in evidence in this case, reserving, however, to each party the right to introduce such additional evidence as they may desire. It is further agreed that in case any exhibits introduced in evidence in said case of Fisher v. Craig shall be missing from the files, the same may be supplied, each party supplying his own exhibits." It does not appear by the record to what extent the evidence taken and on file in the same court in the case of Fisher v. Craig, thus referred to, was used on the hearing of the present case. There is found in the record a paper marked "Exhibit No. 5," being a certified copy from the Patent Office, certified March 8, 1878, of the original patent granted to Fisher, with its specification and drawings. There is no separate memorandum in the record of the introduction of this original patent in evidence; but, as it is found in the record, under a certificate of the clerk of the circuit court that it is a part of the record, and of the proceedings in the cause, we must accept it as such, and, if necessary, assume it to have been a part of the evidence taken and on file in the case of Fisher v. Craig, and covered by the stipulation above referred to. That stipulation was to the effect that the evidence in Fisher v. Craig should "be considered in evidence in this case."

The first reissue is not found in the record. The plaintiffs do not appear to have put it in evidence, although the bill avers that it is ready in court to be produced by them, or a duly authenticated copy of it. Nor does it appear that the defendants put it in evidence, although, as the suit of Fisher v. Craig was founded upon it, it is to be inferred that it must have been part of the evidence taken and on file in that case, and which, by the stipulation, was to be considered in evidence in this case. Nevertheless, neither party has brought it before us.

The plaintiffs contend that, in order to determine the validity of the second reissue, that must be compared with the first reissue, on the surrender of which it was granted; that in the absence of the first reissue no such comparison can be made; that, therefore, it must be presumed that the first reissue and the second reissue were both for the same invention; and that it must also be presumed that the second and third claims of the second reissue were contained in the first reissue. But we are of opinion that, the original patent and the second reissue being properly before us, we have a right to compare them with each other, and that, upon such comparison, the question of the validity of the second reissue must be determined.

Under the proffer in the bill of complaint, it was for the plaintiffs to introduce the first reissue in evidence; and if they desire to show an excuse for the delay of more than eight years and three months after the granting of the original patent in applying for the second reissue, by showing that the first reissue, granted a little less than two years after the date of the original patent, contained substantially claims 2 and 3 of the second reissue, they should have affirmatively made good that excuse, by themselves introducing the first reissue in evidence, or bringing it before us in the record as a part of the evidence taken and on file in the case of Fisher v. Craig.

Under the allegations contained in the answer, that the original patent did not claim the devices covered by the 2d and 3d claims of the second reissue, and that said 2d and 3d claims are new matter, not contained in the original patent, and that the second reissue is void by reason of such new matter, the question is fairly raised, on the face of the original patent and the second reissue, as to the effect of the delay of more than eight years and three months after the date of the original patent in applying for the second reissue, the case standing, for the purpose of such comparison, as if there never had been any first reissue.

In the case of Wollensak v. Reiher, 115 U. S. 96 [29: 350], the following propositions were laid down by this court: (1) The question whether delay in applying for a reissue of a patent has been reasonable or unreasonable is a question of law for the determination of the court. (2) The action of the Patent Office in granting a reissue, and deciding that, from special circumstances shown, it appeared that the applicant had not been guilty of laches in applying for it, is not sufficient to explain a delay in the application which otherwise appears unreasonable and to constitute laches. (3) Where a reissue expands the claims of the original patent, and it appears that there was a delay of two years, or more, in applying for it, the delay invalidates the reissue, unless accounted for and shown to be reasonable. These principles are applicable to the present case, and require that the decree of the circuit court should be reversed. The delay is not accounted for by the plaintiffs, nor shown to be reasonable.

The descriptive parts of the specifications of the original patent and the second reissue are substantially alike, and the drawings of the two are the same; but claims 2 and 3 of the second reissue are not found in the original patent. The claim in that patent to the swivel-jointed nozzle and pipes A B D E, combined with the other parts of the machine, and to nothing else, was, under the decisions of this court, an abandonment and dedication to the public of subcombinations less than the whole combination, after an unexplained delay such as that in the present case. The 2d and 3d claims of the second reissue are claims to such subcombinations. It was not indicated in the specification of the original patent that Fisher considered his invention as consisting in anything less than a combination of all the elements embraced in the combination claimed in that patent.

In the recent case of Parker & Whipple Co. v. Yale Clock Co. 123 U. S. 87 [ante, 100], it was held that what was suggested or indicated in the original specification, drawings, or Patent Office model is not to be considered as a part of the invention intended to have been covered by the original patent, unless it can be seen from a comparison of the original and the reissued patents that the invention which the original patent was intended to cover embraced the things thus suggested or indicated in the original specification, drawings, or Patent Office model, and unless the original specification indicated that those things were embraced in the invention intended to have been secured by the original patent; and that, where it did not appear that any attempt had been made to secure by the original patent the inventions covered by the new claims in the reissue, those inventions must be regarded as having been abandoned or waived, so far as the reissue was concerned.

The plaintiffs contend that it appears from the testimony of Fisher that it was the result of the suit of Fisher v. Craig, brought on the first reissue, which convinced him that that reissue was inoperative, and that he took out the second reissue to remedy the defect in the first; and that the delay in taking out the second reissue is explained by the fact that the suit on the first reissue was pending. But we have not before us the proceedings in the suit of Fisher v. Craig, to such an extent as to be able to form any intelligent judgment upon the question as to how far the proceedings in that suit bear upon the question of the delay in taking out the second reissue. If the plaintiffs desired to avail themselves of those proceedings to show such excuse, it was their duty to have brought them before us, if they were a part of the evidence in this case under the stipulation above referred to. Although the defendants did not incorporate them in the record, and although the clerk of the court below, in making his return to this court, certifies that what is contained in the transcript is a "full, true and correct copy of the record (excepting models), and of all proceedings in the above and therein entitled cause, and that the same together constitute the transcript on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in said cause," such certificate being entitled in the present cause, it was perfectly competent for the plaintiffs to have brought before this court, and it was their duty to have done so, by certiorari, any necessary parts of the record which the defendants had omitted to bring before us.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to the Circuit Court for the Northern District of California, with a direction to dismiss the bill, with costs.

JOHN F. HARTRANFT, Collector of Customs for the DISTRICT OF PHILADELPHIA, Plff. in Err.,

v.

JOSEPH B. SHEPPARD ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporters' ed. 337, 338.)

Duty on quilts.

Quilts composed of cotton and eider-down, or silk and eider-down, the eider-down in each case being the component material of chief value, are chargeable with the duty of 20 per centum ad valorem under section 2513, Act of March 3, 1883, 22 Stat. at L. 523, rather than 35 per centum as a manufacture of cotton, or 50 per centum as a manufacture of which silk is the component material of chief value.

[No. 191.]

Argued Feb. 17, 1888. Decided April 2, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, to review a judgment for plaintiff, in a suit to recover back duties illegally paid. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Frank P. Prichard, for defendants in error.

The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Chief Justice Waite, was delivered by the court as its opinion:

The single question in this case is, whether quilts composed of cotton and eider-down, or silk and eider-down, the eider-down in each case being the component material of chief value, are dutiable, on importation into the United States, as manufactures of cotton or of silk, not enumerated, at 35 per centum ad valorem if of cotton, and at 50 per centum ad valorem if of silk, or at 20 per centum ad valorem as manufactured articles not enumerated, the latter being the amount admitted to be due by the importer in his protest. The Collector demanded the highest rates, which were paid; and this suit was brought to recover back the difference between these amounts and a duty of 20 per cent.

The case depends upon the effect to be given the following provisions of the Act of March 3, 1883, chap. 121, 22 Stat. at L. 488: "Cotton cords, braids, gimps, galloons, webbing, goring, suspenders, braces, and all manufactures of cotton, not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act, and corsets, of whatever material composed, thirty-five per centum ad valorem." § 2502, schedule I, p. 506. The quilts made of cotton and eider-down were assessed under that provision.

"All goods, wares, and merchandise, not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act, made of silk, or of which silk is the component material of chief value, fifty per centum ad valorem." Id. schedule L, p. 510. Those of silk and eider-down were assessed under that provision.

"There shall be levied, collected, and paid, on the importation of all raw or unmanufactured articles, not herein enumerated or provided for, a duty of ten per centum ad valorem; and all articles manufactured, in whole or in part, not herein enumerated or provided for, a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem." § 2513, p. 523. The claim of the importer was that the articles should be assessed at twenty per centum under that section.

By § 2499, p. 491, it was provided as follows: "And on all articles manufactured from two or more materials the duty shall be assessed at the highest rates at which the component material of chief value may be chargeable. If two or more rates of duty should be applicable to any imported article, it shall be classified for duty under the highest of such rates; Provided, That nonenumerated articles similar in material and quality and texture, and the use to which they may be applied, to articles on the free list, and in the manufacture of which no dutiable materials are used, shall be free."

Quilts are nonenumerated manufactured articles, composed of two or more materials. Eider-down is on the free list. § 2503, p. 518. As eider-down is the component material of chief value in the quilts involved in this suit, and that is free, it follows that they are manufactured articles not provided for, and therefore chargeable with the duty of 20 per centum ad valorem under § 2513, rather than 35 per centum as a manufacture of cotton, or 50 per centum as a manufacture of which silk is the component material of chief value.

As such was the opinion of the court below, its judgment to that effect is affirmed.

JOHN C. SPENCER, Plff. in Err.,

v.

CAROLINE L. MERCHANT, EXRX. of JOHN MERCHANT, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 345–361.)

Federal question—legislative power to tax—decision final—Act, when constitutional—exorbitant sum—validity of assessment.

1. Where plaintiff in the state court contended that a statute of the State was unconstitutional and void because it was an attempt by the Legislature to validate a void assessment without giving the owners of the lands assessed an opportunity to be heard upon the assessment, the adverse judgment of such court, affirmed by the court of appeals of the State, necessarily involved a decision against a right claimed under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which this court has jurisdiction to review.

2. The Legislature may commit the ascertainment of the sum to be raised by a tax, and of the benefited district, to commissioners, but is not bound to do so, and may settle both questions for itself; and when it does so its action is conclusive and beyond review.

3. The question of special benefit, and the property to which it extends, is of necessity a question of fact; and when the Legislature determines it in a case within its general power, its decision is final.

4. Where a hearing is given by the taxing Act as to the apportionment among the land owners, which furnishes to them an opportunity to raise all pertinent and available questions, and to dispute their liability, or its amount and extent, such hearing was sufficient and the Act, in that respect, was constitutional.

5. Where the work is one which the State has the authority to do, and to pay for by assessment on the property benefited, objections that the sum raised is exorbitant, and that part of the property assessed was not benefited, present no question under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution upon which this court can review the decision of the state court.

* Died March 23, 1888. [Ed.]

6. It is no objection to the validity of a new assessment made by the Legislature that it includes interest upon the unpaid part of an old assessment and part of the expense of levying that assessment.

[No. 872.]

Submitted Jan. 10, 1887. Submission set aside and case restored to docket for argument before full bench, Mar. 7, 1887. Resubmitted Feb. 7, 1888. Decided April 2, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of New York, to review a judgment of that court, for the defendant, in regard to the validity of an assessment, upon an agreed state of facts. Affirmed.

Reported below, 1 Cent. Rep. 741, 100 N. Y. 585.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This case was submitted to the general term in Kings County of the Supreme Court of the State of New York under section 1279 of the Code of Civil Procedure, without process, upon an agreed statement of facts signed by the parties, the substance of which, and of the statutes therein referred to, was as follows:

On June 20, 1883, the parties made a contract in writing, by which the plaintiff agreed to sell to the defendant a parcel of land in the Town of New Lots in that county, and to execute and deliver a deed thereof, with full covenants of warranty, and free of all incumbrances, in consideration of the sum of $8,000, part of which was paid, and the rest was payable on delivery of the deed. Upon examination, the defendant discovered that there remained unpaid on the land an assessment of $1,221.78, with interest from November 8, 1881, and demanded that the plaintiff should pay it, but he refused. The assessment was made under the following circumstances:

By the Statute of the State of New York of 1869, chapter 217, as amended by the Statute of 1870, chapter 619, it was enacted in § 1, that the supreme court held in the County of Kings should, upon the application of one or more freeholders of the Town of New Lots, appoint three commissioners, who, by § 2, should immediately proceed to lay out in that town a street or avenue in continuation of Atlantic Avenue in the City of Brooklyn, and by § 3, take the land lying within the boundaries of the avenue so laid out, and after public notice in two or more newspapers of the county, "at least twenty days before meeting for that purpose, of their intention to proceed to make the award and assessment required by this Act, and of the time when and the place where they will meet for that purpose, at which meeting all persons interested may appear and be heard in relation to the said award and assessment," award damages to the owners of those lands, and assess the amount of the award and the attendant expenses upon the lands lying within three hundred feet on either side of the avenue, which in their judgment should be benefited by opening and extending it, and report such award and assessment to the court for confirmation, after public notice that all persons having any objection to it might be heard before the court; and that upon its confirmation the amount of the assessment should be added by the county supervisors to and made part of the annual taxes for three years, one third each year, with interest on the portions unpaid, and, when collected, be paid over to the owners of the lands taken.

The Statute of 1869, as amended by the statute of 1870, further provided, in § 4, that upon the confirmation of the report as to the opening of the street, the commissioners should be authorized to enter upon the land taken, to cause it to be regulated, prepared and graded for public travel, and to assess the expense of such regulating, grading and preparing for travel "upon the lands and premises which, in their judgment, shall be benefited by such improvement, in proportion to the benefit accruing to them by reason thereof, the district of assessment to extend back as provided heretofore in this Act;" and that the amounts so assessed, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent a year from the making of the assessment, should be added to and made a part of the annual taxes for the ensuing year upon the lands assessed, and, when collected, be applied to the payment of bonds issued under that statute.

The commissioners were appointed, laid out the street, and regulated, graded and prepared it for travel, and made the award and assessments, as directed by the statutes aforesaid. The assessment made under § 4 for the expense of regulating, grading and preparing the street for travel, amounted to more than $100,000. The sums so assessed upon some lots were paid; but the sums assessed upon other lots remained unpaid, the owners of these lots contesting the validity of the assessment. The principal amount of the unpaid part of that assessment, being $40,664.96, was returned for five years as uncollected by the treasurer of Kings County to the comptroller of the State, and, together with interest thereon at the yearly rate of 5 per cent and amounting to $8,293.33, was paid or credited in account by the State to the treasurer of Kings County. On June 18, 1878, the court of appeals declared that assessment void. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183. On January 29, 1879, the comptroller of the State canceled the unpaid assessment, and charged the county with the amount thereof, being $40,664.96, together with the interest thereon to February 1, 1879, amounting to $8,293.33.

On August 12, 1881, the Legislature of New York, by the Statute of 1881, chapter 689, directed the board of supervisors of Kings County to levy on the assessment roll of the Town of New Lots for 1881, upon the lands, the assessment made upon which, under § 4 of the Act of 1869, had been so cancelled by the comptroller, and charged to the County of Kings, "a sum equitably apportioned among the several parcels comprising said lands, which shall be sufficient to refund to the State of New York the sum its due by reason of such cancellation, which sum, amounting to $40,664.96, was duly credited August 28, 1876, by the comptroller of said State to the treasurer of Kings County, and the interest charged thereon by said comptroller, as required by law, to February 1, 1879, amounting to $8,293.33, together with further interest thereon, at 6 per centum per annum from February 1, 1879, to the date of such levy. Before proceeding to levy such sums, the said board shall apportion the same among the several parcels of land hereinbefore mentioned, and said board shall give ten days' notice of the time and place when they will meet to make such apportionment, which notice shall be published daily in a newspaper published in the County of Kings; and all parties interested in said lands shall be entitled to be heard before said board, upon the question of said apportionment." The Statute of 1881 further provided that the sums so levied should be collected by the collector of taxes in the Town of New Lots, and paid over to the county treasurer, and by him applied "to pay the amount so due the State of New York by reason of such cancellation."

Under and pursuant to this statute, the supervisors of Kings County added to the aforesaid sums of $40,664.96, being the unpaid balance of the previous assessment, and $8,293.83, being the interest thereon to February 1, 1879, further interest thereon at the yearly rate of 6 per cent from that date to November 3, 1881, the day of the final conclusion of their report, and assessed and levied the aggregate sum of $55,653.52 upon the plaintiff's and other lots.

The lots so assessed were isolated parcels, not contiguous, and many of them not fronting on the avenue. Most of the territory benefited as fixed by the Statute of 1869, and a great portion of the original assessment, was not included in the Statute of 1881, nor directed to be taken into consideration in making the new assessment. But this assessment included a proportionate part of the expenses of the former assessment, which had been declared void by the court of appeals.

The case stated by the parties, after setting forth the foregoing facts, continued and concluded as follows:

"The plaintiff claims that said assessment of 1881 in question is not a lien or cloud on the title to said premises; and the defendant refuses to pay the balance of said consideration until the plaintiff allows it to be deducted from the consideration money or pays the same, neither of which is the plaintiff willing to do; and the plaintiff also claims that the Statute of 1881, chapter 689, is unconstitutional, and therefore void, for the reason that it is an attempt made by the Legislature of this State to validate a void assessment (and to do the same without giving the property holders an opportunity to be heard as to the total amount of the assessment, only providing for a hearing on the apportionment), which was levied upon said premises under and pursuant to chapter 217 of the laws of 1869, as amended by chapter 619 of the laws of 1870; and that the Statute of 1881 is clearly void for the further reasons that the defect in the former assessment was jurisdictional, and it has been so declared and decided by the court of appeals in the case of Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, and is special and invidious, and unjustly and illegally apportioned upon certain individuals without reference to a uniform standard, and is an arbitrary exaction, and is levied on an individual or individuals to the exclusion of others in the same district. The defendant doubts the said claim of the plaintiff. The question submitted to the court upon this case is as follows:

"Is the assessment levied on the property in 1881 in question a good and valid lien or cloud on said property?

"If this question is answered in the affirmative, then judgment is to be rendered in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff, requiring the plaintiff to pay said assessment and to deliver a deed according to contract.

"If it be answered in the negative, then judgment is to be rendered in favor of the plaintiff, requiring the defendant to take title to said premises in accordance with the contract above mentioned without the plaintiff paying said assessment or tax, and without deducting the same out of the consideration money."

The Supreme Court of New York gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed to the court of appeals, which affirmed the judgment and remitted the case to the supreme court. 100 N. Y. 585 [1 Cent. Rep. 741]. The plaintiff sued out this writ of error, and assigned for error that it appeared by the record that both those courts held that the Statute of 1881, chapter 689, and the proceedings under it were constitutional and valid, "whereas, the said courts should have decided that the said statute and the proceedings thereunder were in violation of the Constitution of the United States and were void, for the reason that they deprived the said plaintiff and the other persons assessed thereunder of their property without due process of law."

Messrs. Matthew Hale and Albert Day, for plaintiff in error:

The canceled assessments referred to were originally imposed under chapter 217 of the Laws of 1869, as amended by chapter 619 of the Laws of 1870, which Act, so far as it authorized the assessment in question, was held to be unconstitutional and void, as depriving the parties assessed of their property without due process of law, by the Court of Appeals of the State of New York.

Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183; Horn v. New Lots, 83 N. Y. 100.

These decisions of the court of appeals have been cited with approval in the courts of the United States.

R. R. Tax Cases, 18 Fed. Rep. 753, 763, 764; Santa Clara County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 410; Burns v. Multnomah R. Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 177, 188.

This court has jurisdiction of the case. The validity of the New York Statute, chapter 689 of the Laws of 1881, and of the authority exercised thereunder, was drawn in question on the ground of its being repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and the decision of the state court was in favor of its validity.

Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574 (28: 1084).

The statute in question was unconstitutional and void.

Stuart v. Palmer, and Horn v. New Lots, supra.

The Legislature cannot validate an unconstitutional Act or any Act which it might not have previously authorized.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 881, 4th ed. 477; Albany City Nat. Bank v. Malter, 9 Fed. Rep. 884, 885.

Chapter 689 of 1881 violates each and every of the principles stated above.

The sums attempted to be levied on the lands in question are so levied without reference to special benefits to the lots assessed.

People v. Gold & Stock Tel. Co. 98 N. Y. 67, 79, 80; Lane County v. Oregon, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 71, 80 (19: 101, 105); Hill. Tax. 16; Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. L. 398; Peirce v. Boston, 3 Met. 520; Shaw v. Peckett, 26 Vt. 482; 1 Desty, Tax. 9.

Interest could be charged in any case only as damages for a failure to meet a valid obligation.

O'Brien v. Young, 95 N. Y. 428.

Mr. Walter E. Ward, for defendant in error:

The statute complained of, to wit, chapter 689 of the Laws of 1881, is constitutional and valid.

Due process of law is a restraint upon the legislative as well as the executive and judicial powers of the government.

Murray v. Hoboken Land & I. Co. 59 U. S. 18 How. 272 (15: 372).

Levying of an assessment without any notice to the property owners is the taking of property, under the Constitution, without due process of law.

Cooley, Tax. 265; Overing v. Foote, 65 N. Y. 263; Philadelphia v. Miller, 49 Pa. 440; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97 (24: 616), 17 Alb. L. J. 223.

Before an assessment can be laid and property taken by due process of law, some notice must be given. It is, however, the province of the Legislature to prescribe the kind of notice and the mode in which it may be given. It cannot dispense with all notice.

Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 184.

The Legislature of the State of New York had power, upon providing for the giving of notice as above set out, to place any tax upon property for public purposes that it saw fit. Its power of taxation to that extent is unlimited.

Weismer v. Douglas, 64 N. Y. 91; Re Van Antwerp, 56 N. Y. 261.

It may be that exaction in such matters may be oppressive and unjust, still it is unlimited.

Litchfield v. Vernon, 41 N. Y. 123; People v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 427; Horn v. New Lots, 83 N. Y. 100.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The leading facts of this case are as follows: The original assessment of the expenses of regulating, grading and preparing the street for travel was laid by commissioners, as directed by § 4 of the Statute of 1869, upon all the lands lying within three hundred feet on either side of the street, and which, in the judgment of the commissioners, would be benefited by the improvement. After the sums so assessed upon some lots had been paid, the Court of Appeals of the State declared that assessment void, because the statute (although it made ample provision for notice of and hearing upon the previous assessment for laying out the street under § 3), provided no means by which the landowners might have any notice or opportunity to be heard in regard to the assessment for regulating, grading and preparing the street for travel under § 4. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183. The lots, the sums assessed upon which had not been paid, were isolated parcels, not contiguous, and some of them not fronting upon the street. By the Statute of 1881, a sum equal to so much of the original assessment as remained unpaid, adding a proportional part of the expenses of making that assessment, and interest since, was ordered by the Legislature to be levied and equitably apportioned by the supervisors of the county upon and among these lots, after public notice to all parties interested to appear and be heard upon the question of such apportionment; and that sum was levied and assessed accordingly upon these lots, one of which was owned by the plaintiff.

The question submitted to the Supreme Court of the State was whether this assessment on the plaintiff's lot was valid. He contended that the Statute of 1881 was unconstitutional and void, because it was an attempt by the Legislature to validate a void assessment, without giving the owners of the lands assessed an opportunity to be heard upon the whole amount of the assessment. He thus directly, and in apt words, presented the question whether he had been unconstitutionally deprived of his property without due process of law, in violation of the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as well as of art. 1, § 7, of the Constitution of New York; and no specific mention of either constitutional provision was necessary in order to entitle him to a decision of the question by any court having jurisdiction to determine it. The adverse judgment of the supreme court, affirmed by the Court of Appeals of the State, necessarily involved a decision against a right claimed under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which this court has jurisdiction to review. Bridge Propr. v. Hoboken Land & I. Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 116, 142 [17: 571, 575]; Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 432, 442 [24: 760, 761]; Furman v. Nichol, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 44, 56 [19: 370, 375]; Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574, 579 [28: 1084, 1086].

The jurisdiction of this court, as is well understood, does not extend to a review of the judgment of the state court, so far as it depended upon the Constitution of the State. Provident Sav. Institution v. Jersey City, 113 U. S. 506, 514 [28: 1102, 1105]. Yet, as the words of the two Constitutions are alike in this respect, the decisions of the highest court of the State upon the effect of these words are entitled to great weight. The substance of the former decisions, and the grounds of the judgment sought to be reviewed, can hardly be more compactly or forcibly stated than they have been by Judge Finch in delivering the opinion of the court of appeals, as follows:

"The Act of 1881 determines absolutely and conclusively the amount of tax to be raised, and the property to be assessed and upon which it is to be apportioned. Each of these things was within the power of the Legislature, whose action cannot be reviewed in the courts, upon the ground that it acted unjustly or without appropriate and adequate reason. Litchfield v. Vernon, 41 N. Y. 123, 141; People v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 427; People v. Flagg, 46 N. Y. 405; Horn v. New Lots, 83 N. Y. 100; Cooley, Tax. 450. The Legislature may commit the ascertainment of the sum to be raised and of the benefited district to commissioners, but is not bound to do so, and may settle both questions for itself; and when it does so, its action is necessarily conclusive and beyond review. Here an improvement has been ordered and made, the expense of which might justly have been imposed upon adjacent property benefited by the change. By the Act of 1881, the Legislature imposes the unpaid portion of the cost and expense, with the interest thereon, upon that portion of the property benefited which has thus far borne none of the burden. In so doing, it neccessarily determines two things, viz., the amount to be realized, and the property specially benefited by the expenditure of that amount. The lands might have been benefited by the improvement, and so the legislative determination that they were, and to what amount or proportion of the cost, even if it may have been mistakenly unjust, is not open to our review. The question of special benefit and the property to which it extends is of necessity a question of fact; and when the Legislature determines it in a case within its general power, its decision must of course be final. We can see in the determination reached possible sources of error and perhaps even of injustice, but we are not at liberty to say that the tax on the property covered by the Law of 1881 was imposed without reference to special benefits. The Legislature practically determined that the lands described in that Act were peculiarly benefited by the improvement to a certain specified amount which constituted a just proportion of the whole cost and expense; and while it may be that the process by which the result was reached was not the best attainable, and some other might have been more accurate and just, we cannot for that reason question an enactment within the general legislative power. That power of taxation is unlimited, except that it must be exercised for public purposes. Weismer v. Douglas, 64 N. Y. 91. Certainly, if the Acts of 1869 and 1870 had never been passed, but the improvement of Atlantic Avenue had been ordered, the Legislature might have imposed one part or proportion of the cost upon one designated district and the balance upon another. Practically just that was done in this case. In Re Van Antwerp, 56 N. Y. 261, an assessment for a street improvement had been declared void by reason of failure to procure necessary consents of property owners. The Legislature made a reassessment, imposing two thirds of the expense upon a benefited district and one third upon the city at large. The Act was held valid as a new assessment and not an effort to validate a void one.

"These views furnish also an answer to the objection that the only hearing given to the landowner relates to the apportionment of the fixed amount among the lots assessed, and none is given as to the aggregate to be collected. No hearing would open the discretion of the Legislature, or be of any avail to review or change it. A hearing is given by the Act as to the apportionment among the landowners, which furnishes to them an opportunity to raise all pertinent and available questions, and dispute their liability, or its amount and extent. The precise wrong of which complaint is made appears to be that the landowners now assessed never had opportunity to be heard as to the original apportionment, and find themselves now practically bound by it as between their lots and those of the owners who paid. But that objection becomes a criticism upon the action of the Legislature and the process by which it determined the amount to be raised and the property to be assessed. Unless by special permission, that is a hearing never granted in the process of taxation. The Legislature determines expenditures and amounts to be raised for their payment, the whole discussion and all questions of prudence and propriety and justice being confided to its jurisdiction. It may err, but the courts cannot review its discretion. In this case, it kept within its power when it fixed, first, the amount to be raised to discharge the improvement debt incurred by its direction; and, second, when it designated the lots and property, which in its judgment, by reason of special benefits, should bear the burden; and having the power we cannot criticise the reasons or manner of its action. The landowners were given a hearing, and so there was no constitutional objection in that respect. Nor was that hearing illusory. It opened to the landowner an opportunity to assail the constitutional validity of the Act under which alone an apportionment could be made, and that objection failing, it opened the only other possible questions, of the mode and amounts of the apportionment itself. We think the Act was constitutional." 100 N. Y. 587-589.

The general principles, upon which that judgment rests, have been affirmed by the decisions of this court.

The power to tax belongs exclusively to the legislative branch of the government. U. S. v. New Orleans, 98 U. S. 381, 392 [25:225]; Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 472 [26:197]. In the words of Chief Justice Chase, condensing what had been said long before by Chief Justice Marshall: "The judicial department cannot prescribe to the legislative department limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged powers. The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons; but the responsibility of the Legislature is not to the courts, but to the people by whom its members are elected." Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 533, 548 [19:482, 487]; McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 316, 428 [4:579, 606]; Providence Bank v. Billings, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 514, 563 [7: 939, 956]. See also Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 491, 497 [25:558, 561]. Whether the estimate of the value of land for the purpose of taxation exceeds its true value, this court on writ of error to a state court cannot inquire. Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 80 [26:658, 659].

The Legislature, in the exercise of its power of taxation, has the right to direct the whole or a part of the expense of a public improvement, such as the laying out, grading or repairing of a street, to be assessed upon the owners of lands benefited thereby; and the determination of the territorial district which should be taxed for a local improvement is within the province of legislative discretion. Willard v. Presbury, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 676 [20:719]; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97 [24:616]; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 703, 704 [26:238, 241, 242]; Hagar v. Reclamation District, 111 U. S. 701 [28:569]. If the Legislature provides for notice to and hearing of each proprietor, at some stage of the proceedings, upon the question what proportion of the tax shall be assessed upon his land, there is no taking of his property without due process of law. McMillen v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 37 [24:335]; Davidson v. New Orleans and Hagar v. Reclamation District, above cited.

In Davidson v. New Orleans it was held that if the work was one which the State had the authority to do, and to pay for by assessments on the property benefited, objections that the sum raised was exorbitant and that part of the property assessed was not benefited presented no question under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, upon which this court could review the decision of the state court. 96 U. S. 100, 106 [24:618, 620].

In the absence of any more specific constitutional restriction than the general prohibition against taking property without due process of law, the Legislature of the State, having the power to fix the sum necessary to be levied for the expense of a public improvement, and to order it to be assessed, either like other taxes, upon property generally, or only upon the lands benefited by the improvement, is authorized to determine both the amount of the whole tax, and the class of lands which will receive the benefit and should therefore bear the burden, although it may if it sees fit, commit the ascertainment of either or both of these facts to the judgment of commissioners.

When the determination of the lands to be benefited is entrusted to commissioners, the owners may be entitled to notice and hearing upon the question whether their lands are benefited and how much. But the Legislature has the power to determine, by the statute imposing the tax, what lands, which might be benefited by the improvement, are in fact benefited; and if it does so, its determination is conclusive upon the owners and the courts, and the owners have no right to be heard upon the question whether their lands are benefited or not, but only upon the validity of the assessment, and its apportionment among the different parcels of the class which the Legislature has conclusively determined to be benefited.

In determining what lands are benefited by the improvement, the Legislature may avail itself of such information as it deems sufficient, either through investigations by its committees, or by adopting as its own the estimates or conclusions of others, whether those estimates or conclusions previously had or had not any legal sanction.

In section 4 of the Statute of 1869, the assessment under which was held void in Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, for want of any provision whatever for notice or hearing, the authority to determine what lands, lying within three hundred feet on either side of the street, were actually benefited, was delegated to commissioners.

But in the Statute of 1881 the Legislature itself determined what lands were benefited and should be assessed. By this statute the Legislature, in substance and effect, assumed that all the lands within the district defined in the Statute of 1869 were benefited in a sum equal to the amount of the original assessment, the expense of levying it, and interest thereon; and determined that the lots upon which no part of that assessment had been paid, and which had therefore as yet borne no share of the burden, were benefited to the extent of a certain portion of this sum. That these lots as a whole had been benefited to this extent was conclusively settled by the Legislature. The Statute of 1881 afforded to the owners notice and hearing upon the question of the equitable apportionment among them of the sum directed to be levied upon all of them, and thus enabled them to contest the constitutionality of the statute; and that was all the notice and hearing to which they were entitled.

It is objected to the validity of the new assessment that it included interest upon the unpaid part of the old assessment, and a proportionate part of the expense of levying that assessment. But, as to these items, the case does not substantially differ from what it would have been if a sum equal to the whole of the original assessment, including the expense of levying it, and adding the interest, had been ordered by the Statute of 1881 to be levied upon all the lands within the district, allowing to each owner, who had already paid his share of the original assessment, a credit for the sum so paid by him, with interest from the time of payment.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice Matthews, dissenting:

I am unable to agree with the judgment of the court in this case, and will state very briefly the ground of my dissent.

In Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 188, the Court of Appeals of the State of New York declared the Statute of the State of New York of 1869, chapter 217, as amended by the Statute of 1870, chapter 619, and the assessment made in pursuance thereof, to be unconstitutional and void. In the opinion of the court in that case, delivered by Earl, Judge, and which was the unanimous opinion of the court, the ground of its judgment was stated as follows, p. 188: "I am of opinion that the Constitution sanctions no law imposing such an assessment without a notice to, and a hearing or an opportunity of hearing, by the owners of the property to be assessed. It is not enough that the owners may by chance have notice, or that they may as a matter of favor have a hearing. The law must require notice to them, and give them a right to a hearing, and an opportunity to be heard. It matters not, upon the question of the constitutionality of such a law, that the assessment has in fact been fairly apportioned. The constitutional validity of law is to be tested, not by what has been done under it, but by what may by its authority be done. The Legislature may prescribe the kind of notice, and the mode in which it shall be given, but it cannot dispense with all notice." And, on page 190, it was further said: "The Legislature can no more arbitrarily impose an assessment, for which property may be taken and sold, than it can render a judgment against a person without a hearing. It is a rule founded upon the first principles of natural justice, older than written constitutions, that a citizen shall not be deprived of his life, liberty, or property without an opportunity to be heard in defense of his rights; and the constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of these 'without due process of law,' has its foundation in this rule. This provision is the most important guaranty of personal rights to be found in the Federal or State Constitutions. It is a limitation upon an arbitrary power, and is a guaranty against arbitrary legislation. No citizen shall arbitrarily be deprived of his life, liberty, or property. This the Legislature cannot do, nor authorize to be done. 'Due process of law' is not confined to judicial proceedings, but extends to every case which may deprive a citizen of life, liberty, or property, whether the proceeding be judicial, administrative, or executive in its nature. Weimer v. Bunbury, 30 Mich. 201. This great guaranty is always and everywhere present to protect the citizen against arbitrary interference with these sacred rights."

Accordingly, the assessment for the expense of regulating and grading the avenue under the Act of 1869, as amended by the Act of 1870, was declared null and void as against parties refusing to pay.

Subsequently, by the Statute of 1881, chapter 689, the Legislature of New York directed the levy to be made upon the lands, the assessment made upon which under the Act of 1869 had been declared void and canceled, of the same sum which had been assessed under the Act of 1869, together with interest thereon to February 1, 1879, amounting to $8,298.33, and further interest thereon at 6 per cent per annum from February 1, 1879, to the date of such levy. This Act required the Board of Supervisors of Kings County to apportion this sum among the several parcels of land mentioned, after giving ten days' notice of the time and place when they would meet to make such apportionment, to the parties interested in said lands, who should be entitled to be heard before the board upon the question of the apportionment. It is to be observed, however, that this apportionment is only to be made as between the lands in respect to which the prior assessment had been canceled as being void. The question of the original apportionment between those lands and the remaining lands, on which the owners had paid the first assessment, was not left open under the Act of 1881. By this Act, therefore, the owners of the lands in question were deprived of the opportunity of being heard upon the question whether the apportionment as between them and the other landowners, embraced within the original assessment district for the same improvement, was equitable and fair. They were, therefore, deprived by the Act of 1881 of the very thing of which they were deprived by the Act of 1869, on account of which the Court of Appeals of New York held the latter Act to be unconstitutional and void. It is impossible for me, therefore, to reconcile the opinion of the Court of Appeals of New York now under review and the opinion of the same court in the case of Stuart v. Palmer. The same objection applies to both statutes with equal force. As I think the court of appeals was right in its judgment upon the first statute, I am of opinion that its judgment upon the Act of 1881, involved in this writ of error, should be reversed.

The argument against this conclusion, which seems to be chiefly relied on, is, that in the Act of 1881 the Legislature made a new assessment upon a new assessment district created for that purpose by the statute, and fixed the whole amount to be raised, leaving the question of apportionment open as between the parties, upon notice and a hearing; and that all this was within the admitted competency of the legislative power of the State, the exercise of which cannot be construed as depriving the parties of their property without due process of law. But it seems to be a mere evasion to say that this was an original assessment upon a district created by law for that purpose, consisting of the lands adjudged by the Legislature to be benefited by the improvement. The improvement was ordered by the Act of 1869, and the assessment district was created by it; and so far as the laying out of the street and the appropriation of private property for that purpose, and awarding damages to the owners thereof, and assessing the amount of such awards, and the attendant expenses upon the lands lying within three hundred feet on either side of the avenue, which in the judgment of the commissioners should be benefited by opening and extending the street, that Act and what was thus far done under it were not invalidated, but were held to be in conformity with the Constitution. In the Act of 1881, the Legislature of New York did not profess to undo anything which had been done under the Act of 1869, and certainly did not begin de novo in dealing with the improvement. On the contrary, they took that portion of the old assessment for the expense of regulating, grading, and preparing the street for travel which remained unpaid, and which had been declared to be void, and revived it by a mere Act of legislation as against the parties who had been judicially declared not to be bound by it, adding interest upon it from the time when it was first charged to the State by virtue of the cancellation, as well as a part of the expenses incurred in making the original assessment. Such an Act of the Legislature seems to me to be in violation of that provision of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution which declares that no State shall deprive any person of his property without due process of law.

I am authorized by Mr. Justice Harlan to say that he concurs in these views.

STATE OF MISSOURI, ex rel. JOHN R. WALKER, Plff. in Err.,

v.

JOHN WALKER, State Auditor.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 339-345.)

Agency, when revocable—interest coupled with a power.

1. Where the fund commissioners of a State were authorized to and did employ an agent to prosecute claims of the State against the United States, and such agent gave security for the faithful performance of his duties, and it was agreed that he should receive certain commissions on the amount collected as full compensation for his services and expenses incurred, such agency was not irrevocable, as being coupled with an interest in the thing to be collected; but the State could revoke it, at its will, by an Act repealing the Act under which he was employed.

2. The interest coupled with a power, to make it irrevocable, must be an interest in the thing itself, and not an interest in that which is to be produced by the exercise of the power.

[No. 910.]

Submitted Feb. 15, 1888. Decided April 2, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri, to review a judgment of that court denying a writ of mandamus on the Auditor of that State to require him to deliver to an agent of the State a demand for collection. Affirmed.

Reported below in 2 West. Rep. 512, 88 Mo. 279.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. William M. Williams, for plaintiff in error:

A State can no more impair the obligation of its own contract than it can one between individuals.

Davis v. Gray, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 203 ((21: 447); Hall v. Wisconsin, 103 U. S. 5 (26:302); Story, Const. 4th ed. §§ 1385, 1386.

The employment of an attorney to collect a claim, the attorney to be paid a certain part of the proceeds collected, is a power coupled with an interest; and even the death of an administrator who made the contract cannot terminate the employment. The administrator's successor is bound by the contract.

Jeffries v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 110 U. S. 305, 310 (28:156, 158); Hunt v. Rousmanier, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 174 (5:589).

What is implied in a contract, pleading, or statute, is as much a part of it as what is expressed.

U. S. v. Babbit, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 55 (17:94).

The object of construction is to find out what the parties intended to do.

Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Hill, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 94 (21:64).

Statutes are to be construed as operating prospectively.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 3d ed. p. 63; State v. Grant, 79 Mo. 119; State v. Greer, 78 Mo. 188.

Where power is coupled with an interest, or where it is given for a valuable consideration, or where it is part of a security, then, unless there is an express stipulation that it shall be revocable, it is irrevocable, whether it is expressed to be so on the face of the instrument conferring the authority or not.

Story, Ag. 9th ed. § 477; Jeffries v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. supra; U. S. v. Linn, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 315 (10: 751); McConnell v. Brayner, 63 Mo. 464, 465; Marsiou v. Pioche, 8 Cal. 535, 536; Walker v. Denison, 86 Ill. 142; Bruce v. Schuyler, 9 Ill. 278.

This cause coming to this court under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act, only the questions mentioned in the Act can be reviewed here.

Rector v. Ashley, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 143 (18: 733).

Mr. B. G. Boone, Atty-Gen. of Missouri, for defendant in error:

A principal who employs an agent may revoke the appointment at any time.

Story, Ag, 9th ed. § 463; Walker v. Denison, 86 Ill. 142; Blackstone v. Buttermore, 53 Pa. 266; Peacock v. Cummings, 46 Pa. 434; Chambers v. Seay, 73 Ala. 372.

It is only when the agent's power is coupled with an interest that it is irrevocable.

Hunt v. Rousmanier, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 174 (5: 589); Hartley's Appeal, 53 Pa. 212; Jeffries v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 110 U. S. 305-310 (28: 156-158); Brown v. Pforr, 88 Cal. 550; Hutchins v. Hebbard, 34 N. Y. 24.

A power coupled with an interest is a power which accompanies or is connected with an interest in something then in existence. If the interest is in that which is produced by the exercise of the power then it is not a power coupled with an interest.

Barr v. Schroeder, 32 Cal. 609; Coffin v. Landis, 46 Pa. 426; Gilbert v. Holmes, 64 Ill. 548; Attrill v. Patterson, 58 Md. 226.

A mere power to collect money and receive property, the agent to have one half of the net proceeds as compensation, is not a power coupled with an interest, and is revocable.

Bancroft v. Ashhurst, 2 Grant, Cas. 518.

The interest which an agent must have, in order to render his power irrevocable, must be an interest in the property on which the power is to be exercised, and not an interest in the money to be derived from the sale of property.

Blackstone v. Buttermore, 53 Pa. 266.

If the property is money and the agent's interest has been fixed by agreement with the principal before any power is attempted to be exercised, it will be irrevocable.

Jeffries v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 110 U. S. 305 (28:156).

The relation which plaintiff in error sustained to the State of Missouri was that of a mere agent.

Act March 19, 1881; Sess. Act Mo. 163; State v. Walker, 2 West. Rep. 512, 88 Mo. 279.

In the case at bar, the power granted not being coupled with an interest, no contract right was impaired by the repeal of the Act.

Simpson v. Carson, 11 Oreg. 361; Phillips v. Howell, 60 Ga. 411.

Similar cases: East Saginaw Salt Mfg. Co. v. East Saginaw, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 373 (20: 611); Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. § 284; Durkee v. Board of Liquidation, 103 U. S. 646 (26: 598); Bishop's Fund v. Rider, 13 Conn. 87; Simpson v. Carson, supra; Lord v. Thomas, 64 N. Y. 107; People v. Banvard, 27 Cal. 470; Bryan v. Cattell, 15 Iowa, 538.

There was no stipulation or provision that any contract or employment that might be entered into under this Act should remain in perpetuity.

Newton v. Mahoning County, 100 U. S. 548 (25: 710); Butler v. Pennsylvania, 51 U. S. 10 How. 402 (13: 472); Conner v. Mayor of N. Y. 2 Sandf. 369; Pott v. Sheboygan County, 25 Wis. 506; Head v. Curators of Univ. 47 Mo. 221.

The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Chief Justice Waite, was delivered by the court as its opinion:

On the 10th of March, 1881, a statute was enacted by the General Assembly of Missouri, authorizing and empowering the Fund Commissioners of the State, if they deemed it expedient, to employ a competent agent to prosecute to final settlement before Congress and the proper departments at Washington certain specified claims of the State against the Government of the United States. The agent thus appointed was to give security for the faithful performance of his duties. He was to prosecute the claims at his own expense, and receive, as full compensation for his services, such commissions on the amount collected by him as might be agreed upon between himself and the Fund Commissioners, not exceeding 5 per cent on claims for money that had already been paid out by the State, and 15 per cent on the others. The officers of the United States were authorized to pay the agent his agreed commissions; but all other payments by the United States must be made to the treasurer of the State. Section 3 of this Act is as follows: "Sec. 3. With a view to the prompt and satisfactory settlement of the claims of this State against the Government of the United States, and referred to in this Act, the Adjutant-General, State Auditor, and other officers of the State having in their possession any papers, accounts, pay rolls, orders, receipts, vouchers, or other evidences of indebtedness necessary to the establishment of said claims, shall, upon the written order of the Governor, deliver to such agent all such papers, documents, pay rolls, receipts, vouchers, or other evidences of indebtedness (or authenticated copies of the same, where such copies will answer), and take his receipt for the same; and in all cases wherein it is held by the Government of the United States to be necessary to the establishment of said claims, that such original papers, pay rolls, vouchers, receipts, or orders, etc., should be filed in the departments at Washington, it shall be the duty of the agent, and he is hereby authorized, to deliver the same to the proper authorities to be so filed; but before delivering the said original papers he shall withdraw from file all authenticated copies of the same heretofore filed by this State, or the agents thereof; and in all cases wherein copies shall not have been made of such original papers, etc., as it may be necessary to file as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of said agent to prepare, or cause to be prepared, and properly authenticate, copies of the same, which copies so made, together with those heretofore made and by him withdrawn from file, as hereinabove provided for, shall be returned by such agent to the proper state officers of this State; and the fact of the return of such copies shall be by said officers, respectively, certified to the Governor of this State."

On the 28th of November, 1884, the Fund Commissioners, acting under the authority of this statute, employed John R. Walker as the agent of the State in that behalf, and agreed that he should receive for his services and expenses the maximum of compensation provided for. Walker accepted the employment, furnished the necessary security, and agreed, in consideration of the compensation specified, to proceed without delay to the prosecution of the claims. It is averred in the petition, that thereafter "he entered upon the discharge of the duties of his said employment, and has continued therein ever since, and has incurred large expense and expended a great deal of time, in and about the collection of said claims under his contract, and has faithfully demeaned himself in the prosecution of the same, and in the transaction of the business so entrusted to him;" but it does not appear, either in the pleadings or the proof, that any specific claim has ever been put in his hands for collection, or that anything has been done by any officer of the State under § 3 of the statute to furnish him the means of proceeding under his employment.

On the 28th of March, 1885, the Act of March 19, 1881, was repealed without any saving clause, and on the same day another statute was passed, providing for the authentication and payment of certain claims against the State for military service, and which were of the class in respect to which Walker had been employed as agent. The Act then provided for the delivery of these claims "to the agent for the collection of the claims of the State against the Government of the United States." Then followed section 8, of which this is a copy: "Sec. 8. It shall be the duty of the said agent of the State to prepare, present, and prosecute to settlement, the demands of the State for reimbursement by the Government of the United States, of such sums of money as may be paid out under the provisions of this Act; and as full compensation for such services, said agent shall receive the amount of his expenses actually incurred in the prosecution of said work; and when such collection shall have been made, said agent shall file a statement of his said expenses, verified by his oath, with the State Auditor, who shall thereupon draw his warrant upon the State Treasurer in favor of said agent for the amount of said bill of expense; Provided, however, That the amount paid on said bill of expense shall not exceed five per cent of the amount of the collection so made for the State."

Under this statute the claim of James P. Haynes, public administrator of Ray County, having in charge the estate of John King, deceased, was presented and allowed to the amount of $466.59; and Walker demanded it from the Auditor of State for collection from the United States under his employment as agent pursuant to the Act of 1881, but this was refused because that Act had been repealed. Thereupon Walker applied to the Supreme Court of the State for a mandamus on the auditor to make the delivery, his position being that the repealing Act of 1885 impaired the obligation of his contract with the State under the Act of 1881, and to that extent was void. The court denied the writ, and in so doing decided that the employment of Walker was "one of agency, pure and simple," which the State could revoke at its will, as it did by the repealing Act. For a review of a judgment based on that decision this writ of error was brought.

The Fund Commissioners were only authorized to employ an agent for the State, and to agree with him as to the commissions he should receive on the amount collected, as full compensation for his services, and all expenses incurred by him in that behalf. This they did, and there can be no doubt that the agency thus created was withdrawn by the repealing Act of 1885, unless a consideration was given for it, or it was so coupled with an interest in the subject matter of the agency, that is to say, in the claims to be collected, as to make it irrevocable.

There was no consideration in money paid for the employment. The agreement to prosecute the claims faithfully is no more than would be implied in law from the acceptance of the appointment; and the provision for the payment of expenses is only a declaration that the commissions stipulated for shall be in full for services and disbursements. There is nothing, therefore, in the consideration for the employment to prevent this agency from being revoked like any other.

The interest coupled with a power, to make it irrevocable, must be an interest in the thing itself. As was said by Chief Justice Marshall, in Hunt v. Rousmanier, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 174, 204 [5:589, 597], "The power must be engrafted on an estate in the thing. The words themselves seem to import this meaning. 'A power coupled with an interest' is a power which accompanies or is connected with an interest. The power and the interest are united in the same person. But if we are to understand by the word 'interest' an interest in that which is to be produced by the exercise of the power, then they are never united. The power, to produce the interest, must be exercised, and by its exercise is extinguished. The power ceases when the interest commences, and, therefore, cannot, in accurate law language, be said to be 'coupled' with it." Such is undoubtedly the rule.

Here there was no actual assignment of the claims or any part of them. Walker had no authority, under his employment, to take the money from the United States except to the extent of his commissions. The vouchers and evidences of debt were not turned over to him. All he could do was to present the claims in the name of the State and as its representative. He could not even get the vouchers or other evidences of debt which were necessary for the establishment of the claim, by application to the proper custodian, but must go to the Governor of the State for his written order directing their delivery to him. There is nothing whatever in the transaction, from the beginning to the end, which shows an intention on the part of the Legislature to part with any interest in or control over the claims, except to the extent of the commissions of the agent after they had been earned. Walker was given no power to compromise any claim. All he could do was to establish the claim, and, when the State was ready to pay it, take his commissions. Clearly such an agency is not irrevocable in law because of its being coupled with an interest in the thing to be collected. If the vouchers and other evidences of debt had actually been delivered to him for collection, and he had expended time or money under his employment, in endeavoring to make the collection, a revocation of his authority might not require him to return the papers he held until he was compensated for what he had already done; but that is not the question here, because the purpose of this suit is to get possession of new vouchers, not to assert a lien upon such as he already had in hand.

There is nothing in the cases of Hall v. Wisconsin, 103 U. S. 5 [26: 302] or of Jeffries v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 110 U. S. 305 [28: 156] in conflict with this. In Hall's Case the question was whether his employment was an office, or under a contract for work and labor, and it was held to be under a contract, because, although he was appointed a commissioner to make a "geological, mineralogical, and agricultural survey of the State," the law providing for the survey and for his appointment required that the Governor "make a written contract" with him for the performance of his allotted work, and "the compensation therefor;" and it also declared that "such contract shall expressly provide that the compensation to such commissioner shall be at a certain rate per annum, to be agreed upon, and not exceeding the rate of two thousand dollars per annum, and that payment will be made only for such part of the year" as he may actually be engaged in the discharge of his duty as such commissioner. The contract actually entered into was by its terms "to continue till the third day of March, 1863, unless the said Hall should be removed for incompetency or neglect of duty, * * * or unless a vacancy shall occur in his office by his own act or default." In deciding the case it was said: "In a sound view of the subject, it seems to us that the legal position of the plaintiff in error was not materially different from that of parties who, pursuant to law, enter into stipulations, limited, in point of time, with a State, for the erection, alteration, or repair of public buildings, or to supply the officers or employés who occupy them with fuel, light, stationery, and other things necessary for the public service." There was in that case a positive contract by the State for employment in a particular service, for a particular term, made under the authority of law; and because it was such a contract the State could not, any more than a private individual, rescind it at will. The employment in this case, however, has no such provision. There is no agreement as to time, and the matter stands precisely as that of Hall would, if a statute had been passed authorizing a geological, mineralogical, and agricultural survey of the State, and he had been employed to make it and receive for his services a compensation dependent on the amount of work actually done, or the time actually employed. It would hardly have been contended that under such a contract the State could not stop the survey and require Hall to quit work at any time it pleased. The difference between the two cases is the difference in the two contracts.

In Jeffries' Case the contract was by an administrator of a deceased person's estate with a firm of attorneys, to prosecute a doubtful claim, "for a portion of the proceeds, with full power to compromise it as they should please;" and we held that such an agency was not revoked by the death of the administrator who made the contract and the appointment of another in his place. The question was as to the validity of a compromise made by the attorneys, on that authority, after the death of the first administrator. In the present case there was no authority to compromise. Walker could do nothing to establish the claim. He could not even receive the money belonging to the State after he had got the allowance of the claim by the United States.

We find no error in the record and the judgment is affirmed.

MARY WALL ET AL., Appts.,

v.

GEORGE P. BISSELL ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 382–396.)

Executor's title—Indiana Statute as to power of executors—executor who has not qualified, release by—release by trustee—surviving creditor —release by.

1. The title of an executor to the personal property of his testator, being derived from the will, generally vests in him from the testator's death.
2. In Indiana, by statute, although the personal property vests, from the testator's death, in the executor named in his will, an executor cannot interfere with the estate further than to preserve the same until the issuing of letters testamentary.
3. In the absence of any state decision upon the point, this court declines to hold that a release of a mortgage made by an executor in Indiana who has never qualified, and to whom no letters have been issued, has any validity.
4. Such release, executed as trustee under the will, by one named as executor therein, but to whom letters have not been issued, is not valid. The testator cannot evade the statute by bequeathing personal property to a trustee and authorizing him to act as such without taking out letters testamentary.
5. Where the legal title to a bond and mortgage is in one as executor, but the title in the debt for which the bond and mortgage is security is in him as surviving creditor, he has the right as surviving creditor to release such mortgage, without taking out letters, although half of the consideration of the release would inure to the benefit of the estate of his testator and the other half to himself.
6. Such release, although executed by him as executor, is, by reason of his being surviving creditor, binding upon the interests of the representatives of the testator as well as upon his own.

[No. 22.]

Argued April 12, 13, 1887. Decided March 19, 1888.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, for the plaintiff, in a suit to foreclose mortgages. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was a bill in equity by George P. Bissell against Abraham G. Barnett, his wife, Byron H. Barnett and James W. Barnett his minor sons, his sisters Susan B. Shoaff and Mary Ann Wall and their husbands, Henry J. Rudisill, Oscar A. Simons and John H. Bass, Henry Burgess, Charles A. Zollinger, and the representatives of John J. Kamm, to foreclose mortgages of real estate in Indiana. Answers and cross bills were filed by the various parties, setting up their different interests; and a final decree was rendered for the plaintiff, from which Mr. and Mrs. Wall, Mr. and Mrs. Shoaff, and the two minor sons of Abraham G. Barnett appealed to this court. The case appeared by the pleadings and proofs to be as follows:

In 1869 Abraham G. Barnett, his brother, John H. Barnett, and Newton B. Freeman, were partners in a paper mill, and desired to raise money for the use of the partnership and to pay up Freeman's share of the capital. At the request of the two Barnetts, and of Rudisill (who appears to have been promised an interest in the partnership), Bissell lent to the two Barnetts the sum of $8,000, the whole of which was put into the firm and $5,000 of which was credited to Freeman. Pursuant to an agreement then made by the three partners and Rudisill and Bissell, the following instruments were executed:

On July 15, 1869, the two Barnetts executed to Bissell eight bonds for $1,000 each, payable in ten years, with interest semi-annually, secured by mortgage from John H. Barnett to Bissell, of land in the City of Fort Wayne.

On the same day, Rudisill executed to John H. Barnett a bond, reciting that "said Henry J. Rudisill has received from said Barnett the sum of $5,000, part of a loan made, by J. H. Barnett and Abraham G. Barnett for the sum of $8,000 of George P. Bissell, secured by" the bonds and mortgage aforesaid, and conditioned to "pay said sum of $5,000 of said bonds, with interest thereon, as it becomes due."

On December 23, 1871, as security for the payment of this bond, Rudisill executed to John H. Barnett a mortgage of land, upon all of which, except a small piece, there existed a prior mortgage made by Rudisill to his mother to secure the payment of an annuity to her, and now held by Simons and Bass.

On January 28, 1872, John H. Barnett died, leaving a will containing the following provisions:

First. A devise of part of the land, mortgaged by him to Bissell as aforesaid, to Mrs. Wall, with successive remainders to Byron H. Barnett, to his children, and to Abraham G. Barnett.

Second. A devise of the rest of that land to Mrs. Shoaff, with successive remainders to James W. Barnett, to his children, and to Abraham G. Barnett.

Third and Fourth. Devises of other lands to Mrs. Shoaff and to Abraham G. Barnett and his children.

"Fifth. Now, as to my interest in the paper mill and business carried on at the City of Fort Wayne under the name of Freeman & Barnett, which is regarded as one third in extent of said business effects, real and personal, etc., etc., stock, assets, machinery, dividends, dues, etc. I devise and bequeath, subject to the conditions and agreements, performed or unperformed, which were named at the time I became a party in interest in said paper business so carried on by and in Freeman & Barnett's name, and which conditions and agreements are known to my brother, A. G. Barnett, I give and bequeath unto my said brother, A. G. Barnett, and to my nephews, James Barnett Wall and Charles W. Wall, sons of my sister, Mary A. Wall, all my interest in the paper mill and business aforesaid, real and personal, or otherwise, so carried on and owned by said Freeman & Barnett: To have and to hold to each of said devisees or legatees, three in number, so named, one full third of my said interest in said paper business, mill, etc. The sole control of the respective interests of said James B. and Charles W. Wall shall be under the control of my brother, A. G. Barnett, until said James B. shall reach the age of twenty-five years. The profits arising out of said interest so bequeathed to said Charles and James B. respectively shall be at reasonable periods each year paid said legatees respectively by said Barnett, or by any other person who may be authorized to control said interest in the progress of said business, by law or otherwise. And I hereby give the said A. G. Barnett the right to sell said interests of said Charles and James B., if he shall deem such sale expedient and for the best interests of said Charles and James, he, the said A. G. Barnett, first giving said Charles and James security for faithfully accounting to them for the proceeds of said sale; or if he shall desire to buy said interests, or either of them, before either shall be of age, then some third party shall qualify as guardian, and proceed to sell the same to said A. G. Barnett under order and authority of law.

"Sixth. I name my brother, A. G. Barnett, my executor, to act himself, or jointly with one he may choose; if acting alone, then he shall and may do so without bond as such executor, but if acting with another both shall give bond and take out letters testamentary and proceed according to law; but if he shall act alone, then, as executor, he shall have authority under this will to proceed as if he had letters testamentary to execute the trusts devolved on him as executor, as also those which may incidentally arise in the execution of this trust as executor, but not any others arising out of a different relation, such as trustee or guardian of some of the parties named herein or of some of the trust funds named hereinbefore. He shall have power to proceed to collect all debts, judgments, or choses in action, due me at my death, all rents due me at my death, of any and all my real estate, except the homestead, and to have control of and dispose of all my personal property, moneys and effects, reducing them to availability, and to collect all rents on the lots devised respectively, located in the City of Fort Wayne, until such rents and the reasonable use of the whole homestead place, including that devise to Mrs. Susan Shoaff and to himself, until such funds so arising from rents, use of homestead, moneys, personal property, etc., shall be enough to pay my debts, funeral expenses, debts of last illness, and to purchase a lot in Lindenwood cemetery, properly and fairly improve it, pay for exhuming the remains of my father and mother, their interment, and the erection of a monument suitable to their condition in life in said lot, and this shall be done speedily as the nature of the business shall allow, after which the devisees respectively herein lastly named, and incidentally referred to, shall control said property as the same is intended in the respective clauses wherein said property is devised."

On February 7, 1872, the will was duly admitted to probate, on the testimony of the subscribing witnesses, in a court of the State of Indiana.

Abraham G. Barnett never qualified or gave bond as executor, as required by the statutes of Indiana, and the court of probate never made any order appointing him executor, or directing letters testamentary to issue, and no such letters were ever issued. But he assumed to act as executor; and as such took control of the real and personal property, collected the rents of the real estate for some months (after which he turned it over to the devisees), paid the testator's debts and funeral expenses, purchased a burial lot, removed the remains of the testator's father and mother to it, and erected a monument upon it. The other devisees knew of all these acts, and made no objection, supposing him to be authorized by the will to do them.

On January 23, 1875, Rudisill sold and conveyed by warranty deed to Burgess, Zollinger and Kamm part of the land included in the mortgage from him to John H. Barnett, and in the annuity mortgage to his mother; she released from her mortgage this part of the land; and Abraham G. Barnett executed, on the margin of the record of the mortgage from Rudisill to John H. Barnett, a release of the same part, in the following words:

"I hereby release from any and all lien by reason of this mortgage the following of the premises herein described: All that part of S. E. ¼ of sec. 35, t'p 31, R. 12 East, this day conveyed by Henry J. Rudisill to H. Burgess, Chas. A. Zollinger, and J. J. Kamm. Witness my hand and seal as such executor, January 23, 1875.

"ABRAHAM G. BARNETT, [SEAL.]

"Executor of the Estate of John H. Barnett, deceased."

On the same day, and as part of the same transaction, Rudisill executed to "Abraham G. Barnett, as executor of the estate of John H. Barnett, deceased," a mortgage of other lands, partly included also in the annuity mortgage. All the parties to this transaction acted in good faith. But the transaction was not shown to have been known to the devisees until about the time of the beginning of this suit, or to have ever been assented to by them.

The bill prayed for a foreclosure of the mortgages from John H. Barnett to the plaintiff and from Rudisill to John H. Barnett, or, if the court should hold the release of the latter good, then for a foreclosure of the mortgage from Rudisill to Abraham G. Barnett.

The circuit court decreed that the release was valid, and that the title in the land so released be quieted in the present holders as against all other parties to this suit, and that the various parcels of land be sold and applied to the payment of the debts secured by the several mortgages in an order not objected to by the appellants, supposing the release to be valid, which they denied.

Mr. L. M. Ninde, for appellants:

No person is authorized to act as executor or administrator until he is appointed and receives his letters from the proper court.

Landers v. Stone, 45 Ind. 408.

In Croxton v. Renner, 1 West. Rep. 206, 108 Ind. 226, and in Jeffersonville R. R. Co. v. Swayne, 26 Ind. 477, it is held that the jurisdiction of the court to grant letters of administration is derived from the statute and can only be exercised in the cases provided for thereby.

A release of a debt can only be made by the party legally or equitably entitled to it.

2 Pars. Com. Law, 221, 222; Eastman v. Wright, 6 Pick. 322; Loring v. Brackett, 3 Pick. 408.

Qualification by a bond is a prerequisite to receiving letters testamentary.

Bankhead v. Hubbard, 14 Ark. 298; Hunter v. Bryson, 5 Gill & J. 483; Gardner v. Gantt, 19 Ala. 666; Holbrook v. Bentley, 32 Conn. 502; Bodley v. McKinney, 9 Smedes & M. 339; Echols v. Barrett, 6 Ga. 443; Webb v. Dietrich, 7 Watts & S. 401; Hall v. Cushing, 9 Pick. 395; Pettingill v. Pettingill, 60 Me. 411; Fairfax v. Fairfax, 7 Gratt. 36; Moore v. Ridgeway, 1 B. Mon. 234; Phillips v. Stewart, 59 Mo. 491.

If a trustee releases or compromises a debt without sufficient reason, he will be answerable for it in his accounts.

2 Perry, Tr. § 482; 1 Perry, Tr. § 217.

Messrs. R. S. Taylor and S. R. Alden, for appellees:

Although the law directs that an administrator or guardian shall give bond, yet it is held in many cases that acts done in good faith without such bond are not void.

Dequindre v. Williams, 31 Ind. 444; Foster v. Birch, 14 Ind. 445; Ex parte Maxwell, 37 Ala. 362; Jones v. Gordon, 2 Jones, Eq. 353; Giddings v. Butler, 47 Tex. 585.

If a person duly elected to the office of sheriff should assume and exercise its duties, without receiving a commission, taking oath, or giving bond, but with the acquiescence of the courts and the public, his acts would not be void.

People v. Hopson, 1 Denio, 574; People v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 630; Bucknam v. Ruggles, 15 Mass. 180; McIntyre v. Tanner, 9 Johns. 135; Doty v. Gorham, 5 Pick. 487.

The functions of executors as such and trustees are distinct and separable.

Conklin v. Egerton, 21 Wend. 430; Rex v. Jenkins, 3 Dowl. & R. 41; Dunning v. Ocean Nat. Bank, 61 N. Y. 497; Bolton v. Jacks, 6 Robt. 166; Tainter v. Clark, 13 Met. 220; Beekman v. Bonsor, 23 N. Y. 298; Cole v. Wade, 16 Ves. Jr. 27; Sheets' Estate, 52 Pa. 257; 1 Ves. & B. 213; 3 Ves. Jr. 210; Cockrill v. Armstrong, 31 Ark. 580.

Where two have a joint personal interest, the release of one bars the other.

Ruddock's Case, 6 Coke, 25; Pierson v. Hooker, 3 Johns. 68; Austin v. Hall, 13 Johns. 286; Fitch v. Forman, 14 Johns. 172; Decker v. Livingston, 15 Johns. 479; Wheeler v. Curtis, 11 Wend. 663; Bradley v. Boynton, 22 Me. 290; Hall v. Gray, 54 Me. 231; Wisheart v. Legro, 33 N. H. 182; True v. Huntoon, 54 N. H. 121; Grossman v. Lauber, 29 Ind. 618; Smith v. Wiley, 22 Ala. 403; Stapleton v. King, 33 Iowa, 35; Myrick v. Dame, 9 Cush. 248; Blake v. Sanborn, 8 Gray, 154; Martin v. McReynolds, 6 Mich. 70; Emerson v. Knower, 8 Pick. 63.

Resident executors were not required to give bond except on application of one interested in the estate when danger of loss was apparent.

Mandeville v. Mandeville, 8 Paige, 475; Holmes v. Cock, 2 Barb. Ch. 426; Wood v. Wood, 4 Paige, 299; Clark v. Niles, 42 Miss. 460; Atwell v. Helm, 7 Bush, 504; Fairfax v. Fairfax, 7 Gratt. 36; Langley v. Harris, 28 Tex. 564.

Testamentary direction controls or is held to be without general sweeping statutory provisions as to sale of a testator's real estate.

McDermut v. Lorillard, 1 Edw. Ch. 272; Minuse v. Cox, 5 Johns. Ch. 441; Champlin v. Champlin, 3 Edw. Ch. 602; Goods of Smith, L. R. 1 P. & D. 717.

In construing powers the intention of the parties, gathered from the whole instrument, considering the circumstances of the case, governs.

Wilson v. Troup, 7 Johns. Ch. 25; Goodtitle v. Funucan, Doug. 565; Pomery v. Partington, 3 T. R. 362; 7 Com. Dig. title Poiar, 8; Smyth v. Taylor, 21 Ill. 296.

The rule of sale in the inverse order of alienation has never obtained in the courts of Kentucky, Tennessee, Iowa, and other most respectable courts.

Parkham v. Welch, 19 Pick. 231; Dickey v. Thompson, 8 B. Mon. 312; Jobe v. O'Brien, 2 Humph. 84; Bates v. Ruddick, 2 Iowa, 423; Barney v. Myers, 28 Iowa, 478; Barnes v. Racster, 1 Younge & C. Ch. 401; Stanly v. Stocks, 1 Dev. Eq. 314–317.

In this State the rule cannot yet be regarded as a rule of property.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question in this case is the validity of the release, executed by Abraham G. Barnett, of the mortgage from Henry J. Rudisill to John H. Barnett. By the law of Indiana, a mortgage creates only a lien to secure the mortgage debt, leaving the legal title of the land in the mortgagor. Fletcher v. Holmes, 32 Ind. 497.

It was argued for the appellees that this release was valid, considering Abraham G. Barnett in any one of three capacities: 1. As executor of the will of John H. Barnett. 2. As trustee under that will. 3. As surviving joint owner, in equity, of the bond and mortgage executed by Rudisill to John H. Barnett to secure the payment of a debt due to John H. Barnett and Abraham G. Barnett jointly.

1. The title of an executor in the personal property of his testator, being derived from the will, doubtless vests in him from the moment of the testator's death. Dixon v. Ramsay, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 319, 323 [2: 453, 454]; Hill v. Tucker, 54 U. S. 13 How. 458, 466 [14: 223, 226]. At common law, he might, before proving the will in the probate court, not only take possession of the property, but sell or dispose of it, pay debts of the estate, receive or release debts owing to it, bring actions for property which was in the testator's actual possession, and do almost any other acts incident to his office, except that he could not maintain any other actions without producing a copy of the probate and letters testamentary at the trial. 1 Williams, Executors, 7th ed. 293, 302, 303, 629.

But the Statutes of Indiana provide that whenever any will shall have been admitted to probate, letters testamentary shall be issued to the persons named therein as executors (being competent by law to serve as such) who shall qualify; and further provide as follows:

"Sec. 3. Every person named in the will as executor, who shall qualify and give bond, shall be named in such letters, and every person not thus named shall be deemed superseded.

"Sec. 4. Any person who is appointed executor, who shall renounce his trust in writing filed with the clerk, or who shall fail to qualify and give bond within twenty days after probate of such will, shall be deemed to have renounced such appointment, and such letters shall issue to any other person named in the will, capable and willing to accept such trust.

"Sec. 5. No executor named in the will shall interfere with the estate intrusted to him, further than to preserve the same until the issuing of letters; but for that purpose he may prosecute any suit to prevent the loss of any part thereof."

"Sec. 19. Every person appointed executor, administrator with the will annexed, or administrator, before receiving letters, shall execute a separate bond," with sureties, "in a penalty payable to the State of Indiana, of not less than double the value of the personal estate to be administered, conditioned that he will faithfully discharge his duties as such executor or administrator, and shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation that he will faithfully discharge the duties of his trust according to law;" and the bond, as well as the oath or affirmation, is required to be recorded. 2 Gavin & H. Stat. 484, 489, 490, 491; Indiana Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 2222-2225, 2242, 2243.

These statutes clearly manifest the intent of the Legislature that, although the personal property shall vest from the death of the testator in the executor named in his will, yet, in order to secure the interests of creditors and of legatees, every executor shall give bond and take out letters testamentary before he can do any act as executor, except such as may be necessary to preserve the property and to prevent the loss of any part of it. The prohibition is absolute that, except for that purpose, "no executor shall interfere with the estate" until the issuing of letters testamentary.

The direction in the will of John H. Barnett that Abraham G. Barnett may act as executor, without giving bond or taking out letters testamentary, as the statutes require, is of no legal effect.

The current of decision in other States, so far as we are informed, is to the effect that under similar statutes (some of them less peremptory in their terms) any acts done by an executor by way of disposing of the property are invalid, unless he takes out letters testamentary, or is appointed executor by an order of the court of probate, equivalent to the issue of such letters. Monroe v. James, 4 Munf. 194; Martin v. Peck, 2 Yerg. 298; Cleveland v. Chandler, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 489; Carpenter v. Going, 20 Ala. 587; Ex parte Maxwell, 37 Ala. 362, 364; Kittredge v. Folsom, 8 N. H. 98, 111; Rand v. Hubbard, 4 Met. 252, 257; Gay v. Minot, 3 Cush. 352; Carter v. Carter, 10 B. Mon. 327; Stagg v. Green, 47 Mo. 500; Hartnett v. Wandell, 60 N. Y. 346, 350; McDearmon v. Maxfield, 38 Ark. 681.

We have been referred to no decision of the Supreme Court of Indiana that directly bears upon this case. The only one that approaches it is Hays v. Vickery, 41 Ind. 583. In that case, an heir, named in the will as executor, had, without qualifying as such, or taking out letters testamentary, but with the consent of all the other heirs, devisees and legatees, acted as executor, and made distribution of the property. A subsequent order of the probate court, made without notice to him, upon the application of one of those heirs, appointing another person administrator with the will annexed, was reversed on appeal, and letters testamentary directed to be issued to the executor upon his qualifying and giving bond according to law. The opinion proceeded upon the ground that the delay in taking out letters testamentary had been waived by the mutual arrangement of all parties interested; and it contained no intimation that the acts of an executor, who never took out letters testamentary, could affect the rights of any person interested in the estate who had not assented to them.

In the present case, whatever effect the facts that the other devisees knew that the executor was acting as such and made no objection might have against those of full age, the minor devisees could not be thereby estopped to assert their rights.

Letters testamentary issued to an executor, upon his qualifying according to law, may relate back and legalize his previous tortious acts. 1 Williams, Executors, 269; Priest v. Watkins, 2 Hill, 225. Or, an order of the court of probate, appointing an executor, may not be subject to be impeached collaterally by showing that he did not in fact qualify; and may of itself be sufficient evidence of his authority, without the production of letters testamentary. Vogel's Succession, 20 La. Ann. 81; Piatt v. McCullough, 1 McLean, 69, 74.

But where, as in this case, the executor has never qualified, nor been appointed by the court, and no letters testamentary have been issued, we have found no decision, under statutes like those of Indiana, that any disposition of the property by the executor is valid as against persons interested who are not estopped by having consented to it.

In the absence of any decision upon the point by the Supreme Court of Indiana, we are therefore not prepared to hold that the release in question has any validity as an act done by Abraham G. Barnett as executor.

2. The difficulties are quite as great in the way of holding the release valid, considered as executed by Abraham G. Barnett in the capacity of trustee under the will, distinct from his office as executor.

In the first place, the will, after naming Abraham G. Barnett executor, and directing that he may act as such without giving bond or taking out letters testamentary, provides that "As executor he shall have authority under this will to proceed, as if he had letters testamentary, to execute the trust devolved on him as executor, as also those which may incidentally arise in the execution of this trust as executor." By this iteration of the words "as executor," the testator clearly shows that he did not intend that in performing the usual duties of an executor he should act in any other capacity.

In the next place, it was not within the power of the testator to defeat the provisions and the policy of the testamentary law of the State, by bequeathing personal property to a trustee, without the intervention of an executor. As was said by Chief Justice Shaw, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, "It is an established rule of law, that all the personal property of the testator vests in the executors for some purposes, before probate of the will; but to all intents and purposes, upon its probate. This they take, not merely as donees, by force of the gift, as inter vivos, but by operation of the rules of law controlling, regulating and giving effect to wills. A trustee, therefore, who is but a legatee, can take only through the executors. If a testator were to appoint no executor, or direct that the estate should go immediately into the hands of legatees or of one or more trustees for particular purposes, such direction would be nugatory and void." Newcomb v. Williams, 9 Met. 525, 533. So in the earlier case of Hunter v. Bryson, the Court of Appeals of Maryland said: "But suppose Bryson not to be created executor by the clause in the will which has been referred to, and that the testator's design was that the persons appointed should act literally as trustees without taking out any letters testamentary or of administration. The appointment is a nullity as far as the personal estate is concerned, being an attempt to evade the provisions of our testamentary system in a way which the law does not tolerate." 5 Gill & J. 483, 488.

3. We are then brought to a consideration of the question whether the release can be upheld, because of the authority vested in Abraham G. Barnett as surviving creditor, under the settled rule that one of two joint creditors or mortgagees, or the survivor of them, may release the joint debt. Penn v. Butler, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 354 [1:364]; People v. Keyser, 28 N. Y. 226. The case, so far as affects this question, stands thus:

John H. Barnett and Abraham G. Barnett borrowed $8,000 of Bissell, and lent $5,000 of it to Freeman, and thereby became, at law as well as in equity, joint debtors to Bissell in the sum of $8,000, and joint creditors of Freeman in the sum of $5,000. Rudisill executed to John H. Barnett a bond, secured by mortgage, conditioned to pay to him the sum of $5,000, describing it in the bond as part of the sum of $8,000 borrowed by the two Barnetts of Bissell, thus clearly identifying the debt, which Rudisill's bond and mortgage were intended to secure, as the $5,000 which the two Barnetts had lent to Freeman, and which Freeman owed to them jointly. Rudisill's bond and mortgage, therefore, although they ran to John H. Barnett alone, and could have been enforced at law in his name only, yet in equity, having been made with the sole object of securing the payment of the debt which Freeman owed to both Barnetts jointly, belonged to them as joint creditors. Batesville Institute v. Kauffman, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 151 [21:775].

Upon the death of John H. Barnett, the debt of Freeman was due to Abraham G. Barnett personally as surviving creditor, with authority as such to sue for and recover it, although he would of course be bound to account to John H. Barnett's representatives for half of anything that he might recover; and Rudisill's bond and mortgage continued to stand as security for that debt; and although the legal title in this bond and mortgage vested in Abraham G. Barnett as executor, yet the equitable interest in them belonged half to him as executor and half to him personally. If he had received from the mortgagor payment of the sum secured by the mortgage, whether as executor or as surviving creditor, in either case he would hold half of that sum to his own use and half as executor. So a valid release of the whole or part of the land mortgaged, made by him, whether as executor or as an individual, would bar him both in his official and in his private capacity; and any substituted security, received by him as a consideration for the release, would ultimately enure to the benefit of the same persons, that is to say, one half to his own benefit, and the other half to the benefit of those entitled under the will. In short, neither the parties to whom nor the amount in which he would be liable to account for anything received upon a payment or release would be affected by the capacity in which he assumed to act. If he had never been named as executor, a release of the debt by him, being surviving creditor, would have been valid at law, and his release of the mortgage, which was security for that debt, would have been good in equity. There is no reason, therefore, which can influence a court of equity, why he might not as surviving creditor release part of the mortgaged land from the mortgage.

The two characters of executor and of surviving creditor being united in the person of Abraham G. Barnett, the court, if he had executed the release in his own name merely, without describing himself as acting in either capacity, would presume that he acted in the character which would make the release valid and effectual. Yeaton v. Lynn, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 224, 229 [8:105, 106].

The form in which the release was drawn up and executed does not affect the equities of the case.

It begins with the absolute and comprehensive words, "I hereby release from any and all lien by reason of this mortgage." Then follow a description of the land released, by range, township, section and quarter section, and as that day conveyed by Rudisill to Burgess, Zollinger and Kamm, and the final clause, "Witness my hand and seal as such executor, January 23, 1875." No executor had been previously named in the release, or in the mortgage, on the margin of the record of which the release was made. The release is signed "Abraham G. Barnett, executor of the estate of John H. Barnett, deceased."

When a person having title in property in different capacities executes a deed in one capacity only, and holds the consideration received for the benefit of those entitled to it, a court of equity, at least, will be slow to hold the deed invalid for want of a more complete and formal execution.

In Corser v. Cartwright, L. R. 7 H. L. 731, a man who was one of two executors of his father, and also the residuary devisee of his lands, charged with the payment of his debts, made a mortgage of the lands, reciting that he was entitled to them in fee, and not describing himself as executor. Lord Romilly, M. R., held that this mortgage was not an exercise of the power vested in the executors for paying the testator's debts, but was only a mortgage of the beneficial interest of the devisee, and therefore ineffectual against the testator's general creditors. But his decree was reversed by the Lords Justices in Chancery, and their decree was affirmed by the House of Lords upon the motion of Lord Chancellor Cairns, who said: "What I find is this, that the estates with which Your Lordships have to deal are clearly devised to, and the legal estate vested in, the residuary devisee, who was also one of the executors. I find him selling or mortgaging, and I find him, beyond all doubt, able to sell and able to give to a mortgagee a good title to the legal estate. I find that that legal estate is in his hands; and therefore any money that is produced by the sale or mortgage of that legal estate is subject to and chargeable with the payment of debts and legacies; and that therefore the money coming into his hands must be money which ought to be applied to the payment of debts and legacies. But then I find that he himself is an executor of the testator; that he himself is the person who ought to hold assets impressed with the liability to satisfy debts and legacies. I find, therefore, that assets which ought to be applied to the payment of debts have come into the hands of an executor, and that he has given a receipt for them. Therefore, on the one hand the mortgagees have got the legal estate; and on the other hand they have got a receipt from the proper person for money which ought to be applied to the payment of debts and legacies. That being so, it appears to me that their title is entire and complete." L. R. 7 H. L. 740.

In West of England & S. W. Dist. Bank v. Murch, L. R. 28 Ch. Div. 138, that decision was followed, and applied to this state of facts: One of two brothers, partners in business, died, leaving a will, by which he directed his debts to be paid, and devised his real estate in trust with power of sale, and appointed his widow executrix and trustee. The widow and the surviving brother sold and conveyed real estate of which the two brothers had been tenants in common, and which was in fact partnership property, by deeds reciting that the brother in his own right, and the widow as trustee under the will, were seised of it in fee as tenants in common, but not stating that she was executrix, or that the property was partnership property. This conveyance was held to be valid, Lord Justice Fry saying: "It is plain that as executrix she could sell the whole of the partnership property." "Then it is said that if she had power so to do, yet, by omitting to state in the deeds by which she conveyed the freehold property that she was acting as executrix, she precluded herself from asserting that she was acting in that character. In my judgment, she did not. It must be borne in mind that, as executrix, hers clearly was the hand to receive the purchase moneys; and therefore those moneys came to the right hand, the hand of the person whose duty it was duly to apply the assets in satisfaction of the creditors of the deceased as well as of the beneficiaries under his will. Moreover, whether she was acting as trustee or as executrix, she was under an obligation to do the best she could for the estate. Her fiduciary character was substantially the same, whether she was acting as executrix or as trustee. I think, therefore, that I should be straining at a gnat, if I were to hold that the mere fact, that she spoke of herself in the instruments as trustee and not as executrix, was enough to prevent the validity of a transaction which, in her character of executrix, I hold that she had the power of carrying into effect." "The legal estate passed from her, because she held it as trustee, and the money reached the hands of the person who was bound to distribute it among the persons entitled to it. I therefore overrule this objection." 28 Ch. Div. 151–153.

In the present case, the legal title, indeed, in the bond and mortgage of Rudisill was in Abraham G. Barnett as executor, and could not, at law, be released by him in any other capacity. But the legal title in the debt, for which the bond and mortgage stood as security, and to which in equity they were incident, was in him as surviving creditor. In equity, therefore, he had the right, as surviving creditor, to release the mortgage, in whole or in part; and any consideration for such a release, whether received by him as executor or as surviving creditor, would inure to the benefit of himself, and of the estate of his testator in equal moieties.

If he had received payment of the debt, and given a receipt for it as executor, he would have held the money, half as executor, and half to his own use, just as he would have held it if he had receipted for it in his own name only; and it cannot be doubted that the addition "as executor" in the receipt would not have prevented the payment from extinguishing the debt, and consequently the mortgage by which it was secured.

The release which Abraham G. Barnett did execute was of part of the land mortgaged, and in consideration of receiving a mortgage of other land, the parties to the release and to the new mortgage acting in good faith, and with no intent to defraud devisees or other persons interested. The body of the release contains apt words of release by him (without stating in what capacity) of the land described "from any and all lien by reason of this mortgage;" and he is described as executor in the testimonium clause and the signature only. Although he is described as executor in the new mortgage also, a court of equity certainly could not hold that mortgage to convey any interest to him as executor or otherwise, if the release for which it was the consideration was void.

Abraham G. Barnett was the person authorized to make the release, and the consideration for the release came into his hands, for the benefit of the persons entitled to it. The interests of no one were affected by the question in which of his two characters he executed the release, and received the new mortgage. Whether he acted as executor or as surviving creditor, the fruits of the transaction belonged in equity, one half to himself and one half to the estate of John H. Barnett.

If the whole debt had belonged to him alone, the description of himself as executor in the release could not have prevented its operating upon his interest in the debt, and in the mortgage by which that debt was secured. As the survivor of two joint creditors, he had the same power (independently of any authority as executor) to release the debt and the mortgage, as if he had been the sole creditor. The release, therefore, notwithstanding the superfluous description of the releasor as executor, was, by reason of his being surviving creditor, binding upon the interests of the representatives of the deceased creditor, as well as upon his own; and upon this ground the decree is affirmed.

D. H. WILLIAMS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
EDWARD D. CONGER ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 397–426.)

Texas land title—protocol, when evidence—comparison of handwriting—ancient instrument—instruction to jury—authentication of instrument—copy, when evidence—recital—right of citizens of Mexico.

1. In an action to try the title to land granted by the Government of Coahuila and Texas in 1828 to one Miguel Rabago, the protocol, or first original, of the application of Rabago for the grant, and of the concession, made thereon, produced from the archives in the office of the Secretary of State of Coahuila, at Saltillo, is admissible in evidence as a link in the chain of title.

2. Where other writings, admitted or proved to be genuine, are properly in evidence for other purposes, the handwriting of such instruments may be compared by the jury with that of the instrument or signature in question, and its genuineness inferred from such comparison; but other instruments or signatures cannot be introduced for the mere purpose of comparison.

3. An ancient instrument, being an alleged original power of attorney from Rabago, found in an old trunk, held to be admissible in evidence, under the facts of the case, as an ancient writing.

4. The court may give to the jury its opinion on the weight of evidence.

5. That an instrument was not acknowledged, nor witnessed, nor proved before a notary, does not affect its validity; such informalities only affect the mode of proving it. If not duly authenticated, it must be proved to have been executed by the party to be charged with it.

6. A copy of an instrument may be admitted in evidence, to show that the original was in existence when the copy was made, and as evidence that the latter was an ancient instrument.

7. A recital in an ancient document that the person executing it was a citizen of Mexico, with evidence that he was established as a merchant in the City of Mexico, held sufficient evidence that he was such citizen.

8. Citizens of Mexico never lost the right of disposing of their Texas lands by the division of the Empire.

[No. 105.]

Argued Dec. 16, 19, 20, 1887. Decided April 2, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas, to review a judgment for defendants in an action to try the title to land. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated by the court.

Mr. Eugene Williams, for plaintiff in error:

The pretended application of Miguel Rabago to Viesca and the pretended concession of Viesca were inadmissible for the purpose of comparing the handwriting thereof with the pretended signature of Miguel Rabago to the pretended power of attorney.

Hazleton v. Union Bank, 32 Wis. 48; 1 Whart. Ev. 2d ed. § 717.

The paper, if genuine and an archive, can be brought into court only by its lawful custodian, or by a lawfully certified or examined copy.

1 Whart. Ev. 2d ed. p. 111, §§ 107, 828; Smith v. Townsend, Dall. (Tex.) 571; Houston v. Perry, 5 Tex. 464; Wallis v. Beauchamp, 15 Tex. 306; Leathers v. Salvor W. & T. Co. 2 Woods, 680; Phelps v. Hunt, 43 Conn. 194; Luco v. U. S. 64 U. S. 23 How. 515 (16: 545); Eborn v. Zimpelman, 47 Tex. 520; Edwards v. James, 7 Tex. 378; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 502.

Foreign laws should be proved.

Strother v. Lucas, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 768 (8:575); Martin v. Payne, 11 Tex. 295; Ennis v. Smith, 55 U. S. 14 How. 426 (14:484); Church v. Hubbart, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 236 (2:265); Vandervoort v. Smith, 2 Cal. 155.

The purported application of Miguel Rabago was not shown to have been his act, and was not a paper which by law required his signature.

White v. Holliday, 11 Tex. 607.

Rule on comparison of handwriting.

Hanley v. Gandy, 28 Tex. 211; Kennedy v. Upshaw, 64 Tex. 420; Matlock v. Glover, 63 Tex. 236.

It is a general rule that evidence by comparison of hands is not admissible.

Moore v. U. S. 91 U. S. 270 (23:346); Macferson v. Thoytes, Peake, N. P. 29.

Comparison of hands is no evidence.

Jumpertz v. People, 21 Ill. 414; Doe v. Suckermore, 5 Ad. & El. 703; Jackson v. Phillips, 9 Cow. 94.

The English rule has been changed in Texas in criminal cases.

Code Crim. Proc. 667.

But not in civil cases.

Eborn v. Zimpelman, 47 Tex. 518; 2 Phill. Ev. 257.

Comparison of handwriting has been admitted only in extraordinary instances arising from the necessity of the case.

Roe v. Rawlings, 7 East, 282; Woodard v. Spiller, 1 Dana (Ky.) 180; S. C. 25 Am. Dec. 139; Jackson v. Murray, Anth. N. P. 105; Row v. Kile, 1 Leigh, 222; Jackson v. Brooks, 8 Wend. 426; State v. Givens, 5 Ala. 747.

Comparison of hands may be made where other writings, admitted or clearly proved to be genuine, are already in evidence for some other purpose.

U. S. v. Darnaud, 3 Wall. Jr. 181; Bragg v. Colwell, 19 Ohio St. 412; Shannon v. Fox, 1 Cranch, C. C. 188; Martin v. Maguire, 7 Gray, 177; Depue v. Place, 7 Pa. 428; Reed v. Spaulding, 42 N. H. 122; Eborn v. Zimpelman, supra; Tyler v. Todd, 36 Conn. 218; Jones v. State, 60 Ind. 241; Bowman v. Sanborn, 25 N. H. 98; Miles v. Loomis, 75 N. Y. 288; Hynes v. McDermott, 82 N. Y. 41; S. C. 22 Alb. L. J. 367; Outlaw v. Hurdle, 1 Jones, L. 150; Williams v. Drexel, 14 Md. 573; Allport v. Meek, 4 Car. & P. 267; Goodyear v. Vosburgh, 63 Barb. 154; Hazleton v. Union Bank, 32 Wis. 48; State v. Miller, 47 Wis. 633; Commonwealth v. Eastman, 1 Cush. 189; State v. Givens, 5 Ala. 757; Kirksey v. Kirksey, 41 Ala. 639.

Experts may make comparison of a genuine signature with ancient writing in dispute when living witnesses cannot be had and such writing is not old enough to prove itself.

Williams v. Drexel, 14 Md. 573; State v. Scott, 45 Mo. 302; State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 460; Hicks v. Person, 19 Ohio, 429; Yates v. Yates, 76 N. C. 143; Van Sickle v. People, 29 Mich. 61; McAllister v. McAllister, 7 B. Mon. 270.

The standard must be proven clearly, beyond a reasonable doubt, in addition to what is necessary to admit the standard in evidence.

Bragg v. Colwell, 19 Ohio St. 412; Outlaw v Hurdle, 1 Jones, L. 150.

If there is any controversy as to the genuineness of the specimens, they are excluded.

Bowman v. Sanborn, 25 N. H. 98; Reed v. Spaulding, 42 N. H. 122; Commonwealth v. Coe, 115 Mass. 481; Tyler v. Todd, 36 Conn. 218; State v. Ward, 39 Vt. 225.

An ancient deed may be admitted in evidence without direct proof of its execution if it appears, first, to be of the age of at least thirty years; second, when it is found in proper custody; third, when either possession under it is shown or some other evidence of its authenticity freeing it from all just grounds of suspicion.

Applegate v. Lexington & C. C. Min. Co., 117 U. S. 255 (29:892); Middleton v. Mass., 2 Nott & McC. 55; Jackson v. Brooks, 8 Wend. 431; Crowder v. Hopkins, 10 Paige, 183; Willson v.

Betts, 4 Denio, 215; Jackson v. Blanshan, 8 Johns. 292; Meegan v. Boyle, 60 U. S. 19 How. 130 (15:577); Jackson v. Davis, 5 Cow. 123; Hanrick v. Barton, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 166 (21:354).

A power not under seal will not authorize a deed under seal.

Watson v. Sherman, 84 Ill. 268; Peabody v. Hoard, 46 Ill. 242; Clark v. Graham, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 577 (5:334).

If the agent, in the performance of his agency, completes his trust, the agency is functus officio.

Moore v. Stone, 40 Iowa, 259; U. S. v. Grossmayer, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 72 (19:627); 2 Perry, Tr. 3d ed. p. 46, § 511c.

It is error in the court to charge a jury upon a supposed or conjectural state of facts, of which no evidence has been offered.

Lucas v. Brooks, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 454 (21: 788); Bump. Fed. Proc. 302; U. S. v. Breitling, 61 U. S. 20 How. 252 (15:900).

By the Texas Constitution, March 17, 1836, section 10: "No alien shall hold land in Texas except by title emanating directly from the Government of this Republic". This was the law of Texas before the Republic.

Clay v. Clay, 26 Tex. 24; Lacoste v. Odam, Id. 458; Barrett v. Kelly, 31 Tex. 481; Phillips v. Moore, 100 U. S. 208 (25: 603); Osterman v. Baldwin, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 116 (18: 780); Jones v. McMasters, 61 U. S. 20 How. 8 (15: 805); Merle v. Mathews, 26 Cal. 475; Andrews v. Spear, 48 Tex. 568; 1 Pasch. Dig. note to Const. 845, 310; Bowmer v. Hicks, 22 Tex. 155.

Mr. E. H. Graham, for defendants in error:

In Mexican titles much more stress is placed on the original grant or concession than is now in Texas on the land certificate, or in the United States on the land warrant.

Hanrick v. Barton, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 170 (21: 852).

In Mexican titles the original grant or concession must be shown in making out a title.

Hanrick v. Barton, supra; Hollingsworth v. Flint, 101 U. S. 591 (25: 1028); Spencer v. Lapsley, 61 U. S. 20 How. 264 (15: 902); McPhaul v. Lapsley, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 264 (22: 344).

It cannot be said to be irrelevant, because it is part of the title and conduces to prove an issue in the case.

1 Whart. Ev. § 20; Schuchardt v. Allen, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 368 (17: 645).

It has been repeatedly held in Texas that archives are primary evidence and, as such, admissible.

Wheeler v. Moody, 9 Tex. 375; Herndon v. Casiano, 7 Tex. 322; Blythe v. Houston, 46 Tex. 67; Andrews v. Marshall, 26 Tex. 212.

The exception should be specific, and point out the particular objection.

Noonan v. Caledonia Min. Co. 121 U. S. 400 (30: 1068).

This court takes judicial notice of the law at that time.

State v. Sais, 47 Tex. 309; Brownsville v. Cavazos, 2 Woods, 298.

The rule forbidding proof of handwriting by comparison is gradually being abandoned by the States of this Union that once recognized it, until it is now recognized in only sixteen States, and in some of these it is very much qualified by exceptions.

Lawson Expert & Opinion Ev. 326, 376–407; 1 Whart. Ev. 717 and note; 1 Best, Ev. 459; 2 Starkie, Ev. 7th Am. ed. 516.

This court can scarcely be said to be committed to the rule.

Moore v. U. S. 91 U. S. 273 (23: 347); Strother v. Lucas, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 767 (8: 575); Shinn v. Hicks, 4 S. W. Rep. 486.

The practice on this point is different in the different States.

Homer v. Wallis, 11 Mass. 309.

The better reason is in favor of allowing the jury to compare.

Travis v. Brown, 43 Pa. 9; S. C. 82 Am. Dec. 540.

The plaintiff is estopped to deny the signature of Rabago to this original petition, and hence comparison with it is admissible.

State v. Clinton, 67 Mo. 380; State v. Thompkins, 71 Mo. 615; Kennedy v. Upshaw, 64 Tex. 420; Canley v. Platt, 2 McCord, 261.

The rule against comparison does not apply, and perhaps never did, when a prima facie case has been made without it, or when the evidence is conflicting. It is only when comparison is relied on alone and by itself. But when comparison is resorted to in aid and corroboration of other competent evidence or of doubtful proof, or when the evidence is conflicting, the rule is not violated.

Benedict v. Flanigan, 18 S. C. 506; S. C. 44 Am. Rep. 588; Boman v. Plunkett, 2 McCord, 518; Travis v. Brown, supra; Baker v. Haines, 6 Whart. 284; S. C. 36 Am. Dec. 225; Myers v. Toscan, 3 N. H. 48; Gore v. Stevens, 1 Dana, 201; S. C. 25 Am. Dec. 141; Woodard v. Spiller, 1 Dana, 180; Smith v. Fenner, 1 Gall. 175; Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 490.

The authorities seem to be in conflict as to whether the judge or jury should pass upon the genuineness of the standard.

State v. Hastings, 58 N. H. 454; State v. Ward, 39 Vt. 225.

The letter power of attorney from Miguel Rabago to Victor Blanco, dated June 8, 1882, was properly admitted in evidence as an ancient instrument and as a valid title paper in the chain of title.

Williams v. Conger, 49 Tex. 582; Frankland v. Cassaday, 62 Tex. 418; Meyers v. Dittmar, 47 Tex. 375; Clark v. Keith, 106 U. S. 464 (27: 302); Duncan v. Gegan, 101 U. S. 812 (25: 876); Andrews v. Marshall, 26 Tex. 212; Watrous v. McGrew, 16 Tex. 509.

The court did not err in charging the jury that Blanco could have procured and retained a legal copy of the power from Rabago to him, which would have all the force and effect of an original, nor in refusing the charges asked by plaintiff on this subject, as shown under the fifth assignment.

Williams v. Conger, 49 Tex. 595, 597; Titus v. Kimbro, 8 Tex. 212; Blythe v. Houston, 46 Tex. 67; McPhaul v. Lapsley, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 284 (22: 346).

The court did not err in its general charge relating to proof of the power.

The court did not err in admitting in evidence the copy of Blanco's deed to Laguerinne, nor the copy of Laguerinne's power to Priolland.

DeLeon v. White, 9 Tex. 600; Spencer v. Lap-

ley, 61 U. S. 20 How. 274 (15: 906); Holmes v. Coryell, 58 Tex. 681; State v. Cardinas, 47 Tex. 250; Las Caygas v. Larionda, 4 Mart. O. S. La. 288; Watrous v. McGrew, 16 Tex. 506; Hanrick v. Barton, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 173 (21: 353).

The evidence in the record points to the irresistible conclusion that there was an original power from Rabago to Blanco, though ours may not be the one, and such original will, from these facts, now be conclusively presumed.

Watrous v. McGrew, 16 Tex. 512; Johnson v. Timmons, 50 Tex. 534.

From Supplemental Brief.

The question raised by plaintiff is fully settled against him, both by the Supreme Court of Texas and by this court.

Barrett v. Kelly, 31 Tex. 481; Andrews v. Spear, 48 Tex. 568; Phillips v. Moore, 100 U. S. 208 (25: 603); Osterman v. Baldwin, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 116 (18: 730).

Mr. Eugene Williams, for plaintiff in error, in reply:

The doctrine of estoppel, as such, does not apply here.

Bragg v. Colwell, 19 Ohio St. 412; Shannon v. Fox, 1 Cranch, C. C. 133; Martin v. Maguire, 7 Gray, 177; Jones v. State, 60 Ind. 241; Lawson, Ex. Ev. 382; Allport v. Meek, 4 Car. & P. 267; Goodyear v. Vosburgh, 63 Barb. 154.

It is a misnomer to call the opinion and a simple judgment of remand for a new trial res judicata.

White v. Downs, 40 Tex. 225; Clark v. Keith, 106 U. S. 464 (27: 302).

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass to try title, brought by the appellant to recover from the appellees the possession of eleven leagues of land situated in McLennan and Bosque Counties, in Texas, on the west bank of the River Brazos, and granted by the Government of Coahuila and Texas in December, 1828, to one Miguel Rabago. The defendants pleaded not guilty, the Statute of Limitations, and laches. The action was commenced on the 11th of September, 1873, in the District Court of McLennan County, Texas, and was tried in that court in the year 1876, and a verdict was rendered and judgment given for the defendants. The case was then appealed to the Supreme Court of Texas, and at the Austin Term of 1878 the judgment was reversed for an error in the charge on the question of laches, and the cause was remanded for a new trial. 49 Tex. 582. It was then removed to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas, and was tried in that court in April Term, 1884. Both parties claim title under Rabago; the plaintiff, by derivation from his heirs at law (he having died in 1848), and the defendants through an alleged conveyance made by Rabago, in his lifetime, by an attorney in fact, one Victor Blanco. No question is made, therefore, as to the validity of Rabago's title. The principal controversy at the trial arose in relation to the admission in evidence of two papers offered by the defendants, namely, first, the protocol, or first original, of the application of Rabago for the grant, and of the concession made thereon, produced from the archives in the office of the Secretary of State of Coahuila at Saltillo; secondly, the alleged original power of attorney from Rabago to Blanco, by virtue of which the latter executed a conveyance of the land in the name of Rabago, under which the defendants claim title. The latter was admitted as an ancient document in case of insufficient proof of Rabago's signature; but the jury were permitted to compare the signature with that purporting to be Rabago's affixed to the protocol of the application for the grant. Several bills of exception were taken by the plaintiff to the rulings and charge of the court, a verdict was rendered for the defendants and judgment was entered thereon, to reverse which the present writ of error was brought.

The following are copies of the documents referred to. The translation of the alleged protocol of Rabago's application, and of the concession made thereon, is in the words following, to wit:

"[Seal of Coahuila and Texas.]

"Petition of Don Miguel Rabago for the purchase of eleven leagues of land in the Department of Bexar. December 1, 1828.

"3rd seal. Two reals. Issued by the State of Coahuila and Texas for the years 1828 and 1829.

"Most Excellent Sir: The citizen Miguel Rabago, resident of the valley of Santa Rosa, with due respect represents to you that needing land for agricultural and raising of stock, he begs you that, by virtue of your authority, you will be pleased to sell him eleven leagues of land on the margins of the Trinity River, in the Department of Bexar, or in the section which shall appear to me to be most convenient and best adapted to my interests, being all together or in different localities, offering to settle and cultivate said lands within the time prescribed by the Colonization Laws of the State of the 24th of March, 1825. Also, that you will be pleased to grant me the time designated by the said law to pay the dues on the said land. I ask Your Excellency that you will be pleased to refer my petition, for which I will be thankful.

"Leona Vicario, 28th of November, 1828.

"(Signed) MIGUEL RABAGO."

"Leona Vicario, 2d of Dec'r., 1828.

"Conformable to article 24 of the Colonization Laws of the 24th of March, 1825, I sell to the petitioner the eleven leagues of land he asks for of the vacant lands in the Department of Texas, in the part he may point out, or in the locality most suitable to him. The commissioner whom the government will appoint will place him in possession of said leagues, and will extend the necessary titles, previously classifying the class and quality of said lands as a guide of the amount to be paid to satisfy the government dues, for which payment I grant him the time designated by the 22d article of said Colonization Law. A copy of the petition and decree will be given to the party intended for his observance and the subsequent effects. "(Signed) VIESCA.

SANTIAGO DEL VALLE."

This protocol or second original was authenticated by a certificate annexed thereto, by the Secretary of State of Coahuila, the translation of which is in the words following, to wit:

"The citizen, Licentiate José Ma. Musquiz, Secretary of the Government of Coahuila de Zaragoza, certifies that the annexed document is the original which exists in the archives of the Government of Coahuila relative to the concession of eleven [leagues] of land made to Don Miguel Rabago, in the Department of Bexar, on the 2d of December, 1828. And at the request of the applicant this document is given, with the obligation of returning it when the suit in which it is to be used shall be terminated.

"Saltillo, April 6, 1881.

"[SEAL] (Signed)
JOSÉ MA. MUSQUIZ, Sect'y."

The translation of the alleged original power of attorney from Rabago to Blanco is in the words following, to wit:

"MONCLOVA, 8th June, 1833.

"Señor Don Victor Blanco:

"My esteemed Uncle and Sir: With this I hand you the testimonio of eleven leagues of land which His Excellency the Governor of the State granted to me a sale of, in the Department of Texas, in order that you may have the goodness to do whatever should be in your power, so that possession may be taken of them by yourself or by a person of your confidence, giving to you the most ample power so that you may cultivate them, may sell them, may exchange or alienate to your entire satisfaction, because for everything I authorize you, and I will stand and I will pass in all time for that which you should do; and should this my letter power not be sufficient, I will grant judicially as soon as you please, and notify me that you require it and you excusing this trouble. I place myself at your disposal as your most affectionate nephew and servant, who attentively kisses your hands.

"(Signed) MIGUEL RABAGO (rubric)."

(Indorsement.)

"I transfer all my powers in favor of Señor Don Samuel Williams, postmaster of the Town of San Felipe de Austin, in order that in my name and as my attorney he may take possession of the eleven leagues expressed in this.

"(Signed) VICTOR BLANCO (rubric).

"Monclova, 3d April, 1833."

It appeared on the trial that the extension of final title to Rabago was made on the 18th of January, 1834, on the application of Samuel M. Williams, as attorney for Rabago; but no power of attorney authorizing him to make the application was produced or proved by the plaintiff whose title depended on the extension thus obtained. The paper above copied, however, purporting to be a power of attorney from Rabago to Blanco, and propounded by the defendants, if their witnesses were to be believed, was found among the old papers of Williams in the custody of his son, and had on it an indorsement by Blanco transferring to Williams all the powers conferred upon him so far as to enable him (Williams) to take possession of the eleven leagues of land.

The defendants claimed that after the title was thus extended, to wit, on the 25th of May, 1836, Victor Blanco, under and by virtue of the power of attorney referred to, sold the land in question, in the City of Mexico, to one Guillermo Laguerenne by an act of sale passed before one Bonilla, a notary public, and that Laguerenne, on the 10th of January, 1837, in the City of Mexico, executed before one Madriago, a notary public, a power of attorney to Francisco Priolland, of New Orleans, authorizing him to sell all and any real estate belonging to Laguerenne, and that the latter, in pursuance of said power, did sell the said eleven leagues on the 15th of February, 1837, to one George L. Hammekin, by act of sale passed before one Caire, a notary public of New Orleans. It was admitted that the defendants had a regular chain of title from Hammekin.

The course of the trial was as follows: The plaintiff first gave in evidence a duly certified translation of the title of Rabago, from the records of the general land office of Texas, consisting of—

1. A testimonio of Rabago's application for the grant, dated November 28, 1828; and of the concession made thereon, dated December 2, 1828.

[The above testimonio was dated December 2, 1828, and signed by the Government Secretary.]

2. The extension of title, comprising the application for extension by S. M. Williams, as attorney of Rabago, dated December 8, 1833; the approval of the empressarios (of whom Williams was one); the order of survey; the field notes of the survey, etc.; concluding with a formal patent. This expediente was indorsed as filed in the land office June 7, 1875.

The plaintiff then proved the death of Rabago, and deduction of title from Rabago's heirs to himself, and rested.

The defendants, preparatory to offering their documentary evidence of title, — including, amongst other things, (1) the said protocol, or first original of Rabago's application for the grant, with his signature thereto, and the original concession made to him thereon; (2) the original power of attorney, above mentioned, from Rabago to Blanco; (3) the act of sale from Rabago, by his attorney Blanco, to Laguerenne; (4) Laguerenne's power to Priolland; (5) Priolland's act of sale to Hammekin—submitted the following evidence, to wit: The depositions taken at Saltillo, Mexico, in August, 1881, of José M. Musquiz, Secretary of State of Coahuila, and ex officio custodian of the archives relating to land grants in Texas; and of Estaban Portilla, keeper in charge of said archives, who identified the paper produced by the defendants purporting to be such protocol, or first original, of Rabago's application, found (as they testify) among the said archives in the proper office in Saltillo, and which by the law of the State might be allowed to go out of the office by the permission of the Governor. Also, the depositions of Ex-Governor E. M. Pease, of Austin, Texas, and of Andrew Neill, a notary public of the same place, who testified that they were familar with the signatures of Viesca and Del Valle by having often seen them as affixed to the public archives, laws and records of Coahuila and Texas, deposited in the public offices of the State of Texas, and believed their signatures to the purported original concession, attached to said application, to be their genuine handwriting. The defendants also gave in evidence the testimony of John Willett, to the effect that he procured the said protocol in Saltillo, for the use of the counsel of the defendants, by the courtesy of the Governor of Coahuila, and of the Secretary, Musquiz, upon giving his bond for its return. It was also in evidence that Rabago was in Saltillo (which is the same as Leona Vicario) in person when the original concession was granted, and brought the testimonio home with him, and the interpreter testified that the application and concession in the certified copy put in evidence by the plaintiff is a good translation of the document produced by the defendants.

The defendants then gave in evidence the testimony of William H. Williams, son of Samuel M. Williams, born in 1833, and of M. E. Klieberg, of Galveston, tending to prove that the said paper, purporting to be the original power of attorney from Rabago to Blanco, of which a copy has been given, was found in 1876 by said Klieberg after a search therefor at the request of said William H. Williams in behalf of General Thomas Harrison, one of the defendants, in an old leather trunk that had belonged to said Samuel M. Williams, of whose papers said William H. Williams was custodian, and which trunk contained old miscellaneous papers of said Samuel relating to occurrences before the year 1836, and had always been in said Williams' possession since his father's death in 1858; that the paper in question was an old looking paper; that the trunk contained several letters and documents signed by Victor Blanco; and that said paper, with said letters and documents, were delivered to General Harrison.

The defendants also gave in evidence the testimony of George L. Hammekin, taken before a notary in November, 1876, who stated that he purchased the land in controversy about forty years before, in the City of New Orleans, from Francisco Priolland, acting as attorney for Guillermo Laguerenne; and had in his possession for a long time a paper purporting to be a copy of a power of attorney from Miguel Rabago to Victor Blanco, and had it then (whilst testifying). That it was dated Monclova, 8th June, 1832; first saw it in 1837 or 1838; that Laguerenne was a Frenchman or an American; that the land was sold to him May 25, 1836, and by him to witness in February, 1837. [The copy referred to by the witness was annexed to his deposition, and exactly corresponded with the paper propounded by the defendants as the original. It had annexed to it a certificate, of which the following is a translation, to wit:]

"I, the undersigned notary, do certify that the foregoing copy is, to the letter, the same as the original power that Don Victor Blanco has presented to me, and the same that I had before me when making out the bill of sale; that on the 25th day of May, 1836, made by virtue of it to Don Guillermo Laguerenne of eleven sitios of land situated in the Department of Texas, on the west side of the Brazos River, above the road that leads from the Town of Nacogdoches to Bejar, as it appears in the public records in my charge. And so that this be of value wherever required, and at the request of the party interested, I issue duplicates of the present in Mexico, the 17th day of March, 1837, being witnesses Dn. Rafael de Revilla, Dn. Teofilo Carreno, and Dn. Felipe de Revilla Olivares, of this community.

"(Signed) MIGUEL DIEZ DE BONILLA,
"Notary Public."

The defendants also gave in evidence the further testimony of said Hammekin, taken by deposition on the 26th of March, 1880, wherein he says: "I have had the following title papers of the Rabago grant in my possession: 1. Testimonio, or second original issued in the name of Miguel Rabago. 2. A letter of attorney from Miguel Rabago to Victor Blanco. 3. Sale by Victor Blanco as attorney for said Rabago to said Laguerenne. 4. Power of attorney from said Laguerenne to Francis Priolland. 5. Sale by said Priolland to myself.

"I received the above entitled papers from Francis Priolland in New Orleans at the time I made the purchase. I delivered them to my agent, Robert Rose, and have not seen them since. I saw today the original power of attorney from Rabago to Blanco. I have seen Blanco's signature frequently before and after I left Mexico. I know Victor Blanco's signature because I have seen it on many papers having no reference to the Rabago grant. It appears on the said original power of attorney, subscribed to the transfer made to Samuel May Williams. I believe the transfer is in Blanco's handwriting, and I know the signature is his. I had a copy of said power certified before and by Mig'l Diez de Bonilla in the City of Mexico. I also had a copy of this copy." The witness stated that this last copy was delivered by him to General Harrison; and that the original testimonio of title was deposited by him in the general land office at Houston in 1873. [These papers were offered in evidence by the defendants, the said copy of the power being shown to be an exact copy or counterfeit of the purported original power.] The witness further stated that he and his vendees had exercised acts of ownership on this eleven league grant and claimed it certainly since May, 1838; and stated the manner in which such acts of ownership had been exercised.

Hammekin further testified, in another deposition, that the original act of sale from Rabago by Victor Blanco to Laguerenne, dated May 25, 1836, which was given to the witness by Priolland when he purchased the land in 1837, was executed before Miguel Diez de Bonilla, a notary public in the City of Mexico; that he knew the signature of said officer, and recognized his signature to said act of sale as his genuine signature, because he had often employed Bonilla during his (witness') residence in Mexico from 1831 to 1836; that he delivered it to Robert Rose, his attorney and agent, in 1850, and had not seen it since. He also stated that he had, then, in his possession, (1) a legal copy of the original testimonio of title to Rabago, followed by a petition to Judge Alltors by Guillermo Laguerenne for the same, and a certificate signed by Miguel Diez de Bonilla, and the certificate of the American consul; (2) a simple copy of the sale from Rabago by Blanco to Laguerenne, followed by a copy of the [receipt of the treasurer of the custom house of Mexico, for the alcabala from said Laguerenne. These papers were attached to the deposition. The certificates are dated in the year 1836. To show the loss of the paper given by Hammekin to his agent, Robert Rose, the defendants produced as a witness John N. Rose, who testified that Robert Rose was his brother, was a lawyer, and died in Washington City in May, 1871, and that he (John) was Robert's administrator, and had charge of all his papers, and had several times searched for, and failed to find, the following papers, viz.: (1) the deed from Rabago, by his attorney Blanco, to Laguerenne; (2) the power of attorney from Rabago to Blanco, dated the 8th of June, 1832; (3) the power of attorney from Laguerenne to Priolland, executed in Mexico, January 10, 1837.

The defendants also gave in evidence the testimony of several witnesses, tending to prove that they and those from whom they derived title had constantly exercised acts of ownership over the land in question from the time of the origin of their title, by paying the taxes, filing the muniments of title, surveying the tract into parcels, selling to settlers, leasing to tenants, compromising with persons who got unauthorized possession of portions of the land, etc., and that, by these means, the tract had become largely settled, and many valuable improvements had been erected thereon.

E. D. Conger testified on the stand: That he is one of the defendants in this case, and was one of the purchasers from Gen. Harrison; that before they purchased they had the title examined by competent attorneys, and bought on the faith of their opinion as to the title; that they never heard of any adverse claim until the institution of this suit; that the land bought by the Congers was the remnant of the grant after the best parts of it had been sold off; that they have paid taxes on the land regularly since they have purchased it; that there were about one hundred settlements on the eleven leagues when they purchased, but none on the part they purchased.

The defendants also introduced in evidence:

1. A certificate from the comptroller of the State, showing that Robert Rose, as agent for G. L. Hammekin, rendered for taxes for the years 1854 to 1859, both inclusive, 48,700 acres of the M. Rabago grant in McLennan County, and that the records do not show that there were any other assessments made for those years.

2. An original lease from A. M. Hughes to William Graham to the Neville league on said grant, dated May 24, 1854. It recites that Hughes is acting for Robert Rose, the agent for Mr. Goodrich, who claims the Rabago eleven leagues of land. Also, a transfer from said Graham to David E. London of this lease, dated October 17, 1854.

3. A power of attorney from George L. Hammekin to Robert Rose, dated May 24, 1855, recorded in the records of McLennan County, April 28, 1857. It is a general power to prosecute, sue for, recover, and establish his claim to lands situated in different parts of Texas; to compromise with settlers, and sell.

4. Docket of the District Court of McLennan County, showing the suits about the land before the war, styled Hammekin v. Graham and Hammekin v. Bell.

The original act of sale from Rabago, by Blanco, to Laguerenne, purchased by the defendants as after mentioned, recites that the sale was made under a "letter power," which the officer saw, read, and returned to the party, Blanco. It was in evidence that Rabago was a citizen of the State of Coahuila, and that he and his family lived there all their lives. The original testimonio of the title, dated January 18,. 1834, which Hammekin testified was delivered to him by Priolland when he bought in 1837, was also put in evidence by the defendants.

Other evidence referred to in the charge of the court need not be adverted to here.

After the introduction of the foregoing evidence, the defendants offered in evidence, as a part of their title, the said protocol, or first original of Rabago's application for the said eleven league grant, and of the concession made thereon, dated, respectively, the 28th of November and the 2d of December, 1828. The plaintiff objected to its admission on the following grounds:

1. That it is irrelevant and forms no part of the defendants' title.

2. The paper, if genuine, is an archive of a foreign government, and from public policy cannot be introduced in our courts; but only a lawfully certified and examined copy can be introduced.

3. The custodian shows that he holds it by virtue of a foreign law which is not properly proven.

4. But if the paper be admitted, then it is objected to for purposes of comparison of handwriting, for which object alone it is introduced. Because—

First. It is not such a paper as was required to be signed by Rabago, and no presumption can arise that it was so signed by reason of its being an archive or ancient document.

Second. There is no evidence of the handwriting being that of Rabago.

Third. It is not admitted nor proven to be the genuine handwriting of Rabago.

Fourth. The instrument with which it is to be compared is not so old but that living witnesses to the questioned signature can be and are actually introduced.

The court overruled these objections and permitted the paper to go to the jury for all purposes, subject to be controlled by his charge as to its being a standard of comparison for the handwriting of Miguel Rabago. To this ruling the plaintiff excepted.

The plaintiff then offered evidence to rebut that adduced by the defendants, as to the genuineness of the alleged protocol, to wit: the testimony of Antonio Garcia Corillo and Ramon L. Flores, the purport of which was that Flores, then chief clerk of the Department of State, at the request of Corillo, had searched the archives in 1874 for everything relating to the Rabago grant, and had not found the document now produced by the defendants. The court still adhered to its ruling to admit the document in evidence.

This raises the first question in the cause, namely, whether the protocol, or first original of the application and concession, belonging to the public archives of the State of Coahuila, at Saltillo is admissible as evidence. The court below decided that it was, and we have difficulty in seeing any reason why it should not be. It is true that the testimonio given out to the interested party is a second original, and is treated as an original, and may be admitted in evidence as such; but it does not take away from the validity and faith of the first original. The latter may always be resorted to for the purpose of correcting any errors in the testimonio. It is true, it may be deemed a matter of public policy in some States to prohibit public records from being removed from their places of deposit; but if their removal is allowed, or in any legitimate way effected, they certainly constitute the best evidence of their contents and authenticity. No public policy could have been contravened, in the present case, but that of the State of Coahuila, or the Republic of Mexico. If the authorities of Coahuila allowed the removal of the protocol in question, we do not see what objection could be made by the courts of Texas, or of the United States. On general grounds, there is no valid objection to its admissibility. Though by the practice of the courts a certified or sworn copy of a record of another court may suffice, it is not unusual for the record itself to be brought in. In Taylor on Evidence, § 1377, it is said: "The general records of the realm, which are placed under the custody of the Master of the Rolls, may be proved by copies purporting to be verified by the deputy keeper of the records, or one of the assistant record keepers, and to be sealed and stamped with the seal of the record office; and in cases of importance before the House of Lords or elsewhere, permission will be given to one of the assistant keepers to produce the original record." In § 1378, it is also said: "The records of the superior courts may either be proved by the mere production of the originals, or,—as this course would be highly inconvenient to the public if generally adopted, since it might lead to mutilation or loss of valuable documents,—they may be proved by means of copies. Of these, there are four kinds; viz., exemplifications under the Great Seal; exemplifications under the seal of the particular court where the record remains; office copies; and examined copies." This shows that originals are admissible as evidence, if properly authenticated. We do not see how it could well be more satisfactorily authenticated than it was, namely, by the certificate annexed to it by the Secretary of the State of Coahuila, and by the actual identification of it, made by the said secretary and his keeper of records when examined as witnesses in the cause. The objection that it was irrelevant is certainly untenable. It was one of the links in the defendants' chain of title. They were not bound to rest on the testimonio of the same document introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, nor on that introduced by themselves. They were entitled, if they chose, to put in the very original itself, even if it were cumulative evidence. As to the uses to which it might be applied, being admissible as evidence, it might go before the jury, and be used, under the charge of the court, for all legitimate purposes in the cause. It was certainly available as a link in the defendants' chain of [title, if for nothing more.

The defendants contended that the signature purporting to be that of Rabago, appended to the application, might be examined by the jury as a standard of comparison of Rabago's handwriting, on the question whether the signature purporting to be his on the other paper, namely, the power of attorney from Rabago to Victor Blanco, was genuine or not. This was resisted by the plaintiff on the grounds stated above; and, before the cause went to the jury, the plaintiff requested the court to charge that, at the date of the signature to the application, the law did not require it to be signed by Rabago; and that it should only be considered as one of the links in the chain of defendants' title, and not for the purpose of comparison of handwriting; and that the jury should not consider such signature as the signature of Rabago for that purpose. The court refused to give this instruction, and the plaintiff excepted; and the court then charged the jury on this point as follows, to wit:

"The defendants have also offered a paper which purports to be the original application of Miguel Rabago for this concession, which purports to be signed by said Rabago in person —that is, by himself, and have offered proof to the effect that this paper came from the office of the archives at Saltillo, which is the proper custody for said original application and decree, and to the effect that the signatures of Governor Viesca and of the secretary are genuine, with proof as to the circumstances of the finding said paper, and manner [of] keeping said archives; and if you believe from the proof that said paper so offered by the defendants is as old as its date imports, that it has been preserved in the archives as the initial paper connected with this grant, you may give these circumstances the weight of direct testimony to the genuineness of said signature; and if the other proof in the case does not in your judgment overbear this weight you may find the signature to this original application to be the proved signature of Miguel Rabago, and use it as a standard of comparison to aid you in determining the genuineness of the signature to the writing purporting to be a letter power from said Rabago to Victor Blanco."

To which charge of the court the plaintiff's counsel objected and excepted for the following reasons:

1. The charge is upon the weight of evidence.

2. It submits to the jury a question which should be decided by the court.

3. It submits to the jury a paper for the comparison of handwriting which is neither proven nor admitted to be genuine, nor to be signed by the genuine signature of Miguel Rabago.

The first and second reasons are certainly not well assigned. The charge does not take from the jury the determination of the weight of the evidence; nor does it submit to the jury a question of law determinable only by the court. Whether the signature appended to the application, purporting to be Rabago's, if the jury believed it to be his, might legally be used by them as a standard of comparison to aid them in determining the genuineness of the signature to the writing purporting to be a letter power from Rabago to Blanco, is the important question arising upon the charge.

It is well settled that a witness who only knows a person's handwriting from seeing it in papers produced on the trial, and proved or admitted to be his, will not be allowed, from such knowledge, to testify to that person's handwriting, unless the witness be an expert, and the writing in question is of such antiquity that witnesses acquainted with the person's handwriting cannot be had. Greenl. Ev. § 578. It is also the result of the weight of authority that papers cannot be introduced in a cause for the mere purpose of enabling the jury to institute a comparison of handwriting, said papers not being competent for any other purpose. Greenl. Ev. §§ 579, 581. But where other writings, admitted or proved to be genuine, are properly in evidence for other purposes, the handwriting of such instruments may be compared by the jury with that of the instrument or signature in question, and its genuineness inferred from such comparison. Griffith v. Williams, 1 Cromp. & J. 47; Doe v. Newton, 5 Ad. & El. 514; Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N.Y. 439; Miles v. Loomis, 75 N. Y. 288; Medway v. U. S. 6 Ct. Cl. 421; McAllister v. McAllister, 7 B. Mon. 269; 1 Phil. Ev. 4th Am. ed. 615; Greenl. Ev. § 578. The history of this last rule is well stated in Medway v. U. S., qua supra. In Griffith v. Williams, it was stated by the court that "Where two documents are in evidence, it is competent for the court or jury to compare them. The rule as to the comparison of handwriting applies to witnesses who can only compare a writing to which they are examined with the character of the handwriting impressed upon their own minds; but that rule does not apply to the court or jury, who may compare the two documents when they are properly in evidence." In Doe v. Newton, Lord Denman said: "There being two documents in question in the cause, one of which is known to be in the handwriting of a party, the other alleged, but denied, to be so, no human power can prevent the jury from comparing them with a view to the question of genuineness; and therefore it is best for the court to enter with the jury into that inquiry, and to do the best it can, under circumstances which cannot be helped." The other judges expressed substantially the same view. "The true rule on this subject," said Justice Johnson, in Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N.Y. 439, 442, "is that laid down in Doe v. Newton, that where different instruments are properly in evidence for other purposes, the handwriting of such instruments may be compared by the jury, and the genuineness or simulation of the handwriting in question be inferred from such comparison. But other instruments or signatures cannot be introduced for that purpose." See Amer. note to Griffith v. Williams, 1 Cromp. & J. 47, Phil. ed.

This rule is not contravened by the decisions of the Supreme Court of Texas or of this court. The leading case in Texas on comparison of handwriting is Hanley v. Gandy, 28 Tex. 211, which only decides that other papers, not connected with the cause, cannot be introduced for the mere purpose of instituting a comparison of handwriting. No case decides that a signature to be proven cannot be compared by the jury with other papers or signatures of the party, properly in evidence in the cause. Strother v. Lucas, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 763 [8:573], the leading case in this court, relates to the competency of a witness to testify as to the genuineness of a signature without having any knowledge of the party's handwriting; and the court held that such evidence was not admissible. The case of Moore v. U. S. 91 U. S. 270 [23:346] affirms the rule in question in cases where the paper used as a standard of comparison is admitted to be in the handwriting of the party, or where he is estopped from denying it to be so; it does not disaffirm the rule as applied to cases where the standard is clearly proved to be in such handwriting. In that case the paper referred to as the standard of comparison was the claimant's power of attorney given to his attorney in fact, by virtue of which the latter presented his case to the court of claims. It was held that he was estopped from denying that the signature to the power was in his handwriting. The present case is quite similar to that. The plaintiff himself claims title under the very application of Rabago, the signature to which is claimed to be a proper standard of comparison of Rabago's handwriting. Is he not estopped from denying it to be Rabago's hand? His counsel say that at that period of time the application did not require the party's signature. Even if this be so, still, it is proved that Rabago was at Saltillo at the time the application was made, and it purports to be signed by him, and not by any person for him; and, if the document is the real protocol of the application as presented, it is to be presumed, at least until the contrary is shown, that the signature which it bears is the real signature of Rabago. Whether the document is or is not the real protocol of the application, as presented, was fairly left to the jury under the circumstances and evidence of the case—which, we may add, were so strong and convincing that the jury would not have been justified in finding in the negative. The evidence, indeed, was such as abundantly to satisfy the condition, that the paper referred to as a standard of comparison must be clearly proved to be genuine. We think that the charge of the court was right.

The defendants next offered in evidence, as an ancient instrument, the alleged original power of attorney from Rabago to Victor Blanco, found by the witness Klieberg in the old trunk, at Galveston, a copy of which, with the indorsements thereon, has been already given. The plaintiff objected to its admission for the following reasons, to wit:

First. Having been in the trunk since March, 1836, it could not have been the instrument by virtue of which title passed from Rabago in the City of Mexico, by deed from Blanco to Laguerenne on the 25th of May, 1836.

Second. The recitals in the deed contradict the evidence of Williams and Klieberg, under whose testimony it is introduced.

Third. It cannot be introduced as an ancient instrument, because,—

1. No possession was ever held under it, it not coming to the possession of the defendants for forty years after its execution.

2. It is suspicious on its face by reason of not being acknowledged, certified to, witnessed, nor written on sealed paper.

3. It does not come from the proper custody.

Fourth. It is not such an instrument as would have passed title to land in 1832 or in 1836.

1. It is not acknowledged, witnessed, certified to, nor written on sealed paper.

2. No summons was served upon the grantor to appear before an official for the purpose of rendering it an authentic or judicial act.

Fifth. The power to Blanco, if any, could not pass an equitable title, if any, which could not be cognizable in a court of law.

Sixth. It is not made part of the Laguerenne deed.

Seventh. If it conveyed any power, it was divested out of and from Blanco by the indorsement and delivery to Samuel May Williams in 1838.

Eighth. It appears to have been executed, if at all, before six years from the issuance of the concession, and does not bind the attorney nor his vendees to cultivate the land.

Ninth. If genuine, it was revoked by the War of 1835, the Revolution between Texas and Mexico, and the Constitution of March 17, 1836.

Tenth. It cannot act as power to make a parol or verbal sale, because no possession was taken under it within a reasonable time.

These objections were overruled, the paper admitted in evidence, and the plaintiff excepted; this being the fourth exception taken at the trial.

The objections made against the admission of the paper seem to be either entirely unfounded, or trivial in their character. It is not testified by William H. Williams that it had been in the black trunk ever since March, 1836; he could not know such a fact, for he was only born in 1838. He only says that it was probably placed in the trunk by his mother at the time of the "runaway scrape" (which took place on the advance of Santa Anna in March, 1836); that from his mother's statements, she had his father's papers with her at that time, and that she kept them until her death, and the witness has kept them from that time until now; that the trunk was either in his father's or mother's possession, until it came into his; that his earliest recollection of it was in 1840, at their house in Galveston, where it remained until 1859; but that it was traditionally known to witness to have been with the family at San Philipe de Austin and at Quintana, and afterwards at Galveston; that from 1836 to 1838 his father and mother lived at Quintana, at the mouth of the Brazos River.

There is nothing in this testimony inconsistent with the fact that Blanco may have transmitted the paper to Samuel M. Williams after the execution of the deed to Laguerenne in Mexico in May, 1837. As it was Williams' authority for taking possession of the property, and not recited in the final title papers, he may have wished it returned to him.

There is nothing in the recitals of the deed to Laguerenne repugnant to the above hypothesis. That deed (which will be more particularly mentioned hereafter) begins as follows: "Before me, notary public and witnesses, Don Victor Blanco, in name of Don Miguel Rabago, in virtue of letter power which has conferred on him for various purposes, among which is comprised the faculty that he can sell and may sell the lands which he has in Texas, which he showed to me, which I have seen, read, and returned to the party, and to it in his possession I refer,—said: That the aforesaid Don Miguel Rabago possesses," etc. [then proceeding in the usual form of an act of sale.] There is no recital here at all inconsistent with the testimony of Williams or of Klieberg; and, as the notary certifies that the power was exhibited to him, Blanco had no occasion to retain it in his possession. Besides, he was a near relative and friend of Rabago, and did not require it.

The other reasons given for objecting to the admission of the power are equally untenable. It is said that no possession was ever held under it, it not coming into the defendants' possession for forty years after its execution. This is not true. The possession of the defendants and of those whose title they hold was always under and by virtue of the instrument. If property passes through a dozen hands in the course of forty years, each keeping in his own possession the deed given to him, the possession of all is equally under the first deed, which may be given in evidence as an ancient deed, although never seen by any but the first grantee to whom it was given. The paper is said to be suspicious on its face, for want of acknowledgment, etc., and that no summons was served on the grantor to appear before an official to render it an authentic or judicial act. It is enough to say that none of these things affect the validity of the instrument; and the circumstances of the case and of the time are sufficient (if any reason is necessary) to account for the absence of these formalities. Besides, they relate more especially to the effect of the instrument than to its admissibility as an ancient document; and in that regard will be examined under the seventh exception, hereafter considered. We see nothing in the other objections to call for remark, except the one that supposes the power was divested out of Blanco by the indorsement and delivery to Samuel M. Williams. This is not so. The indorsement merely gives Williams power to "take possession of the eleven leagues." The power to sell was not transferred. This very fact suggests the reason why the power was returned by Williams to Blanco after the possessory title had been completed. Blanco would want it for the purpose of enabling him to make a sale. The more we consider the circumstances, the more clear it appears that the evidence is entirely harmonious, and consistent with itself. We think that the paper was properly admissible as an ancient writing. It is unnecessary to dilate on the subject of ancient documents in general, and when they are admissible. We are of the opinion that all the conditions of admissibility were satisfied in this case.

But there is another reason why it is proper that we should so hold. The case was once before the Supreme Court of Texas on an appeal taken to set aside the verdict rendered on a former trial; and that court held, under the same evidence used at the trial in the circuit court, that the document was admissible in evidence as an ancient one. If the action had originally been brought in the circuit court upon proper jurisdictional grounds, and had been tried as it was in the state court, and if, on a writ of error from this court, we had decided as the Supreme Court of Texas did,—we should have felt bound by our first decision. We would not have allowed it to be questioned.

Clark v. Keith, 106 U. S. 464 [27:302]. The present case is in exactly the same category. The removal of the cause from the state court does not put us in the position of a court of review over the Supreme Court of Texas. When it acted, it was the highest court that could act in the cause, and stood in precisely the same position that we stand now. Its action must be accepted by us as that of a court having plenary and final jurisdiction.

By the fifth exception, objection is made to that portion of the judge's charge in which he says: "By the law in force at the time this letter power of attorney purports to have been transferred to Samuel May Williams (April 3, 1833), authorizing him to solicit title to and take possession of said eleven leagues, and at the time said Blanco made his deed to Laguerenne, Blanco could have procured, if he desired, and retained in his possession a legal copy of the power of attorney, which would have all the force and effect of the original; and although the original might at the time be in Samuel May Williams' trunk, in Texas, Blanco's conveyance to Laguerenne would not on that account be without authority if the said paper in Williams' trunk was a genuine paper giving him such power. Such power, if conferred, was conferred on the one named, and remained with him, whether evidenced by the original writing or such copy."

It is objected that there is no evidence that any attempt was ever made by Blanco to obtain such a copy; and that none could have been obtained, because the original had never been an archive of any office. This same objection was before the Supreme Court of Texas. That court seems to have adopted the hypothesis that Williams never returned the power to Blanco, and that the latter, therefore, did not return it to Williams after making use of it in the sale to Laguerenne. The court says: "Where should we have expected to find the instrument? Certainly we would infer that it should have been placed by the commissioner to whom it was presented either with the papers pertaining to the title which he issued for the land, or have been returned to the party by whom it was presented to him. But as the title shows that it was not incorporated into it, as is most usual when the power is an authentic act, we should expect to find it in the custody of Williams, in whom the title and possession of it purports on its face to be vested; or, if not, that he would have transmitted it to his principal, Blanco. But as the latter appears to have taken the precaution to have another power of like effect from Rabago, or to have secured an official copy of this one before remitting it to Williams, there was no necessity for its being returned to him." Certainly there is nothing unreasonable or improbable in the hypothesis that the paper should have been executed in duplicate, in view of the fact that the possessory title to the land had yet to be obtained, and some person in Texas would have to be authorized to attend to it. We think, therefore, that the judge was justified in making the charge he did, and that the jury could not have been misled by it. The fact that Blanco had the original, or a copy in Mexico on the 25th of May, 1836, does not detract from the force of the presumptions in favor of the power found in the trunk.

The sixth exception was taken to that portion of the charge which related to the evidence proper to be taken into consideration on the question of the genuineness of the power of attorney and its effect. The portion of the charge referred to is as follows, to wit:

"The defendants introduced testimony tending to show that as early as 1838 Hammekin had placed in his possession the deed from Blanco to Laguerenne, referring to such a power of attorney; that he insisted on having an authenticated copy of said power furnished him; that very soon thereafter he received said copy of said power, which he placed (with other title papers) in the hands of his agent, retaining a copy made by said Hammekin, which copy has been given you, declared by the interpreter to be identical (with immaterial exceptions) in terms with the letter power offered by defendants; that Hammekin had placed the testimonio in the land office as required by law of persons having such evidence of title to land in Texas; that said Hammekin paid the government dues on said grant, had paid taxes, had sent agents on the land as early as the growing settlement of the country so far freed this section of the country from the hostile Indians, as permitted its occupancy, and the assertion of ownership by assuming actual control of it, and that Hammekin and those to whom he conveyed and the defendants claiming under them had continued to assert ownership to these lands under said power of attorney; and if, in your judgment, said proof establishes such facts, and the proof as to the age and custody of the said letter power satisfies you that said paper is as old as its date imports, and has been in the custody that said evidence indicates, you may consider this proof equal to the direct testimony of at least one witness to the signature of Miguel Rabago; and unless in your judgment the evidence of plaintiff's witnesses and all the circumstances of these parties and these transactions as shown by all the testimony proves that Miguel Rabago did not sign said letter power, you will find said letter power to be genuine, and return your verdict for the defendants."

To this extract from the charge the plaintiff's counsel objected—

1. Because it is a charge upon the weight of evidence.

2. It is in itself an incorrect statement of law.

The plaintiff's counsel seem to overlook the language of the charge. The court did not say that such and such facts were proved, but that the defendants introduced testimony tending to show such facts, and left the testimony with the jury. Besides, we have repeatedly held that the court may give to the jury its opinion on the weight of evidence. We see no error whatever in the charge.

The seventh exception was taken to a portion of the charge which instructed the jury that if the papers and documents relied on by the defendants, and constituting their chain of title, were genuine, they conclusively show that Rabago parted with his title in his lifetime, and no right to it could pass to his heirs by descent, and that the defendants by reason of their right thus acquired would be entitled to a verdict. The ground assigned for this exception was that the letter power of attorney was not such an instrument as could convey land in Texas at that time, because it was not an authentic instrument, being neither acknowledged, witnessed, certified to, nor written on sealed paper, nor proved before a notary; and no summons was even served on Rabago to appear before an official for the purpose of rendering it an authentic or judicial act. We apprehend that the want of the formalities referred to merely affects the mode of authenticating the instrument. If it is passed before a notary public and witnesses, and is certified as a testimonio, it is called an authentic instrument and proves itself. If not thus authenticated, it must be proved to have been executed by the party to be charged with it. Watrous v. McGrew, 16 Tex. 509, 513; Andrews v. Marshall, 26 Tex. 212; Jones v. Montes, 15 Tex. 351, 352; Chambers v. Fisk, 22 Tex. 504; Gonzales v. Ross, 120 U. S. 605, 624 [30:801, 808]; Hanrick v. Barton, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 166, 171, 172 [21:350, 352]. The appellant relies upon a passage in Escriche (verbo Poder) where he says that a power of attorney is to be made before a notary public, and to have certain formalities described. But he there refers to the technical power called, in the Spanish law, poder, or procuracion, having much the same meaning as our term "power of attorney," which indicates a power or authority under seal. But the technical poder is not the only form by which authority may be given to act for another. A technical power, executed with all the solemnities, is but one form of a mandate (mandato, mandamiento). Under the word mandato, the same Escriche says: "Mandate. A consensual contract, by which one of the parties confides the carrying on or execution of one or more matters of business to the other who takes it in his charge. * * * Mandate has also the name of procuration, and the mandatary that of procurator; but the word mandate is more general and comprehends every power given to another in whatsoever mode it be, whilst procuration supposes a power given by writing." Again: "The mandate may be contracted between persons present, or absent, by words, by messengers, by public writing or private writing, and even by letter, as likewise by acts; e. g., if a person, being present, allows another to transact his business, etc." See farther to the same effect, Azo and Manuel's Inst. Book II, Tit. XII; Tapia's Febrero Novisimo, Book II, Tit. IV, c. 13, 14; Partida V, Tit. XII, L. 24.

In the present case the parties were not in the same place; Rabago resided in the State of Coahuila, and Blanco in the City of Mexico; so that the making of the power in the form of a letter was the very form allowed by the laws in such a case. As before said, the only difference it made was in the proof necessary to authenticate the instrument in legal proceedings.

As to the objection that this form was not sufficient to authorize an act of sale, but that it required a power executed under the same solemnities as the act of sale itself, we know of no such rule in the Spanish or Mexican law. The English rule as to the requisites of a power to execute sealed instruments has no application to the case.

The eighth exception related to the admission in evidence of Hammekin's copy of the power of attorney. He testified that when he purchased the land from Laguerenne, through Priolland, the latter had no copy of the power from Rabago to Blanco, and he (Hammekin) made it a condition that a copy should be furnished to him; and that soon after he received a certified copy, which he delivered to his agent, Rose, with the other papers, and with them has been lost. He testified, however, that he took an exact copy of this certified copy before giving the latter to Rose, and had it yet; and it was in evidence in the case and was found to be an exact copy of the power found in the old trunk, with the exception of a date being written in words at length in place of figures, and an abbreviation being written in full words. This copy made by Hammekin himself (called the "Hammekin copy") is the paper whose admission in evidence was objected to. The plain answer to the objection is that it was not offered nor admitted as a muniment of title, but merely to show the fact that there was such a paper in existence in 1837 as that found in the trunk, which fact had a legitimate bearing on the question whether the latter was an ancient instrument. For this purpose, it was certainly admissible.

The ninth exception related to the admission in evidence of a copy of the deed, or act of sale, executed by Victor Blanco, as attorney for Rabago, to Laguerenne, dated May 25, 1836; and of a copy of the power of attorney given by Laguerenne to Priolland to sell his real estate. The copies offered in evidence by the defendants were certified copies. That of the deed of May 25, 1836, was taken in the City of Mexico from the original protocol of the deed in the notarial archives, or records, of the deceased notary, Miguel Diez de Bonilla, before whom the deed purported to be executed. It appeared by the testimony of one Crescencio Landgrave, a notary public of the City of Mexico, that these archives, with those of other deceased notaries, had been collected and placed in the public archives of the City of Mexico, under the charge of different notaries. Landgrave testified that he had general charge of said archives, and the particular charge of those of Bonilla, whom he knew, and with whom he was intimate; and that he knew Bonilla's signature appended to the different documents in the archives, and, in fact, received them from his own hands in his (Bonilla's) lifetime. He further testified that the protocol of the deed from Rabago, through Blanco, to Laguerenne, was among the archives of Bonilla, and that he, as the custodian thereof, made an official and duly certified copy of said deed (which was the copy offered in evidence)—the certificate annexed to the copy being in the words following, to wit:

"I certify and give faith that the preceding copy is faithful and exact to the letter of the original document which exists on folio 37 to folio 40 of the protocol of my deceased companion, Don Miguel Diez de Bonilla, which I have under my custody in the archives of the city which is under my charge, from whence the present was taken in order to deliver it to the consul of the United States of the North, in Mexico, by virtue of judicial mandate, this 15th December, 1874, in presence of Don Miguel

Moral and Don Manuel Correo, of this vicinity. (Between Parenthesis:) All not valid.

"[L. S.]

(Signed) CRESCEN. LANDGRAVE."

The official authority of Landgrave is authenticated by the certificates of three other notaries, of the Governor of the Federal District, of the chief official of the Department of Foreign Affairs, and of the United States consul, each certifying to the authority of the preceding.

Landgrave further testified that his brother in office, notary public Antonio Ferreira, had charge of the records of the deceased notary Francisco Madriago, before whom the power of attorney from Laguerenne to Priolland, before referred to, purports to have been executed.

A certified copy of this power of attorney, certified by Ferreira, and authenticated in the same manner as the deed to Laguerenne, was the copy offered in evidence by the defendants, the power being dated January 10, 1837, and its protocol being among the archives of the deceased notary Francisco de Madriago. This power of attorney authorized said Priolland to sell and dispose of all and any real estate belonging to Laguerenne wherever situated.

It is unnecessary to examine in detail the reasons assigned by the plaintiff for objecting to the admission of these papers in evidence. We think that they were properly and sufficiently authenticated, and that the judge committed no error in admitting them.

The only other exception related to the citizenship of Laguerenne. The plaintiff alleged that it was not shown that he was entitled to convey land in Texas in May, 1837, but that he was disabled to do so by reason of his being a citizen of France, and an alien to the Government of Texas. The only direct statement as to his citizenship is that contained in the said power of attorney which he executed, and which begins as follows: "In the City of Mexico, on the 10th day of January, 1837, before me [Madriago], a notary public, and witnesses, personally appeared Don Guillermo Laguerenne, a citizen, and of the commerce of this place, in whom I have faith and know," etc. There is no testimony in the case sufficient to overthrow the presumption arising from this recital. Hammekin says that he does not recollect whether he was an American or a Frenchman; that in May, 1836, he was established as a merchant in the City of Mexico; that he had a brother in Philadelphia much older than himself, who was a merchant in that city for many years. This is all the evidence on the subject. It must be received, therefore, that he was a citizen of Mexico. As to citizens of Mexico, it is well settled that they never lost the right of disposing of their Texas lands by the division of the empire. Airhart v. Massieu, 98 U. S. 491, 493, 497 [25:213–215].

Having considered all the material questions raised by the plaintiff in error, and being of opinion that he has not succeeded in showing any error in the judgment of the court below, the same is affirmed

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 530–555.)

Taxation of telegraph companies—liability to taxation—government agencies—tax, when legal—rule of taxation—injunction.

1. The Act of July 24, 1866, sections 5263–5269, Revised Statutes, giving to a telegraph company the right to run its lines over the public domain, post roads, etc., is merely a permissive statute, and does not carry with it any exemption from the ordinary burdens of taxation.

2. The company receiving the benefit of the laws of the State for the protection of its property and its rights is liable to be taxed upon its real or personal property, as any person would be.

3. Agencies of the Federal Government are only exempt from state taxation so far as such taxation may interfere with or impair their efficiency in performing the functions by which they serve the government.

4. A tax, though nominally upon the shares of the capital stock of the company, is, in effect, a tax upon it on account of property owned and used by it in the State, where the proportion of the length of its lines in the State to their entire length is the basis for ascertaining the value of the property; and such tax is not forbidden by the acceptance, by the telegraph company, of the right conferred by section 5263, Revised Statutes, or by the commerce clause of the Constitution.

5. This court will not hold a tax void because, if called upon, it might have adopted a different system or rule for ascertaining the taxable value on which the percentage of taxation should be arrived at, provided the rule adopted is not unfair or unjust.

6. An injunction forbidding the telegraph company from operating its lines, the greater part of which are over post roads of the United States, until the tax is paid cannot be sustained; and a state statute prescribing such injunction, as a remedy to enforce the collection of its taxes, is void.

[No. 1325.]

Argued Feb. 15, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, against a telegraph company, for a state tax. Judgment for the amount of the tax affirmed; that part of the judgment which awards an injunction reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George S. Hale, Chas. W. Wells and Willard Brown, for appellant:

Telegraph companies which have accepted the Act of Congress of July 24, 1866, are, as to government business, government agencies; and so far as a state tax on a company is on, or affects, the means employed by the Government of the United States to exercise its constitutional powers it is void.

Western Union Tel. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460 (26:1067); Osborn v. Bank of U. S. 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 788 (6:204).

The States can not levy taxes, the direct effect of which shall be to hinder the exercise of any powers which belong to the National Government.

Union Pac. R. R. Co. v. Peniston, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 5 (21:787).

The power of taxation by a State involves and includes the power of destroying the thing taxed, and does not exist as to anything which the taxing power cannot destroy.

McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 316, 427, 431, 433, 436 (4: 579, 606–608); New York v. Tax Comrs. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 620 (17:451); Weston v. Charleston, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 449, 466, 468 (7:481, 487, 488).

The grant of the right, privilege or franchise, to construct and maintain lines of telegraph on post roads of the United States by the Act of July, 1866, cannot be interfered with or limited by any State by prohibition.

One State cannot exclude a corporation organized under the laws of another State from prosecuting its through or local business over and by its use of lines on post roads, if that corporation has accepted the Act of Congress.

Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 96 U. S. 1 (24:708); Hewett v. Western Union Tel. Co. 14 Wash. L. Rep. 194, 211; Savannah v. Charlton, 86 Ga. 460.

Any statute of a State, intended to regulate, tax or restrict the transmission of persons, property or messages from one State to another is void.

Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v Illinois, 118 U. S. 557 (30:244); Fargo v. Michigan, 121 U. S. 230 (30:888).

Nor can a State by a privilege tax on cars, not owned by a railroad company, used upon its road, tax the privilege of carrying passengers in such cars through the State.

Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34 (29:785).

The tax in question in Massachusetts can be sustained only as an excise or franchise tax.

Manufacturers Ins. Co. v. Loud, 99 Mass. 146; Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 632 (18:904); S. C. below, 12 Allen, 298; Providence Sav. Inst. v. Massachusetts, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 611 (18:907); Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252; Commonwealth v. People's Sav. Bank, 5 Allen, 428, 431.

An excise cannot be assessed at different rates or amounts on different descriptions of property, or alone on any one class of property, while others are differently assessed.

1 Desty, Tax. p. 8, 28; Cooley, Tax. 2d. ed. 4.

Franchises are special privileges.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 519, 595 (10:274, 311).

The Company is a government agency and uses this franchise for such business.

Western Union Tel. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 464, (26:1067, 1068).

The fact that it also uses it for private or local business does not authorize the burden imposed by a state tax.

New York v. Tax Comrs. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 620 (17:451); Osborn v. Bank of U. S. 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 738 (6:204); Western Union Tel. Co. v. Texas, supra.

It was considered in New York v. Tax Comrs. supra, that a tax bearing on United States stock was invalid. A tax on the franchises by length of lines is like a general tax on all messages.

Western Union Tel. Co. v. Texas, supra; Commonwealth v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 12 Allen, 298; Atty-Gen. v. Bay State Min. Co. 99 Mass. 148, 152.

The right to levy excises upon franchises has never been extended further than to corporate franchises specially granted by the government, or enjoyed and exercised by its permission.

Gleason v. McKay, 134 Mass. 419, 425.

But in this case the right of exclusion clearly does not exist, and the defendant does not purchase the privilege of the State, but of a paramount authority.

Fargo v. Michigan, 121 U. S. 230, 242, 243 (30:888,893), and Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 205, 206, 211 (29:158, 162–164); Philadelphia & S. S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326, 342–344 (30:1200, 1203, 1204).

It has been shown to be a tax on the franchises of the Company, and the right in question is one of them.

New York v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 539 (25:705).

Valuation is part of the assessment of taxes.

Achison v. Huddleson, 53 U. S. 12 How. 293 (13:993).

A State cannot impose taxes upon persons passing through the State.

Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 493 (30:694, 696).

The power granted by the Constitution to Congress to establish postoffices and post roads extends to the adoption of the electric telegraph as one of the instrumentalities for that service.

Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 96 U. S. 7 (24:708).

The tax is not laid upon the property represented by the capital stock; and if it were so, it would be void.

Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 632 (18:904); Providence Sav. Inst. v. Massachusetts, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 611 (18:907).

The omission to deduct from the total valuation the real estate located and subject to local taxation in other States renders the tax excessive and invalid.

Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. R. Co. 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 206 (21:888); Gloucester Ferry Co v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 197 (29:159); New York v. Weaver, supra.

The defendant is a person, and entitled to protection against unequal taxation.

Santa Clara County v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co. 118 U. S. 394 (30: 118); San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co. 13 Fed. Rep. 722, 747, 748, 762; Libby v. Burnham, 15 Mass. 144; Stetson v. Kempton, 13 Mass. 272.

Messrs. Andrew J. Waterman, Atty-Gen. of Massachusetts, and Henry C. Bliss, Asst. Atty-Gen., for the Commonwealth:

This is not a tax on property but an excise, and, in order that it may be reasonable, the amount to be paid is measured by the aggregate market value of the shares of the capital stock. Such a mode of taxation is legal.

Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252; Commonwealth v. People's Sav. Bank, 5 Allen, 428; Commonwealth v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 12 Allen, 305–309; Reg. v. Arnaud, 9 Q. B. 806–817; Utica v. Churchill, 33 N. Y. 161, 237; Van Allen v. Albany Assessors, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 573 (18:229); Atty-Gen. v. Bay State Min. Co. 99 Mass. 148.

A sovereignty has a right to adopt any standard of measurement, and may follow its caprice even in this respect.

New York v. Tax Comrs. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 620, 630 (17:451, 454); Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. R. Co. 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 206–225 (21:888–894); State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 284–293 (21:164–167).

Legislation may, in a great variety of ways, affect commerce and persons engaged in it, without constituting a regulation within the meaning of the Constitution.

Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557–594 (30:244–257); Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99 (23:819); Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113 (24:77); Chicago, B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Iowa, Id. 155 (24:94).

It is not necessary herein to distinguish between domestic and foreign corporations; the power of the State extends over each within its limits.

Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168 (19:357); Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 209 (29:164); Union Pac. R. R. Co. v. Peniston, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 5–34 (21:787–792); Commonwealth v. Lancaster Sav. Bank, 128 Mass. 495; Woodruff v. Parham, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 123 (19: 382); Manufacturers Ins. Co. v. Loud, 99 Mass. 146.

In Commonwealth v. People's Sav. Bank, 5 Allen, 428–436, it is said that perfect equality in the assessment of taxes is unattainable. An excise tax is legal if it applies alike on all persons who exercise a particular employment or enjoy the same privilege.

Oliver v. Washington Mills, 11 Allen, 268, 279; Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 632–639 (18: 904–906); Dickey v. Maysville, etc., Turnpike Road Co. 7 Dana, 113.

This case is distinguishable from Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 860 (6:233); and McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 360 (4: 590) in that the Western Union Telegraph Company was not created by the government as an instrument for carrying into effect the powers vested in the United States. The right to tax is an incident to sovereignty.

McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 429 (4:607).

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

The action was commenced in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, sitting in equity, by an information on behalf of the Commonwealth, by its Attorney-General, at the relation of the treasurer thereof, Alanson W. Beard. It was afterwards removed, upon motion of the defendant, the Western Union Telegraph Company, into the Circuit Court of the United States. The object of the information was to enforce the collection of a tax levied by the proper authorities of the State upon the Telegraph Company, and to enjoin it from the further operation of its telegraph lines within the territorial limits of the Commonwealth until that tax was paid.

The defendant Company is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, having its capital stock divided into shares. The tax assessed by the treasurer of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts was based upon an estimate of $750,952 as the taxable value of the shares of the Corporation apportioned to that State, the rate of taxation having been determined for that year, 1885, at $14.14 for and upon each $1,000 of valuation. The mode by which this taxable valuation was arrived at was this: The treasurer ascertained from the officers of the Telegraph Company that the valuation of its entire capital stock was $47,500,000, from which was deducted the credits proper to be allowed in determining the assessable value, leaving $38,713,924 as the total valuation of said stock liable to taxation. It was then ascertained that the total number of miles of line of said Corporation in all the States and Territories of this country was 146,052.60, of which 143,219.55 were without the limits of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, leaving 2,833.05 miles within its boundaries. Taking these figures, the treasurer of the State assessed the value of that portion of the capital stock of this Company which, under this calculation, would fall within the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, at the sum of $750,952. The amount thus arrived at, at the rate of $14.14 upon each $1,000 of valuation, produced the sum of $10,618.46 as the amount of the tax claimed to be due and payable to the treasurer of said Commonwealth by that Corporation. This sum was demanded of the Telegraph Company, but it refused to pay the same.

The answer of the defendant Corporation set up that of its 2,833.05 miles of line within the State of Massachusetts more than 2,334.55 miles were over, under, or across post roads, made such by the United States, leaving only 498.50 miles not over or along such post roads, on which the Company offered to pay the proportion of the tax assessed according to mileage by the state authorities.

The main ground on which the Telegraph Company resisted the payment of the tax alleged to be due, and on which probably the case was removed from the state court into the Circuit Court of the United States, is that it is a violation of the rights conferred on the Company by the Act of July 24, 1866, now title LXV, sections 5263 to 5269 of the Revised Statutes. The defendant alleges that it had accepted the provisions of that law, and filed a notification of such acceptance with the Postmaster-General of the United States, June 8, 1867. The argument is, therefore, that by virtue of section 5263 the Company has a right to exercise its functions of telegraphing over so much of its lines as is connected with the military and post roads of the United States which have been declared to be such by law without being subject to taxation therefor by the state authorities. That section reads as follows:

"Sec. 5263. Any telegraph company now organized, or which may hereafter be organized under the laws of any State, shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by law, and over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States; but such lines of telegraph shall be so constructed and maintained as not to obstruct the navigation of such streams and waters, or interfere with the ordinary travel on such military or post roads."

It is urged that this section, upon its acceptance by this Corporation or any of like character, confers a right to do the business of telegraphing which is transacted over the lines so constructed over or along such post roads without liability to taxation by the State. The argument is very much pressed that it is a tax upon the franchise of the Company, which franchise being derived from the United States by virtue of the statute above recited cannot be taxed by a State, and counsel for appellant occasionally speak of the tax authorized by the law of Massachusetts upon this as well as all other corporations doing business within its territory, whether organized under its laws or not, as a tax upon their franchises. But by whatever name it may be called, as described in the laws of Massachusetts, it is essentially an excise upon the capital of the Corporation. The laws of that Commonwealth attempt to ascertain the just amount which any corporation engaged in business within its limits shall pay as a contribution to the support of its government upon the amount and value of the capital so employed by it therein.

The Telegraph Company, which is the defendant here, derived its franchise to be a corporation, and to exercise the function of telegraphing, from the State of New York. It owes its existence, its capacity to contract, its right to sue and be sued, and to exercise the business of telegraphy, to the laws of the State under which it is organized. But the privilege of running the lines of its wires "through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States, * * * and over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States," is granted to it by the Act of Congress. This, however, is merely a permissive statute, and there is no expression in it which implies that this permission to extend its lines along roads not built nor owned by the United States, or over and under navigable streams, or over bridges not built or owned by the Federal Government, carries with it any exemption from the ordinary burdens of taxation.

While the State could not interfere by any specific statute to prevent a corporation from placing its lines along these post roads, or stop the use of them after they were placed there, nevertheless the company receiving the benefit of the laws of the State for the protection of its property and its rights is liable to be taxed upon its real or personal property as any other person would be. It never could have been intended by the Congress of the United States, in conferring upon a corporation of one State the authority to enter the territory of any other State and erect its poles and lines therein, to establish the proposition that such a company owed no obedience to the laws of the State into which it thus entered, and was under no obligation to pay its fair proportion of the taxes necessary to its support.

In the case of Western Union Tel. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460 [26: 1067], this question was very fully considered; and while a tax imposed upon every telegram passing over its lines, whether entirely within the State or coming from without its limits, or going from the State out of it, was held to be void so far as related to messages passing through more than one State, as an interference with or a regulation of commerce and with the Act of Congress we have just been considering, it was distinctly pointed out that if it could be ascertained what telegrams were confined wholly within the State a tax on those might be imposed by it.

In that case the Chief Justice, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"The Western Union Telegraph Company, having accepted the restrictions and obligations of this provision by Congress, occupies in Texas the position of an instrument of foreign and interstate commerce, and of a government agent for the transmission of messages on public business. Its property in the State is subject to taxation the same as other property, and it may undoubtedly be taxed in a proper way on account of its occupation and its business. The precise question now presented is whether the power to tax its occupation can be exercised by placing a specific tax on each message sent out of the State, or sent by public officers on the business of the United States."

This authority of the government gives to this Telegraph Company, as well as to all others of a similar character who accept its provisions, the right to run their lines over the roads and bridges which have been declared to be post roads of the United States. If the principle now contended for be sound, every railroad in the country should be exempt from taxation because they have all been declared to be post roads; and the same reasoning would apply with equal force to every bridge and navigable stream throughout the land. And if they were not exempt from the burden of taxation simply because they were post roads, they would be so relieved whenever a telegraph company chose to make use of one of these roads or bridges along or over which to run its lines. It was to provide against the recognition of such a principle that this court, in the case above cited, while holding that telegrams themselves coming from without a State or sent out of it as a part of their conveyance could not be taxed by the State specifically, nevertheless used the language that "Its property in the State is subject to taxation the same as other property; and it may undoubtedly be taxed in a proper way on account of its occupation and its business."

A still stronger case in the same direction is that of Union Pac. R. R. Co. v. Peniston, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 5 [21:787]. The plaintiff in that action, the Union Pacific Railroad Company, was incorporated under a law of the United States. The State of Nebraska, under a revenue law passed by its Legislature, undertook to lay a tax upon the property of that company which was used or embraced within the limits of its territory, upon a valuation of $16,000 per mile. The property thus rated and taxed consisted of its roadbed, depots, stations, telegraph poles, wires, bridges, etc. It will be here observed that a part of the valuation on which this tax was levied was made up of the telegraph poles and wires belonging to the company.

The argument was pressed in that case that the railroad company held its franchises from the Government of the United States, and that its property could not be taxed by the State; but this court held otherwise, and in the opinion used this language:

"It is often a difficult question whether a tax imposed by a State does in fact invade the domain of the General Government, or interfere with its operations to such an extent, or in such a manner, as to render it unwarranted. It cannot be that a state tax which remotely affects the efficient exercise of a federal power is for that reason alone inhibited by the Constitution. To hold that would be to deny to the States all power to tax persons or property. Every tax levied by a State withdraws from the reach of federal taxation a portion of the property from which it is taken, and to that extent diminishes the subject upon which federal taxes may be laid. The States are, and they must ever be, coexistent with the National Government. Neither may destroy the other. Hence the Federal Constitution must receive a practical construction. Its limitations and its implied prohibitions must not be extended so far as to destroy the necessary powers of the States, or prevent their efficient exercise."

The case of Thomson v. Union Pac. R. R. Co. 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 579 [19:792] is then cited, where it was held that the property of that company was not exempt from state taxation, though their railroad was a part of a system of roads constructed under the authority and direction of the United States, and largely for the uses and to serve the purposes of the General Government. The court further said:

"A very large proportion of the property within the States is employed in execution of the powers of the government. It belongs to governmental agents, and it is not only used but it is necessary for their agencies. United States mails, troops, and munitions of war are carried upon almost every railroad. Telegraph lines are employed in the national service. So are steamboats, horses, stage coaches, foundries, ship yards, and multitudes of manufacturing establishments. They are the property of natural persons or of corporations, who are agents or instruments of the General Government and they are the hands by which the objects of the government are attained. Were they exempt from liability to contribute to the revenue of the States it is manifest the state governments would be paralyzed. While it is of the utmost importance that all powers vested by the Constitution of the United States in the General Government should be preserved in full efficiency, and while recent events have called for the most unembarrassed exercise of many of those powers, it has never been decided that state taxation of such property is impliedly prohibited."

In First Nat. Bank v. Kentucky, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 858 [19:701] which was a case of a tax levied upon the shares of a national bank, the same objection in regard to a tax by state authority was pressed upon the court; but this court said that the principle of exemption of federal agencies from state taxation has a limitation growing out of the necessity upon which the principle is founded. "That limitation is that the agencies of the Federal Government are only exempted from state legislation, so far as that legislation may interfere with or impair their efficiency in performing the functions by which they are designed to serve that government. Any other rule would convert a principle founded alone in the necessity of securing to the Government of the United States the means of exercising its legitimate powers into an unauthorized and unjustifiable invasion of the rights of the States. * * * So of the banks. They are subject to the laws of the State, and are governed in their daily course of business far more by the laws of the State than of the Nation. All their contracts are governed and construed by state laws. Their acquisition and transfer of property, their right to collect their debts, and their liability to be sued for debts, are all based on state law. It is only when the state law incapacitates the banks from discharging their duties to the government that it becomes unconstitutional. We do not see the remotest probability of this, in their being required to pay the tax which their stockholders owe to the State for the shares of their capital stock, when the law of the Federal Government authorizes the tax."

The tax in the present case, though nominally upon the shares of the capital stock of the Company, is in effect a tax upon that organization on account of property owned and used by it in the State of Massachusetts; and the proportion of the length of its lines in that State to their entire length throughout the whole country is made the basis for ascertaining the value of that property. We do not think that such a tax is forbidden by the acceptance on the part of the Telegraph Company of the rights conferred by section 5263 of the Revised Statutes, or by the commerce clause of the Constitution.

It is urged against this tax that in ascertaining the value of the stock no deduction is made on account of the value of real estate and machinery situated and subject to local taxation outside of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The report of examiner Fisk, to whom the matter was referred to find the facts, states that the amount of the value of said real estate outside of its jurisdiction was not clearly shown, but it did appear that the cost of land and buildings belonging to the Company and entirely without that State was over $3,000,000. In the statement of the treasurer of the Company it is said that the value of real estate owned by the Company within the State of Massachusetts was nothing. Since the Corporation was only taxed for that proportion of its shares of capital stock which was supposed to be taxable in that State on the calculation above referred to, and since no real estate of the Corporation was owned or taxed within its limits, we do not see why any deduction should be made from the proportion of the capital stock which is taxed by its authorities. But if this were otherwise we do not feel called upon to defend all the items and rules by which they arrived at the taxable value on which its ratio of percentage of taxation should be assessed; and even in this case, which comes from the circuit court and not from that of the State, we think it should appear that the Corporation is injured by some principle or rule of the law not equally applicable to other objects of taxation of like character. Since, therefore, this Statute of Massachusetts is intended to govern the taxation of all corporations therein, and doing business within its territory, whether organized under its own laws or those of some other State, and since the principle is one which we cannot pronounce to be an unfair or an unjust one, we do not feel called upon to hold the tax void, because we might have adopted a different system had we been called upon to accomplish the same result.

It is very clear to us, when we consider the limited territorial extent of Massachusetts, and the proportion of the length of the lines of this Company in that State to its business done therein, with its great population and business activity, that the rule adopted to ascertain the amount of the value of the capital engaged in that business within its boundaries, on which the tax should be assessed, is not unfavorable to the Corporation, and that the details of the method by which this was determined have not exceeded the fair range of legislative discretion. We do not think that it follows necessarily, or as a fair argument from the facts stated in the case, that there was injustice in the assessment for taxation.

The result of these views is that the tax assessed against the plaintiff in error is a valid tax; that the judgment of the court below, "that the sum claimed by the plaintiff (below) to be due for taxes, to wit, $10,618.46, be paid to said State by said Corporation, with interest thereon," is without error, and so much of said judgment is hereby affirmed.

The decree or judgment, however, proceeds and awards an injunction against the Company in the following language added to that above extracted: "and that an injunction shall be issued out of and under the seal of this court, directed to said Corporation and its officers, agents and servants, commanding them and each of them absolutely to desist and refrain from the further prosecution of the business of said Corporation until said sums due to the said Commonwealth for taxes, as aforesaid, shall have been fully paid, with interest and costs, unless the said sum is paid by said defendant within thirty days from the entry hereof."

The effect of this injunction, if obeyed, is to utterly suspend the business of the Telegraph Company, and defeat all its operations within the State of Massachusetts. The Act of Congress says that the company accepting its provisions "shall have the right to construct, maintain and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States." It is found in this case that 2,884.55 miles of the Company's line out of 2,883.05 on which this tax is assessed, are along and over such post roads; and of course the injunction prohibits the operation of the defendant's telegraph over these lines, nearly all it has in the State.

If the Congress of the United States had authority to say that the Company might construct and operate its telegraph over these lines, as we have repeatedly held it had, the State can have no authority to say it shall not be done. The injunction in this case, though ordered by a Circuit Court of the United States, is only granted by virtue of section 54 of chapter 18 of the Public Statutes of Massachusetts. If this statute is void, as we think it is, so far as it prescribes this injunction as a remedy to enforce the collection of its taxes by the decree of the court awarding it, the injunction is erroneous.

In holding this portion of section 54 of chapter 18 of the Massachusetts statutes to be void as applicable to this case, we do not deprive the State of the power to assess and collect the tax. If a resort to a judicial proceeding to collect it is deemed expedient, there remains to the court all the ordinary means of enforcing its judgment—executions, sequestration, and any other appropriate remedy in chancery.

That part of the decree of the Circuit Court which awards the injunction is, therefore, reversed, and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings in conformity to this opinion.

Mr. Justice Bradley was not present at the argument of this case and took no part in its decision.

THEODORE P. BUCHER, Plff. in Err., v. CHESHIRE RAILROAD COMPANY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 555-585.)

Act of charity, what is—Massachusetts Sunday Act—state decisions—negligence of railroads—rule of law.

1. In order to constitute an act of charity, such as is exempted from the Lord's Day Act of Massachusetts, the act which is done must be itself a charitable act.

2. The courts of the United States as a general rule adopt and follow the decisions of the state courts, in questions which concern merely the Constitution and laws of the State.

3. Wherever the decisions of the state courts relate to some law of a local character which may have become established by those courts, or has always been a part of the law of the State, the decisions of the state court upon the subject are usually conclusive, and always entitled to the highest respect in the federal courts.

4. The decisions of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, holding that a person engaged in travel on the Sabbath Day, contrary to the statute of the State, shall not recover against a corporation upon whose road he traveled, for the negligence of its servants, thereby established this principle as a local law of that State.

5. The decisions on this subject by the Massachusetts Court are numerous enough and of sufficiently long standing to establish the rule as the law of that State on that subject.

[No. 132.]

Argued Jan. 11, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action to recover for injuries sustained by negligence while traveling upon defendants' road upon the Sabbath Day. Affirmed.

See 131 Mass. 156.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. A. Ranney, for plaintiff in error:

This case is brought to recover damages for personal injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff by reason of the joint tort of the defendants, while he was traveling in the State of Massachusetts, as a passenger on a train operated by one of them. The case had but one element of defense, and that was the fact that the day on which the misfortune occurred was Sunday; and the court, on that ground alone, ordered a verdict for the defendants.

The law of Massachusetts is not binding Sawyer v. Oakman, 1 Lowell, 134.

It is held in Hough v. Texas & P. R. R. Co. 100 U. S. 214 (25:613) that where a case depends upon principles of general law, and not upon statute regulations, this court is not bound by the decisions of the state courts. That was a railroad case of tort.

Myrick v. Michigan Cent. R. R. Co. 107 U. S. 102 (27:325); Brooklyn C. & N. R. R. Co. v. National Bank of the Republic, 102 U. S. 14 (26:61); Chicago v. Robbins, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 418 (17:298); Oates v. First Nat. Bank, 100 U. S. 239 (25:580); Branch v. Macon & B. R. R. Co. 2 Woods, 385; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 34 (27:365).

For the sound rule of general law, see Sutton v. Wauwatosa, 29 Wis. 21; Schmid v. Humphrey, 48 Iowa, 652; Carroll v. Staten Island R. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 126; Mohney v. Cook, 26 Pa. 342; Merritt v. Earle, 29 N. Y. 115; Johnson v. Irasburgh, 47 Vt. 28; Bigelow, Torts, 309; 2 Thomp. Neg. 1094; Strickler v. Hough, 1 Pitts. L. J. 239; Moulton v. Sanford, 51 Me. 127; Baker v. Portland, 58 Me. 199; Norris v. Litchfield, 35 N. H. 271; Corey v. Bath, Id. 530; Landers v. Staten Island R. R. Co. 18 Abb. Pr. N. S. 339; Whart. Neg. § 321; Cooley, Torts, 156-7.

The doctrine of the Court of Massachusetts is generally regarded as strained, unwarranted, and unjust.

2 Wood, R. R. 1248; Wallace v. Merrimac River Nav. & Exp. Co. 134 Mass. 95; Commonwealth v. Louisville & N. R. R. Co. 80 Ky. 291; Platz v. Cohoes, 89 N. Y. 219; Baldwin v. Barney, 12 R. I. 392; Bailey v. Mayor of N. Y. 3 Hill, 536; Kerwhaker v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. R. Co. 3 Ohio St. 172; Opsahl v. Judd, 30 Minn. 126; Jacobus v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. 20 Minn. 130; Wood v. Erie R. Co. 72 N. Y. 196.

Mr. Charles A. Welch, for defendants in error:

What is known as the Lord's Day extends in the State of Massachusetts from midnight on Saturday to the ensuing midnight; and at the time of the accident hereafter referred to, the General Statutes of Massachusetts of 1860 were in operation, by which it was made an offense, punishable by fine, to travel on the Lord's Day, except from necessity and charity.

Gen. Stat. 1860, chap. 84, §§ 2, 12.

The state courts have put a construction upon this Statute of Massachusetts in this very case, following previous decisions, and this decision has also been subsequently followed and approved.

Bucher v. Fitchburg R. R. Co. 131 Mass. 156; Jones v. Andover, 10 Allen, 18; Stanton v. Metropolitan R. R. Co. 14 Allen, 485; Commonwealth v. Sampson, 97 Mass. 407; Commonwealth v. Josselyn, Id. 411; McGrath v. Merwin, 112 Mass. 467; Smith v. Boston & M. R. R. Co. 120 Mass. 490; Davis v. Somerville, 128 Mass. 594; Wallace v. Merrimac River Nav. & Exp. Co. 134 Mass. 95; Day v. Highland St. R. Co. 135 Mass. 113; Read v. Boston & A. R. R. Co. 1 New Eng. Rep. 890, 140 Mass. 199.

Two other cases may be referred to where the court decided that the plaintiff was not violating the statute.

Cronan v. Boston, 136 Mass. 384: Barker v. Worcester, 139 Mass. 74.

The United States Courts are bound to follow the decision of the Supreme Court of the State upon the construction of a local statute, where those decisions have been uniform.

Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 28 (27: 359, 361); Sumner v. Hicks, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 532, 534 (17: 355, 356); Leffingwell v. Warren, Id. 599, 603 (17:261, 262); Rowan v. Runnels, 46 U. S. 5 How. 134, 139 (12: 85, 87); Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 57 U. S. 16 How. 416, 431 (14: 997, 1003); Pease v. Peck, 59 U. S. 18 How. 595, 598 (15: 518, 520); Douglass v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677 (25: 968).

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

The plaintiff in error was plaintiff in that court, and sought to recover of the defendants for injuries which he sustained by reason of their negligence while traveling upon their roads. The court on the trial substantially instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover because the injury complained of occurred while he was traveling upon the Sabbath Day, in violation of the law of the State of Massachusetts.

A suit between the same parties in regard to the same transaction had been brought in the Supreme Court of that State, in which, on a trial before a jury, the plaintiff obtained a verdict. This was carried to the court in bank, and was there reversed and sent back for a new trial. The plaintiff then became nonsuit in the state court and brought the present action in the Circuit Court of the United States.

It is important to inquire what was at issue upon the trial in the state court. There the defendant set up the law of the State found in the General Statutes, chapter 84, section 2, which is as follows: "Whoever travels on the Lord's Day, except for necessity or charity, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten dollars;" and insisted that the plaintiff, being in the act of violating that law at the time the injury occurred, could not recover. On the 15th of May, 1877, after the plaintiff was injured, the Legislature of Massachusetts passed a statute declaring that this prohibition against traveling on the Lord's Day should not constitute a defense to an action against a common carrier of passengers for any tort or injury suffered by the person so traveling. Mass. Stat. 1877, chap. 232.

The Supreme Court of that State had decided previous to this, in Stanton v. Metropolitan R. Co. 14 Allen, 485, a similar case, that the plaintiff, being engaged in a violation of law, without which he would not have received the injury sued for, could not obtain redress in a court of justice. Also in Bosworth v. Swansey, 10 Met. 363, and in Jones v. Andover, 10 Allen, 18. In the trial of the case now under consideration, before the jury in the state court, the plaintiff does not seem to have controverted the general doctrine thus declared, but insisted that the present case did not come within the statute, because, first, the Act of May 15, 1877, had declared that traveling on Sunday should no longer be a defense to actions for injuries suffered by reason of the negligence of carriers of passengers, although this statute was passed after the accident occurred upon which the right of action was founded; and second, that at the time he was injured he was, within the meaning of the statute, traveling upon an errand of charity or necessity, specially excepted from its provisions.

The court below sustained both of these propositions of the plaintiff, and the court in bank reversed the trial court upon both of them. It held that the Act of May 15, 1877, did not govern a case where the injury had occurred before its passage; that it was not retroactive, and also held that the facts set out in the bill of exceptions did not show that the plaintiff was traveling at the time of the accident either from necessity or for charity. It may be as well to state here that the facts found in the bill of exceptions relating to this latter question, as it was presented before the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, were identical with those appearing in the bill of exceptions of the case now before us, being in both cases the plaintiff's own statement of his reasons for traveling on that day.

Upon the trial in the Circuit Court of the United States the judge was requested by the plaintiff to charge the jury that the circumstances detailed in the testimony of plaintiff and found in the bill of exceptions concerning the illness of his sister in Minnesota, of which he had received knowledge by letter, and had replied that he would meet her in Chicago at a certain time, and that, having been delayed by accidental circumstances, the travel on Sunday, when he was injured, became necessary to enable him to fulfill that promise, were sufficient to be submitted to the jury in order that they might pass upon the question of whether or not this act of traveling on the Lord's Day was a work of necessity or charity. This the court declined to do, saying that the same question having been submitted to the jury in the trial in the state court, and having been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the State, he did not consider that there was evidence sufficient to go to the jury upon that subject.

This is one of the assignments of error now before us, and upon this point we are of opinion that the court below ruled correctly. It is not a matter of estoppel which bound the parties in the court below, because there was no judgment entered in the case in which the ruling of the state court was made, and we do not place the correctness of the determination of the circuit court in refusing to permit this question to go the jury upon the ground that it was a point decided between the parties, and therefore res judicata as between them in the present action, but upon the ground that the Supreme Court of the State in its decision had given such a construction to the meaning of the words "charity" and "necessity" in the statute as to clearly show that the evidence offered upon that subject was not sufficient to prove that the plaintiff was traveling for either of those purposes. The court in its opinion, which is reported in Bucher v. Fitchburg R. R. Co. 131 Mass. 156, said:

"The act of plaintiff in thus traveling on the Lord's Day was not an act of necessity within the meaning of the statute. * * * In order to constitute an act of charity, such as is exempted from the Lord's Day Act, the act which is done must be itself a charitable act. The act of ascertaining whether a charity is needful is not the charity; but, so far as the statute is concerned, the only question in that case would be, is this act a necessary act? That involves the question, whether the act is one which it is necessary to do on the Lord's Day; and no previous neglect to obtain the requisite information on a previous day creates a necessity for obtaining it on the Lord's Day."

After citing other cases which had been decided in that court, it was further said:

"It is apparent that the plaintiff's duty to his sister was made subservient to his secular business. We are, therefore, of opinion that the ruling should have been given that there was no evidence which would justify the jury in finding that the plaintiff was traveling from necessity or charity, within the meaning of the statute."

Taking, therefore, this construction of the language of the statute, as well as prior decisions to the same purport in which we think we are bound to follow the Supreme Court of the State, we agree that the record in this case as in that does not furnish evidence which should have gone to the jury upon that branch of the subject.

The other assignment of error, in regard to the effect of traveling on the Lord's Day in violation of the Statute of Massachusetts, submitted as a defense to what would otherwise be a liability of the railroad for the negligence of its servants, presents the matter in a somewhat different aspect. It is not easy to see that there was anything in the case as it arose in the circuit court which required a construction of the meaning of that statute, after eliminating what has just been suggested as to the signification of the words "necessity" and "charity." The remainder is a short prohibition against traveling upon the Lord's Day, and provides for the imposition of a penalty for so doing. This is very plain; it admits of no doubt as to its meaning, and its validity has never been controverted. When, therefore, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in a long line of decisions, has held that the violation of this statute may be set up as a defense to a liability growing out of the negligence of a railroad company in carrying passengers upon its road, it must have been on some other ground than that to be found in the expressions used in the statute itself. There is no such provision in it, and there is no necessary inference to be drawn from its language that it was intended to control the relations between the passenger and the carrier, or to modify the obligations of the one to the other.

The language of the court in Stanton v. Metropolitan R. Co., already cited, is that "Because the plaintiff was engaged in the violation of law, without which he would not have received the injury sued for, he cannot obtain redress in a court of justice." This principle would seem to be as applicable to a man engaged in any other transaction forbidden by law as to that of violating the Sabbath. Whether the doctrine thus laid down is a sound one, and whether, if if it be not sound as it commends itself to our judgment, we should follow it as being supported by the decisions of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in numerous instances, presents in this case the only serious question for our consideration. Hamilton v. Boston, 14 Allen, 475; Bosworth v. Swansey, 10 Met. 363; Jones v. Andover, 10 Allen, 18; Day v. Highland St. R. Co. 135 Mass. 113; Read v. Boston & A. R. R. Co. 1 New Eng. Rep. 390, 140 Mass. 199.

If the proposition, as established by the repeated decisions of the highest court of that State, were one which we ourselves believed to be a sound one, there would be no difficulty in agreeing with that court, and, consequently, affirming the ruling of the circuit judge in the present case. But without entering into the argument of that subject, we are bound to say that we do not feel satisfied that upon any general principles of law, by which the courts that have adopted the common-law system are governed, that this is a true exposition of that law.

On the contrary, in the case of Philadelphia, W. & B. R. R. Co. v. Havre de Grace Steam Towboat Co. 64 U. S. 23 How. 209 [16:433], this court had under consideration the same question. It arose in regard to the effect of a statute of Maryland forbidding persons "to work or do any bodily labor, or willingly suffer any of their servants to do any manner of labor on the Lord's Day, works of charity or necessity excepted," and prescribing a penalty for a breach thereof. It was held by this court that where a vessel was prosecuting her voyage on Sunday, and was injured by piles negligently left in the river, this statute making traveling on Sunday an offense and punishing it by a penalty, constituted no defense to an action for damages by the vessel. A number of cases were cited sustaining that view of the subject, and the court, through Mr. Justice Grier, used this language: "We do not feel justified, therefore, on any principles of justice, equity, or of public policy, in inflicting an additional penalty of seven thousand dollars on the libelants, by way of set-off, because their servants may have been subject to a penalty of twenty shillings each for the breach of the statute."

In that case, however, there had been no decision of the courts of Maryland holding that a violation of the Sabbath would constitute a defense to the action against the company which had left the piles in the river. In this view of the matter it is not unworthy of consideration that, shortly after the injury in the present case was inflicted, the General Court of Massachusetts passed a statute, to which we have already referred, declaring that traveling on the Lord's Day should not "constitute a defense to an action against a common carrier of passengers for any tort or injury suffered by a person so traveling."

The question then arises, how far is this court bound to follow the decisions of the Massachusetts Supreme Court on that subject?

The Congress of the United States, in the Act by which the federal courts were organized, enacted that "The laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." R. S. § 721; Judiciary Act, § 34, 1 Stat. at L. 92. This statute has been often the subject of construction in this court, and its opinions have not always been expressed in language that is entirely harmonious. What are the laws of the several States which are to be regarded "as rules of decision in trials at common law" is a subject which has not been ascertained and defined with that uniformity and precision desirable in a matter of such great importance.

The language of the statute limits its application to cases of trials at common law. There is, therefore, nothing in the section which requires it to be applied to proceedings in equity, or in admiralty; nor is it applicable to criminal offenses against the United States,—see U. S. v. Reid, 53 U. S. 2 How. 361 [13:1028]—or where the Constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States require other rules of decision. But with these, and some other exceptions which will be referred to presently, it must be admitted that it does provide that the laws of the several States shall be received in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply, as the rules of decision in trials at common law.

It has been held by this court that the decisions of the highest court of a State in regard to the validity or meaning of the Constitution of that State, or its statutes, are to be considered as the law of that State, within the requirement of this section. In Leffingwell v. Warren, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 599 [17:261], this court said, in regard to the Statutes of Limitations of a State: "The construction given to a statute of a State by the highest tribunal of such State is regarded as a part of the statute, and is as binding upon the courts of the United States as the text."

In the case of Luther v. Borden, 48 U. S. 7 How. 40 [12:598], Chief Justice Taney said: "The point then raised here has been already decided by the courts of Rhode Island. The question relates altogether to the Constitution and laws of that State; and the well settled rule in this court is that the courts of the United States adopt and follow the decisions of the state courts in questions which concern merely the Constitution and laws of the State." See also Post v. Kendall County, 105 U. S. 667 [26:1204].

It is also well settled that where a course of decisions, whether founded upon statutes or not, have become rules of property as laid down by the highest courts of the State, by which is meant those rules governing the descent, transfer, or sale of property, and the rules which affect the title and possession thereto, they are to be treated as laws of that State by the federal courts.

The principle also applies to the rules of evidence. In Ex parte Fisk, 113 U. S. 720 [28:1120], the court said: "It has been often decided in this court that in actions at law in the courts of the United States the rules of evidence and the law of evidence generally of the State prevail in those courts." See also Wilcox v. Hunt, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 378 [10:209]; Ryan v. Bindley, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 66 [17:559].

There are, undoubtedly, exceptions to the principle that the decisions of the state courts, as to what are the laws of that State, are in all cases binding upon the federal courts. The case of Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 1 [10:865], which has been often followed, established the principle that if this court took a different view of what the law was in certain classes of cases which ought to be governed by the general principles of commercial law, from the state court, it was not bound to follow the latter. There is, therefore, a large field of jurisprudence left in which the question of how far the decisions of state courts constitute the law of those States is an embarrassing one.

There is no common law of the United States, and yet the main body of the rights of the people of this country rest upon and are governed by principles derived from the common law of England, and established as the laws of the different States. Each State of the Union may have its local usages, customs, and common law. Wheaton v. Peters, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 591 [8: 1055]; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co. 54 U. S. 18 How. 518 [14: 249].

When, therefore, in an ordinary trial in an action at law we speak of the common law we refer to the law of the State as it has been adopted by statute or recognized by the courts as the foundation of legal rights. It is in regard to decisions made by the state courts in reference to this law, and defining what is the law of the State as modified by the opinions of its own courts, by the statutes of the State, and the customs and habits of the people, that the trouble arises.

It may be said generally that wherever the decisions of the state courts relate to some law of a local character, which may have become established by those courts, or has always been a part of the law of the State, that the decisions upon the subject are usually conclusive, and always entitled to the highest respect of the federal courts. The whole of this subject has recently been very ably reviewed in the case of Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20 [27: 359]. Where such local law or custom has been established by repeated decisions of the highest courts of a State it becomes also the law governing the courts of the United States sitting in that State.

We are of opinion that the adjudications of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, holding that a person engaged in travel on the Sabbath Day, contrary to the statute of the State, being thus in the act of violating a criminal law of the State, shall not recover against a corporation upon whose road he travels for the negligence of its servants, thereby establish this principle as a local law of that State, declaring, as they do, the effect of its statute in its operation upon the obligation of the carrier of passengers. The decisions on this subject by the Massachusetts Court are numerous enough and of sufficiently long standing to establish the rule, so far as they can establish it; and we think that, taken in connection with the relation which they bear to the statute itself, though giving an effect to it which may not meet the approval of this court, they nevertheless determine the law of Massachusetts on that subject.

Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Harlan dissented.

WASHINGTON ICE COMPANY ET AL., Plffs. in Err., v. NATHANIEL WEBSTER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 426-447.)

Damages in replevin—action on replevin bond—liability of sureties—interest—estoppel as to value—finding of jury.

1. In an action on a replevin bond, given by the plaintiff in replevin, in Maine, conditioned to pay such damages and costs as the defendant should recover against him, and for the return of the goods replevied in like good order and condition as when taken, in case such shall be the final judgment,—the defendant, if he succeeds in the action and the goods are not returned, is entitled to recover the value of the goods when taken and interest thereon.

2. If a part of the goods was not returned, and a part when returned was not in good order and condition, the obligors in the bond are liable for the value, at the time when taken, of what was not returned, and for the depreciation in value of what was not returned in good order and condition.

3. Under the condition of the bond, the sureties are liable to pay the damages recovered against the principal in the replevin action, in case the principal has not paid them.

4. It makes no difference that part of such interest recoverable by defendant is allowed in the replevin suit, and part in the suit on the bond, so long as there is no duplication.

5. The defendant in replevin is not concluded by the value of the property named in the bond or the writ, when he brings an action on the bond, and is not estopped from showing such value to be greater than there stated.

6. The finding of the jury in the replevin suit of the value of the goods replevied where a judgment has been entered on their verdict is conclusive upon the parties to the replevin suit, and also upon those who became sureties by the bond, to abide its event.

[No. 150.]

Argued Jan. 30, 31, 1888. Decided April 2, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maine, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff on a bond given in a replevin action to the defendant therein, conditioned to pay such damages and costs as such defendant should recover in such action, and to restore the goods replevied in good condition in case it was so adjudged. Affirmed.

See 62 Maine, 341, 68 Maine, 449.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Albert P. Gould, for plaintiffs in error:

The writ in this replevin case was in the form prescribed by statute.

Laws 1821, Vol. 1, chap. 63, § 9.

In Maine, if the defendant in replevin recovers judgment for a return of the goods replevied, and elects to have his damages assessed in the replevin suit, he can recover no damage accruing prior to the judgment in that suit, in his action on the bond.

Dillingham v. Smith, 32 Me. 182; Smith v. Dillingham, 33 Me. 384; Thomas v. Spofford, 46 Me. 408, 411; Washington Ice Co. v. Webster, 62 Me. 341, 368; Stevens v. Tuite, 104 Mass. 328; Boston Loan Co. v. Myers, 8 New Eng. Rep. 511; 143 Mass. 446.

The assessment at the trial becomes important principally when the goods are in esse and may be returned on demand upon the writ of return; if they are not then assessed and the goods are returned and costs paid, the defendant has no further remedy on his bond.

Pettygrove v. Hoyt, 11 Me. 66; Wood v. Braynard, 9 Pick. 322; Dillingham v. Smith, 30

Me. 370; Smith v. Dillingham, 33 Me. 384; Tuck v. Moses, 58 Me. 461.

The measure of damages in trover is the value of the property at the time the right of action accrues, with interest thereon.

Robinson v. Barrows, 48 Me. 188; Pierce v. Benjamin, 14 Pick. 356; Kennedy v. Whitwell, 4 Pick. 467; Leighton v. Brown, 98 Mass. 515. Rowley v. Gibbs, 14 Johns. 385.

It was error in the circuit court to apply to this case the doctrine of estoppel.

To create an estoppel as to the value of the goods replevied by a statement of their value in the replevin bond, the officer's return must state that he has replevied the precise quantity that was described in the writ.

Miller v. Moses, 56 Me. 128.

If that return was specific it is conclusive of the quantity replevied, and in litigation in that suit. The return of an officer, as to all matters which are properly the subject of his return, is conclusive.

Baker v. Baker, 125 Mass. 7; Slayton v. Chester, 4 Mass. 478; Bott v. Burnell, 9 Mass. 96; S. C. 11 Mass. 168; Bean v. Parker, 17 Mass. 591; Eastabrook v. Hapgood, 10 Mass. 313; Brown v. Davis, 9 N. H. 76; Morse v. Smith, 47 N. H. 476; Campbell v. Webster, 15 Gray, 28; Chappell v. Hunt, 8 Gray, 427; Smith v. Randall, 1 Allen, 456; Johnson v. Stone, 40 N. H 197; Stinson v. Snow, 10 Me. 263; Harkness v Farley, 11 Me. 491; Chase v. Gilman, 15 Me 64; Craig v. Fessenden, 21 Me. 34; Agry v. Betts, 12 Me. 415; Grover v. Howard, 31 Me. 546; Darling v. Dodge, 36 Me. 370; Hobart v. Bennett, 77 Me. 401, 404.

The jury is only bound to find the general verdict upon the legal issues presented.

Smith v. Putney, 18 Me. 87, 91; Gordon v. Wilkins, 20 Me. 184, 188; Thomas v. Spofford, 46 Me. 408.

It is not necessary to allege the value in the writ of replevin.

Litchman v. Potter, 116 Mass. 371; Blake v. Darling, Id. 300; Gilbert v. Thompson, 9 Cush. 348; Eastman v. Cooper, 15 Pick. 276.

The judgment is conclusive only upon the matter which was directly in issue upon the former trial.

King v. Chase, 15 N. H. 9; Howard v. Kimball, 65 Me. 330; Smith v. McCool, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 563 (21: 325); Washington, A. & G. S. Packet Co. v. Sickles, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 580 (18: 550); Aurora City v. West, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 82 (19: 42).

Mr. Benj. F. Butler, for defendant in error:

Any fact found in a court by a verdict or decree forever after concludes the parties as to that fact so found, when judgment has been entered in accordance with such finding, and the verdict and judgment necessarily involve the fact.

U. S. Bank v. Beverly, 42 U. S. 1 How. 134 (11: 75); Aspden v. Nixon, 45 U. S. 4 How. 467 (11: 1059); Sherwin v. Clarges, Bull. N. P. 232; 1 Stark. Ev. 4th Am. ed. 200; Eastman v. Cooper, 15 Pick. 285; Stockton v. Ford, 59 U. S. 18 How. 418 (15: 395); Aurora City v. West, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 82 (19: 42); Washington, A. & G. S. Packet Co. v. Sickles, 65 U. S. 24 How. 341 (16: 653).

The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction upon a question directly involved is conclusive.

Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606 (24: 214); Washington, A. & G. S. Packet Co. v. Sickles, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 580 (18: 550); Lea v. Lea, 99 Mass. 493; Burlen v. Shannon, Id. 200; Ingraham v. Dawson, 61 U. S. 20 How. 486 (15: 984); Nations v. Johnson, 65 U. S. 24 How. 195 (16: 628); Bigelow, Estop. 114, 115, 197; Hendrickson v. Norcross, 19 N. J. Eq. 417; Low v. Mussey, 41 Vt. 393; Franklin v. Greene, 2 Allen, 519.

Sureties upon bonds are bound by facts judicially found against their principals.

Drummond v. Prestman, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 515 (6: 712); Stovall v. Banks, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 583 (19: 1036); Babbitt v. Finn, 101 U. S. 7 (25: 820); Douglass v. Douglass, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 98 (22: 479); Sweeney v. Loome, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 208 (22: 727).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 12th of August, 1870, the Washington Ice Company, a New York corporation, procured from the Supreme Judicial Court of the State of Maine a writ of replevin, directed to the Sheriff of the County of Lincoln, in that State commanding him to replevy "a certain lot of ice, being about thirty-eight hundred tons of ice, now lying and being in certain icehouses situate in the Town of Boothbay, in the County of Lincoln and State aforesaid, and owned or occupied by Nathaniel Webster, of Gloucester, in the County of Essex and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, of the value of fifteen thousand dollars, belonging to the Washington Ice Company, * * * now taken and detained by Nathaniel Webster, * * * and them deliver unto the said The Washington Ice Company," and summon the defendant to appear before the court within and for the County of Lincoln on the fourth Tuesday of October, 1870, to answer unto the plaintiffs in a plea of replevin, for that the defendant, on the 1st of August, 1870, at said Boothbay, unlawfully took the goods of the plaintiffs, as aforesaid and them unlawfully detained; "provided they, the said plaintiffs, shall give bond to the said defendant, with sufficient sureties, in the sum of thirty thousand dollars, being twice the value of the said goods and chattels, to prosecute the said replevin to final judgment, and to pay such damages and costs as the said defendant shall recover against them; and also to return and restore the same goods and chattels in like good order and condition as when taken, in case such shall be the final judgment."

The sheriff made a return to the writ, dated August 13, 1870, as follows: "By virtue of this writ I have taken the ice within named, as the property of the within named Washington Ice Company, and on the nineteenth day of August, A. D. 1870, I delivered said ice to Hiram Perkins, whom the Washington Ice Co. designed as their agent to receive said ice; and, on the nineteenth day, I summoned the within named Nathaniel Webster, by reading this writ in his presence and hearing, for his appearance at court—the quantity replevied, by actual weight, being about twenty-five hundred tons."

Webster pleaded the general issue to the writ, at October Term, 1871, and filed a brief statement and special matter in defense, setting forth that, at the time of the alleged taking, as stated in the writ, the ice named therein was not the property of the plaintiff, nor had the plaintiff any right to the possession thereof, but it was the property of the defendant and one Babson, and was rightfully in the possession of the defendant, and was wrongfully taken from his possession by the plaintiff; and prayed judgment for the return of the ice in like good order and condition as when it was taken from the possession of the defendant, and for damages for such taking and detention, and for costs.

The case came on for trial before a jury, and evidence was put in; but the case was taken from the jury and submitted to the full court, on the report of the evidence by the judge, and transferred to the Supreme Judicial Court for the Middle District. It was there heard, and is reported as Washington Ice Co. v. Webster, 62 Me. 341.

It is there stated that the case came before the full court under an agreement that if the action was maintainable, it was to stand for trial, but otherwise a nonsuit was to be entered. On June 26, 1874, the order of the full court was received, in these words: "The nonsuit to stand, judgment for return of the goods replevied, damages to the time of taking to be assessed at nisi prius, if the defendant so elect; or he may, if he prefer, resort to his remedy on the bond." The case was then continued to October Term, 1874, when the defendant elected to have his damages assessed by a jury. The case was then continued to April Term, 1875, when leave was granted to the officer who served the writ, to amend his return thereon in accordance with the facts; and thereupon he made the following as his amended return, which was allowed by the court, such amended return bearing date August 18, 1870: "By virtue of this writ, having first taken a bond as prescribed by law, I have this day replevied all the ice by me found in the icehouses within mentioned, all of which said ice I caused to be weighed on delivery at the wharf in said Boothbay, about three miles from said icehouses, being the nearest place thereto where ice could be shipped—twenty-two hundred and ninety-seven tons and nineteen hundred and twenty-one pounds of which was thus weighed on successive days, portions of it on each week day between the twenty-third day of August, 1870, and the sixteenth day of September, 1870, and thirty-three tons and nineteen hundred and thirty pounds thereof was thus weighed on three several days between the twenty-sixth day of September, 1870, and the twenty-sixth day of October, 1870, the whole of said ice thus taken by me weighing twenty-three hundred and thirty-one tons and eighteen hundred and fifty-one pounds, and on the nineteenth day of said August, 1870, I delivered all the said ice at said icehouses to the plaintiff, reserving to myself authority to weigh the same; and, on the nineteenth day of said August I summoned the within named Nathaniel Webster to appear at court, as within directed, by reading this writ aloud in his presence and hearing."

The action of replevin was tried by a jury, and the presiding judge submitted to them to find, in addition to their verdict, answers to two questions; and the jury, on the 14th of May, 1875, returned the following verdict: "The jury find that the defendant was damaged by reason of the taking of the property replevied in the suit, and assess damages for the defendant in the sum of six thousand five hundred and fifty-five dollars." They also returned answers as follows to the questions submitted to them: "First. What was the value of the ice replevied, where it was situated, at the time it was taken in this suit? Answer. Twenty thousand and sixty-nine dollars and thirty-three cents. Second. What damage did the defendant sustain by reason of the taking of the ice in replevin, on account of the preparations he had to make to remove it? Answer. Eight hundred and thirty-five dollars and twenty-five cents." The plaintiff filed exceptions to the rulings of the judge in matters of law, and also moved to set aside the verdict. The evidence was reported to the full court, and the case was transferred to the Supreme Judicial Court for the Middle District, where it was heard, and is reported as Washington Ice Co. v. Webster, 68 Me. 449. The decision of the court was that the motion and exceptions should be overruled. Thereupon a judgment was rendered by the lower court, on the 4th of May, 1878, that the property replevied be returned and restored to Webster irrepleviable, and that he recover against the Washington Ice Company $7,723.98, damages for the taking and detaining of the property replevied, being the amount of the verdict, with interest thereon to the date of the judgment, and also $477.67, costs of suit.

On the 31st of July, 1878, a writ of return was issued on the judgment. It recited that the Washington Ice Company had replevied the 2331 tons and 1851 pounds of ice, of the value of $20,069.33, and set forth the terms of the judgment for the return, and for the recovery of the $7,723.98 damages for the taking and the $477.67 costs, and commanded the sheriff that he forthwith return and restore the said property to Webster, and collect the said sums of money from the Washington Ice Company, with interest from the 4th of May, 1878. On the 19th of August, 1878, a demand was duly made upon the Washington Ice Company for the return of the ice mentioned in the writ of restitution.

On the 17th of September, 1878, the Washington Ice Company paid to Webster $8,879.36, in full for such damages and costs, and interest. The receipt given by Webster for the amount contained this clause: "This receipt not to affect any further claim of the within named Webster for the ice named in said writ, or for any further damages or costs that may be recovered or recoverable by said Webster."

Before delivering the ice to the plaintiff in the original writ of replevin, the sheriff, as commanded by the writ, and as stated by him in the amended return, exacted a bond in the penalty of $30,000, dated August 12, 1870, executed by the Washington Ice Company, as principal, and Josiah H. Drummond and William E. Gould, to Webster, the condition of which was as follows: "The condition of the above obligation is such that, whereas, the said The Washington Ice Company have this day commenced against the said Nathaniel Webster an action of replevin for a certain lot of ice, being about thirty-eight hundred tons of ice, now lying and being in certain icehouses situate in the Town of Boothbay, in the County of Lincoln, and State of Maine, owned or occupied by Nathaniel Webster, of Gloucester, in the County of Essex and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, of the value of fifteen thousand dollars, which they say the said Nathaniel Webster has unlawfully taken: now, therefore, if the said The Washington Ice Company shall prosecute the said replevin to final judgment, and pay such damages and costs as the said Nathaniel Webster shall recover against them, and also return and restore the same goods and chattels in like good order and condition as when taken, in case such shall be the final judgment, then the said obligation to be void; otherwise, to remain in full force."

On the 18th of February, 1879, Webster brought the present action of debt, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maine, against the Washington Ice Company and Drummond and Gould, founded on the said bond. The defendants appeared, and by their plea prayed oyer of the bond and its condition, and set forth the condition and pleaded that they had kept all the conditions of the bond except the following, namely: "and also return and restore the same goods and chattels in like good order and condition as when taken, in case such shall be the final judgment; " that, as to that condition, they had not kept it; that final judgment had been rendered against them in the replevin suit mentioned in the condition, for a return of the goods and chattels replevied therein; that they had not returned the same to the plaintiff according to the requirement of said condition; and that they therefore submitted to the judgment of the court and prayed that they might be heard by the court in equity in the assessment of the damages for the breach of the last mentioned condition. On the 12th of October, 1880, the defendants filed an offer to be defaulted, and that judgment might be rendered against them for $16,000 and legal costs, and execution might issue against them for the same. That offer was declined by the plaintiff on the 1st of November, 1880. At September Term, 1882, the case was tried before the circuit court on the filing of a written stipulation waiving a jury. At the conclusion of the trial, the court directed a judgment for Webster against the defendants, to be entered for $28,990.14 and costs, which was done. To review that judgment, the defendants have brought this writ of error.

There is a bill of exceptions, upon which various questions are raised by the plaintiffs in error. At the trial, the plaintiff introduced in evidence the original writ of replevin in the suit in the state court, the return and the amended return, the pleadings in that suit, the record of the judgment and of the proceedings of the court therein, and the two orders of the full court. The defendants objected to the admission of the following question to the jury and their answer thereto, recited in the record of the proceedings in the replevin suit, namely: "What was the value of the ice replevied, where it was situated, at the time it was taken in this suit? Answer. Twenty thousand and sixty-nine dollars and thirty-three cents." The court overruled the objection and admitted the question and answer, and the defendants excepted.

The plaintiff then introduced in evidence the writ of return, and the fact of the making upon the defendants of the demand for the return of the ice replevied, and the receipt given by him to the Washington Ice Company for the damages, costs, and interest awarded by the judgment of May 4, 1878. He also introduced in evidence the bond sued upon.

The bill of exceptions then proceeds as follows: "The plaintiff thereupon contended that the defendants were estopped to deny that the goods replevied were at least of the value set forth in the writ of replevin and in the replevin bond (being the bond in suit), at whatever time that value is to be assessed, but that the plaintiff was not precluded from showing that they were of greater value.

"The defendants claimed that they were not thus estopped or precluded, and offered evidence to show that the value of the ice replevied was less than ten thousand dollars, at whatever time such value is to be assessed, and submitted to the court the following prayer for a ruling on this subject, viz: That the defendants are not estopped to prove that the value of the goods replevied was less than fifteen thousand dollars by reason of the insertion of that sum in the replevin writ and bond as the value of the goods which the officer in that writ was commanded to replevy.

"The court rejected the evidence offered, and overruled this prayer of the defendants, and ruled that the defendants are estopped as is contended by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff is not precluded from showing that the value of the goods replevied was more than fifteen thousand dollars. To which rejection of evidence and ruling the defendants then excepted.

"The defendants contended that the statement of the officer who served the replevin writ, in his returns thereon, of the quantity of goods actually taken by him on the writ of replevin, is competent and conclusive evidence of that quantity, in the trial of this action upon the replevin bond, and submitted to the court a prayer for a ruling to that effect.

"The plaintiff contended that the statement of the officer, in his return, of the quantity of ice replevied, being indefinite in the first return, and in the amended return being of weights taken at a different place from that at which the ice was replevied, and at subsequent times from that of the taking, was not evidence of the quantity of the ice replevied.

"The court overruled the said prayer of the defendants in this respect, and ruled that neither of the returns was conclusive evidence of the quantity taken by the officer upon the replevin writ. To which rulings the defendants then excepted.

"It was admitted by the plaintiff that the damages which were assessed in the action of replevin, for the taking and detention by the plaintiff in that action, of the property replevied therein, with the interest thereon, and the costs recovered in that action, with interest thereon, have been fully paid, and that the judgment in that action, awarding to the defendant in the same the sum of seven thousand seven hundred and twenty three dollars and ninety-eight cents damages, and his costs of suit taxed at four hundred and seventy seven dollars and sixty-seven cents, has been fully satisfied.

"Thereupon the defendants contended that the damages which the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action are the value of the goods replevied, or of goods of like description, character, and intrinsic value, at the date of the judgment in the action of replevin, and of the order therein that the property replevied be returned and restored to the said Nathaniel Webster, with interest thereon; and they offered evidence to prove that the value of ice of like description, character, intrinsic value, and quantity as that replevied, at the place where the ice was replevied, and also at the place where the demand upon the writ of return was made, was less than ten thousand dollars at that time. The court rejected the evidence offered, and overruled this prayer of defendants. To which rejection of evidence and ruling defendants then excepted.

"The defendants thereupon offered evidence to prove that the value of the ice replevied was less than ten thousand dollars at the time the demand was made upon the defendant, the Washington Ice Company, upon the writ of return issued pursuant to the judgment, in the action of a replevin, for a return of the goods, replevied, viz., August 19, A. D. 1878; and presented a prayer to the court for a ruling that the damages which the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action are the value of the goods replevied, or of goods of like quantity, description, character and intrinsic value as those replevied, at the date of said demand. But the court rejected the evidence offered, overruled this prayer of the defendants, and ruled that the plaintiff in this action is entitled to recover the value of the ice replevied at the time it was taken by the officer upon the replevin writ. To which rejection of evidence and rulings the defendants then excepted.

"The plaintiff contended that the finding of the value of the ice replevied, by the jury which assessed the damages for taking the ice upon the replevin writ, against the plaintiff in that suit, in answer to the question submitted to them in that trial, 'What was the value of the ice replevied, where it was situated, at the time it was taken in this suit?' as appears in the record of the proceedings in the action of replevin, is evidence in this action upon the bond, and is conclusive against the defendants of the value of the ice, in determining the amount which the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action, and moved the court for an entry of judgment against the defendants, for the sum found by the jury in answer to that question, viz., the sum of twenty thousand and sixty-nine dollars and thirty-three cents, with interest thereon from the date of that finding, and that execution issue for such sum.

"The defendants resisted this motion, and contended that the value of the ice replevied was not a legal issue in the replevin action, and that they were not precluded from showing that the value of the ice was less than the sum thus found; and that said question and answer were not evidence to be taken into consideration in determining the amount which the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action upon the bond; and they further contended that, if the finding of value in the action of replevin furnished the rule of damages to be assessed in this action, interest thereon should be cast only from the date of the demand upon the writ of return, and not from the date of that finding by the jury.

"The court overruled the defendant's position, sustained the motion of the plaintiff, and ruled that the finding of value by the jury in the action of replevin was conclusive against the defendants, and ordered judgment to be entered for the sum of twenty-eight thousand nine hundred and ninety dollars and fourteen cents damages, and that execution issue for that sum, that being the amount of the said sum of twenty thousand and sixty-nine dollars and thirty-three cents, with interest thereon from the date of said finding, May 14, 1875. To which rulings of the court, order, and decision, and entry of judgment for damages, and each and every of them, defendants then excepted."

The positions of the parties as thus set forth in the bill of exceptions are those taken by them on the argument before this court. The material question in the case is what damages the defendants shall pay for the failure to return the 2,331 tons and 1,851 pounds of ice to the plaintiff, after judgment for its return was rendered. The jury in the replevin suit assessed the damages of Webster at the sum of $6,555. They also found the value of the ice replevied, where it was situated, at the time it was taken in the replevin suit, to have been $20,069.33. The ice was taken, under the writ of replevin, on the 13th of August, 1870. The verdict of the jury was rendered on the 14th of May, 1875. The interest on $20,069.33, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, from August 13, 1870, to May 14, 1875, a period of four years and nine months, was $5,719.75. Add to that the sum of $835.25, found by the jury to be the damage sustained by Webster by reason of the taking of the ice in replevin, on account of the preparations he had to make to remove it, and it makes a total of $6,555, which was the exact amount assessed by the jury as damages by reason of the taking of the property replevied. Thus, in the judgment in the replevin suit, Webster recovered, as damages, in addition to the $835.25, interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum on $20,069.33, the value of the ice, where it was situated at the time it was taken, from August 13, 1870, to May 14, 1875; and, in the present suit, he has recovered on the bond the sum of $20,069.33, as the value of the ice, where it was situated, at the time it was taken, and interest on that sum, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, from May 14, 1875, to the date of the verdict of the jury in the present suit, such interest amounting to $8,920.81. Therefore, in the two suits, taken together, Webster has recovered, as the value of his ice unlawfully taken from him by the writ of replevin on the 13th of August, 1870, its value as it was situated at that time, $20,069.33, and interest thereon from that date, at 6 per cent per annum, to the date of the verdict of the jury in the present suit on the bond. This is equal and exact justice, and no more, so far as he is concerned. So far as the principal and the sureties in the bond are concerned, they obligated themselves that the principal should return and restore the goods taken on the writ of replevin, "in like good order and condition as when taken." The article taken was ice, a perishable commodity. None of that taken on the 18th of August, 1870, can be supposed to have been in existence when the judgment of May 4, 1878, for its return, was rendered, or when the writ of return of July 31, 1878, was issued, or when the demand of August 19, 1878, for the return, was made. The same quantity of ice which was taken on the writ was, by the bond, to be returned, in like good order and condition as when taken. If a part of it had been returned in like good order and condition, and the rest of it had not been returned at all, or returned not in such like good order and condition, the obligors in the bond would have been liable for the value, at the time when taken, of what was not returned, and for the depreciation in value of what was not returned in like good order and condition. In no other manner could the condition of the bond have been satisfied, and the defendant in the writ of replevin have been made whole, according to the intent and purpose of the writ and of the bond, and of the statute of Maine under which the bond was given. The writ and the bond were in the form prescribed by statute.

The principal argument on the part of the defendants in the present suit is, that in the Statute of Maine (Rev. Stat. 1857, 1871, chap. 96, sec. 11) which provides that, in a replevin suit, "If it appears that the defendant is entitled to a return of the goods, he shall have judgment and a writ of return accordingly, with damages for the taking and costs," the words "damages for the taking" mean all damages resulting from the taking and detention of the goods; that, if the defendant in replevin recovers judgment for a return of the goods replevied, he may, at his election, have the damages which he has sustained by reason of the taking and detention of them, to the time of such judgment, assessed in the replevin suit, or he may recover those damages in a suit on the bond, but cannot have both; that, if he elects, as he did in the present case, to have his damages assessed in the replevin suit, he cannot, in a subsequent suit on the bond, founded on a failure to return the goods, recover any damages which accrued prior to the judgment in the replevin suit, and, therefore, cannot recover for any depreciation in the value of the goods which occurred between the time of the taking and the date of the judgment of return; that any damages collectible for such depreciation must, if the defendant makes the election referred to, be assessed in the replevin suit, as an item of damages resulting from the detention of the goods; and that, as the plaintiff in this suit failed to have such damages assessed in the replevin suit, he cannot recover them in the present suit.

This point seems to us, at best, to be altogether technical, and not to be founded on any sound principle. By the terms of the bond, it was made enforceable against the principal and sureties if the principal should not pay such damages and costs as Webster should recover against it, and should not also return and restore the goods replevied in like good order and condition as when taken. Under the condition of the bond, the sureties were liable to pay the damages recovered against the principal by the judgment of May 4, 1878, in case the principal had not paid them, as it did. By the judgment in the present suit, they are only made liable according to their obligation, that their principal shall return and restore the goods in like good order and condition as when taken. Such we consider to have been the effect of the rulings of the state court in the replevin suit, in 62 and 68 Maine.

In the case in 62 Me. the court, commenting upon the above recited provision of the Revised Statutes of 1871; chapter 96, section 11, says, p. 361: "When the defendant makes a good title to the goods replevied, he is entitled to damages for the interruption of his possession, the loss of the use of the goods from the time of their replevin till their restoration, and for their deterioration." It also says, p. 362: "The damages are to be assessed to the time of the verdict for the defendant, upon the principles adopted in trover, save that the value of the property is not to be included therein." It also says, p. 363: "It seems, therefore, fully settled that in a replevin suit, when damages are not assessed at nisi prius, or where a nonsuit is entered, the defendant, when the property replevied is not returned, may recover all damages sustained, in a suit upon the replevin bond." It also says, p. 363, that the plaintiff "is bound by his replevin bond to restore the goods in like good order and condition as when taken. He is responsible, if judgment is against him, for the damaged or deteriorated condition of the goods when restored." Again, it says, p. 364: "When goods not held under legal process are replevied, and after entry of the action the plaintiff becomes nonsuit and a return is ordered, but the goods replevied are not forthcoming on demand, the defendant, in a suit on the bond, is entitled to recover, as damages, the value of the goods when taken, and interest thereon from the service of the writ to the time of the rendition of judgment." Again, p. 364: "If the market value of the goods replevied shall be less at the time of the demand on the writ of return, than when the goods are taken, the loss must fall on the plaintiff, by whose wrongful act the defendant is deprived of his property. Besides, the plaintiff, having possession, might have sold them, which the defendant could not do."

It is contended for the defendants that, in this suit on the replevin bond, Webster is entitled to recover, as damages, only the value of the goods replevied, on the 19th of August, 1878, the date of the demand on the writ of return, with interest thereon; and some expressions of the court in the decision in 62 Me. supposed to tend in that direction, are referred to. But they are wholly inconsistent with the other expressions of the court, above quoted, and contrary to reason and justice, in their application to the present case, and also to authority.

One of the expressions thus relied on by the defendants is this, p. 363: "The damages being assessed to the time of the verdict, if the goods replevied are not forthcoming on demand on the writ of return, the defendant, in a suit by him on the replevin bond, will be entitled to recover, as damages, the value of the goods replevied at the date of the demand on the writ of return, with interest thereon, the damages and costs assessed in the replevin suit, and interest. Swift v. Barnes, 16 Pick. 194." But a reference to the case of Swift v. Barnes shows that the remark of the court had reference to a case where the value of the property replevied had risen, at the time of the demand on the writ of return, beyond what it was at the time it was taken. The Massachusetts Statute and practice in regard to replevin are the same as in Maine. The principle declared in Swift v. Barnes was that the successful defendant in replevin was entitled to a full indemnity; that the plaintiff in replevin, who caused the property to be valued, might well be bound by the valuation, when it was made to appear that the action was groundless; that it by no means followed that the other party, who had no agency in the valuation, was also to be bound; that the plaintiffs in the suit on the bond were entitled to a full indemnity for the damages sustained by the nonperformance of the condition of the bond, and that could not be obtained unless they should be allowed to recover the actual value of the property replevied at the time when it ought to have been restored on the writ of restitution; and that, in the case then before the court, that was the true measure of damages.

In Parker v. Simonds, 8 Met. 205, it is said that the property in Swift v. Barnes had risen in value after it was replevied; and, in Parker v. Simonds, as some of the property had been sold at the time of the demand, and some was deteriorated and depreciated in value by use, the court said that the value at the time of the demand would not be the measure of damages without a proper allowance for the depreciation.

The rule in Massachusetts seems well settled. In Leighton v. Brown, 98 Mass. 515, which was a suit on a replevin bond, the value of the property, at the time of the demand for its return, was greater than the penal sum of the bond; but though the obligors contended that the proper measure of damages was its appraised value or its value at the time it was replevied, the court said: "The appraisal made in the replevin suit is conclusive against the party by whom it was made. Parker v. Simonds, 8 Met. 205. But it is not admissible in evidence against the present plaintiff, who, as defendant in the replevin action, had no agency in procuring this valuation. Kafer v. Harlow, 5 Allen, 348. In the present case, the value was greater at the date of the final judgment ordering a return than at the date of the appraisal. The value at the date of a demand for the restoration of the property in compliance with the order of return is the measure of damages for which the plaintiff contends, and to which, in the opinion of the court, he is entitled. Swift v. Barnes, 16 Pick. 194."

In Tuck v. Moses, 58 Me. 461, the market value of the replevied property had increased from the time it was replevied to the time of the judgment for a return; and it was held, in a suit on the bond, that the defendants were liable for the value of the property at the date of the judgment for a return, with interest at 6 per cent from the date of that judgment to the date of the judgment on the bond.

It is, therefore, manifest that the court, in its opinion in 62 Me. did not mean that the time of the demand on the writ of return was to be taken as the time for fixing the value of the property in any other case than one where there had been an increase in the value from the time of the taking, to the benefit of which increase the defendant in the replevin suit was entitled.

We see nothing inconsistent with these views in Stevens v. Tuite, 104 Mass. 328. In that case the defendant in a replevin suit had a judgment therein for a return, and for damages assessed by computing interest on the appraised value of the goods replevied, from the date of the writ of replevin to the date of the judgment; and, in a subsequent suit on the bond, he sought to recover, not only the value of the property, with interest from the date of the demand under the judgment, but damages for inconvenience and loss resulting from the interruption of the possession of the property, which was the machinery of a manufactory, and damages for the expense, trouble, and delay attending the restoration of the establishment to its original condition. It was held that these damages were included in the damages recoverable in the replevin suit. The case was a peculiar one, and the defendant in the replevin suit did not, as in the present case, ask merely for an allowance, as damages, of a continuation of the interest on the value of the property when taken, from the time of the verdict in the replevin suit to the time of the verdict in the suit on the bond; and the court did not pass on that question.

The decisions in Maine support the views taken by the circuit court. In Smith v. Dillingham, 33 Me. 384, in a suit on a replevin bond, the value of the property replevied, as valued in the writ, was allowed, with interest from the date of the bond. The interest was objected to. No damages had been assessed in the replevin suit. The court said: "If damages for the taking had been assessed, as the statute provides, up to the time when the nonsuit was ordered, the estimate of damages in this suit for the detention would have commenced at that period. But the record shows that no such assessment was made. The wrong done to the plaintiffs consists in the taking of their property, and in the delay of making compensation for it. There is nothing in the statute which precludes the allowance of interest on the value of the property from the time when it was taken." It certainly can make no difference in principle that part of such interest is allowed in the replevin suit and part in the suit on the bond, so long as there is no duplication.

In Thomas v. Spofford, 46 Me. 408, the case of Smith v. Dillingham is cited by the court, as authority for the proposition that in a suit on the replevin bond the plaintiff may recover damages for detention, although they were not assessed in the judgment in the replevin suit.

The opinion of the court in 68 Me. contains nothing to support the views of the defendants. In that opinion it is said, p. 459: "When this cause was first tried, the presiding justice was of opinion that the action was not maintainable, and that the defendant's claim for damages for the plaintiffs' unlawful taking could only be determined in a suit upon the replevin bond. By agreement of parties, the case was withdrawn from the jury, to be reported to the full court. If the action could not be maintained upon the evidence offered and introduced by the plaintiffs, a nonsuit was to be entered. If the action could be maintained, it was to stand for trial; and the court were also authorized to pass upon the several propositions in respect to damages, made by the defendant's counsel. Upon a full hearing of the questions of law raised upon the report, it was determined that the action was not maintainable; and a nonsuit in pursuance of the agreement of the parties was ordered. It was further decided that the defendant had a right to have his damages assessed. 62 Me. 841."

The trial court had instructed the jury as to damages as follows, p. 452: "The defendant is entitled to the value of that ice, at the time it was taken, and where it was situated, for any lawful use to which it could be put. If it was valuable to use there, he is entitled to its value for use. If it was valuable for sale, he is entitled to its value for sale. If it was valuable to send to market, he is entitled to whatever value it bore at the time and place for any market, not what it might bring at another market,—I don't mean that—but its value at Boothbay, on August 13, 1870, for any purpose to which it might be put." On this the Supreme Judicial Court remarked, p. 461: "To these instructions there can be no reasonable objections urged. The value at the time and place of taking is the rule."

The contention of the defendants that, on the recovery of the judgment in replevin, the plaintiff in replevin was only bound to restore the goods or to pay their money value at that time, and that the liability for the breach of the replevin bond would be discharged if the plaintiff in replevin paid such sum of money as would enable the defendant then to go into the market and buy goods of like description and value, is not sound. Ice is a peculiar article of property. The ice in question was taken in August, 1870, at a time of year when, as we all know, ice has a larger value than at some other times of the year. The defendant in the replevin suit was entitled to the value of that ice as of that time, and of the place where it was taken, as stated in the case in 68 Me. for any lawful use to which it could be put. It was also said by the court in that case, p. 462: "As the taking by the plaintiffs was wrongful, the defendant is entitled to full indemnity. The measure of damages is the actual value of the property to the plaintiffs as an article of merchandise or sale." Under these views, the defendant would not necessarily be made whole by a sum of money sufficient to enable him to purchase in the market a like quantity of ice, eight years after it was taken.

It is also contended for the defendants in this suit that the circuit court erred in rejecting the evidence offered by them to show that the value of the ice replevied was less than $10,000, at whatever time such value was to be assessed, and in ruling that the plaintiff was not precluded from showing that the value of the goods replevied was more than $15,000 named in the replevin writ and the bond.

We do not think the court erred in rejecting the evidence so offered by the defendants. The writ of replevin stated that the quantity of ice was "about thirty-eight hundred tons," "of the value of fifteen thousand dollars." The bond of the 12th of August, 1870, recited that the action was for "about thirty-eight hundred tons of ice," "of the value of fifteen thousand dollars." The first return of the sheriff, dated August 13, 1870, specified the quantity of ice as "about twenty-five hundred tons." The amended return specified the quantity as being 2,331 tons and 1,851 pounds. The jury, in the trial of the replevin suit, found that the value of the ice replevied, where it was situated, at the time it was taken, was $20,069.33. The condition of the bond must be held to mean that the quantity of goods replevied was to be restored, leaving it to be ascertained what that quantity was. It must be assumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the quantity taken by the jury as the basis of the value they found, was the quantity named in the amended return of the sheriff. The sureties in the bond were, by its terms, so connected with the replevin suit that they are bound by the adjudications necessarily made in it. The jury could not have found any basis for the calculation of the interest as damages, unless they had found, as they did, the value of the ice, where it was situated, at the time it was taken. The sureties are bound by that finding.

There was, therefore, no error in excluding the evidence so offered by the defendants, or in permitting the plaintiff to show, as he did conclusively, by the record in the replevin suit, that the value of the ice, where it was situated, at the time it was taken, was greater than the $15,000 named in the writ of replevin and the bond.

This is in accordance with the decisions in the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. In Thomas v. Spofford, 46 Me. 408, the court below had ruled that the plaintiff in the suit on the replevin bond was estopped from showing that the property was of greater value than that stated in the writ of restitution, which was the value stated in the writ of replevin, the bond being for double that value, but the Supreme Judicial Court said: "The defendant in replevin is not concluded by the value of the property named in the bond or the writ. If he was to be thus estopped from denying that value, he would be at the mercy of his opponent, whose interest it always is to fix as low a value as possible. * * * It seems clear, on the authorities and fair reason, that the defendant in replevin is not concluded or estopped by the sum named in the bond as the actual value." To the same effect is Miller v. Moses, 56 Me. 128, 141. In Tuck v. Moses, 58 Me. 461, 477, it is held that the plaintiff in replevin is bound by the value which he puts upon the property in his writ, but that with the defendant in replevin it is otherwise; and, as he has no hand in fixing the value in the writ, he is not estopped from showing it to be greater than is there stated.

The defendants submitted to the court a prayer for a ruling that the statement of the sheriff, in his return, of the quantity of ice actually taken by him on the writ of replevin was competent and conclusive evidence of that quantity, in the trial of the suit on the replevin bond. The bill of exceptions states that the court overruled such prayer, and ruled that neither one of the returns was conclusive evidence of the quantity taken by the officer upon the replevin writ, and that the defendants excepted to such rulings. No practical question arises upon this exception, for it does not appear by the bill of exceptions that either side offered any evidence for the purpose of showing that the quantity of ice replevied varied from the quantity stated in the amended return. The evidence offered to be given by the defendants to prove that the value of the ice replevied was less than $10,000 at whatever time such value was to be assessed, was not an offer to prove that the quantity of ice replevied varied from that stated in the amended return; and the plaintiff, neither offering nor giving any evidence that such quantity varied from that stated in the amended return, relied upon the finding of the jury in the replevin suit as to the value of the ice replevied.

The defendants complain of the admission in evidence of the answer of the jury in the replevin suit as to the value of the ice replevied where it was situated, at the time it was taken, and also of the ruling of the court that such answer was evidence in this suit, and conclusive against the defendants, of the value of the ice, in determining the amount which the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this suit. It is contended for the defendants that it was discretionary in the jury, in the trial of the replevin suit, to answer the question referred to, and that it was no part of the legal issue in that trial. But, as has been shown, the rule adopted in that trial, for finding the damages, was to assess the interest on what was found to have been the value of the ice at the time and place of taking, and that such value was an indispensable element in arriving at a verdict. Such value was found by the jury, in finding the verdict; and a judgment having been entered thereon, the fact so found is conclusive, not only upon the parties to the replevin suit, but upon those who became sureties by the bond, to abide its event. The sureties became bound by the result of the replevin suit by virtue of their agreement contained in the bond.

In Drummond v. Prestman, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 515 [6: 712], the record of a judgment confessed by a principal to a creditor for a debt due was held to be admissible in evidence to charge a surety who had guarantied the debt to the creditor. In Stovall v. Banks, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 583 [19: 1036] it was held that the sureties in the bond of an administrator were bound by a decree against the administrator, made in a suit to which they were not parties, finding assets in his hands which he had not paid over.

The sureties in the replevin bond were represented in the replevin suit by the plaintiff therein, and were identified with it in interest, and claimed in privity with it, so as to be concluded by the proceedings in that suit. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 523. The question of the value of the ice at the time it was taken in replevin was essential to the finding of the verdict in the replevin suit; and in such case, it is not necessary to the conclusiveness of the former judgment that there should have been a formal issue in the prior suit as to such question. Id. § 534.

On the whole case, we are of opinion that there is no error in the record, and that the judgment must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

YALE LOCK MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
THOMAS L. JAMES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 447-464.)

Infringement of patent—reissue—when not sustained.

1. In a suit to recover for the infringement of reissued letters patent, No. 8783, granted to the Yale Lock Manufacturing Company, as assignee, for an improvement in postoffice boxes, on an application for a reissue filed May 23, 1879, held, that although the patentee might have fallen into an erroneous conclusion as to the defectiveness or insufficiency in the specification of the original patent, yet the original patent was not defective nor insufficient, either in its descriptive portion or in its claims.

2. Held further, that inasmuch as the patentee abandoned, under pressure from the Patent Office, clauses in his application and in his claim, he cannot insist that it was the intent of the office to include in the claim and patent those clauses and parts which he had abandoned.

3. Held further, that there was no infringement by defendant of the patent.

[No. 162.]

Argued Feb. 3, 6, 1888. Decided April 9, 1888.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, dismissing a suit in equity for infringement of letters patent. Affirmed.

Reported below, 22 Blatchf. 294.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frederic H. Betts, for appellant:

The patentee can reissue in case the original patent embodied the claims which the reissue is intended to cover (Parker & W. Co. v. Yale Clock Co. 123 U. S. 89 (ante, 100); or to meet a possible construction of the original (Eames v. Andrews, 122 U. S. 40, 68 (30:1064, 1072); or to remove ambiguity or obscurity (Campbell v. James, 104 U. S. 370 (26:791).

The patentee may, if he applies in due season, enlarge his claim.

Morey v. Lockwood, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 230 (19: 339); Campbell v. James, supra; Miller v. Bridgeport Brass Co. 104 U. S. 350 (26:783).

Nothing but a clear mistake, or inadvertence, and a speedy application for its correction, is admissible when it is sought merely to enlarge the claim.

Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 362 (28:668).

Due diligence in applying for a reissue is prima facie proved, if the application is within two years.

Wollensak v. Reiher, 115 U. S. 100 (29:351).

In the construction of patents, the specific mention of limitations in one claim implies the absence of such limitations in others, where they are not mentioned.

Bogart v. Hinds, 26 Fed. Rep. 150; Burden v. Corning, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 477; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. National Car Brake Shoe Co. 110 U. S. 229 (28:129).

The acceptance by the Commissioner of Patents of the surrender of the original patent, and the grant by him of a reissue, is prima facie evidence of the existence of the statutory prerequisites to wit: (1) That the original patent was "inoperative" or "invalid," and (2) that the defects were due to inadvertence, accident or mistake.

Clark v. Wooster, 119 U. S. 322, 326 (30:392, 393); Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 516 (20:33); Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Smith, 1 Ban. & Ard. 205.

The presumption of the existence of such statutory prerequisites is a conclusive presumption, unless it shall clearly appear on the face of the papers that there could have been no inadvertence, accident or mistake.

Seymour v. Osborne, supra; Milligan & H. Glue Co. v. Upton, 97 U. S. 3 (24:985); Union Paper Collar Co. v. Van Dusen, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 530 (23:128); Graham v. Mason, 4 Cliff. 88; Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 362 (28:668).

The following are instances in which patents have been sustained:

Wooster v. Blake, 8 Fed. Rep. 432; Webster Loom Co. v. Higgins, 105 U. S. 591 (26:1181); Miller v. Pickering, 16 Fed. Rep. 540; Shuter v. Davis, Id. 564; Smith v. Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. 93 U. S. 486 (23:952); Hobbs v. King, 8 Fed. Rep. 91; Rogers v. Sargent, 7 Blatchf. 507; Furbush v. Cook, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 668; Eames v. Cook, Id. 146; Waterbury Brass Co. v. New York & B. Brass Co. 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 48; Parker v. Stiles, 5 McLean, 44.

Suggestions from another, in order that they may be sufficient to defeat a patent subsequently issued, must embrace the plan of the improvement, and must enable an ordinary mechanic to construct and put the improvement in successful operation.

Agawam Woolen Co. v. Jordan, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 583 (19:177); Putnam v. Hickey, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 334; Matthews v. Skates, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 602; Alden v. Dewey, 1 Story, 336; Thomas v. Weeks, 2 Paine, 92; Dixon v. Moyer, 4 Wash. 68; National Feather Duster Co. v. Hibbard, 21 Off. Gaz. 685.

Although the idea of the invention and hints concerning it came to a patentee from others, still if he was the first who gave to that idea a useful and practical form, his rights are not to be defeated.

Teese v. Phelps, 1 McAll. 48; Bell v. Daniels, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 372; Spaulding v. Tucker, Deady, 649; McMillin v. Barclay, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 189; Pitts v. Hall, 2 Blatchf. 229; Pitts v. Edmonds, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 52.

The government cannot, after the patent has issued, make use of the improvement any more than a private individual, without license of the inventor or making compensation to him.

U. S. v. Burns, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 246 (20: 888); Cammeyer v. Newton, 94 U. S. 225 (24:72); Campbell v. James, 17 Blatchf. 43; Forehand v. Porter, 15 Fed. Rep. 256.

A bill in equity will lie against an officer of the United States for his unauthorized use of a patent, solely in the service of the government.

U. S. v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196 (27:171); Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 726 (27:453); Tracy v. Swartwout, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 94 (9:359); Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 287 (29:191); Hagood v. Southern, 117 U. S. 70 (29:811); Adsit v. Brady, 4 Hill, 632; Keenan v. Southworth, 110 Mass. 474.

To construe the instrument it is proper to ascertain the intention of the parties, by considering the character in which the party undertakes, the nature and subject of the undertaking, and the terms employed in the instrument.

Auburn City Bank v. Leonard, 40 Barb. 119; Stanton v. Camp, 4 Barb. 274; Brockway v. Allen, 17 Wend. 40; Newell v. West, 13 Blatchf. 114; Townsend v. Corning, 23 Wend. 435; Pinckney v. Hagadorn, 1 Duer, 89.

When a reissue counts upon a prior assignment of the original patent to the complainant, this makes, with the act of the commissioner granting the reissue, a prima facie case that it was valid to reissue to the complainant.

Middletown Tool Co. v. Judd, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 141; Cook v. Ernest, 2 Off. Gaz. 89-93; Perry v. Parker, 1 Wood. & M. 280; Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. v. Haish, 4 Fed. Rep. 900.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for appellee:

The patent is not evidence of the supposed invention having been made at any time earlier than its own date or the date of the application.

Wing v. Richardson, 2 Cliff. 450.

The reissue must be for the same invention.

Giant Powder Co. v. California Powder Works, 98 U. S. 127 (25:81); Heald v. Rice, 104 U. S. 753 (26:916).

If by the record it appears that there could not have been any inadvertence, accident or mistake, in respect of the matters sought to be covered by a reissue, then, either the reissue must be construed so as to include such matters, or must be held to be invalid.

James v. Campbell, 104 U. S. 371 (26:791); Leggett v. Avery, 101 U. S. 259 (25:866); Hopkins & D. Mfg. Co. v. Corbin, 103 U. S. 789 (26: 611).

The reissue must be held void by reason of the laches of the patentee.

Miller v. Bridgeport Brass Co. 104 U. S. 350 (26:783).

No action can be maintained against the defendant in this case.

James v. Campbell, 104 U. S. 359 (26:787); Carr v. U. S. 98 U. S. 433 (25:209); Cary v. Curtis, 44 U. S. 3 How. 246 (11:581).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought by the Yale Lock Manufacturing Company, a Connecticut corporation, against Thomas L. James, to recover for the alleged infringement of reissued letters patent No. 8783, granted to the plaintiff, as assignee of S. N. Brooks, administrator of L. Yale, Jr., deceased, July 1, 1879, for an "improvement in postoffice boxes," on an application for a reissue filed May 23, 1879 (the original patent No. 119212, having been granted to Silas N. Brooks, administrator of Yale, September 19, 1871, on an application filed September 30, 1868; and having been reissued to said Brooks, as administrator, July 9, 1872, as No. 4963 on an application for reissue filed May 7, 1872; and having been again reissued to said Brooks, as administrator, April 24, 1877, as No. 7625, on an application for reissue filed April 19, 1875). The circuit court dismissed the bill, and the plaintiff has appealed from its decree.

Among other defenses, the answer sets up that each of the three reissues was not for the same invention as the original patent, but contained material new matter, and was therefore invalid.

Reissue No. 8783 was the subject of a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut, by the present plaintiff, against the Scovill Manufacturing Company, in which Judge Shipman, in June, 1880, gave a decree for the plaintiff as to the first and second claims of the patent. 18 Blatchf. 248.

The original patent contained the following description of the invention: "This invention relates to an improvement in the construction of the fronts of postoffice boxes, and consists in making said fronts, including the doors and box frames, of metal, and in securing the frames to the wooden pigeon holes by rivets connecting the frames with each other at top, bottom, and sides. The body of these boxes is to be made of wood, in the usual manner, namely, a series of pigeon holes; but the front of the box and the door frame are made of iron or other suitable metal. Each door frame or box front is so made that it aids in covering the edge of the wooden partition or pigeon holes, and is connected with the other frames above, below, and on each side of it in such manner that the frames make a continuous frontage, no part of which can be removed (from the outside) without pulling down other parts and breaking the wood work, so that a surreptitious removal of the front of any box, in order to get possession of its contents, is practically impossible. Each frame, made, as before stated, of metal, has all around it a flange, a a, which protects the outside of the wood work. The sides of the frame b b enter and fit closely against the wood forming the pigeon holes, and may be continuous or notched out at intervals; and each frame has attached to it one leaf of two or more hinges, c c. The door is of iron, solid at top, where the lock d is attached, and having an opening, e, below, in which a plate of glass is secured. I prefer to locate rods f f behind the plate, to prevent the introduction of a hand if the glass be broken, and so to form the door that, when shut, it enters within the frame (see g g), so that it cannot be lifted from its hinges. When the frames are all in place, each frame is riveted through the wood work to its four neighbors (see h h, Fig. 2), and thus a continuous iron frontage is formed. Each door has a small spring bolt, i, and a lock, d, attached to it, the two operating together and forming, in the hands of the postmaster, a perfect safeguard against all entrance to the box by means of the key, as is more particularly set forth in my application for a patent therefor, made equal date with this."

That patent had two claims, as follows: "1. The combination of several box frames with each other and with pigeon holes, as described, by means of rivets passing through the frames, and the wood work entering between the said frames, the combination being substantially as described. 2. The above, in combination with the flanges, making part of the frames and protecting and inclosing the exterior of the wood work, substantially as set forth."

The first reissue, No. 4968, contained the following description of the invention: "This invention relates to an improvement in the fronts of postoffice boxes, and consists in making said fronts, including the doors and box frames, of metal, said box frames being constructed so as to overlap and cover, in whole or in part, the front edges of the wooden pigeon holes to which they are affixed. The body of the boxes is to be made of wood in the usual manner, viz., a series of pigeon holes; but the front of the box and the door frame are made of iron or other suitable metal. Each door frame or box front is so made that it aids in covering the edge of the wooden partition or pigeon holes, and is connected with the other frames above, below, and on each side of it in such manner that the frames will make a continuous frontage, no part of which can be removed from the outside without pulling down other parts. Each frame, made, as before stated, of metal, has all around it a flange, a a, which protects the outside or edges of the wood work. The sides of the frame b b enter and fit closely against the wood forming the pigeon holes, and may be continuous or notched out at intervals; and each frame has attached to it one leaf of two or more hinges, c c. The door may be of any desirable metal, solid where the lock d is attached, and having an opening, e, below, in which a plate of glass is secured. I prefer to locate rods f f behind the plate, to prevent the introduction of a hand if the glass be broken. The door is so constructed that, when shut, it enters within the frame, so that it cannot be lifted from its hinges. When the frames are all in place, each frame is riveted through the woodwork to its four neighbors (see h h, Fig. 2), and in this way forms a continuous metal frontage. The door for each frame has a small spring bolt, i, and a lock, d, attached to it, the two operating together and forming, in the hands of the postmaster a perfect safeguard against all entrance to the box by means of the key, as is more particularly set forth in letters patent granted to me on the 24th day of October, 1871, and numbered 120177."

That reissue contained two claims, as follows: "1. The combination of several box frames with each other and with pigeon holes, as described, by means of rivets passing through the frames, and the wood work entering between the said frames, the combination being substantially as described. 2. The combination of two or more metallic frames and doors and locks with pigeon holes, said frames having flanges, which protect and inclose wholly or in part the front edges of said pigeon holes."

In order to a comparison of the specification and claims of the first reissue with the specification and claims of the original patent, the parts of each which are not found in the other are above put in italics.

The specification and claims of reissue No. 8783 are as follows: "This invention consists in an improvement in the construction of postoffice boxes; and its chief feature is the combination of a tier of pigeon holes made of wood with a continuous frontage of metal, such frontage consisting of doors and their frames, which latter cover the ends of the boards which form the pigeon holes. A series of wooden pigeon holes, open at the rear, and covered at the front, or on the outside, by a permanent glass front, is very old; and such a series was used for postoffice boxes, and in hotels as a receptacle for keys, cards, letters, etc. There has also been in use a series of wooden pigeon holes, each provided at one end with a door, as described in the patent granted to Jacob Beidler, May 28, 1866; but in this patent the door is described as hinged to the wood, and the construction is consequently insecure, as an ordinary pocket knife or small chisel will, even in inexperienced hands, suffice to cut away the wood or pry off the door, so that the boxes may be entered. Pigeon holes made of iron or other metal are difficult to construct and very costly; but such pigeon holes, each provided with an ordinary metal door, would be sufficiently secure. Such a degree of security at a comparatively low cost is attained by covering the front of a series of wooden pigeon holes with a continuous metallic frontage, that is, a frontage which presents a continuous surface of metal, or, in other words, a surface which covers the ends of the wooden pigeon holes in such manner that those portions of the wood in which the metallic frames are attached cannot be attacked when the doors making part of the frontage are closed. In constructing Yale's invention the body of the boxes or the series of pigeon holes is to be made of wood in any usual manner, and the fronts thereof, viz., the doors and their frames are to be made of iron or other suitable metal. Each door frame is of such size that it aids in covering the ends of the wooden partitions that form the pigeon holes to which it is applied, and these frames (see Fig. 1) are of such size and shape, that, where a series of them are combined with a series of pigeon holes, they cover the whole of the ends of the wood. Each door frame is a plate of metal, a a, which, when in place, overlaps a part of the ends of the wood work surrounding the pigeon hole, the outside of the frame inclosing a greater area than the orifice of the pigeon hole, and each frame has an ear, b b, which enters the pigeon hole; but this ear may be either continuous or notched out at intervals. The door is of iron or other metal, solid at top and having an opening, e, below, in which a plate of glass is secured, and is hinged to the frame as at c c. It is preferable to locate rods f f behind the plate, so as to prevent the introduction of a hand if the glass be broken, and so to form and hinge the door that, when shut, it enters within the frame, so that it cannot be lifted from its hinges when shut. When the frames are all in place, each frame is riveted or bolted to the wood work, to fasten it thereto, and is also riveted or bolted to its four neighbors, to secure the frames to each other. (See h h, Fig. 2) Thus each frame is secured to the wood work, so that it cannot be removed till the rivet or the wood work is cut away or broken. When all the frames are in place, a continuous metallic frontage protecting the wood work is presented upon the outside of the series of boxes, that is, the side where the public can approach the boxes. Each door has a lock attached to it, the bolt of which is actuated through the intervention of an arm, k, in the manner and for the purposes set forth in a patent granted for the invention of Linus Yale, Jr., on the 24th day of October, 1871, No. 120177. An iron door in an iron frame is not claimed as of Yale's invention, as such doors have been used in safe vaults and for furnaces.

"What is claimed as the invention of said Linus Yale, Jr., deceased, is, 1. The combination, substantially as specified, of a series of metallic door frames and doors with a series of wooden pigeon holes, whereby a series of postoffice boxes with a continuous metallic frontage is formed. 2. The combination, substantially as described, of a series of wooden pigeon holes with a series of metallic door frames and doors, and with rivets or bolts which attach the frames to the wood work, whereby a continuous metallic frontage secured to the woodwork of pigeon holes is obtained. 3. The combination, substantially as described, of a series of wooden pigeon holes with a series of metallic door frames and doors, and with rivets or bolts which attach the frames both to the wood work and to each other, the combination being substantially such as described. 4. The combination of a metallic door with a glass panel and with a frame to which the door is hinged, said frame being so constructed as to cover a part of the ends of the wooden partitions forming pigeon holes and being applied thereto, the combination being substantially as specified. 5. The combination of a postoffice box or pigeon hole, open at the rear, with a metallic frame and door to protect the front end of it."

Claims 4 and 5 were disclaimed by the plaintiff November 29, 1880.

Claim 1 of the first reissue was the same as claim one of the original patent, while claim 2 of the first reissue was in these words: "2. The combination of two or more metallic frames and doors and locks with pigeon holes, said frames having flanges, which protect and inclose wholly or in part the front edges of said pigeon holes."

In the opinion of the circuit court in the present case (22 Blatchf. 294), Judge Shipman says: "The defendant, as postmaster in the City of New York, and not otherwise, used in the postoffice, provided and equipped for him by the United States Government, wooden postoffice boxes, with metallic fronts and doors and open at the rear. They were manufactured by the Johnson Rotary Lock Company. The doors and door frames made a continuous metallic frontage. The door frames were secured to each other and to the wood work as follows: At about the middle of each vertical edge of each door frame there was a triangular hole, which, with the corresponding hole in the adjoining door frame, made a rectangular hole, through which the metal fastening bolt, completely filling such hole, was passed, the heads of such bolts overlapping the contiguous edges of adjoining metallic fronts, and the bolt itself passing through the wooden partition between the adjoining pigeon holes, and being secured at the back thereof, within the postoffice room, by a nut screwed upon the end of the bolt. There were other boxes constructed substantially as above described, excepting that the metal front of each pigeon hole was fastened to the wood work by means of flanges and screws, but the screws which attached the frames to the wood work did not attach the frames to each other. Neither series of boxes would have infringed either claim of the original patent. Each series infringes the first and second claims of the present reissue, unless these claims are to receive a construction which shall compel the metallic frontage to be made continuous by rivets, bolts, or fastenings which shall attach the frames both to the wood work and to each adjoining frame. The plaintiff insists that these claims should not receive such a construction, because it has been found that the invention of the specification of the reissue, although a broader one than was described in the original patent, is the invention which the history of the art and the patent show should have been described, and because the first reissue was promptly applied for, and, as issued, included in its second claim, in the view of the plaintiff, the same invention which is described in the 1st and 2d claims of the reissue. The defendant says, among other things, that, since the cases of Miller v. Bridgeport Brass Co. 104 U. S. 350 [26:783], and James v. Campbell, Id. 356 [26:786], it has been settled by the supreme court that the Commissioner of Patents, in allowing the 1st and 2d claims, exceeded his jurisdiction, because the invention which was first applied for and was 'complete in itself,' was clearly, specifically, and fully described in the original specification and in the claim, and an expanded claim would necessarily include an invention which was not sought to be described in the original patent; and, furthermore, that there could have been no inadvertence or mistake, because the original patent and the accompanying documents show that the patentee 'did not intend it' (the patent) 'to embrace any such broad invention' as was described in the reissue. The defendant also says that the patentee, in his application for the the first reissue, ineffectually endeavored to alter the description of the invention, so as to omit the fastening of the door frames to each other as a necessary integral part of the invention, and that the second claim of the first reissue cannot fairly be construed to permit such omission, and, therefore, that the patentee is estopped from insisting upon a broad construction of the 1st and 2d claims of the present reissue, and that these claims are objectionable on account of the laches of the patentee. The 'file wrapper and contents' of the first reissue were not a part of the record in the Scovill Case."

In order to show the changes made in the specification and claims of the first reissue, as they passed through the Patent Office, the specification and claims of that reissue as granted, and the specification and claims of the same as applied for, are here placed in parallel columns, the parts of the latter which are not contained in the former being in italics and brackets, and being numbered severally from 1 to 8:

As Applied For.	As Granted.
"This invention relates to an improvement in the fronts of postoffice boxes, and consists in making said fronts, including the doors and box frames, of metal, said box frames being constructed so as to overlap and cover, in whole or in part, the front edges of the wooden pigeon holes to which they are affixed [1 and in securing said frames to said pigeon holes by rivets or screws.] The body of the boxes is to be made of wood in the usual manner, viz., a series of pigeon holes, but the front of the box and the door frame are made of iron or other suitable metal. Each door frame or box front is so made that it aids in covering the edge of the wooden partition or pigeon holes	"This invention relates to an improvement in the fronts of postoffice boxes, and consists in making said fronts, including the doors and box frames, of metal, said box frames being constructed so as to overlap and cover, in whole or in part, the front edges of the wooden pigeon holes to which they are affixed. The body of the boxes is to be made of wood in the usual manner, viz., a series of pigeon holes, but the front of the box and the door frame are made of iron or other suitable metal. Each door frame or box front is so made that it aids in covering the edge of the wooden partition or pigeon holes is and [2 may be] connected A with the other frames above, below, and on each side of it in such manner that the frames will make a continuous frontage, no part of which can be removed from the outside without pulling down other parts, [3 or the several frames may be secured or otherwise fastened directly to the wooden pigeon holes, each one independent of the other, if desired.] Each frame made, as before stated, of metal, has all around it a flange, a a, which protects the outside or edges of the wood work. The sides of the frame b b enter and fit closely against the wood forming the pigeon holes, and may be continuous or notched out at intervals, and each frame has attached to it one leaf of two or more hinges, c c. The door may be of any desirable metal, solid where the lock d is attached, and having an opening, e, below, in which a plate of glass is secured. [4 Cast with the door and over the opening e for glass may be a network or ornamental open work, admitting light, and at the same time preventing the introduction of a hand if the glass be broken, or rods f f may be located behind the plate for the same purpose.] The door is so constructed that, when shut, it enters within the frame [5 see g g], so that it cannot be lifted from its hinges. When the frames are all in place, each is frame [6 may be] riveted A through the woodwork to its four neighbors (see h h, Fig. 2), and in this way form a continuous metal frontage [7 or each separate frame may be screwed or otherwise fastened to the wood work independent of its neighboring frames.] The door for each frame has a small spring bolt, i, and a lock, d, attached to it, the two operating together, and forming, in the hands of the postmaster, a perfect safeguard against all entrance to the box by means of the key, as is more particularly set forth in letters patent granted to me on the 24th day of October, 1871, and numbered 120,177.
	"What I claim as the invention of the said Linus Yale, Jr., deceased, is, First. The combination of several box frames with each other and with pigeon holes, as described, by means of rivets passing through the frames and the wood work entering between the said frames, the combination being substantially as described. Second. The combination of two or more metallic frames and doors and locks with pigeon holes, said frames having flanges, which protect and enclose, wholly or in part, the front edges of said pigeon holes, [3 Third. The combination of several metallic box frames with each other and with pigeon holes, said box frames being secured to said pigeon holes independently of each other, by means of screws or other similar fastening, as described.]" is, 1. The combination of several box frames with each other and with pigeon holes, as described, by means of rivets passing through the frames and the wood work entering between the said frames, the combination being substantially as described. 2. The combination of two or more metallic frames and doors and locks with pigeon holes, said frames having flanges, which protect and enclose, wholly or in part, the front edges of said pigeon holes."

On the 8th of May, 1872, the Patent Office Examiner called the attention of the applicant to the fact that the following matters in the new specification were not warranted by the original patent, namely: the words "or screws," in the part marked "one," the words "may be," in the parts marked "2" and "6," the parts marked "3," "4," and "7," and the third claim, being the part marked "8."

On the 9th of May, 1872, the applicant appealed to the Commissioner of Patents in person, because the examiner had refused to examine the case on its merits, in view of the introduction of such new matter; but, on the next day, the applicant virtually withdrew his appeal, by amending his application as follows: He erased part "1;" he erased the words "may be," in parts "2" and "6," and substituted in each case the word "is;" he erased parts "3" and "4" and substituted for the latter the words, "I prefer to locate rods f f behind the plate to prevent the introduction of a hand if the glass be broken." He also erased part "7," and claim 3, part "8," and submitted the case for further action.

The application was then reconsidered, and twice rejected, and from the second rejection the applicant appealed to the examiners in chief who reversed the decision of the examiner, and the reissue was granted, July 9, 1872.

In view of these facts, Judge Shipman, in his decision in the present case said: "It is unquestionable that the patentee, when he made his original application, intended to say that his invention did not consist simply in making, by his combination of metallic doors, door frames, and wooden boxes a continuous metallic frontage, but that it also consisted in the way in which the frontage was made continuous; viz. by the connection of the adjoining frames with each other. His definite and exact specification shows that he supposed that his patentable invention was thus limited. He described, with precision and clearness, that his metallic frontage was to be so constructed that the frames were to be fastened to each other at top, bottom, and sides, and not merely to the wood work. 'A specific invention, complete in itself,' was described 'fully and clearly, without ambiguity or obscurity.' Under the definitions which are given in the decisions which have been referred to, and in Swaine T. & Mfg. Co. v. Ladd, 102 U. S. 408 [26: 184] of the inadvertence, accident, or mistake which permits a reissue, when a patent is said to be inoperative on account of a defect or insufficiency in the specification, which arose through such inadvertence or mistake, and also of the nature of the defectiveness or insufficiency which is meant by the statute, there was no mistake, although the patentee might have fallen into an error of judgment, or into an erroneous conclusion of fact; and, furthermore, the original patent, according to the definitions contained in the recent, and, perhaps, in the earlier cases, was not defective nor insufficient, either in its descriptive portion or in its claims. The second claim of the first reissue, construed in the light of the contemporaneous facts which are shown in the 'file wrapper and contents,' cannot be fairly construed to mean a metallic frontage, irrespective of the fastening of the frames to each other through the wood work. Were this claim to be construed without study of the history of the application as it made its way through the Patent Office, and of the amendments which it was compelled to undergo, it would probably receive the construction which naturally belongs to the first claim of the present reissue. But the patentee abandoned, under pressure from the Patent Office, the clauses in the application which made the fastening of the frames to each other to be optional, and abandoned also a proposed third claim, which described the box frames as secured to the pigeon holes 'independently of each other, by means of screws or other similar fastening.' In view of the fact that the Patent Office excluded from the descriptive part of the specification suggestions of any other method of fastening than that by which the frames were to be fastened to each other, it would be singular if the intent of the office was to include in the second claim such other method of construction. If this claim has properly, and the applicant knew that it was intended to have, a narrow construction—and of this knowledge I think there can be little doubt—the plaintiff would not insist that the 1st and 2d claims of the present reissue ought, in view of the decision in Miller v. Bridgeport Brass Co., supra, to be so construed as to be any broader than the 3d claim, which requires the combination of door frames, doors, and pigeon holes to be by means of rivets or bolts which attach the frames both to the wood work and to each other."

It was held that there was no infringement; and, on that ground, the bill was dismissed.

We concur in these views of the circuit court, and in the result which it reached. In view of the numerous recent decisions of this court on the subject of reissued patents, it would serve no good purpose to expand or amplify the views so well expressed by the judge at circuit. They are supported by the decisions in Miller v. Bridgeport Brass Co. 104 U. S. 350 [26:788]; Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 354 [28:665]; Parker & W. Co. v. Yale Clock Co. 123 U. S. 87 [ante, 100]; Matthews v. Iron Clad Mfg. Co. 123 U. S. 347 [ante, 477].

Our conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider the defense raised in the answer, and urged in argument, that the postoffice boxes used by the defendant were used by him as Postmaster of the United States at the City of New York; that the boxes were the property of the United States and were rented by it to sundry persons; that the rent was a part of the postal revenue of the United States and was not a source of personal emolument to the defendant; that it was not within the power of the defendant to remove or alter the boxes; and that the use of such boxes at the postoffice, while the defendant was postmaster, was not an infringement of the patent by him, and did not make him liable to this suit.

Decree affirmed.

JOHN F. HARTRANFT, Collector of Customs for the DISTRICT OF PHILADELPHIA, Plff. in Err.,

v.

JOSEPH M. OLIVER ET AL., Trading as JOSEPH M. OLIVER & SON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 525–530.)

Duty Act of March 3, 1883—refunding excess of duties—goods in government custody.

1. Under the Act of March 3, 1883, goods, though imported before the Act took effect, yet, if kept after that period in bonded warehouses or a public store, are subject only to the duties thereafter leviable when they are entered for consumption.

2. If, previous to such entry, duties have been paid on goods imported before the Act took effect, which are kept in a public store or bonded warehouse until after the Act took effect, the importer is entitled to a refund of the difference between the amount paid and the amount which would be leviable if they were imported after the Act took effect.

3. Goods on board of a ship, in charge of a custom house officer, preliminary to their removal to a public store or a bonded warehouse, during the time necessary for that purpose, are in the custody of the government and are, within the intent of the Act, subject only to such duties as are leviable when the goods are freed from such custody.

[No. 190.]

Argued March 22, 1888. Decided April 9, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, to review a judgment for plaintiffs in an action to recover an excess of duties exacted and paid. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Field:

In 1883 the plaintiffs were merchants in the City of Philadelphia, and during that year they imported from Leghorn, Italy, by the bark Pellegra Madre, 155 cases of salad olive oil, and ten cases of lamp olive oil. The bark arrived at the Port of Philadelphia on Saturday, the 30th of June, 1883, and was entered at the custom house of that port between the hours of one and two in the afternoon. It was not practicable on that day after that time to remove the cases from the vessel into any public store or bonded warehouse; and the next day, July 1, 1883, was Sunday. On the 7th of July the cases were entered in bond at the custom house, and on the same day the plaintiffs made a withdrawal entry for the goods, and offered to pay the defendant, who was at the time Collector of the port, duty thereon at the rate of 25 per cent ad valorem, as provided by section six of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1883, 22 Stat. at L. 494; but the defendant refused to permit the withdrawal entry, or to accept the duty at that rate, and exacted duty on the 155 cases of salad olive oil, gauging $645\frac{53}{100}$ gallons, at the rate of one dollar per gallon, and on the ten cases of lamp olive oil, gauging one hundred gallons, at the rate of 25 cents per gallon, the whole making the sum of $670.63, which was paid by the plaintiffs within ten days after liquidation of the entry, under protest, they claiming that the oil was only subject to duty at the rate of 25 per cent ad valorem. The difference between the amount of duties exacted and paid, and the amount which the plaintiffs claimed were leviable upon the goods was four hundred and thirty-five dollars and sixty-two cents ($435.62). From the decision of the Collector the plaintiffs appealed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who approved the decision; and thereupon they brought this action in the Court of Common Pleas for the County of Philadelphia in Pennsylvania to recover the alleged excess of duties exacted. On petition of the Collector the action was removed to the Circuit Court of the United States, where issue was joined, and the action tried, resulting in a special verdict, finding the several facts stated above; and also that from the time of the arrival and entry of the bark in the Port of Philadelphia, June 30, 1883, until after payment of the duty exacted, July 7, the "vessel remained with unbroken hatches, and with a custom house inspector in charge of the same."

Upon the special verdict the court rendered judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, with interest; and to review this judgment the case is brought here on writ of error.

In his general circular to collectors of customs of May 19, 1883, the Secretary of the Treasury, in giving construction to section 10 of the Act of March 3, 1883, said "that all goods imported before said Act takes effect, and which are entered in bond on or before that date, and for which permits to land, designating the warehouse, have been issued, and which have not then been delivered on payment of duties, are to be regarded as subject to duty under said Act. This rule will prevail, whether the goods are actually within the walls of a bonded warehouse on that day, or on the dock, or on shipboard in port, or undergoing transportation in bond, either after appraisal or under the Immediate Transportation Act."

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for plaintiff in error:

The duties did not accrue until the vessel arrived at the port of entry.

U. S. v. Vowell, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 372 (3: 129); Arnold v. U. S. 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 120 (3: 676); Meredith v. U. S. 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 494 (10: 262); U. S. v. Lyman, 1 Mason, 482; Prince v. U. S. 2 Gall. 204; Perots v. U. S. Pet. C. C. 256; U. S. v. Cobb, 11 Fed Rep. 76; U. S. v. Benzon, 2 Cliff. 512; U. S. v. Macdonald, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 658 (18: 516).

Mr. Edward L. Perkins, for defendants in error:

Duties accrue on the arrival of the vessel at the port of entry; but their amount, under the Act, is to be ascertained when entered for consumption.

U. S. v. Vowell, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 368 (3: 128); Arnold v. U. S. 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 104 (3: 671); Harris v. Dennie, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 305 (7: 688).

A thing within the intention is within the statute, though not within the letter; and a thing within the letter is not within the statute, unless within the intention.

People v. Utica Ins. Co. 15 Johns. 358; Oates v. First Nat. Bank, 100 U. S. 244 (25: 582); U. S. v. Kirby, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 482 (19: 278).

Statutes levying duties are to be construed liberally in favor of the importer and against the government.

U. S. v. Wigglesworth, 2 Story, 369; U. S. Hodson, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 406 (19: 939); Cliquot's Champagne, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 145 (18: 121); Hartranft v. Wiegmann, 121 U. S. 616 (30: 1015); McAndrew v. Robertson, 29 Fed. Rep. 246.

Private bonded warehouses are public storehouses within the meaning of the Acts of Congress.

U. S. v. Macdonald, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 647 (18: 512).

The government has recognized the importing vessel as a warehouse.

Treas. Regulations, 1884, arts. 788, 753, pp. 331, 309.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

The duties exacted by the Collector, and paid by the importers, who were plaintiffs below, were imposed by a clause in section 2504, title 33 of the Revised Statutes, p. 478. As the vessel, in which they were brought, arrived at the Port of Philadelphia, and was entered at the custom house on the 30th of June, 1883, they would be deemed imported on that day, so as to be subject to the duties thus prescribed, were it not for provisions in the Act of March 3, 1883, and the custody taken of the vessel and goods by an officer of the custom house on the day of its arrival in port, and kept by him until after the first of July following. That Act declared that on and after the first day of July, 1883, certain designated sections should be a substitute for title 33 of the Revised Statutes. 22 Stat. at L. 489. One of these sections provides that the duties on all preparations known as "expressed oils," not specifically enumerated or provided for in the Act, shall be 25 per cent ad valorem. Olive oils, both salad and lamp, are expressed oils within the meaning of this section, and are not specifically enumerated or provided for elsewhere in the Act. Section 10 of the Act declares "that all imported goods, wares, and merchandise, which may be in the public stores or bonded warehouses on the day and year when this Act shall go into effect, except as otherwise provided in this Act, shall be subjected to no other duty upon the entry thereof for consumption than if the same were imported respectively after that day; and all goods, wares, and merchandise remaining in bonded warehouses on the day and year this Act shall take effect, and upon which the duties shall have been paid, shall be entitled to a refund of the difference, between the amount of duties paid and the amount of duties said goods, wares, and merchandise would be subject to if the same were imported respectively after that date." 22 Stat. at L. 525.

The plain meaning of this section is that, though goods are imported before the Act takes effect, yet if they are kept until after that period in a public store or bonded warehouse, that is, in the custody and under the control of officers of the customs, they shall be subjected only to the duties thereafter leviable when they are entered for consumption. If, previously to such entry, duties have been paid on goods imported before the Act took effect, which are afterwards kept in a public store or bonded warehouse, that is, in the custody and control of officers of the government, the importer is entitled to a refund of the difference between the amount paid and the amount which would be leviable if they were imported after the Act took effect. In other words, goods imported before the Act took effect, if kept in the custody and control of the government, are to be charged with duties according to the law in force when they are entered for consumption; that is, when passed over to the control of the importer or owner. The place in which the goods are thus kept is not the essential fact, but the custody of the government, and the consequent exclusion of control over them by the owner, which calls for the suspension of previous duties. There is manifest justice in the rule that goods thus withheld from the control of the owner or importer shall be subject only to such duties as are leviable by the law when he is at liberty to take possession of them. Ordinarily, goods in the custody and control of officers of the customs are placed in a public store or bonded warehouse; and thus the designation of the goods as thus placed is, in the legislation of Congress, in effect a designation, and no more, of their being in such custody. But goods on board of a ship, in charge of a custom house officer, preliminary to their removal to a public store or a bonded warehouse, and during the time necessary for that purpose, are in like custody, and so are, within the spirit and intent of the law, subject only to such duties as are leviable when the goods are freed from such custody. So far as the government is concerned, they are in the same position as if technically in a public store or bonded warehouse. When in either of those places, they cannot be removed without a permit from the collector. When on shipboard, in charge of a custom house inspector, they are in the same condition, and cannot be removed without a like permit. By statute, collectors are required to put one or more inspectors on board of every vessel immediately on her coming within a collection district; and no merchandise can be unloaded or removed from the vessel without a permit in writing from the collector. Rev. Stat. §§ 2875, 2876.

The Act of Congress of March 28, 1854, which is now embraced in section 2971 of the Revised Statutes, in providing for the deposit of goods in public stores and bonded warehouses, declares that "any goods remaining in public store or bonded warehouse beyond three years shall be regarded as abandoned to the government;" and in the construction of this clause the Treasury Department has decided that the period limited for their remaining in a public store or a bonded warehouse includes the time on shipboard, after the arrival of the ship in port. Treasury Regulations, 1857, art. 488.

We are, therefore, of opinion that, within the spirit and intent of the 10th section of the Act of March 3, 1883, the goods were not chargeable with duties, whilst on board the bark, in custody of an officer of the customs, at any greater rate than they would have been chargeable if in custody of such officer in a public store or bonded warehouse of the government; and that therefore duties were only leviable on the goods by the Act which went into effect on the first of July, 1883. The intent of the Legislature is to be followed, even if not strictly within the letter of the statute. It follows that the construction placed upon the section by the Secretary of the Treasury in his circular of May 19, 1883, to collectors of customs, is correct, so far as it recognizes as subject to duties under it goods imported before the Act took effect, whether "actually within the walls of a bonded warehouse on that day, or on the dock, or on shipboard in port, or undergoing transportation in bond, either after appraisal or under the Immediate Transportation Act;" but is incorrect so far as it limits the application of the rule to goods imported before the Act took effect, "which are entered in bond on or before that date, and for which permits to land, designating the warehouse, have been issued, and which have not then been delivered on payment of duties." If goods thus imported can be brought within the provisions of the 10th section in any case, when not actually in a public store or bonded warehouse, they should be deemed within those provisions when, by reason of the custody of officers of the customs, it is impracticable to remove them from the vessel, whether they are at the time entered in bond or not.

Judgment affirmed.

BENJAMIN F. BOWERMAN ET AL., Piffs. in Err.,
v.
WILLIAM C. ROGERS ET AL., Assignees of BENJAMIN F. BURGESS and WALTER BURGESS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 585–590.)

Liability of agents for not bringing action to recover back illegal duties paid.

Upon the facts of the case, held, that it was the duty of the defendants, as agents of the plaintiffs, to have brought a suit against the collector to recover back the excess of duties paid on importation of goods for the plaintiffs, the defendants having assumed such duty and having been relied upon by the plaintiffs to perform it; and also held that the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs, for such excess, by reason of having omitted to bring such suit against the collector until the time required by statute for such suit had elapsed.

[No. 187.]

Argued Feb. 16, 1888. Decided March 19, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, for a failure of defendants to sue for excess of duties within the time required by statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edwin B. Smith, for plaintiffs in error:

Implied promises, or promises in law, exist only when there is no express promise between the parties.

Hawkins v. U. S. 96 U. S. 697 (24:610); Cutter v. Powell, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 17; Whiting v. Sullivan, 7 Mass. 107; Galloway v. Holmes, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 330; Weston v. Davis, 24 Me. 375; Britton v. Turner, 6 N. H. 491.

Here was a declaration which excludes any implied promise.

Ladd v. Franklin, 37 Conn. 62; Roberts v. Barker, 1 Cromp. & M. 808.

An executory contract is one in which a party binds himself to do, or not to do, a particular thing.

Marshall, Ch. J., in Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 136 (3:177).

There was no acceptance.

Taylor v. Rennie, 35 Barb. 276; Myers v. Smith, 48 Barb. 614; Emmott v. Biddel, 2 Foster & F. 142.

To make a valid contract it is not only necessary that the minds of the contracting parties should meet on the subject of the contract, but they must communicate that fact to each other.

Frith v. Lawrence, 1 Paige, 442; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Columbus Rolling Mill, 119 U. S. 151 (30:377); Brown v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. 44 N. Y. 79; Nundy v. Matthews, 84 Hun, 78; Topping v. Swords, 1 E. D. Smith, 610; Baxter v. Bishop, 65 Iowa, 582; Pew v. Gloucester First Nat. Bank, 130 Mass. 397.

Whatever contract existed between these parties was a New York contract; and New York decisions would indicate the legal rules applicable to the formation, as well as to the performance of the contract.

McIntyre v. Parks, 3 Met. 207; Hazard v. New England M. Ins. Co. 1 Sumn. 224; S. C. 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 586 (8:1053); Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441; Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 307; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 365, 366; Wayne County Sav. Bank v. Low, 6 Abb. N. C. 90; Chiles v. Nelson, 7 Dana, 281; Levy v. Cohen, 4 Ga. 1; Tayloe v. Merchants F. Ins. Co. 50 U. S. 9 How. 390 (13: 187).

Unless Burgess & Sons, by what was contained in these letters, were bound to permit Bowerman Brothers to commence and conduct this litigation, and to pay them for so doing, then the latter was not bound.

Tuttle v. Love, 7 Johns. 470; Tucker v. Woods, 12 Johns. 190; Eliason v. Henshaw, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 225 (4:556); Head v. Providence Ins. Co. 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 127 (2:229); Essex Turnpike Corp. v. Collins, 8 Mass. 299; Carr v. Duval, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 77 (10:361); First Nat. Bank v. Hall, 101 U. S. 48 (25:824); Martin v. Black, 21 Ala. 729; Hutcheson v. Blakeman, 3 Met. (Ky.) 80; Allen v. Roberts, 2 Bibb, 98; Emerson v. Graff, 29 Pa. 358; Slaymaker v. Irwin, 4 Whart. 380; Beckwith v. Cheever, 21 N. H. 41; McKinley v. Watkins, 13 Ill. 143; Maclay v. Harvey, 90 Ill. 525; Esmay v. Gorton, 18 Ill. 486, 487; Van Valkenburg v. Rogers, 18 Mich. 180; Forster v. Ulman, 2 Cent. Rep. 848, 64 Md. 531; Knight v. Cooley, 34 Iowa, 218; Greve v. Ganger, 36 Wis. 369.

The mere determination of the mind, unacted upon, can never be an acceptance.

Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 310; The Palo Alto, 2 Ware, 357, 358; Hallock v. Commercial Ins. Co. 26 N. J. L. 280; Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103; Trounstine v. Sellers, 35 Kan. 447.

It was erroneous for the court to assume the existence of a consideration.

Thorne v. Deas, 4 Johns. 84, 97; Burnet v. Bisco, Id. 236; Smedes v. Bank of Utica, 20 Johns. 379; Rose v. U. S. Tel. Co. 3 Abb. Pr. N. S. 408; S. C. 6 Robt. 307; Boniface v. Relyea, 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 267; S. C. 6 Robt. 405; Doupe v. Genin, 1 Sweeny, 32; Coleman v. Eyre, Id. 483; People v. Shall, 9 Cow. 778.

The jury should have been permitted to determine what the fact was.

Pendleton v. Empire Stone Dressing Co. 19 N. Y. 18; Smith v. Long Island R. R. Co. 32 Hun, 39; Powell v. Powell, 71 N. Y. 71; Hart v. Hudson River Bridge Co. 80 N. Y. 622.

All that passed in relation to the particular subject matter which is the basis of this action was in writing; hence, whether or not it amounted to a legal contract was for the court. Taken by itself, the correspondence does not show a contract, and the motion to dismiss should have been granted.

Etting v. U. S. Bank, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 59 (6:419); Barreda v. Silsbee, 62 U. S. 21 How. 168 (16:93); Iasigi v. Brown, 58 U. S. 17 How. 188, 196 (15:208, 213); West v. Smith, 101 U. S. 270 (25:812); Goodlett v. Louisville & N. R. R. Co. 122 U. S. 411 (30:1234).

Mr. Everett P. Wheeler, for defendants in error:

An agent is bound to great diligence and care for his principal; not the utmost possible, but all that a reasonable man, under similar circumstances, would take of his own affairs.

1 Pars. Cont. 85.

A factor has a lien upon property in his possession.

Story, Ag. § 376; Bryce v. Brooks, 26 Wend. 367, 375.

Factors and agents are bound to follow the instructions of their principals strictly.

Brown v. McGran, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 479 (10: 550); Johnson v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. 33 N. Y. 610; Wilson v. Wilson, 26 Pa. 393; Scott v. Rogers, 31 N. Y. 676; Hays v. Stone, 7 Hill, 128; Hilton v. Vanderbilt, 82 N. Y. 591.

And when they fail to follow the instructions of their principals they make themselves liable for the whole amount of the loss caused thereby.

Rundle v. Moore, 3 Johns. Cas. 36; Hamilton v. Cunningham, 2 Brock. 350, 366; Exchange Nat. Bank v. Third Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 276 (28:722); 1 Pars. Cont. 85.

The question of whether Burgess & Sons relied upon the Bowermans to bring the suits against the government, was a fact material to the issue and was properly admitted.

King v. Fitch, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 508, 515, 524.

The rule as to the inadmissibility of parol evidence to contradict or vary a valid written instrument, or to prove the facts of which, as between the parties thereto, the writing is the best evidence, does not apply where one of the parties in the action is a stranger to the instrument.

Sprague v. Hosmer, 82 N. Y. 466; McMaster v. Ins. Co. of North America, 55 N. Y. 222; Rex v. Kingston-upon-Hull, 7 Barn. & C. 611; The Lady Franklin, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 325 (19:455); The Thames, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 98 (20:804).

The injury to Burgess & Sons, caused by the failure of the Bowermans to comply with their agreement to commence the necessary suits, was of itself a sufficient consideration for the promise.

1 Pars. Cont. 431; White v. Baxter, 71 N. Y. 254; Townsley v. Sumrall, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 170, 182 (7:386, 390).

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

The writ of error in this case is to a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. This judgment was entered upon a verdict rendered by a jury in favor of the plaintiffs, Benjamin F. and Walter Burgess, under the peremptory instructions of the court, for the sum of $6,105.77, against the defendants, Bowerman Brothers.

Burgess & Sons were dealers in sugars and molasses, residing in Boston, and Bowerman Brothers were sugar brokers, residing in New York. Burgess & Sons had a large part of the articles in which they dealt, either for themselves or as agents for others, landed in New York, and entered at the custom house there. In such cases they employed Bowerman Brothers as their agents, and it is not disputed that this agency extended to the entry of these goods at the custom house in New York, as well as to the sale of them afterward. With regard to two shipments of goods so entered there, from two different vessels, a question arose as to the duties assessed upon them by the collector. This controversy proceeded as far as the payment of the duties through Bowerman Brothers, followed by an appeal from the decision of the collector to the Secretary of the Treasury, and a protest against the final action of the department. All this was attended to and faithfully performed in due time by the defendants. They, however, did not bring suit to recover back the duties so paid; and the single question to be decided here is whether it was the duty of Bowerman Brothers, under the circumstances of their employment, to have brought such a suit against the collector for the excess of duties claimed to have been imposed by him on these importations.

The case arises in this way. Suits were brought by other parties who had paid similar duties upon like importations, and recoveries had against the collector upon precisely the same grounds mentioned in the protest of the plaintiffs in this suit, and in a case brought to this court the error of the Treasury Department was established. But the statute allowing recoveries to be had against the collector for excessive duties which have been paid requires the suits to be brought within ninety days after such payment has been made, and that period had elapsed before the decisions in those cases. It was for that reason too late for Burgess & Sons to cause suit to be brought to recover back their alleged excessive payments.

Bowerman Brothers maintain that, as mere sugar brokers, it was no part of their duty to cause suit to be brought on account of the imposition of excessive duties, and that they are not liable, therefore, for the failure to do so, by reason of which it is very clear the sum recovered in this suit was lost to the plaintiffs. On the other hand, Burgess & Sons insist that, whether it was a part of their duty as brokers to institute such suit or not, they had come under an obligation to do it by reason of conversation or correspondence which passed between the parties. The whole of this correspondence, and the verbal testimony of one of the plaintiffs which is very brief, is found in the bill of exceptions; and we concur with the judge who tried the case below that this correspondence itself makes out the obligation of Bowerman Brothers to have caused the institution of such a suit.

About the only piece of verbal testimony that is of any consequence in the consideration of this matter is the statement of Mr. Burgess on the stand, that his firm fully relied upon the defendants to attend to the matter of bringing such a suit. Some of the letters produced, which passed between them, make this very plain.

On January 27, 1881, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants as follows:

"We notice the tests and have seen the sample. They are certainly very beautiful sugars for their class. Now, we feel anxious as to the duties on the dry test; but if they should be decided against us we must protest as soon as duties are paid, and place the matter in the hands of a first class lawyer, the one employed by Messrs. Knowlton, perhaps, unless you know of a better, to commence the suit as soon as possible, but we hope all this will not be necessary.

* * * * * * * *

"If the sugars are marked up on dry test, it is necessary to formally protest against the decision of the collector and then appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury. This is the first step, and when the duties are paid to enter suit."

To this the defendants replied on the next day: "Your favor of yesterday is received and contents noted, all of which will be duly attended to."

Several other letters then follow concerning other importations and protests made by Bowerman Brothers on behalf of plaintiffs against the duties levied on those goods. On March 31, 1881, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants: "Of course you will duly appeal from the government assessing duties by tests." On April 15, the defendants wrote to Burgess & Sons as follows:

"We have your favor of yesterday and enclose herewith the Secretary of the Treasury's reply to our appeal of March 5 (sugars per 'Santiago,' Jan. 25, '81.) The collector's decision is affirmed. We suppose you will wait the decision in the Welch suit before commencing proceedings.

"Please advise us."

To this the plaintiffs replied on April 16, as follows:

"We are in receipt of your favor of yesterday enclosing the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury to your appeal of March 5 regarding sugars ex Santiago, Jan. 25. We would await the decision in the Welch suit before commencing proceedings, if there is time.

"Please keep us posted in the sugar case."

On April 27, 1881, Bowerman Brothers wrote to plaintiffs as follows:

"Your favor of yesterday is received. The Kioto sugars are about half out of ship, and we send you to-night, by express, samples and tests of each mark. Our market is quiet but strong. We hear that the government has decided to appeal from the decision (in New York) in the Welch Case. Sales reported as below."

On June 18, 1881, Bowerman Brothers again wrote to plaintiffs as follows:

"We presume you have in mind The Santiago's cargo—centrifugal, Angelita—which arrived here July 6, 1880, the most of which was raised on polariscope test, one fourth cent and 25 per cent above the legitimate rate of entry on Dutch standard, and will commence suit against the government in due season."

To this latter the plaintiffs, Burgess & Sons, replied on June 20, as follows:

"We have your favor of the 18th, in which, you say, 'We presume you have in mind The Santiago's cargo—centrifugal, Angelita—which arrived July 6, '80, the most of which was raised on polariscope test, one fourth—and 25 per cent above the legitimate rate of duty on Dutch standard, and will commence suit against the government in due season.'

"The cargo you refer to did not pay at all, as we understand duty above the Dutch standard, it having just escaped on dry test.

"Of course we must not let any of our cases escape due attention. We attend here to all our Boston cases and enter suits as fast as they come around, and we suppose you can do the same as our agents in New York. Are we right? Please look into every case and keep us timely informed and whether there is anything for us to do personally or by power."

We think the whole of this correspondence leads to the inevitable conclusion that the defendants, either expressly or by fair implication, assumed the duty of causing suit to be brought within a reasonable time; living, as they did, in New York, where the transactions all occurred, where the suit must be brought, and being frequently admonished by the letters of plaintiffs to see that suit was brought in due time. This is especially evident from the last letter quoted above, in which the expectation of plaintiffs is distinctly stated that defendants would cause suit to be brought "in due season," and an inquiry made whether they are right in that supposition. They had by the statement in their letter, "Please look into every case and keep us timely informed and whether there is anything for us to do personally or by power," which is not denied, raised an implied acknowledgment on the part of the defendants that they would attend to this matter.

Taking the evidence altogether, it is very clear that Burgess & Sons understood that Bowerman Brothers would attend to the whole affair from the beginning to the end, and, without regard to their special occupation as mere sugar brokers, would take charge of all that was necessary to secure the rights of the plaintiffs in the matter of paying duties, making proper protests, getting the goods through the custom house, and seeking redress by suit against the collector if that became necessary. And that they might be sure that they were not mistaken in this understanding, the letter of the 20th of June was written, which required in good faith that if Bowerman Brothers did not consider themselves charged with the duty of having a suit brought in due time, that they should have made a disclaimer of it by an immediate answer. It cannot be denied that the loss by Burgess & Sons of the sum of money found in the verdict, was due to the failure of Bowerman Brothers to fulfill faithfully the obligation in this particular which they had assumed in this correspondence, and which Mr. Burgess swears his firm relied upon them to perform.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

FRANK E. DEWOLF ET AL., Appts.,
v.
FLORENCE W. HAYS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 614–618.)

Action to set aside deed, decided upon the facts.

Action to set aside a deed, executed by a married woman, of her property, and to compel its reconveyance to her, dismissed upon the facts of the case; it appearing that the deed was made by her upon a prudent and fair settlement with the grantee, made deliberately, and under the advice of competent counsel.

[No. 868.]

Submitted Jan. 6, 1888. Decided April 9, 1888.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Reversed and remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill.

The original suit was a bill in equity, filed May 7, 1884, by Florence W. Hays, the widow of John J. Hays, against Frank E. DeWolf and wife and Horace M. Barnes, to set aside a deed of real estate from DeWolf and wife to Barnes, and to compel a conveyance to the plaintiff. Upon a hearing on pleadings and proofs, the circuit court entered a decree for the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed to this court.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Benjamin F. Thurston and Louis T. Haggin, for appellants:

Parties who seek relief from the effect of a deed or agreement to which they themselves are parties, on the ground of mistake or of fraud, must proceed with diligence to assert their claims.

In a case like the present the strictest diligence is enjoined by the law, especially since a portion of the land in question has been, during the last six years, sold in small parcels to bona fide purchasers for value.

Wollensak v. Reiher, 115 U. S. 96 (29: 350); Sullivan v. Portland & K. R. R. Co. 94 U. S. 806, 812 (24: 324, 326); Beaubien v. Beaubien, 64 U. S. 23 How. 190 (16: 484); Stearns v. Page, 48 U. S. 7 How. 819 (12: 928); Moore v. Greene, 60 U. S. 19 How. 69 (15: 533); Marsh v. Whitmore, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 178, 185 (22: 482, 485); Godden v. Kimmell, 99 U. S. 201 (25: 431); Badger v. Badger, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 87, 95 (17: 836, 839); Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135 (25: 807); Lansdale v. Smith, 106 U. S. 391 (27: 219).

On the subject of presumption of acquiescence after considerable delay, see:

Fisher v. Boody, 1 Curt. 206, 219; Prevost v. Gratz, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 481 (5: 311); Elmendorf v. Taylor, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 152 (6: 289); Piatt v. Vattier, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 405, 416 (9: 178, 177); Stearns v. Page, 1 Story, 204, 217; Wagner v. Baird, 48 U. S. 7 How. 234 (12: 681); Lawrence v. Blake, 8 Clark & F. 504; Hough v. Richardson, 3 Story, 659.

A court may afford relief under a prayer for general relief, provided it is such relief as is agreeable to the case made by the bill.

1 Daniell, Ch. 378, note 5 and cases; English v. Foxall, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 595 (7: 531); Hobson v. McArthur, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 182 (10: 930).

The special relief prayed at the bar must essentially depend upon the frame and structure of the bill.

Story, Eq. Pl. § 42 and note 3; Hiern v. Mill, 13 Ves. Jr. 120; Walker v. Devereaux, 4 Paige, 229.

In equity, relief is granted only secundum allegata et probata; and under the prayer for general relief it can give such relief only as the case stated by the bill and sustained by the proof will justify.

Scudder v. Young, 25 Me. 153; Grimes v. French, 2 Atk. 141; Dorner v. Fortescue, 3 Atk. 124; Halsted v. Meeker, 18 N. J. Eq. 136; Thomason v. Smitheon, 7 Port. (Ala.) 144; Peck v. Peck, 9 Yerg. 301; Isaacs v. Steel, 4 Ill. 97; Jordan v. Clark, 16 N. J. Eq. 243; Simplot v. Simplot, 14 Iowa, 449; Landis v. Olds, 9 Minn. 90; Wilson v. Horr, 15 Iowa, 489.

Messrs. W. Hallett Phillips and Ben. Morgan, for appellee:

The conveyance in which Mrs. Hays made a sacrifice of her entire separate property was made under the influence of her husband.

Vernon v. Bethell, 2 Eden, 113.

Her consent to the surrender of her property was imperfect; there was no freedom of judgment, no liberty of action.

1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 239; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 948, 951; Hall v. Hall, 37 L. J. Ch. (Probate) 40.

It is immaterial that the respondents neither had any hand in inducing the conveyance, nor were aware of the influences which induced it.

Wheeler v. Smith, 50 U. S. 9 How. 83 (13: 56); Central Bank v. Copeland, 18 Md. 318.

The objection of the lapse of time, six years, before the bringing the suit, cannot avail the defendants.

Allore v. Jewell, 94 U. S. 512 (24: 264); Connecticut Gen. L. Ins. Co. v. Eldredge, 102 U. S. 547 (26: 245).

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The question upon which the decision of this case turns is one of fact; and upon full consideration of the evidence, we are unable to adopt the conclusion of the circuit court.

Hays and wife and DeWolf and wife, connections by marriage and intimate friends, took up their residence in California in 1871. Hays was in ill health, and DeWolf had the confidence of Hays and wife and often transacted business for them. In 1872, De Wolf and wife owned a ranch of 4,160 acres in Fresno County, California, and at his suggestion Mrs. Hays purchased an undivided half of the tract for the price of $23,425, part of which she paid out of her separate funds and for the rest of which she gave them her promissory note for $10,135, secured by mortgage of the land.

It is alleged in the bill, and shown by the evidence, that afterwards DeWolf and wife, without consideration, assigned the note and mortgage to one Haggin, and he commenced an action of foreclosure which was dismissed upon the plaintiff's executing and delivering to Haggin a deed of the land; that in 1877 the same was conveyed, without consideration, by Haggin to one Dimmock, and by him to Mrs. DeWolf; and that in all these transactions Haggin, as well as Dimmock, acted as agent of the DeWolfs.

The bill alleges, and the answers deny, that the plaintiff executed and delivered the deed to Haggin "at the urgent solicitation of her husband, who was at the time an invalid, unable to attend to business, and who importuned the plaintiff to make said deed, urging as a reason that he was unwilling to die and leave her involved in a litigation which might result in her pecuniary ruin, and the plaintiff, yielding to his entreaties and persuasions, consented to and did make said deed;" and that DeWolf and wife, at the time of the execution of that deed, "well knew that the same was made by the plaintiff under the influence of her said husband and because of his persuasion and solicitation, and was not her free and voluntary act."

In March, 1884, DeWolf and wife conveyed the land to Barnes. The bill alleges that this conveyance was made "for the purpose of covering up and concealing their title to the same, the better to cheat and defraud the plaintiff." The answers deny that it was made with that or any other fraudulent or wrongful purpose.

It appears by the evidence that, at and before the time of the making of the deed to Haggin, Mrs. Hays and her husband had very little other property, while Haggin and DeWolf were wealthy; and that her husband was very ill of consumption complicated with other diseases (of which he died a year afterwards) and was, as his attending physician testified, "extremely nervous and sensitive, and easily affected by almost everything surrounding him," and less fit to transact business than he had previously been. Mrs. Hays testifies that she was induced to make the deed by the persuasions and entreaties of her husband, who was greatly worried by the fear of leaving her without means in a network of legal trouble.

But the other circumstances, preceding and attending the execution of the deed, which are clearly established by the evidence, give a different color to the matter.

In May, 1876, Mrs. Hays brought an action in a court of the State against DeWolf and wife, alleging that she had been induced to make her original purchase by their fraudulent representations as to the value of the property, and demanding damages for the fraud, as well as that the note and mortgage might be declared void. Haggin's action to foreclose the mortgage was brought in November, 1876.

Mr. Rearden, a counselor at law, whose integrity and veracity are not impugned, and who had long been acquainted with Hays and wife and their affairs, and was one of her counsel, testifies that while those two suits were pending the question of a compromise and settlement was discussed between himself and the opposing counsel, by which of them first suggested he did not remember; that he had conversations on the subject at his office in San Francisco with Hays alone, and afterwards with him in the presence of his wife at their residence in Redwood; that "they stated a number of facts which, if proved, might possibly be defenses to the note and mortgage;" that the reasons Hays gave him for wanting to settle the matter were that "They were practically without means to carry on any extensive litigation, which seemed to be opening up, and his health was bad, and he did not want to risk his labor and time on the great uncertainties of this business;" and that he carefully suggested to Hays various items of the possible expenses of the litigation, and, among other things, that one of the pending suits "would possibly cost him all the way from $1,500 to $2,500."

It was after Hays had talked with Rearden, that, as Mrs. Hays testifies, he entreated her and she consented "to wipe out the whole thing, the DeWolf suit and the Haggin suit and everything, if they could just get out of it, and not continue in it at all."

Mrs. Hays further testifies that, at Rearden's request, she went without her husband to San Francisco "to see the DeWolfs in relation to this matter of the deed and the suit," and negotiations were had at Rearden's office between Mrs. Hays and Rearden on the one side and DeWolf and his counsel on the other, lasting a great part of two days, before a settlement was effected. The only evidence of any knowledge on the part of the defendants that Mrs. Hays was acting under the influence of her husband is her testimony that she then told DeWolf "that she wanted to wipe out the whole thing on account of her husband's ill health, and that she did it because it was a wife's duty, in other words, to do what he told her to do."

The terms of the settlement, as then agreed upon and some days afterwards carried out, were that the mortgage note was delivered up to Mrs. Hays, two debts of hers of about $1,200 were paid by DeWolf, and Hays and wife executed the deed conveying the land to Haggin, and a deed of release of all claims against the DeWolfs. These deeds were dated January 16, 1887; and annexed to each of them was a certificate of a notary public to its acknowledgment by Hays and wife, and that she, upon being examined apart from her husband, and made acquainted with its contents, acknowledged her execution and did not wish to retract it.

The plaintiff, in her present bill, filed in 1884, does not allege any fraud or undue influence in the original transaction in 1872, by which she purchased the property and gave the note and mortgage for part of the price; but, on the contrary, claims title under that purchase, and offers to pay the amount of the mortgage note and interest, deducting any rents and profits received by the defendants. The uncontradicted testimony of well informed witnesses proves that at the time of the settlement in 1877 the value of the undivided half of the land did not exceed the amount of the mortgage, although it has since greatly increased because of the introduction of irrigation. In the state of facts then existing, the settlement appears to have been a prudent and fair one, made deliberately and under advice of competent counsel. Independently of any question of laches, therefore, no ground is shown for maintaining this suit.

Decree reversed, and case remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to dismiss the bill.

JOEL JOHNSON, Appt.,
v.
GEORGE CHRISTIAN ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 642-646.)

Jurisdiction of U. S. Courts—amendment of record.

1. The facts on which the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts of the United States rests must, in some form, appear on the face of the record of suits prosecuted before them; and it is error for a court to proceed without its jurisdiction is shown.

2. If the party in regard to whom the necessary citizenship is not shown actually possesses such citizenship, the record cannot be amended in this court so as to show the fact; but the court below may, in its discretion, allow that to be done when the case gets back there.

3. A suit in equity, for a perpetual injunction, to restrain the enforcing a judgment in ejectment, rendered in the United States Circuit Court, brought in the same court, is merely an incident of and ancillary to the ejectment suit; and the circuit court has jurisdiction of the case without any averment of the citizenship of the parties.

[No. 195.]

Submitted April 2, 1888. Decided April 16, 1888. Petition submitted April 28. Decided May 14, 1888.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas, in favor of plaintiffs in a suit in equity brought for the release of land from a deed of trust. Reversed.

On petition for reconsideration, decree of April 16 vacated and case ordered to stand for hearing on the merits at the next term, in its order.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. D. H. Reynolds and A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., for appellant:

The court below erred in enjoining appellant instead of dismissing appellees' bill.

Conway v. Ellison, 14 Ark. 360; Herndon v. Higgs, 15 Ark. 392; Dickson v. Richardson, 16 Ark. 114; Earle v. Hale, 31 Ark. 472.

To maintain the suit in ejectment by Johnson, he must have shown: (1) a legal estate in himself; (2) right of entry; (3) defendants in possession.

Daniel v. Lefevre, 19 Ark. 201.

The dispute was on the legal estate and the right of entry, which are matters that law passes upon and not equity; and there is no averment that they were prevented from interposing their defense by accident of any kind, or by the fraud of appellant, and the suit should have been dismissed.

Goolsby v. St. John, 25 Gratt. 146; Hendrickson v. Hinckley, 58 U. S. 17 How. 443 (15:123); New York L. Ins. Co. v. Bangs, 103 U. S. 780 (26: 608); Crim v. Handley, 94 U. S. 652 (24: 216); Very v. Watkins, 18 Ark. 551; Murphy v. Harbison, 29 Ark. 340.

Robinson, the vendor of Christian & Stuart, is a necessary party.

Hoe v. Wilson, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 501 (19:762).

Mr. U. M. Rose, for appellees:

Persons dealing with an agent, in the business for which he was appointed, may rely on a continuance of his authority until they are informed of its revocation.

Hatch v. Coddington, 95 U. S. 48 (24: 389); Southern L. Ins. Co. v. McCain, 96 U. S. 84 (24: 653).

Under all the circumstances it is clear that Mrs. Johnson and the appellant are estopped to deny the agency.

Schimmelpenich v. Bayard, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 264 (7:188).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas, by George Christian and Jerry Stuart, against Joel Johnson, to obtain a decree for the release of certain land from liability under a deed of trust. The defendant appeared and answered, a replication was filed and proofs were taken. The court, on final hearing, made a decree in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendant has appealed to this court.

On looking into the record, we can find no evidence of the jurisdiction of the circuit court. The bill commences in this way: "The complainants, George Christian and Jerry Stuart, citizens of the County of Chicot and State of Arkansas, would respectfully represent," etc. Joel Johnson is the sole defendant, but there is no allegation as to his citizenship, nor does that appear anywhere in the record. Under these circumstances, this court must take notice for itself of the absence of the averment of the necessary facts to show the jurisdiction of the circuit court, and must reverse the decree, in accordance with the settled practice.

It is only necessary to refer to the case of Continental Ins. Co. v. Rhoads, 119 U. S. 237 [30: 380], where it was said, citing numerous cases: "It was settled at a very early day that the facts on which the jurisdiction of the circuit courts rests must, in some form, appear on the face of the record of all suits prosecuted before them;" and that "It is error for a court to proceed without its jurisdiction is shown."

It was also said in the same case, citing Morgan v. Gay, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 81 [22: 100] and Robertson v. Cease, 97 U. S. 646 [24: 1057], that, if the party in regard to whom the necessary citizenship was not shown actually possessed such citizenship, the record could not be amended in this court so as to show the fact, but that the court below might, in its discretion, allow that to be done when the case should get back there.

In accordance with these views, the decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, with costs; and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings.

Thereafter, upon petition of counsel for appellees for reconsideration, upon the ground that the reversal had been "based upon an obvious oversight," etc., on May 14, 1888,

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the following opinion of the court:

In this case, on the 16th of April last, this court made a decree reversing with costs the decree of the circuit court and remanding the case to that court for further proceedings. This was done upon the view that the record contained no evidence of the jurisdiction of the circuit court, arising out of the citizenship of the parties; but the fact was overlooked that the bill states that the defendant had obtained a judgment in ejectment in the same court (the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas), and was seeking to oust the plaintiffs from the possession of the land involved, by a writ of possession founded on the judgment. The bill further sets forth that the plaintiffs in this suit, who are the appellants, had not been admitted to interpose in the ejectment suit an equitable defense to the same, which they state with particularity in the bill in this suit, and which they seek to avail themselves of herein. One of the prayers of the bill is for a perpetual injunction restraining the defendant from enforcing or attempting to enforce against the land the judgment in ejectment. The answer admits the recovery of the judgment in the same court.

This is sufficient to give the circuit court jurisdiction of the case, without any averment of the citizenship of the parties; and not only is the present suit in equity merely an incident of and ancillary to the ejectment suit, but no other court than the one which rendered the judgment in the ejectment suit could interfere with it or stay process in it, on the grounds set forth in the bill. Milwaukee & M. R. R. Co. v. Soutter, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 609, 688 [17: 886, 895]; Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276 [28: 145]; Pacific R. R. Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 111 U. S. 505 [25: 498].

The decree made by this court on the 16th of April last is therefore vacated, and the case will stand for hearing on the merits at the next term of this court, in its order on the docket.

JULIA A. NUTT, EXTX. of HALLER NUTT, Deceased, Appt.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 650–655.)

Claim of Julia A. Nutt—report upon—appropriation.

1. The report of the Quartermaster-General to Congress of Dec. 22, 1882, made under the Act of Aug. 7, 1882, for the relief of Julia A. Nutt, was for the information of Congress, and is not an award in pursuance of an arbitration.

2. Such report is not an account stated; in order to constitute an account stated, the statement of the account must be adopted by one party and submitted as correct to the other.

3. The appropriation made by Congress in the Act of July 5, 1884, of part of the amount recommended by the Quartermaster-General to be paid to her, is not an adoption of his report by Congress, and is not a recognition that a larger amount was due.

[No. 1380.]

Submitted April 2, 1888. Decided April 16, 1888.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims, dismissing petition of appellant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. F. Morris, for appellant:

The reference of the claim by Congress constituted a submission to arbitration, and the Quartermaster-General's finding was an award upon which suit can be maintained.

Gordon v. U. S. 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 188 (19: 35); Chorpenning v. U. S. 94 U. S. 397 (24: 126).

But whether there was here a technical arbitration or not it is certain that, in the language of the court in the case of the U. S. v. Kaufman, 96 U. S. 567 (24: 792), the allowance of a claim under this statute is equivalent to an account stated between private parties, which is good until impeached for fraud or mistake.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and Heber J. May, Asst. Atty-Gen., for appellee:

The report of the Quartermaster-General was not an award.

Hayburn's Case, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 409 (1: 436); U. S. v. Ferreira, 54 U. S. 13 How. 50, 51 (14: 46); Bruce v. U. S. 1 Ct. Cl. 343; Gordon v. U. S. 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 188 (19: 35); S. C. 7 Ct. Cl. 46; Gilbert v. U. S. 1 Ct. Cl. 108; Lavalette v. U. S. Id. 147; Carmick v. U. S. 2 Ct. Cl. 126; Chorpenning v. U. S. 3 Ct. Cl. 140; S. C. 11 Ct. Cl. 625, 12 Ct. Cl. 110, 94 U. S. 397 (24: 126); Ludington v. U. S. 15 Ct. Cl. 453; Huffman v. U. S. 17 Ct. Cl. 55; Kaufman v. U. S. 11 Ct. Cl. 659; Dodd v. U. S. 21 Ct. Cl. 117.

The claim cannot be treated as an account stated.

Whitwell v. Willard, 1 Met. 216; McWilliams v. Allan, 45 Mo. 573.

A stated account properly exists only where accounts have been examined and the balance admitted as the true amount between the parties, without having been paid.

Reinhardt v. Hines, 51 Miss. 344; McCall v. Nave, 52 Miss. 494; Stebbins v. Niles, 25 Miss. 267; Zacarino v. Pallotti, 49 Conn. 36.

Mrs. Nutt has brought her claim within the purview of the Act and cannot accept the part of it which benefits her, and reject the part which is adverse to her interests.

U. S. v. Adams, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 463 (19: 249); U. S. v. Child, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 232 (20: 360); U. S. v. Justice, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 535 (20: 753); Baird v. U. S. 96 U. S. 430 (24: 703).

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

An Act of Congress, approved August 7, 1882, for the relief of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, 22 Stat. 784, declared: "That the Quartermaster-General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to examine and adjust the claims of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, late of Natchez, in the State of Mississippi, growing out of the occupation and use by the United States Army, during the late rebellion, of the property of the said Haller Nutt during his lifetime, or of his estate after his decease, including live stock, goods, and moneys taken and used by the United States or the armies thereof; and he may consider the evidence heretofore taken on said claim, so far as applicable, before the commissioners of claims, and such other legal evidence as may be adduced before him in behalf of the legal representatives of Haller Nutt, de-ing ships. During the time he was attached to the vessel the claimant was required to have his quarters on board, and was obliged to wear his uniform, to mess there, and was not permitted by the rules of the service to live with his family. The Wabash, during the time of the claimant's service thereon, was not in what was technically known as a commission for sea service. Duty on board a receiving ship since 1843 has not been regarded as sea service by the Navy Department. An order of the department issued that year declared that "the receiving ships at the several stations are not to be considered vessels in commission for sea service, except, as may sometimes be the case, while going from one port to another."

In the case of U. S. v. Symonds, 120 U. S. 46, 50 [30: 557, 558] it was decided: "That the sea pay given in paragraph 1556 may be earned by services performed under the orders of the Navy Department in a vessel employed, with authority of law, in active service in bays, inlets, roadsteads, or other arms of the sea, under the general restrictions, regulations and requirements that are incident or peculiar to service on the high sea. It is of no consequence in this case that The New Hampshire was not, during the period in question, in such condition that she could be safely taken out to sea beyond the main land. She was a training ship, anchored in Narragansett Bay during the whole time covered by the claim of appellee, and was subject to such regulations as would have been enforced had she been put in order and used for purposes of cruising, or as a practice ship at sea. Within the meaning of the law, Symonds, when performing his duties as executive officer of The New Hampshire, was at sea."

We are unable to find any ground of distinction between the present case and that of Symonds. It results that the claimant was entitled by law to pay for sea service.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is accordingly affirmed.

UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
ASHER C. BAKER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 646-650.)

Student in Naval Academy, when an officer—midshipman—when officer of navy.

1. A student at the Naval Academy appointed a midshipman in the navy was, while he was a midshipman, serving as an officer or enlisted man in the navy, within the meaning of the Act of 1888, chapter 97, 22 Stat. at L. 473.

2. One who was, on Sept. 30, 1867, appointed a midshipman in the navy, continued to be after the passage of the Act of 1870, chapter 295, 16 Stat. at L. 330, 334, as he was prior to its passage, an officer of the navy, on the active list, and serving as such an officer, by virtue of his having been appointed midshipman and continuing to be a student in the Naval Academy, although he might be properly styled, after the passage of the Act of 1870, a cadet midshipman.

3. No legislation which took place after the 14th of July, 1872, can affect the question, arising under the Act of 1888, as to the service of such officer in the navy prior to the 14th of July, 1872.

[No. 1394.]

Submitted April 2, 1888. Decided April 16, 1888.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims, in favor of claimant for the difference of pay provided by the Act of March 3, 1883. Affirmed.

The facts are stated by the court.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., Robert A. Howard, Asst. Atty-Gen., and F. P. Dewees, Asst. Atty., for appellant.

Messrs. John Paul Jones, and Robert B. Lines, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal by the United States from a judgment of the court of claims, awarding to the claimant $886.71, on the following facts:

On the 30th of September, 1867, the claimant was appointed a midshipman in the navy, by a form of appointment which stated that he was "appointed to the grade of midshipman in the United States Navy." By section 12 of the Act of July 15, 1870, chapter 295, 16 Stat. at L. 334, it was provided that "The students in the Naval Academy shall hereafter be styled cadet midshipmen;" and that "When cadet midshipmen shall have passed successfully the graduating examination at said academy, they shall receive appointments as midshipmen, ranking according to merit, and may be promoted to the grade of ensign as vacancies in the number allowed by law in that grade may occur." After the passage of that Act, the form of appointment was changed by striking out the words "appointed to the grade of midshipman," and inserting the words "appointed a cadet midshipman;" but no appointment in the amended form was issued to the claimant. After completing his academic course at Annapolis the claimant was, on the 14th of July, 1872, promoted to the grade of ensign; on the 6th of December, 1876, to that of master; and on the 10th of January, 1884, to that of lieutenant, in which grade he was serving when his petition was filed.

By the Act of March 3, 1883, chapter 97, 22 Stat. at L. 473, it was provided as follows: "And all officers of the navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers or enlisted men in the regular or volunteer army or navy, or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous and in the regular navy in the lowest grade having graduated pay held by such officer since last entering the service." The claimant alleged in his petition that the lowest grade having graduated pay held by him since last entering the service was, under the Act of July 15, 1870, chapter 295, 16 Stat. at L. 330, § 3, now section 1556 of the Revised Statutes, that of ensign, and that he was, under the Act of 1883, entitled to have credit given to him upon his grade of ensign for all of his service prior to the date of his commission as ensign, namely, 4 years, 9 months, and 14 days, from September 30, 1867, to July 14, 1872, which included all of the time of his service as midshipman. The question is as to whether he is entitled to the difference of pay resulting from such credit. The court of claims decided in his favor, awarding to him for that pay the sum of $886.71.

The single question involved is whether the claimant, while he was a midshipman, was serving as an officer or enlisted man in the navy, within the meaning of the Act of 1883. The contention on the part of the United States is that the claimant, whilst a student at the Naval Academy, did not, in the sense of the Act of 1883, serve either as an officer or an enlisted man; and that, in that view, it is immaterial whether, as a student, he is or is not to be regarded as an officer of the navy. It is denied by the United States that the entry of a pupil into the academy is his entry into the naval service, and that the period of his pupilage is actual service, within the meaning of the Act of 1883; and it is argued that he does not enter into actual service until he is appointed either in the line of the navy, the marine corps, or the engineer corps; that, as a student, he does not serve, but is preparing to serve; that he does not render service to the Government, but is receiving favors from it; that he can only commence service after his graduation, such service depending upon his graduating merit; and that the compensation of $500 a year given to him is not a payment for service rendered, but is a gratuity and an allowance made to him for his support in his preparation for service to be rendered.

When the claimant was appointed a midshipman in the navy, on the 30th of September, 1867, the Act of July 16, 1862, chapter 183, 12 Stat. at L. 583, was in force. The first section of that Act divides the active list of line officers of the navy into nine grades, the first of which is "rear-admirals," the eighth of which is "ensigns," and the ninth of which is "midshipmen." The 11th section of that Act provides that the students at the Naval Academy shall be styled midshipmen, until their final graduating examination, when, if successful, they shall be commissioned ensigns, ranking according to merit. Thus, section 1 of that Act creates the grade of midshipman as one of the nine grades of the active list of line officers of the navy, and section 11 declares that the students at the Naval Academy shall shall be styled midshipmen. If these statutory provisions were not varied as respects the claimant prior to July 14, 1872, when he was promoted to the grade of ensign, he was all the time an officer in the line of the navy, and serving as such officer.

Section 12 of the Act of July 15, 1870, chapter 295, 16 Stat. at L. 334, provides that the "students in the Naval Academy shall hereafter be styled cadet midshipmen," and that, when they "shall have passed successfully the graduating examination at said academy, they shall receive appointments as midshipmen, ranking according to merit, and may be promoted to the grade of ensign as vacancies in the number allowed by law in that grade may occur." The provisions of that section do not seem to have been applied to the case of the claimant. He did not thereafter receive an appointment as cadet midshipman, nor does he appear to have received an appointment as midshipman after he passed successfully the graduating examination at the academy; but he was promoted to the grade of ensign after he had completed his academic course at Annapolis.

It is very questionable whether the 12th section of the Act of 1870 applies to persons who had been theretofore appointed midshipmen. It would rather seem to be limited in its provisions to persons thereafter to be appointed to the distinct grade of cadet midshipmen, and therefore not to include the case of the claimant. But even if section 12 of the Act of 1870 applies so far to those who were then students in the Naval Academy, that they were, thereafter to be styled cadet midshipmen, yet they were still to discharge the same duties as before, and be subject to the same naval discipline and control as before, and to receive the same pay as before. We see nothing in the Act of 1870 to exclude the claimant from the position which he occupied prior to the passage of that Act, as a member of a grade in the active list of line officers of the navy, so far as respected his service at the Naval Academy after the date of the passage of that Act whether he was thereafter to be styled a cadet midshipman or to continue to be styled a midshipman.

No legislation which took place after the 14th of July, 1872, can affect the question arising under the Act of 1883, as to his service as an officer in the navy prior to the 14th of July, 1872. Section 15 of the Act of 1862 provided that the "annual pay of the several ranks and grades of officers of the navy on the active list," thereinafter named, comprehending the nine grades mentioned in the first section of the same Act, should be as thereinafter specified in the 15th section, and the last provision was this: "Midshipmen shall receive five hundred dollars."

It is impossible not to conclude that the claimant continued to be, after the passage of the Act of 1870, as he was prior to its passage, an officer of the navy, on the active list, and serving as such an officer, by virtue of his having been appointed a midshipman and continuing to be a student in the Naval Academy, even though he might have been properly styled, after the passage of the Act of 1870, a cadet midshipman.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is affirmed.

UNION TRUST COMPANY OF NEW YORK ET AL., Appts.,
v.
WILLIAM R. MORRISON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 591–613.)

Surety, when entitled to protection—sale of railroad on foreclosure.

1. A surety of a railroad company on an injunction bond, given to protect the rolling stock and property of such company from execution and sale, is entitled to protection and indemnity from a receiver of the property on mortgage foreclosure; and, if he has paid the judgment against him on the bond, is entitled to be reimbursed the amount paid by him, out of the property and assets of the company, prior to a mortgage given by the railroad upon such property.

2. Where the bondholders purchased the railroad on foreclosure sale, subject to the lien of all claims against it then before the court by intervening petition which should be decreed to be paid, upon final adjudication, as paramount liens, the purchasers were bound to take notice of the surety's claim for indemnity which had been presented to the court by petition; and no further notice to them was necessary, and the property, in their hands, is subject to such claim.

[No. 64.]
Argued Nov. 10, 1887. Decided April 2, 1888.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois, that the appellee had an equitable lien, for the payment of his claim, against the railroad property sold under a decree of foreclosure, and transferred to the St. Louis and Cairo Railroad Company. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. Corning Judd, Wm. Ritchie, Edward B. Esher and Edward S. Judd, for appellants:

The right of subrogation does not arise in favor of a surety until he has actually paid the debt for which he is liable as surety.

Sheld. Subrogation, §§ 105, 127; Conwell v. McCowan, 53 Ill. 363; Darst v. Bates, 51 Ill. 439; Dering v. Winchelsea, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. ed. 1876, 152; Pennsylvania Bank v. Potius, 10 Watts, 152; Kyle v. Bostick, 10 Ala. 592; Snyder v. Blair, 33 N. J. 211.

The surety is entitled to recover the amount paid, not the amount extinguished by that payment.

Bonney v. Seeley, 2 Wend. 488; Reed v. Norris, 2 Myl. & C. 374, 375; Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Dow, 120 U. S. 301, 302 (30: 601).

Morrison has, in fact, simply incurred a fresh obligation to pay. This is not sufficient.

Maxwell v. Jameson, 2 Barn. & Ald. 51; Taylor v. Higgins, 3 East, 169; Romine v. Romine, 59 Ind. 351, 352; Ex parte Sergeant, 1 Glyn & J. 183; S. C. affirmed, 2 Glyn & J. 23; Eden, Bankr. 158, 159; Taylor v. Mills, Cowp. 526, 527.

The bank is a volunteer, and not entitled to subrogation.

Freem. Judg. § 468; Shinn v. Budd, 14 N. J. Eq. 286; Bank of U. S. v. Winston, 2 Brock. 254; Dering v. Winchelsea, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. ed. 1876, 151; Cumming v. Hackley, 8 Johns. 206.

The surety stands in such a relation to his principal that he cannot be permitted to speculate upon him.

Wynn v. Brooke, 5 Rawle, 106, 110.

It is the surety's duty to make the best terms he can for his principal.

Reed v. Norris, 2 Myl. & C. 375.

The purchasers at the foreclosure sale took the property free from all equities which were subordinate to those of the mortgage creditors.

2 Jones, Mort, §§ 1653, 1654.

This is true of railroad as of other mortgages.

Morgan County v. Thomas, 76 Ill. 147; Sullivan v. Portland & K. R. R. Co. 94 U. S. 806 (24: 324); Menasha v. Milwaukee & N. R. R. Co. 52 Wis. 420; Wright v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 25 Wis. 46.

The purchaser takes free from taxes.

Cooper v. Corbin, 105 Ill. 224.

The surety can acquire no greater right than the creditor.

Houston v. Huntsville Branch Bank, 25 Ala. 257; Colvin v. Owens, 22 Ala. 794; Dozier v. Lewis, 27 Miss. 683.

The surety's remedy cannot be greater than, or different from, that of the creditor.

Winslow v. Otis, 5 Gray, 363; Tubbs v. Williams, 9 Ired. L. 1; Pierson v. Catlin, 18 Vt. 86; Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Winn, 4 Md. Ch. 264.

Holbrook's rights under his judgment are subordinate to the mortgage.

Pennock v. Coe, 64 U. S. 23 How. 117 (16: 436); Dunham v. Cincinnati, P. & C. R. Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 254 (17: 584); Scott v. Clinton & S. R. R. Co. 6 Biss. 534; Central Trust Co. v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 897; Hammock v. Farmers L. & T. Co. 105 U. S. 91 (26: 1116); Foedick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 255 (25: 343); Douglass v. Cline, 12 Bush, 631, 632.

The chancellor will always observe great caution in establishing such a preference as appellee here claims.

Miltenberger v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 106 U. S. 311 (27: 126); Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 117 U. S. 458, 479 (29: 971, 978); Meyer v. Johnston, 53 Ala. 349; Blair v. St. Louis, H. & K. R. Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 475.

There is no allegation or proof as to the nature of the claim upon which Holbrook's original judgment was rendered.

Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 117 U. S. 478, 479 (29: 978).

Holbrook might have made his claim out of the income of the road while the mortgagor remained in possession.

Gilman v. Illinois & M. Tel. Co. 91 U. S. 603 (23: 405); Mississippi Valley & W. R. Co. v. U. S. Express Co. 81 Ill. 537.

Appellee cannot, as against the mortgagee or his grantee, assert any superior equity.

Sheld. Subrogation, § 132; Mitchell v. De Witt, 25 Tex. (Suppl.) 180; Burns v. Huntingdon Bank, 1 Penr. & W. 395; Pott v. Nathans, 1 Watts & S. 155; Armstrong's Appeal, 5 Watts & S. 352; Knouf's Appeal, 91 Pa. 82.

The surety cannot, by subrogation, obtain a preference over creditors of the principal whose lien attached before the surety became bound.

Brandt, Suretyship, § 268; Farmers & D. Bank v. Sherley, 12 Bush, 304; Fishback v. Bodman, 14 Bush, 117; Johnson v. Morrison, 5 B. Mon. 106; Glass v. Pullen, 6 Bush, 350, 351.

In fact, appellee is a volunteer.

Bank of U. S. v. Winston, 2 Brock, 254; Neptune Ins. Co. v. Dorsey, 3 Md. Ch. 340; Swann v. Patterson, 7 Md. 170; Gadsden v. Brown, 1 Speer, Eq. 42; Shinn v. Budd, 14 N. J. Eq. 237; Armstrong's Appeal, 5 Watts & S. 356; Patterson v. Pope, 5 Dana, 243.

As toward other creditors, Morrison must be deemed to have trusted to his principal, and not to the property.

Johnson v. Morrison, 5 B. Mon. 107; Wiggin v. Dorr, 3 Sumn. 419, 420; Hopkinsville Bank v. Rudy, 2 Bush, 329; Burns v. Huntingdon Bank, 1 Penr. & W. 398, Gibson, C. J.; Parsons v. Briddock, 2 Vern. 608; Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. Jr. 22; Smith v. Anderson, 18 Md. 520; McCormick v. Irwin, 35 Pa. 111.

By executing the injunction bond Morrison destroyed the effect of the Holbrook judgment as a lien on the personalty, and released the latter.

Launtz v. Gross, 16 Bradw. 331.

Consequently Morrison could claim no lien on the personalty.

Carroll v. The T. P. Leathers, Newb. Adm. 432; Roberts v. The Huntsville, 3 Woods, 387; The Madgie, 31 Fed. Rep. 926; Gue v. Tide Water Canal Co. 65 U. S. 24 How. 257 (16: 635); Hammock v. Farmers L. & T. Co. 105 U. S. 91 (26: 1116); Jones, R. R. Securities, §§ 157, 158.

This court has never applied the rule of preference to a claim of the nature of this.

Galveston, H. & H. R. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 459 (20: 199); Dunham v. Cincinnati, P. & C. R. Co., 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 254 (17: 584); Porter v. Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co. 120 U. S. 671 (30: 833); S. C. 122 U. S. 283 (30: 1211); Huidekoper v. Hinckley Locomotive Works, 99 U. S. 258 (25: 344); Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 117 U. S. 434 (29: 963); Penn v. Calhoun, 121 U. S. 251 (30: 915).

What is to be deemed a current debt?

Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 780, 781 (28: 598).

A judgment against the mortgagor subsequent to the mortgage, but prior to the receivership, must be held subject to the mortgage.

Central Trust Co. v. East Tennessee V. & G. R. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 897; Hiles v. Case, 9 Biss. 549; Hammock v. Farmers L. & T. Co. 105 U. S. 91 (26: 1116); Duncan v. Mobile & O. R. R. Co. 2 Woods, 542; Newport & C. Bridge Co. v. Douglass, 12 Bush, 675.

Not only is this claim not of the nature of a current debt but it comes within no reasonable limit as to time.

Scott v. Clinton & S. R. R. Co. 6 Biss. 535; Turner v. Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. 8 Biss. 318; Blair v. St. Louis, H. & K. R. Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 474.

Appellee's claim was barred by the excludatory orders entered previous to the foreclosure sale.

Koontz v. Northern Bank, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 196 (21: 465); 2 Jones, Mort. § 1647; Miller v. Sherry, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 250 (17: 880); Hamlin v. McCahill, Clarke, Ch. 249; Cockrill v. Maney, 2 Tenn. Ch. 49; Brightman v. Brightman, 1 R. I. 112; Sapp v. Wightman, 108 Ill. 158.

To fix a purchaser, pending suit, with notice of equities arising out of the suit, the pleadings, etc., must be clear, explicit and direct as to the nature of the claim.

Brightman v. Brightman, supra; Shaloross v. Dixon, 7 L. J. N. S. Ch. 180.

Until the surety pays the debt of his principal, he has no demand upon him.

Kyle v. Bostick, 10 Ala. 592.

Appellee should not have been permitted to file his supplemental petition of June 5, 1882.

Finch v. Anthony, 10 Allen, 477; Vaughan v. Vaughan, 30 Ala. 330; Hill v. Hill, 10 Ala. 527; Godfrey v. Tucker, 33 Beav. 280; Milner v. Milner, 2 Edw. Ch. 114; Miller v. Sherry, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 237 (17: 827); Griffith v. Griffith, 1 Hoffm. Ch. 161; S. C. 9 Paige, 316; Bennett, Lis Pendens, §§ 32, 95, 188; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 402, 403; Story, Eq. Pl. § 904; Schulze v. Fox, 53 Md. 42; Freem. Judg. § 199.

Messrs. Gustav Koerner and Charles W. Thomas, for appellee:

The Chattel Mortgage Act of Illinois had no reference to railroad property.

Hammock v. Farmers L. & T. Co. 105 U. S. 77 (26:1111); Peoria & S. R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 103 Ill. 187.

Property subject to liens, claims and debts of various characters and ranks which is brought within the cognizance of a court of equity for administration, and conversion into money and distribution, is a trust fund.

Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland Co. 117 U. S. 455 (29: 970).

The property of a corporation is to be treated in equity as a trust fund primarily for the payment of its debts.

Farmers L. & T. Co. v. Missouri I. & N. R. Co. 21 Fed. Rep. 264.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This case grows out of the foreclosure of a mortgage given by the Cairo and St. Louis Railroad Company on the 2d day of October, 1871, to the Union Trust Company, to secure the payment of two thousand five hundred bonds of $1,000 each, with interest semi-annually. Morrison, the appellee, intervened in the proceedings, by petition, claiming a lien on the property mortgaged, by reason of having become liable as surety on an injunction bond given to obtain an injunction to prevent an execution sale of a portion thereof. The court below by a decree dated May 4, 1884, allowed his claim, amounting to the sum of $15,352.19, with interest from May 20, 1882. The purchasers at the foreclosure sale (who purchased on behalf of the bondholders), having transferred the property to the St. Louis and Cairo Railroad Company (organized for that purpose), said company was allowed to become a party to the proceedings for the purpose of appealing from the decree; and did appeal from the same in connection with the Union Trust Company. The case is now before us on that appeal.

The facts necessary to be understood in the determination of the case are as follows:

The Cairo and St. Louis Railroad Company was a corporation of Illinois owning and operating a railroad in that State, extending from Cairo to a point opposite St. Louis. The mortgage referred to purported to convey and embrace all the property and assets of the company, real, personal and mixed, then held and owned, or thereafter to be acquired, and the tolls, incomes, rents, issues and profits thereof; and it contained provisions authorizing the mortgage trustee (the Union Trust Company) to take possession of said property and assets in case of default, for a certain period of time, in the payment of interest, or of the installments of a sinking fund provided for; and gave said trustee power, on such default, to declare the principal due. The railroad company made default in the payment of interest in October, 1873, and at every subsequent period of payment, and never paid any installments of the sinking fund.

Meantime, the company was harassed by suits, and, amongst others, one Henry Holbrook, on the 26th of November, 1872, recovered a judgment against it in the Circuit Court of St. Clair County, Illinois, for the sum of $9,500, besides costs. Execution was issued, but not levied. But in October, 1874, an alias execution was issued, and the Sheriff of St.

Clair County threatened to levy upon the rolling stock of the company, a great part of which was in that county, opposite St. Louis. The company, believing the judgment to have been fraudulently and wrongfully obtained, filed a bill in equity in the St. Clair Circuit Court to enjoin Holbrook from proceeding to its collection. An injunction was granted accordingly on the 30th of December, 1874; but only upon the condition that the company should give an injunction bond, with sureties, for the payment of judgment and costs, if the injunction should be dissolved. Morrison, at the request of the company, executed such bond as surety. In February, 1877, the bill for injunction was dismissed, and in June, 1879, the decree of dismissal was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Illinois, and the injunction was definitively dissolved. Thereupon Holbrook sued Morrison on the injunction bond, and on the 30th of September, 1880, recovered judgment against him for the sum of $18,965.

Prior to this time, in November, 1877, the Trust Company declared the principal of the bonds due, and filed a bill in the court below to have a receiver appointed and the mortgage foreclosed. Henry W. Smithers was appointed receiver, with power to operate the road and equip it and keep it in repair, and to pay all amounts due and owing by the railroad company for labor or supplies that might have accrued in the operation and maintenance of the railroad property within six months immediately preceding. The receiver, on taking possession of the property, found a number of suits against the company pending on appeal, and claims for protection on the part of those who had become sureties on the appeal bonds; and on the 29th of December, 1877, he presented a petition to the court, asking its advice and instruction in regard to said bonds, and whether he should protect the sureties in the event of adverse decisions in any of the cases. He stated the fact that such appeal bonds were given by some of the officers of said railroad company, with others as sureties, in order to protect the rolling stock or other personal property of said railroad company from levy or sale under execution pending the determination of the appeals; in each of which cases execution on the judgment or decree was either levied on personal property of said railroad company or the levy thereof threatened at the time of taking the appeal and giving the bond. He mentioned the Holbrook Case [72 Ill. 419] in particular, which was then pending before the Supreme Court of Illinois on appeal, and called attention to the injunction bond given in that case; and he expressed his concurrence in the statement of the sureties generally, that they had become such on the assurance of being protected, and that their action had been to the benefit of all parties interested in the property of the company, since, in default of payment, it would have been sacrificed to meet the demands. The court, on consideration, made a decree authorizing the receiver, in his discretion, to prosecute or defend the appeals and cases, according as the interests of the receivership should in his judgment be best promoted; and to protect such sureties as in his judgment ought to be protected in equity and good conscience by reason of the protection afforded to the property and assets of the company by means of the giving of such bonds. And, for the purpose of this decree, the receiver was authorized to use and pay out any moneys coming into his hands as such receiver, over and above expenses for operation and repairs. The receiver, for alleged lack of funds coming into his hands, failed to protect any sureties except two, one Rosborough and one Pellet.

On the 16th of May, 1881, a decree was made in the foreclosure suit, ascertaining the amount due on the bonds and coupons to be $4,801,157.53, and directing a sale of the mortgaged premises to satisfy the same. The decree required all persons having claims or liens against the railroad and property, or against the proceeds of the sale thereof, to file intervening petitions on or before the first day of July, 1881.

In accordance with this order, Morrison, on the 30th day of June, 1881, filed his intervening petition, setting up the facts respecting his becoming surety on the injunction bond, the preservation of the rolling stock by means thereof, the proceedings in the case, and the proceedings against himself on the bond, resulting in the judgment rendered against him on September 30, 1880. He also set out the copy of a mortgage on four locomotive engines given to him by the railroad company in June, 1875, by way of indemnity against his liability on the injunction bond; which mortgage was duly recorded in the clerk's office for St. Clair County, but was never enforced by him; he stating the fact to be, that the said company and the receiver had used the said locomotive engines continuously since the execution of the said mortgage, and the same were then in the possession of the receiver, and were to be sold at the sale of the property under the said decree of foreclosure. He further set out a copy of the petition presented to the court by the receiver, asking for instructions as before stated, and bringing to the notice of the court the Holbrook judgment and appeal and the injunction bond given in that case. He further stated that the receiver, since his appointment, had not been able, out of the earnings of the railroad, to pay the judgment of Holbrook, and thus protect the sureties on the injunction bond. His petition closed with a prayer for a decree that he should be fully protected from all the consequences of signing the said bond, and from the judgment recovered against him and for further relief.

On the 5th of July, 1881, an order was made declaring that no claim presented or filed after the first of July, 1881, should be received or filed; and that all claims not so filed on or before that date should be forever barred from any benefit under the decree, or from the property, or the proceeds of its sale.

On the 14th of July, 1881, the railroad and other property covered by the mortgage were duly sold in accordance with the decree of May 16; and Josiah A. Horsey and Charles J. Canda, on behalf of the bondholders, became the purchasers for the sum of $4,000,000; which sale was, on the same day, ratified by the court, and an order was made referring to a special master, Frank H. Jones, all the intervening claims and petitions filed in the cause, to take proof and report his conclusions of fact and law thereon for the consideration of the court; and to give notice to the parties of the time and place of taking testimony.

On the first of August, 1881, an order was made referring it to a master to examine and report the amount of receiver's certificates remaining unpaid, and of all claims against the receivership, or railroad assets in the receiver's possession, as shown by intervening petitions or claims filed in the cause before July 1, for labor, supplies or other claims; and whether there was sufficient showing in the several cases to warrant funds to be paid into court to cover the same; also the probable amount of costs and fees. The object of this order was to ascertain how much money the purchasers should be required to pay into court, and how much of their bid might be paid in bonds.

On the 19th of August, 1881, the Union Trust Company and the receiver filed a joint answer to Morrison's petition of intervention, in which all its material statements were admitted; but whilst admitting that the sheriff of St. Clair County did threaten to levy on the railroad company's locomotives and rolling stock they denied that, as against the bondholders and the Union Trust Company mortgage, the execution was a lien on said locomotives and stock paramount to that of the mortgage; they also denied that the chattel mortgage alleged to have been given by the railroad company upon certain locomotives for the purpose of securing the sureties on the injunction bond, could have any effect or create any lien on said property paramount to that of the Union Trust Company mortgage. The respondents admitted that the railroad company and the receiver had continually used the engines and property owned by the company in 1875; but whether they were the same which were included in the alleged chattel mortgage, they could not say. They admitted that the receiver had not paid, and had not been able out of the earnings of the road to pay, the judgment of Holbrook, and submitted to the court, that if he had been able, he would not have had any right or authority to pay the same. They further alleged upon information and belief that the judgment remained wholly unpaid, that neither Morrison nor the railroad company had paid it; and they submitted to the court that there was no liability on the part of the receivership or of the property for the payment of the judgment.

On the 22d of December, 1881, an order was made by the court, by which, after reciting that Horsey and Canda had paid to the commissioner the full amount of their bid for the railroad property and assets, namely, in cash, $100,000, and the residue in first mortgage bonds of the railroad company, it was ordered and decreed that the commissioner should execute a deed of conveyance of the said property and assets to the said Horsey and Canda, to be held subject to all taxes legally due, to the lien of all unpaid receiver's certificates; "and also subject to the lien of any and all claims against the said railroad property and assets which are now before this court by intervening petitions, and which shall be, upon final determination and adjudication, decreed to be paid as liens paramount to the indebtedness secured by said mortgage or deed of trust."

On the 19th of January, 1882, the receiver was also directed to make a conveyance to the purchasers, in order to cover certain real estate, rolling stock and other property which had been acquired by him during his receivership; and to deliver the possession of all such real estate and other property to the purchasers or their grantees, when the commissioner's deed should be presented to him and demand should be made. The receiver made such conveyance on the 30th of January, 1882; and on the 31st, Horsey and Canda conveyed all the property to the St. Louis and Cairo Railroad Company, the appellants; and on the following day, February 1, 1882, the receiver delivered the railroad and all its appurtenances to said company.

As the Union Trust Company and the receiver, in their answer to Morrison's intervening petition, raised the objection that he had not paid the Holbrook judgment (though, of course, he was bound to pay it), he filed a supplemental petition on the 5th of June, 1882, stating that he had paid the judgment on the 29th of May previous, amounting on that day, for principal and interest, to the sum of $15,352.19, and repeated his original application for relief. To this supplemental petition the Union Trust Company and the receiver filed an answer by which they denied that Morrison had paid the judgment; recited the previous orders requiring claims to be filed by the first of July, 1881, and barring those not so filed; the sale of the property, the conveyance thereof to Horsey and Canda, and by them and the receiver to the new company, and the delivery of the railroad property to said company; and averred that there were no proceeds of the sale in the hands of the receiver out of which payment could be made to Morrison upon his claim.

On the 19th of December, 1883, the special master, Frank H. Jones, to whom, at the time of the sale of the railroad, had been referred intervening claims and petitions filed in the cause, made a report, in which he set forth in detail all the facts and circumstances in relation to the intervening petition and claim of Morrison, as they have been already stated, and the evidence taken by him thereon. The only point contested by the respondents was the fact of payment by Morrison, and its effect under the previous orders of the court. The evidence reported by the master, however, showed that Morrison did actually pay the judgment at the time stated in his supplemental petition, and the master so found. The exception taken on this point by the respondents, based on the fact that Morrison, in order to make the payment, raised the money on his note, and that it did not appear that he had paid his note, is too trivial for serious consideration. The conclusion reached by the master was that the claim was barred because Morrison had not actually paid Holbrook's judgment when he filed his original petition, and did not pay it until after the time had expired for claims to be presented, namely, July 1, 1881.

Morrison excepted to the report; and on the 5th of May, 1884, the court sustained the exception, and allowed the claim, and decreed that Morrison had an equitable lien for the payment thereof against the property sold under the decree of foreclosure, and transferred to the St. Louis and Cairo Railroad Company, with leave to apply to the court for further re-ceased, or in behalf of the United States, and shall report the facts to Congress to be considered with other claims reported by the Quartermaster-General: Provided, That no part of said claims, upon which said commissioners of claims have passed on the merits, shall be considered by the Quartermaster-General.

On December 22, 1882, the Quartermaster-General, acting under and pursuant to this Act, reported to Congress, through the Secretary of War, that he had examined the claims of Mrs. Julia A. Nutt, as widow and executrix, and the nature and manner of his investigation, and the circumstances and evidence relating to the same. He further reported as follows: "All the evidence considered, as well as the additional information I have been able to gather, warrants me in recommending that Julia A. Nutt be paid the following items, which, in my judgment, are sufficiently proved by the evidence, viz.:" He then states various items of property, with their value, the total amounting to $256,884.05. This report was transmitted direct by the Secretary of War to Congress, but was not transmitted to or acted upon by the accounting officers of the Treasury. On July 5, 1884, Congress passed an Act (23 Stat. at L. 552) "for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, and for other purposes." This statute enacts: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several persons in this Act named, the several sums mentioned herein, the same being in full for, and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final discharge of the several claims examined and allowed by the proper accounting officers under the provisions of the Act of July 4, 1864, since January 6, 1883, namely:" Then follows a list of the names of the persons, with the amount payable to each, under the head of the several States of Tennessee, Kentucky, West Virginia, Indiana, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Maryland, Missouri, District of Columbia, Colorado, Illinois, Indian Territory, Iowa, Kansas, and, finally, under the head of Mississippi, as follows: "To Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, of Adams County, the sum of $35,556.17." This amount was paid to and accepted by the claimant. The payment and receipt of this sum under the Act of July 5, 1884, however, it is contended, does not operate as a full and final discharge of her claim against the Government, because it is not within the description contained in the Act of "Claims examined and allowed by the proper accounting officers under the provisions of the Act of July 4, 1864." The right to recover the full amount of the claim, after deducting this payment, is rested by counsel for the claimant upon the Act of August 7, 1882, and is based upon the following propositions:

1. The reference of the claim by Congress, with the consent of the claimant, to the Quartermaster-General constituted, under the special provisions of the act of reference, a submission to arbitration, and the Quartermaster-General's conclusion or finding was an award pursuant to arbitration upon which suit can be maintained.

2. If the reference to the Quartermaster-General, and the finding by him, do not constitute an arbitration and award, they are at least the equivalent of an account stated between private individuals.

3. Even if of itself the finding of the Quartermaster-General did not constitute an account stated, it became such by its acceptance by Congress and the appellant.

There is nothing, however, in the language of the Act of August 2, 1882, to justify the inference that the finding reported by the Quartermaster-General is an award in pursuance of an arbitration. On the contrary, the terms of the Act distinctly negative that idea. There is no recital of a mutual submission by the parties of any controversy to an arbitrator. The Quartermaster-General was authorized and directed by Congress to examine and adjust the claims in question, but not for the purpose of settling and adjudging any controversy in relation thereto between the United States and the claimant. He was required to report the facts to Congress, not to publish an award to the parties; and the object for which his report was required was that the claim should be "considered with other claims reported by the Quartermaster-General." This report evidently is purely for the information of Congress itself, in order that it, being thus advised, might thereafter deal with the claim as in its judgment should seem best.

On this point the language of this court in Gordon v. U. S. 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 188, 195 [19:85,87] is applicable. It was there said: "The various Acts and resolutions of Congress in this case emanated from a desire to do justice and to obtain the proper information as a basis of action, and were not intended to be submissions to the arbitrament of the accounting officer. They were designed as instructions to the officer by which to adjust the accounts, Congress reserving to itself the power to approve, reject, or rescind, or to otherwise act in the premises as the exigencies of the case might require. In other words, these references only require the officer to act in a ministerial, not a judicial, capacity."

To the same effect is the case of Chorpenning v. U. S. 94 U. S. 397, 398 [24:126, 127]. It was there said: "The resolution relied upon by the appellant was wholly unilateral. It contained no stipulation of payment, express or implied. Congress, for its own reasons, simply directed an examination and adjustment. It gave no promise, and came under no obligation to the other party, and asked and received none from him. The Government and the claimant stood, and continued to stand, wholly independent of each other. The Government could at any time before payment recall what it had done, and the claimant was at liberty up to the same period to refuse concurrence and assert aliunde his legal rights, if any he had. Prior to that time there could be no vested right and no commitment of either party, not subject to the exercise thereafter of such discretion, affirmative or negative, as might be deemed proper. The case presents the same legal aspect as if it were between individuals. If a merchant should direct his clerk or other agent to investigate and adjust the claim of a third party upon a prescribed basis, and the adjustment was made accordingly, can it be doubted that the merchant might thereafter, because he had come to the conclusion that the claim was tainted with fraud, or had been already fully paid, or for any other reason, or as a matter of choice, without assigning any reason, decline to recognize what had been done as of any validity, and withdraw the authority under which the proceeding had been taken? The reason of the right would be that there was no binding mutuality of assent, no consideration, and hence no legal obligation resting upon either party."

The same reasons dispose of the second proposition, and show that the report of the Quartermaster-General is no more an account stated between the parties than it is an arbitration and award. In order to constitute an account stated between individuals, the statement of the account must be adopted by one party and submitted as correct to the other. But here Congress did not adopt the report of the Quartermaster-General as its statement of what was due from the United States; nor was the report submitted to the claimant as a correct statement of indebtedness.

The acceptance by Congress and the appellant, referred to in the third proposition, can only mean the appropriation made by Congress in the Act of July 5, 1884, but certainly that cannot be considered an adoption of the report of the Quartermaster-General. It does not purport to be an appropriation of a partial payment, as a credit upon a larger sum admitted to be due. Even though it be admitted that the language of the Act in its first clause, declaring that the receipt of the money appropriated in each case shall be taken as a full and final discharge of the several claims, does not apply, yet there is no inference that the appropriation actually made was intended to be a recognition of a larger amount in fact due. The presumption is the other way; and the right conclusion is that Congress appropriated all that it meant to acknowledge.

The judgment of the Court of Claims dismissing the petition is therefore affirmed.

UNITED STATES, Appt.
v.
EDWARD T. STRONG.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 656–658.)

Naval officer—pay of.

A Lieutenant Commander in the United States Navy, performing duty as executive officer, on board a receiving ship at Boston, under an order designating his employment as "shore duty," is entitled to receive pay for sea service.

[No. 1381.]

Submitted April 2, 1888. Decided April 16, 1888.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims, in favor of claimant for the difference between shore pay and sea pay. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., Robert A. Howard, Asst. Atty-Gen., and F. P. Dewees, Asst. Atty., for appellant:

Sea service means, in the United States Navy, service rendered at sea under the orders of a department and in vessels employed by authority of law.

R. S. § 1571; Naval Regulations, 1876, 85, par. 38; U. S. v. Symonds, 120 U. S. 46 (30: 557); Schoonmaker v. U. S. 19 Ct. Cl. 172; Carpenter v. U. S. 15 Ct. Cl. 247.

Naval regulations in force at the time of the passage of the third section of the Act of 1860, 12 Stat. at L. 27, have the force of law.

Gratiot v. U. S. 45 U. S. 4 How. 80 (11: 884); Ex parte Reed, 100 U. S. 13 (25: 538); R. S. 1547.

Mr. Linden Kent, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

The claimant, Edward T. Strong, being a Lieutenant Commander in the United States Navy, by an order of the Secretary of the Navy of February 4, 1886, was directed to report for duty as executive officer on board the United States receiving ship Wabash at Boston, Massachusetts. The order designated his employment as "shore duty." In compliance with the order he reported for such duty on board the ship on February 20, 1886, and continued from that time to discharge the required duties on board such ship until May 11, 1886, when he was relieved from duty thereon. During that period he was allowed and paid only as for shore duty. He claimed to be entitled to receive pay for sea service. Judgment was rendered in his favor by the court of claims for $111.20, being the difference between shore pay and sea pay. From this judgment the United States prosecutes the present appeal.

From the findings of facts it appears that The Wabash is a receiving ship built of wood, about thirty-one years old, stationed at the navy yard in Boston for over twelve years past. The vessel is and has been used as a naval recruiting station whilst at the Boston Navy Yard. There is a roof built over the deck. The ship is connected and communicates with shore by a rope. There is a large boat or scow that plies between the ship and the wharf by means of a crank and connected with the rope. Steam is used only for heating purposes and pumps. All the anchors have never been taken up at the same time. Row boats were also used in going to and from the ship. The Wabash has remained in the same place in which she was anchored since October 28, 1875, and has been and was, during the time of service thereon by the claimant, under the orders and direction of the Secretary of the Navy. During the period of the claimant's service thereon she was not in a safe condition for cruising. She is a sailing and steam vessel, and had on board sails, spars, and tackle; she was capable of being taken out to sea under steam, her machinery and boilers being sufficient for that purpose; she could have been taken out to sea under sail, but in the condition of her boilers and machinery and her sailing apparatus, without repairs, it would not have been, in either case, advisable or safe. The duties of executive officer of the vessel performed by the claimant were similar to those of executive officers on cruising ships. In addition to those he had other duties, which were more exacting and arduous than those on board cruis-serious litigation; and this the mortgagees did not see fit to undertake. To save the property from being taken, to prevent the catastrophe which its taking would have caused, and the serious questions which would have arisen had it actually been sold, the intervener gave his bond to obtain an injunction. It was not done for the purpose of being subrogated to the questionable rights of Holbrook under his judgment, but to prevent the certain injury to the property itself, which the attempted enforcement of those rights would have involved. It is unnecessary, therefore, to discuss the rights of an execution creditor, levying on the personal property of a railroad company in Illinois, as against those of a mortgagee. We express no opinion upon that subject. The claim was presented upon the equities arising in favor of the intervener for taking the action he did, and thus securing the results which followed, and upon the other circumstances of the entire case taken together; and it was upon these grounds that the claim was allowed by the court below.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

ST. LOUIS, ALTON AND TERRE HAUTE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

CLEVELAND, COLUMBUS, CINCINNATI AND INDIANAPOLIS RAILWAY COMPANY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 658–680.)

Insolvent railroad company—application of earnings—unpaid rent—proceeds of sale—conflicting claims.

1. If current earnings of an insolvent railroad company are used for the benefit of mortgage creditors before current expenses are paid, the mortgage security is chargeable in equity with the restoration of the fund which has been thus improperly applied to their use.

2. A lessee of a railroad, being in no default at any time on account of rent, has a legal right to appropriate any surplus of its gross earnings to the payment of interest on bonds or for the improvement and additional equipment of its road, and is not bound to accumulate, out of such surplus, a fund to meet possible contingencies in the future in respect to rent.

3. Where the earnings of the road have been applied by the lessee to the payment of the interest on the first mortgage bonds, leaving the rent unpaid, the equity of the lessor, if in fact it exists, is against the holders of the first mortgage bonds who have actually received the money to which the lessor claims to be equitably entitled, and not against the proceeds of the sale of the railroad on foreclosure.

4. It is also held, on the facts of the case, that the petitioner had failed to establish any diversion and misappropriation of the earnings, applicable to the payment of rent of the leased line, to entitle him in equity to charge the fund in court for the payment of the arrearage due to him in preference to the second and third mortgage bondholders.

5. Where the lessor has actually received since the lease was made, in payment of rent, more than the entire net earnings of the leased property, such lessor has no equitable ground for payment of the amount due for rent out of the fund arising from the sale of the property on mortgage foreclosure, in preference to those who are secured by prior mortgage liens.

[No. 192.]

Argued March 22, 1888. Decided April 16, 1888.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, awarding to petitioner an amount due for rent which accrued while the road was in the possession of a receiver appointed under the foreclosure proceedings, and directing payment thereof; and dismissing the petition so far as it sought to establish a claim for rent prior to the time when the receiver took possession of the property, as against the proceeds arising from its sale, and so far as it sought to recover the value of the supplies turned over to the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad at the time of the execution of the lease. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Matthews:

The decree appealed from in this case was rendered upon an intervening petition of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company, filed October 30, 1882, in a suit then pending in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, wherein Hinman B. Hurlbut was complainant, and the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company defendant, the object of which suit was to foreclose the second and third mortgages, in which Hurlbut was the surviving trustee, upon the railroad and other property of the defendant. A decree of foreclosure and sale had been rendered therein on May 22, 1882, in pursuance of which the mortgaged premises were sold on July 28, 1882, for the sum of $1,396,000, subject to the outstanding first mortgage, and, at the date of the filing of the intervening petition of the present appellant, they had become by purchase the property of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railway Company. The proceeds of the sale were under the control of the court for purposes of distribution; and the matter had been referred to a master in chancery to hear evidence in support of the claims of any creditor claiming the right to share in that distribution, and to make report thereon.

The petition alleges, and it so appears, that by a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, rendered July 26, 1882, in a certain suit in equity, in which said petitioner was complainant and the said Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company and others were defendants, he obtained a decree against said Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company for the payment of the sum of $664,874.70, besides costs, which decree remains unsatisfied and unreversed. This amount, it is claimed by the petitioner, is a lien upon the proceeds of the sale of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad, prior in equity to that of the bondholders secured by the second and third mortgages.

The indebtedness for which this decree was rendered arose under an agreement entered into between the petitioner and the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company on September 11, 1867, whereby it was provided that the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company should manage, operate and carry on the business of that portion of petitioner's road known as its principal or main line, extending from Terre Haute, in the State of Indiana, to East St. Louis, in the State of Illinois, a distance of 189 miles, and of the Alton branch thereof, extending from Alton Junction, in the State of Illinois, to Alton, in said State, a distance of four miles, for the period of ninety-nine years from the first day of June, 1867; that said Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company should pay annually during said term to the petitioner 30 per cent of the gross earnings of the said main line and Alton branch until such gross earnings for the year should amount to $2,000,000, and 25 per cent of any excess over $2,000,000, until the whole earnings for the year should amount to $3,000,000, and 20 per cent of any excess over $3,000,000 of gross earnings for such year; and, further, that the said payment should amount in each and every year to at least the sum of $450,000, which amount was agreed upon as a minimum rental, to be paid absolutely without reference to the percentage which it formed of the gross earnings of any year, and without leaving or creating any claim or charge upon the earnings of any future year. The petition further shows that at the time of the execution of the said operating contract, the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad was not built; and that the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company was organized and created for the express purpose of furnishing to the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railroad Company and the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railway Company a through line to the Mississippi River, by means of its connection with the petitioner's road, the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad, under the foregoing contract; and that while the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company nominally under that contract was the lessee of the petitioner's road, yet in fact it was leased and operated for the benefit of the other two companies named, who furnished the money to build the said Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad, and who entered into a contract with the petitioner, guaranteeing performance of said agreement on the part of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, and who had entered into a contract between themselves for the management and operation of the continuous line of railroad from Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana, to East St. Louis, in the State of Illinois, including the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad and the petitioner's road. It was further alleged in the petition that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which, together with the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company, are made defendants to the petition, had succeeded to the rights and obligations under these several contracts and arrangements of the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railway Company; and that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company were equal owners of the capital stock of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, and that the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company is the holder, substantially, of all the second mortgage bonds of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company.

The petition further alleges that the eastern terminus of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad is the western terminus of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad, the two thus forming a continuous line from Indianapolis to East St. Louis on the Mississippi River, the road of the petitioner being the only outlet for the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad west of Terre Haute; that a very large proportion of the earnings of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company are derived from business received by it from the petitioner's leased line; and avers that the earnings of the leased road over and above the amount authorized to be retained by the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company for the purpose of operating the same at all times have been and are the property of the petitioner.

The petitioner further claims that the rental for the use and occupation of said continuous line constituted a part of the operating expenses of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company; that the operating contract was executed before any of the bonds of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company were issued and sold; that it was the duty of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company to pay all of its operating expenses, including the rental of the petitioner's road, out of its earnings before it paid any interest on said bonds; but that the said Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, instead of paying its operating expenses as thus defined, diverted and appropriated its earnings to improvements of its property in better equipment and new construction, and to the payment of interest upon its bonds, and neglected and refused to pay the rental accruing to the petitioner for which it had obtained a decree, as above stated. And the petition alleges that during the time the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company has been in possession of the petitioner's road, the amount of such misappropriation and diversion of funds, that should have been applied to the payment of operating expenses, amounts to the sum of $1,000,000.

The petition further shows that on May 1, 1878, the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company made default in the payment to petitioner of the rental then due under the terms of said contract, and so continued to make default from and including April 1, 1878, up to and including October 26, 1878, during which time it was in possession and use of the leased road, receiving the profits and income thereof, and paid over no part of the gross earnings of said road to the petitioner whatever, but appropriated the whole of the same to its own use, 30 per cent whereof during said time amounted to the sum of $164,052.82, which, it is alleged, was appropriated by the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company to improvements, betterments, and new construction upon its own line of railroad, in the purchase of rolling stock and equipment, and in the payment of interest upon its bonds.

It is further alleged in the petition that when the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company took possession of the leased road in 1867 it received from the petitioner supplies of the value of $91,860.05, which, by the terms of the lease, the lessee contracted and agreed to return or account for to the lessor at the termination of the lease; that said supplies have long since been consumed by the lessee; that by the terms of the decree and sale in the principal cause the lease has been assigned and transferred to the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, and it is claimed that said amount is a charge upon the proceeds of the sale of the leased road in the possession of the court for distribution.

The petition therefore prays for a decree awarding priority in payment in its favor out of the proceeds of the sale of the two sums of $664,874.70 and $91,860.05.

To this petition answers were filed by the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company, and by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, in which the allegations of the petition in regard to the diversion of the earnings of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company to the purposes of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad are denied, as well as the general equity set up by the petitioner.

On June 27, 1884, the cause having been fully heard upon the petition, and the answers and proofs, a final decree was rendered, awarding to the petitioner an amount found due to it for rental accrued while the road was in the possession of the receiver appointed under the foreclosure proceedings, and directing payment thereof; but so far as the petition sought to establish a claim for rental prior to the date when the receiver took possession of the property, as against the proceeds arising from its sale, and so far as it sought to recover the value of the supplies turned over to the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company in 1867, at the time of the execution of the lease, the petition was dismissed. It is from that decree that this appeal is prosecuted.

Messrs. John M. Butler and Joseph E. McDonald, for appellant:

The decree of July 26, 1882, in so far as it affected the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company, and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, has been reversed by this court.

Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. R. Co. 118 U. S. 290, 314 (30:88,93).

The St. Louis, Alton, and Terre Haute Railroad Company is entitled to payment of the amount equitably due for the use of its railroad and franchises by the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, as upon quantum meruit, regardless of the lease of September 11, 1867.

Thomas v. Brownville, Ft. K. & P. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 522, 526 (27:1018,1019); Gardner v. Butler, 30 N. J. Eq. 710; Wardell v. Union Pac. R. R. Co. 4 Dill. 339; S. C. 103 U. S. 656 (26:511).

The St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company is entitled to payment, out of the proceeds of the sale of the railroad and franchises of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, of the full amount of $664,874.70 decreed due to it by the decree of July 26, 1882, in preference to payment upon said second and third mortgage bonds.

Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235 (25:339); Union Pac. R. R. Co. v. U. S. Id. 420, 422, 423 (25:282,283); Union Trust Co. v. Walker, 107 U. S. 596 (27:490); Union Trust Co. v. Souther, Id. 594, 595 (27:489); Sage v. Central R. R. Co. 99 U. S. 336, 345 (25: 394, 397); Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 776, 780, 781 (28: 596, 598); Miltenberger v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 106 U. S. 311, 312 (27:126,127); Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 117 U. S. 457, 458 (29:971).

Rents definitely ascertained, and specifically reserved by lease, never become the property of the lessee, but vest directly in the lessor, and are simply held in trust by the lessee for the lessor.

Moulton v. Robinson, 27 N. H. 551; Hatch v. Hart, 40 N. H. 98; Daniels v. Brown, 34 N. H. 454; Hart v. State, 29 Ind. 200; Lindley v. Kelley, 42 Ind. 294; Parker v. Garrison, 61 Ill. 254; 1 Washb. Real Prop. § 10, title "Estates for Years."

Messrs. Stevenson Burke and John T. Dye, for appellees:

The indebtedness to the petitioner is not entitled to preference over the claims of the bondholders. The case of Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235 (25:339) is in point and decisive of the contention in this case.

All that can be said of it is that it is an indebtedness arising upon contract for which there was really no consideration received by the lessee. The case of Huidekoper v. Hinckley Locomotive Works, 99 U. S. 258 (25:344) is also in point.

If the petitioner's claim is to be paid in preference to the bonds, it requires that the court shall take the amount of the petitioner's indebtedness out of the small fund arising from the sale of the mortgaged premises, and hand that money over to the petitioner.

Miltenberger v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 106 U. S. 286 (27:117); Union Trust Co. v. Souther, 107 U. S. 591 (27:488).

There is nothing in the case of the Union Trust Company v. Illinois Midland Railway Co. 117 U. S. 434 (29: 963) which in any way conflicts with the principles enunciated in the case of Fosdick v. Schall, supra, nor which in any respect supports the claim of the petitioner in this action.

There is nothing in the case of Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 776 (28:596) which supports the case of the petitioner.

A corporation may be bound to refund to a person from whom it has received money or property for a purpose unauthorized by its charter, the value of that which it has actually received; for, in such case, to maintain the action against the corporation is not to affirm, but to disaffirm, the illegal contract.

White v. Franklin Bank, 22 Pick. 181; Morville v. Am. Tract Society, 123 Mass. 129, 137; Re Cork & Y. R. Co. L. R. 4 Ch. App. Cas. 748.

But when the corporation has actually received nothing in money or property, it cannot be held liable upon an agreement to share in or to guarantee the profits of the enterprise which is wholly without the scope of its corporate powers, upon the mere ground that conjectural or speculative benefits were believed by its officers to be likely to result from the making of the agreement, and that the other party has incurred expenses upon the faith of it.

East Anglian R. Co. v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 11 C. B. 775; Macgregor v. Dover & D. R. Co. 18 Q. B. 618; Ashbury R. Carriage & I. Co. v. Riche, L. R. 7 H. L. 668; Thomas v. West Jersey R. R. Co. 101 U. S. 71 (25:950); Downing v. Mt. Washington Road Co. 40 N. H. 230; Franklin Co. v. Lewiston Sav. Inst. 68 Me. 43; Davis v. Old Colony R. R. Co. 131 Mass. 258.

Every person who enters into a contract with a corporation is bound at his peril to take notice of the legal limits of its capacity.

There was a clear distinction, as was pointed out by Justice Campbell in Zabriskie v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. R. Co. 64 U. S. 23 How. 381–398 (16:488–497), by Mr. Justice Hoar in the Monument Nat. Bank v. Globe Works, 101 Mass. 57, 58, and by Lord Hatherly in Ashbury R. Carriage & I. Co. v. Riche, L. R. 7 H. L. 668–684, between the exercise by a corporation of a power not conferred upon it,—of which all persons dealing with it are bound to take notice,—and the abuse of a general power, or the failure to comply with prescribed formalities or regulations, in a particular instance when such abuse or failure is not known to the other contracting party.

Davis v. Old Colony R. R. Co. 131 Mass. 258.

Having entered into the agreement, it was the duty of the company to rescind or abandon it at the earliest moment.

Thomas v. West Jersey R. R. Co. 101 U. S. 86 (25:953); Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. R. Co. 118 U. S. 317 (30:94).

None of the cases cited to show that the court will sustain an action on a quantum meruit, where the contract is void, are cases where the contract was held void because it was not in the power of the corporation to make it.

The contract in the case of Thomas v. Brownville, Ft. K. & P. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 522–526 (27:1018,1019) was void because of fraud, and not because the work which was performed under it was beyond the scope of the corporate authority. The same criticism applies to the cases:

Gardner v. Butler, 30 N. Y. Eq. 724, and Wardell v. Union Pac. R. R. Co. 4 Dill. 339; S. C. 103 U. S. 656 (26:511).

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

At the time of the execution of the lease in 1867 of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad to the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, the railroad of the latter company was not in existence. It was subsequently constructed in order to form the connection which would give to the parties in interest the desired through line from Indianapolis to St. Louis. The capital stock of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company was owned substantially by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company in equal parts. A portion of the funds necessary to construct and equip the road was represented by bonds secured by mortgages. Of these there were three: the first mortgage was for $2,000,000, the second for $1,000,000, and the third for $500,000. The first mortgage bonds, prior to the foreclosure and sale, had been sold in the market, and were outstanding. The sale was made subject to the continued incumbrance of that mortgage, and of the bonds secured thereby. The holders of these bonds have, therefore, no interest in this controversy.

The second and third mortgage bonds were originally taken to account by the two companies interested in the construction of the road, but, prior to the foreclosure and sale, had become substantially the property of the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company, that Company having acquired the entire interest of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. As the owner of these bonds, the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company claims to be entitled to the whole amount of the proceeds of the sale of the road under the foreclosure, and is the only party in interest adverse to the petitioner.

The default in the payment of interest on the second and third mortgages dates from January 1, 1878. The decree of foreclosure finds the amount of interest in arrears on May 2, 1882, on the second mortgage bonds, to be $291,745.97, and the aggregate sum due on account of said mortgage, principal and interest to be $1,197,745.97, with interest from May 2, 1882. The amount found due by the same decree, on account of the bonds secured by the third mortgage, including interest from January 1, 1878, is $699,164.76. The whole amount found due by the decree, including both sums, is $1,896,910.73, which is more than the amount of the proceeds of the sale of the road, which were $1,896,000.

Upon the bill of Hinman B. Hurlbut, as trustee for the foreclosure and sale of the Indianapolis and St. Louis railroad property, a receiver was appointed, and it was ordered that the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company should be entitled to require the payment of 30 per cent of the gross earnings of its railroad to said lessor, according to the order of the court theretofore made and still in force in the suit of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company against the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, with the terms of which order the receiver was directed to comply. The order appointing the receiver also expressly reserved to the court the right and power to make such orders and decrees touching the payment of the debts of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company incurred in the management and operation of its railroad prior to the appointment of the receiver as might be equitable and just. The decree of foreclosure and sale also contained a clause, reserving to the court the right by subsequent order or orders to distribute the proceeds of the sale of the railroad and property connected therewith, and to make such further order and decree in regard to the distribution of the proceeds of sale as might to the court seem equitable and just; and a reference was made to the master to hear evidence in support of all claims or indebtedness in behalf of any creditor of the defendant Company, whether secured or not.

The Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, from the date of the lease in 1867, continued to pay to the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company the rental reserved by the terms of the lease, viz., 30 per cent of the gross earnings of the leased road in each year until April 1, 1878. Prior to that time there had been no default in respect to the payment of the full amount of the rental as it accrued; the lessee ceased paying rent from that date.

On October 25, 1878, the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company filed its bill in equity in the Circuit Court of the United States for Indiana against the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, to which also the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company were made parties defendant. The object of that bill was specifically to enforce the performance of the covenants contained in the lease on the part of the lessee and of the other defendants as guarantors. It was in that suit that the order was made November 30, 1878, requiring the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company to pay into court, on account of the rental due the lessor, monthly, on the 15th day of each month, 30 per centum of the gross earnings of the preceding month of the leased road, calculating the gross earnings which had accrued since October 26, 1878.

The final decree of the circuit court in that cause declared that the lease and operating contract of September 11, 1867, was a valid obligation upon all the parties thereto, and established the amount of the indebtedness of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company on account of the minimum rent reserved by said lease to July 1, 1882, at the sum of $541,358.23 principal, and $123,516.47 interest, making in all the sum of $664,874.70. It also found that 30 per cent of the gross earnings of the leased line collected and received by the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, and withheld by it from April 1, 1878, until October 26, 1878, amounted to $164,052.82, which was part of said aggregate amount found due. The decree further declared the liability of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and of the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company as guarantors for their proportion of the said sum, and awarded payment accordingly.

From this decree appeals were taken and prosecuted to this court by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company, the judgment in which was rendered at October Term, 1885, and is reported in 118 U. S. 290 [30:83]. It was there decided that the lease of 1867 was void for want of power on the part of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company to enter into it, and that the guaranty of performance executed by the other defendant companies by reason thereof was also void. The decree of the circuit court was accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to dismiss the bill as to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company; but that part of the decree which required the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company to pay the amount found due as rent was left standing, as no appeal from it had been prosecuted by the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company. Pending that litigation, the intervening petition of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company, now under consideration, was filed in the foreclosure suit, in which Hurlbut, as trustee, was complainant.

The propositions on which counsel for the appellant bases its right to the relief prayed for in the intervening petition, and which was denied by the decree, are stated by it as follows:

First. That the petitioner is in equity entitled to just and fair compensation for the use of its railroad, equipment and franchises as upon quantum meruit, even if the lease is entirely disregarded.

Second. That the minimum rent of $450,000 per annum, in monthly payments of $37,500, is no more than just, fair, and equitable compensation for the use of the leased line upon quantum meruit.

Third. That the petitioner is entitled to payment of the $664,874.70 decreed due it by the decree of July 20, 1882, with interest thereon, out of the proceeds of the sale of the railroad and property of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company in preference to payment of the mortgage bonds:

1. Because it is an unpaid operating expense of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, there having been gross earnings abundant to pay all operating expenses, including rent of the leased line.

2. Because it is a debt justly due to the petitioner as a connecting line.

3. Because gross earnings lawfully applicable only to operating expenses, until every operating expense has been fully paid, have been diverted to the benefit of the bondholders of the petitioner in payment of bond interest, and in adding increased value to the mortgaged property by additions and improvements, to an amount sufficient to have paid the debt now due to the petitioner many times.

Fourth. That the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company, in resisting payment of the debt due the petitioner in preference to the payment of the second and third mortgage bonds, does not stand before a court of equity in the position of simply an ordinary bondholder; and that the peculiar relations existing between the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company and the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, as disclosed by this litigation, greatly strengthen the equity in favor of the petitioner in its claim for preference in payment over the mortgage bonds.

Fifth. That the petitioner is entitled to payment of $164,052.82, with interest thereon from October 26, 1882, out of the proceeds of sale, because that amount is 30 per cent of the gross earnings earned on the track of the leased line from April 1, 1878, to October 26, 1878, and is trust money reserved by the lease belonging to the petitioner, collected, withheld, and wrongfully appropriated to its own use and benefit by the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company.

It may be admitted that the petitioner is entitled in equity to a just and fair compensation for the use of its railroad by the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, without regard to the lease, as between it and the lessee, and also that the minimum rent of $450,000 per annum, in monthly payments of $37,500 is no more than that just and fair compensation that the lessor company would be entitled to receive for the use of its road upon a quantum meruit. As between the petitioner and the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, the amount of the indebtedness on that account is conclusively established by the decree of July 26, 1882, which, as between these parties, stands unreversed and unsatisfied.

A different question, however, arises as between the petitioner and the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company, as the owner of the mortgage bonds, for the satisfaction of which the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad has been sold. It remains, as between these parties, for the petitioner to establish that the debt to it of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, on account of this use and occupation, is a prior lien and charge upon the proceeds of the sale of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad, entitled to preference over that of the second and third mortgages. Among the reasons urged in support of this preference are these,—because the arrearage is an unpaid operating expense of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company; because it is a debt due to the petitioner as a connecting line; and because it consists of a portion of the gross earnings earned on the track of the leased line received by the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, and held by it as trust money in equity belonging to the petitioner. This last reason, as formally presented, is limited to $164,052.82, being 30 per cent of the gross earnings earned on the track of the leased line from April 1, 1878, to October 26, 1878, but is applicable as well to all other amounts received by the lessee of the gross earnings of the leased line which have not been accounted for.

But none of these reasons, standing by themselves, are sufficient. It is undoubtedly true that operating expenses, debts due to connecting lines growing out of an interchange of business, and debts due for the use and occupation of leased lines are chargeable upon gross income before that net revenue arises which constitutes the fund applicable to the payment of the interest on mortgage bonds. But here there is no question in respect to current income. The fund in court is the proceeds of the sale of the property, and represents its corpus; and it cannot be claimed that ordinarily the unsecured debts of an insolvent railroad company can take precedence in the distribution of the proceeds of a sale of the property itself over those creditors who are secured by prior and express liens.

There are cases, it is true, where, owing to special circumstances, an equity arises in favor of certain classes of creditors of an insolvent railroad corporation, otherwise unsecured, by which they are entitled to outrank in priority of payment, even upon a distribution of the proceeds of a sale of the body of the property, those who are secured by prior mortgage liens. Illustrations and instances of these cases are to be found in Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235 [25: 339]; Miltenberger v. Logansport, C. & S. W. R. Co. 106 U. S. 286 [27: 117]; Union Trust Co. v. Souther, 107 U. S. 591 [27; 488]; Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 776 [28: 596]; Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 117 U. S. 434 [29: 963]; Dow v. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. 124 U. S. 652 [ante, 565]; Sage v. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. 125 U. S. 361 [ante, 694]; and Union Trust Co. v. Morrison, 125 U. S. 591 [ante, 825]. The rule governing in all these cases was stated by Chief Justice Waite in Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 776, 783 [28: 596, 598] as follows: "That if current earnings are used for the benefit of mortgage creditors before current expenses are paid, the mortgage security is chargeable in equity with the restoration of the fund which has been thus improperly applied to their use." There has been no departure from this rule in any of the cases cited; it has been adhered to and reaffirmed in them all.

Admitting, therefore, that the reasonable rent of the leased line accruing to the petitioner was a proper charge upon the gross income of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, as a part of its current operating expenses, before any net income could arise applicable to the payment of the interest on the mortgage bonds, it must still be shown, to entitle the petitioner to the relief prayed for, that the arrearage due on account thereof has arisen by the diversion and misappropriation of the fund that ought to have been applied to its payment to the use and benefit of the mortgage bondholders. Counsel for the petitioner undertake to do this, and insist that upon the proofs in this case it satisfactorily appears that such a diversion and misappropriation have taken place to its injury and to the advantage and benefit of the bondholders claiming the fund in court for distribution.

This diversion and misappropriation are alleged to have occurred in two ways: (1) by the payment of the interest on the mortgage bonds out of earnings which should have been paid to the petitioner on account of rent due to it as an operating expense; and (2) by the application of earnings to permanent improvements and betterments of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad property, which have increased the value of that property as a mortgage security; an increased value which, it may be very fairly presumed, is represented in the proceeds of its sale.

The fact in issue, it is claimed, is shown by an exhibit, which in tabular form contains a statement of the earnings, expenses, rental, and interest on bonds of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, including the leased line as one of its divisions, from the date of the commencement of operations under the lease in 1867 to May 23, 1882. That statement shows: gross earnings, $26,868,252.31; operating expenses, including taxes, $19,417,078.26; leaving as net earnings, $7,451,174.05. During the same period the amount of rental paid for the leased lines was $6,464,869.19, and during the same period interest paid on bonds, $2,234,896.62, showing as the result of the operations for the entire period a deficit of $1,248,091.76. It thus appears that the payments made on account of the various items mentioned exceed by that sum the entire gross earnings received by the lessee from its own and the leased line. But inasmuch as during this period $2,234,896.62 out of the gross earnings were paid on account of interest on bonds, being $986,804.86 more than the entire apparent deficit, the inference is drawn that the deficit has arisen in consequence of the payment of interest on bonds, more than sufficient, if they had been so appropriated, to have paid the entire rental, including the arrearage now due. This, it is claimed, establishes the fact to be proved, that gross earnings, which should have been applied to the payment of rent, have been diverted by the lessee to the payment of interest on bonds.

This statement, however, is deceptive. From the beginning of operations under the lease in 1867 until April 1, 1878, the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company paid in full, as it accrued, the whole amount of the rental called for by the lease. During that period, the lessee, being in no default at any time on account of rent, had a legal right to appropriate any surplus of its gross earnings to the payment of interest on bonds, or for the improvement and additional equipment of its road. It was not bound to accumulate, out of the surplus of gross earnings, prior to 1878, a fund to meet possible contingencies in respect to rent that might arise after that date. The petitioner, therefore, has no right to complain of any appropriation of the earnings of the leased line during the period in which it received the full amount due to it.

If now we turn to a statement of a similar account, beginning in 1878, when the default in the payment of interest began, to the close of the period, May 28, 1882, we are furnished with the following figures: gross earnings, $7,443,894.43; operating expenses, including taxes, $6,253,819.53; leaving net earnings, $1,190,074.90. During the same period there was paid on account of rent of the leased line to the petitioner $1,450,336.67, making a deficit of $260,261.77, without reference to anything paid during that period on account of interest on bonds. That is to say, during the period in which the arrearage on account of rent accrued, there was paid out on account of rent $260,261.77 in excess of the entire earnings of the whole line, after deducting the ordinary expenses of operation. During the same period there was paid on account of interest on bonds the sum of $490,105, making the entire deficit during that period $750,366.77. But it is admitted that during the same period the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company made advances in cash to the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company to the amount of $510,306.24, a sum greater than the whole amount of the interest paid during the same period on bonds. Even if we should treat the payment, on account of interest on bonds during that period, of $490,105 as taken from the earnings, which should have been applied to the payment of the rental, it is to be considered that the payment was made on account of the interest accruing during that period on the first mortgage bonds alone. No interest whatever was paid from January 1, 1878, on account of the interest accruing on the second and third mortgage bonds. It cannot be said that the application of earnings to the payment of the interest on the first mortgage bonds is chargeable to the holders of the second and third mortgage bonds; the latter alone are interested in the fund for distribution. That fund, in the sense of the rule sought to be applied, cannot be said to have been benefited by the payment to other bondholders from the gross earnings applicable to the payment of the rent. The equity of the petitioner, if in fact it exists, is against the holders of the first mortgage bonds, who have actually received the money to which it claims to be equitably entitled.

It is further insisted, however, on behalf of the petitioner, that there has been a diversion of earnings to its detriment by payments made for additions and improvements to the mortgaged property during the years 1878, 1879, 1880, and 1881, amounting to $256,501.05; but if we exclude from the account the payments made during that period on account of interest on the first mortgage bonds, as should be done, the amount of these betterments of the mortgage security is much more than made up by the cash advances during that period made by the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati, and Indianapolis Railway Company and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which, as we have stated, were $510,306.24.

A special equity is urged as to the unpaid rent of the leased line for the seven months from April 1, to November 1, 1878, during which nothing whatever was paid on that account, amounting, as found by the decree of July 26, 1882, to $164,052.82, on the ground that the gross earnings of the leased line during that period were received by the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company clothed with a trust, and were diverted from their legitimate application to the benefit of the bondholders. As we have already stated, no equity can arise upon alleged breach of trust unless the second and third mortgage bondholders participated in it, or have been benefited by it. The alleged diversion of this amount is covered by the statements that have been already adverted to. It consists in payments on account of interest on the first mortgage bonds, which must be excluded from the account for reasons already given, and payments made on account of new construction, additions, new equipment, and improvements, more than covered by the cash advances made by the owners of the second and third mortgage bonds. An effort is made in the argument to swell the amount chargeable to permanent improvements by pointing out that from January 1, 1881, to May 28, 1882, more than all of the gross earnings of the entire line were charged up to the operating expense account, without counting anything for rent of the leased line as an operating expense. The witness who tabulated the schedules in which these statements appear stated that, during the months covered by these charges for excessive operating expenses, large improvements were being made to the property, but no details were brought out on the examination, and the witness qualified his statement by saying that he did not mean to be understood that the improvements were more than such as were necessary to the proper repair and restoration of the property. We cannot assume by way of conjecture or mere inference that the items referred to were not properly charged as operating expenses. On this branch of the case we conclude that the petitioner has failed to establish any diversion and misappropriation of the earnings applicable to the payment of rent of the leased line to entitle him in equity to charge the fund in court for the payment of the arrearage in preference to second and third mortgage bondholders.

Independently of the equity growing out of the alleged diversion and misappropriation of earnings properly applicable to the payment of rent, it is claimed on behalf of the petitioner that it has an equitable right to a priority of payment out of the fund in court growing out of the peculiar relations existing between it and the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and

Indianapolis Railway Company and the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, as disclosed in the transactions out of which this litigation has grown. It is alleged, in substance, that the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company is the real debtor for this arrearage of rent; that it with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company were in fact the owners of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad, which was built with their money, and for the promotion of their interests, in order, by means of the lease of the petitioner's road, to create a through line from Indianapolis to St. Louis for business between the East and the West, the establishment and operation of which have contributed largely to swell the business upon their own previously existing lines. Having thus induced the petitioner to enter into the arrangement for their benefit, and having secured and actually enjoyed its advantages and profits, the argument now is that good faith, by an equitable estoppel, forbids the Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railway Company from now asserting a claim which will deprive the petitioner of the compensation agreed to be paid for the use of its road. But this is the very equity which the petitioner sought to enforce by its bill filed October 25, 1878, in which it sought to obtain a decree against its lessee and the guarantors in the lease for the specific performance of the covenant to pay the reserved rent. In that bill reliance was placed, it is true, upon the express covenants which were held finally to be void; but every equitable ground upon the existing facts was invoked in support of the validity of the covenants. The facts supposed to constitute the equity now insisted on were urged then as sufficient to support the obligation based upon the terms of the operating contract and lease. If this equity was not sufficient then to sustain an express promise to pay the rent, it certainly is not strong enough now to justify a decree for its payment standing by itself. To enforce the present claim of the petitioner on this ground would be simply to reinstate as valid the covenants of the lease and guaranty which between the same parties have already been finally decided to be void.

It has already been stated that no default occurred in the payment of the rent by the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company until April 1, 1878. After that default occurred, no step was taken by the petitioner by any legal proceeding to forfeit the lease and repossess itself of its road. Nothing was done until the filing of its bill, October 25, 1878, to compel the specific performance of the covenants of the lease and operating contract, when the order was made requiring payment to it, pending the proceeding, of 30 per cent of the gross earnings of its road; and an analysis of the tabular statements, already referred to as in evidence, shows that the arrearage of rent, for which payment is now sought, can be recovered only upon the basis of the minimum rental fixed by the lease by the enforcement of the covenants of guaranty declared to be void.

The minimum fixed by the lease for the rental of the leased line from June 1, 1867, to May 23, 1882, at $450,000 per annum, is $6,750,000; 30 per cent of the gross earnings of the leased road for the same period is $6,031,465.61, being less than the guaranteed rent by $718,534.39. In point of fact, the condition of the petitioner, upon the facts as they now stand, without payment of any arrearage of rent, is demonstrably better than it would have been if no lease had been made, and the road had been operated by its own proprietors independently but as part of a connected through line. This is shown by the fact that the lessor received as rent during the whole period of the lease $6,464,869.19, while the total net earnings of the leased property during the same period are shown to have been only $5,290,783,02. Presumably these net earnings are as large as they would have been if the road had been operated by its own proprietor. The volume of its business, and the corresponding amount of its gross receipts, were certainly swelled beyond what they would have been if the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad had not been built, or had not been operated in connection with it. It follows, therefore, upon the basis of the figures shown in the proofs, that the lessor has actually received, since the lease was made, in excess of the entire net earnings of the leased property, $1,174,086.17. Indeed, it is further shown, that during the period commencing with 1878, when the default began, the net earnings of the entire line, including the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad, as well as the leased road, amounted to $1,190,074.90, and that during the same period the lessor received on account of rent $1,450,836.67, being in excess of the net earnings of the two roads.

Upon these facts, we are unable to discover any equitable ground for the relief prayed for by the petitioner.

The decree of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed.

NELSON LYON, Appt.,
v.
THE PERIN AND GAFF MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 698–702.)

Res judicata—adjudication, when a bar—on the merits—decree of dismissal.

1. In order to render a matter res judicata, there must be a concurrence of the four conditions, viz: identity in the thing sued for; identity of the cause of action; identity of persons and parties to the action; and identity of the quality in the persons for or against whom the claim is made.

2. Where all these conditions exist in a case, and the decree therein is absolute in its terms and is an adjudication of the merits of the controversy, it constitutes a bar to any further litigation of the same subject between the same parties.

3. Where words of qualification, such as "without prejudice," or other terms indicating a right or privilege to take further legal proceedings on the subject, do not accompany the decree, it is presumed to be rendered on the merits.

4. A decree, made upon bill, answer and replication, which decrees that the equities are with the defendant, that the bill of complaint be dismissed, and that defendant recover its costs, if set up as a plea in bar to a new bill for same cause, is conclusive, if the dismissal was upon hearing, and is not, in direct terms, "without prejudice."

[No. 201.]

Argued April 2, 1888. Decided April 16, 1888.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, in favor of defendant, dismissing plaintiff's bill in an action for an alleged infringement of reissued letters patent. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. William H. King, for appellant:

A former verdict or dismissal on a bill filed for an injunction to restrain the use of a patent is not a bar to a subsequent suit, unless a judgment was rendered on such verdict against the plaintiff, or the dismissal was on the merits.

Allen v. Blunt, 2 Robb, Pat. Cas. 288; S. C. 3 Story, 742; 1 Greenl. Ev. Redf. ed. 563.

A former adjudication is an estoppel only as to the matters in issue, or points in controversy, upon the determination of which the judgment was rendered.

Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351 (24:195); Buerk v. Imhaeuser, 10 Off. Gaz. 907; De Florez v. Raynolds, 16 Blatchf. 408.

A decree is not final if it does not make the question of the novelty of the claim res judicata.

Rumford Chemical Works v. Hecker, 2 Bann. & Ard. 351.

A decree of a circuit court taken pro confesso will not preclude full inquiry and investigation by another court.

Everet v. Thatcher, 3 Bann. & Ard. 435.

A suit which is dismissed for want of prosecution is no bar to a subsequent suit for the same cause of action.

American Diamond Rock Boring Co. v. Sheldon, 4 Bann. & Ard. 551.

The record shows no ground upon which it was dismissed, except the want of appearance of the plaintiff; and a dismissal for that cause is not conclusive in favor of the defendant, even upon another suit for the same relief.

Mitf. Ch. Pl. 238; Carrington v. Holly, 1 Dick. 280; Rosse v. Rust, 4 Johns. Ch. 299; Badger v. Badger, 1 Cliff. 237, 245; Porter v. Vaughn, 26 Vt. 624.

Record must show conclusive judgment.

Hartley v. Gregory, 9 Neb. 279.

If, upon the face of the record, anything is left to conjecture as to what was necessarily involved and decided, there is no estoppel in it when pleaded, and nothing conclusive in it when offered in evidence.

Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606 (24:214); Bank of U. S. v. Beverley, 42 U. S. 1 How. 134 (11:75).

In order that a judgment may constitute a bar to another suit, it must be rendered in a proceeding between the same parties, or their privies; and the point of controversy must be the same in both cases and must be determined on its merits.

Hughes v. U. S. 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 232 (18:303); Walden v. Bodley, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 156 (10:398).

After a nonsuit a new action may be brought.

Oscanyan v. Winchester Repeating Arms Co. 103 U. S. 261 (26:539).

(No counsel appeared for appellee.)

Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana by Nelson Lyon against the Perin and Gaff Manufacturing Company, praying an injunction and damages for an alleged infringement of reissued letters patent No. 9198, dated May 11, 1880, owned by complainant, for an improvement in "metallic stiffeners for boot and shoe heels."

The bill of complaint, after the usual recitals necessary in a suit of this character, among other things, sets forth that before the commencement of this action, to wit, in September, 1881, complainant having been informed and believing that the defendant was manufacturing an instrument which infringed said reissued letters patent, filed his bill in equity against the said defendant in the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of Ohio to restrain said defendant from further infringement; that the Company appeared therein and answered, setting forth, among other things, the defense that said reissued letters patent was invalid for want of novelty in the invention, and was not granted in accordance with law, denying also that the instrument used infringed the said reissued letters patent, and denying that complainant was entitled to any of the relief thereiñ prayed, to which answer complainant filed his replication: that the statutory time for taking testimony having expired, and an extension thereof not having been granted, and the complainant not having been able to get the proof of the infringement in time, no evidence of the facts, matters, or things alleged in his complaint was offered or taken, and upon the call of the case before the court, counsel for complainant not appearing, a decree was entered, dismissing the bill; and that none of the issues were tried, and no decision rendered on the merits thereof, the suit having been dismissed merely for want of prosecution.

The defendant interposed a plea that the prior adjudication and decree of the suit mentioned in said plea (which is the same suit set forth in said bill of complaint) is a bar to the present suit. The court below found the plea to be good and sufficient; thereupon complainant filed his replication. The cause being at issue was referred to a master in chancery to take testimony, and to return the same into court with his conclusion of law thereon. Testimony was taken, and the master made and filed his report, in and by which said master concluded, as a matter of law, that the decree mentioned in said plea stands as an absolute adjudication of the rights of the parties upon the merits, and reported and found that the averments of the plea were sustained by the evidence.

Exceptions to said master's report having been overruled by the court and the report confirmed, a decree was entered that the defendant's plea was well taken in law and sustained by the proofs, and the bill was dismissed. An appeal from this decree brings the case here.

The only material question for consideration is as to the effect of the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, rendered May 4, 1882, which is correctly found to be still in full force, as a bar to the prosecution of this suit.

It is well settled that in order to render a matter res adjudicata, there must be a concurrence of the four conditions, viz: (1) Identity in the thing sued for; (2) identity of the cause of action; (3) identity of persons and parties to the action; and (4) identity of the quality in the persons for or against whom the claim is made. 2 Bouv. L. D. 467. All these elements or conditions exist in this case, as shown by the master's report, which was to the effect that the averments of said plea were sustained by the evidence; that there was no controversy as to the identity of the cause of action, or of the identity of the parties in the two suits; that the bill was sworn to by the complainant, and the answer was sworn to by the defendant, and the cause submitted in due course; and that the decree rendered in the suit pending in the court of Ohio was, as it professed to be, an absolute adjudication of the rights of the parties upon the merits, without any qualifying clause, and was conclusive of the rights attempted to be litigated in this case.

The dispute, however, seems to be as to the nature of the former judgment—that is, whether it is a final judgment or decree. It is contended on the part of appellant that such judgment was merely one of nol pros—a decree entered by default—and is, therefore, not a bar to the prosecution of this suit. To sustain this view of the case he has recourse to a statement by the clerk of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio (wherein the decree was rendered), under his hand and seal, dated nearly two years after said decree was rendered, to the effect that no proof or testimony was filed in said cause in his office either for the complainant or the defendant; that at the time of the granting of said decree, May 4, 1882, the complainant did not appear, nor was he represented by counsel; and that said decree dismissing the complainant's bill was granted on default of the complainant.

The decree itself is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"The United States of America, } ss:
Western Division of the Southern District of Ohio, }

"At a stated term of the Circuit Court of the Western Division of the Southern District of Ohio, in the Sixth Judicial Circuit of the United States of America, begun and had in the court rooms at the City of Cincinnati, Ohio, in said district, on the first Tuesday of April, being the fourth day of that month, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and sixth.

"Present: The Hon. John Baxter, Circuit Judge, and Hon. Philip B. Swing, District Judge.

"On Thursday, the fourth day of May, 1882, among the proceedings had were the following, to wit:

"Nelson Lyon vs.
The Perin and Gaff Manufacturing Co. } 3180. In Equity.

"This cause coming on for hearing, and being submitted to the court upon bill, answer, and replication, and having been duly considered, the court finds, adjudges, and decrees that the equities are with the defendant; that the bill of complaint be dismissed, and that defendant recover its costs, to be taxed."

This is the record to which the court must look, and not to the statement of the clerk of the court made two years afterwards. This decree on its face is absolute in its terms, is an adjudication of the merits of the controversy, and, therefore, constitutes a bar to any further litigation of the same subject between the same parties. As was said by this court in Durant v. Essex Company, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 107, 109 [19: 154, 156]: "A decree of that kind, unless made because of some defect in the pleadings, or for want of jurisdiction, or because the complainant has an adequate remedy at law, or upon some other ground which does not go to the merits, is a final determination. Where words of qualification, such as 'without prejudice,' or other terms indicating a right or privilege to take further legal proceedings on the subject, do not accompany the decree, it is presumed to be rendered on the merits."

To the same effect see Bigelow v. Winsor, 1 Gray, 299, 301, where it is said: "Sometimes, indeed, a party plaintiff in equity, who, because he is not prepared with his proofs, or for other reasons, desires not to go into a hearing, but rather to have his bill dismissed, in the nature of a discontinuance or nonsuit in an action at law, may be allowed to do so; but we believe the uniform practice in such case is to enter 'dismissed without prejudice.'"

Likewise Cooper, Eq. Pl., 270, as follows: "A plea in bar, stating a dismissal of a former bill, is conclusive against a new bill, if the dismissal was upon hearing, and if that dismissal be not, in direct terms, 'without prejudice.'" See also Story's Eq. Pl., § 793, and authorities there cited.

The authorities to sustain this view of the case might be multiplied, but those cited are sufficient, and demonstrate the uniformity of the rule. It is clear to this court that the decree below dismissing the bill is in harmony with the law, and it is therefore affirmed.

ROBERT K. DOW ET AL., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
JOHN W. BEIDELMAN.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 680–692.)

Railroad companies—legislative right to regulate fare—effect of law as to freight and fare—Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Co.—classification, when proper—constitutionality of law.

1. Railroad companies are subject to legislative control, as to their rates of fare and freight, unless protected by their charters.

2. In the absence of any legislative regulation upon the subject, the courts must decide for the company, as they do for private persons, when controversies arise, what is reasonable.

3. Where property has been clothed with a public interest, the Legislature may fix a limit to that which in law shall be reasonable for its use. This limits the courts as well as the people. If it has been improperly fixed, the Legislature, not the courts, must be appealed to for the change.

4. The Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company, as reorganized by the purchasers in 1877, at the sale under mortgage foreclosure, if a lawful corporation of Arkansas, was not the same corporation as that chartered by the Legislature in 1853, but was a new corporation, subject to the Constitution and laws in force when it came into existence.

5. The Legislature, in the exercise of its power of regulating fares and freights, may classify the railroads, according to the length of their lines.

If the same rule is applied to all railroads of the same class, there is no violation of the constitutional provision securing to all the equal protection of the laws.

6. There being no proof in this case of the amount invested by the reorganized corporation or its trustees, this court has no means, if it had the power, to determine that the rate of three cents a mile, fixed as the fare of passengers by the Legislature, is unreasonable; and it does not appear that there has been any such confiscation as amounts to a taking of property without due process of law, because the income of the road, at that rate of fare, will pay only one and one half per cent on the original cost of the road.

7. If the classification made by the Legislature operates uniformly, this court cannot decide whether it was the best that could have been made.

[No. 1001.]

Submitted Nov. 21, 1887. Decided April 16, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Arkansas, to review a judgment of that court affirming a judgment of the State Circuit Court for the statutory penalty for the taking of illegal fare by the agent of a railroad company for the carriage of a passenger. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. U. M. Rose, for plaintiffs in error:

The Act of Arkansas, entitled "An Act to Regulate the Rates of Charges for the Carriage of Passengers by Railroad," approved April 4, 1887, was repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution which provides that "No State shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

Santa Clara County v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co. 118 U. S. 394 (30: 118); Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 331 (29: 644); Ex Parte Koehler, 23 Fed. Rep. 529; Cooley, Const. Lim. 578; Miller v. New York & E. R. R. Co. 21 Barb. 519; 2 Morawetz, Corp. § 1075 c; Black, Const. Prohibitions, § 26; Holyoke Water-power Co. v. Lyman, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 500 (21: 138).

The court erred in holding that said Act was not repugnant to that clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution which declares that "No State shall * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 555 (23: 592); Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 31 (25: 992); Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 31 (28: 924); Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 368 (30: 225); New Brunswick v. Fitzgerald, 8 Cent. Rep. 310, 48 N. J. L. 457; State v. Wood, 5 Cent. Rep. 345, 49 N. J. L. 85; McCarthy v. Commonwealth, 1 Cent. Rep. 111, 110 Pa. 243; Morrison v. Bachert, 3 Cent. Rep. 117, 112 Pa. 322; State v. Winsor, 2 Cent. Rep. 259, 48 N. J. L. 95; State v. Bloomfield, 1 Cent Rep. 442, 47 N. J. L. 442; Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. L. 1; Passaic County v. Stevenson, 46 N. J. L. 173; Gibbs v. Morgan, 39 N. J. Eq. 126; Ernest v. Morgan, Id. 391; Woodard v. Brien, 14 Lea, 520; Smith v. Warden, 80 Ky. 608; State v. Herrmann, 75 Mo. 341; Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258; Devine v. Cook County, 84 Ill. 590; Dougherty County v. Boyt, 71 Ga. 484; Scranton School District's Appeal, 1 Cent. Rep. 626; S. C. 4 Cent. Rep. 311, 113 Pa. 176; People v. Haselwood, 3 West. Rep. 538, 116 Ill. 319; Anderson v. Trenton, 42 N. J. L. 486; Zeigler v. Gaddis, 44 N. J. L. 363.

Mr. John H. Rogers, for defendant in error:

It was decided by the Supreme Court of Arkansas in Searcy v. Yarnell, 47 Ark. 269, that private individuals cannot rightfully operate a railroad in this State, this prerogative of sovereignty being accorded to corporations only.

Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 316 (4: 579) said: "The power to tax involves the power to destroy." The Chief Justice, in Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 331 (29: 644) said that "The power to regulate is not the power to destroy."

The right to regulate railroad fares is no longer an open question. It was settled by the Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 307 (29: 636); Stone v. Wisconsin, 94 U. S. 181 (24: 102); Munn v. Illinois, Id. 113 (24: 77); Chicago, B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Iowa, Id. 155 (24: 94).

To classify railroads by length for the purpose of rates has been generally adopted in the Western States.

See 1 Rev. Stat. Mo. 1879, p. 146; Howell, Anno. Stat. Mich. 1882, p. 840, § 3323, sub. secs. 7, 9; Laws Pa. 1876, No. 87, p. 116; Hittell, Code & Stat. Cal. § 5489; Com. Laws Kan. 1879, p. 225, § 57; Acts Wis. 1874, 600, § 4.

Opposing counsel have cited a number of cases from Pennsylvania and New Jersey to show that such a classification is unconstitutional. We call attention to the following cases contra from the same States:

Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 338; Kilgore v. Magee, 85 Pa. 401; Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258; Morrison v. Bachert, 3 Cent. Rep. 117, 112 Pa. 322; Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 377; Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. L. 1; State Board of Assessors v. Central R. R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 310. See also Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. R. Co. v. Clinton County, 1 Ohio St. 85; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 154, note.

If the classification be such that the Act complained of operates uniformly on each class, this is all the Constitution requires.

Chicago, B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155 (24: 94); Little Rock & Ft. S. R. R. Co. v. Hanniford, 5 S. W. Rep. 294.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The general rule of law that governs this case has been clearly stated and developed in opinions of this court, delivered by the late Chief Justice.

In Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113 [24:77], decided at October Term, 1876, after affirming the doctrine that by the common law carriers or other persons exercising a public employment could not charge more than a reasonable compensation for their services, and that it is within the power of the Legislature "to declare what shall be a reasonable compensation for such services, or, perhaps more properly speaking, to fix a maximum beyond which any charge made would be unreasonable," the Chief Justice said: "To limit the rate of charges for services rendered in a public employment, or for the use of property in which the public has an interest, is only changing a regulation which existed before. It establishes no new principle in the law, but only gives a new effect to an old one." Pp. 133, 134 [86, 87].

In Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad

Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155 [24: 94] decided at the same time, a corporation having a perpetual lease of the railroad of another organized under the general Corporation Law of Iowa of 1851, chapter 43, with the same powers as private individuals to make contracts, as well as the power to establish by-laws and make all rules and regulations deemed expedient for the management of its affairs, in accordance with law, was held to be bound by the subsequent Statute of Iowa of 1874, chapter 68, entitled "An Act to Establish Reasonable Maximum Rates of Charges for Transportation of Freight and Passengers on the Different Railroads of This State," by which those railroads were classified according to the gross amount of their earnings per mile for the preceding year; and the compensation per mile, which those of each class might receive for the transportation of a passenger with ordinary baggage, was limited to three cents, three cents and a half, and four cents, respectively. Iowa Laws 1874, p. 61. The Chief Justice said: "Railroad companies are carriers for hire. They are incorporated as such, and given extraordinary powers, in order that they may better serve the public in that capacity. They are, therefore, engaged in a public employment affecting the public interest and, under the decision in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113 [24:77], subject to legislative control as to their rates of fare and freight; unless protected by their charters." "This company, in the transactions of its business, has the same rights, and is subject to the same control, as private individuals under the same circumstances. It must carry when called upon to do so, and can charge only a reasonable sum for the carriage. In the absence of any legislative regulation upon the subject, the courts must decide for it, as they do for private persons, when controversies arise, what is reasonable. But when the Legislature steps in and prescribes a maximum of charge, it operates upon this corporation the same as it does upon individuals engaged in a similar business." 94 U. S. 161, 162 [24: 95].

The same rule was affirmed and acted on in several other cases decided at the same time, in the first of which the Chief Justice, in answering "the claim that the courts must decide what is reasonable, and not the Legislature," said: "Where property has been clothed with a public interest, the Legislature may fix a limit to that which in law shall be reasonable for its use. This limits the courts, as well as the people. If it has been improperly fixed, the Legislature, not the courts, must be appealed to for the change." Peik v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 94 U. S. 164, 178 [24: 97, 98]; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. R. Co. v. Ackley, Id. 179 [24: 99]; Winona & St. P. R. R. Co. v. Blake, Id. 180 [24: 99]; Stone v. Wisconsin, Id. 181 [24: 102].

Upon like grounds, in Ruggles v. Illinois, 108 U. S. 526 [27: 812], and Illinois Central Railroad Company v. Illinois, Id. 541 [27:818], decided at October Term, 1882, the Statute of Illinois of April 15, 1871 (Illinois Laws of 1871, p. 640), which classified the railroads in the State according to their gross annual earnings per mile, and put different limits on the compensation of the different classes per mile for carrying a passenger and his baggage, was adjudged, in opinions delivered by the Chief Justice, to be constitutional and valid, in restricting to the limit of three cents a mile existing corporations, whose charters gave them power to make all by-laws, rules and regulations not repugnant to law, and gave their directors power to establish such rates of toll as they should by their by-laws determine. And two justices who did not assent to those opinions concurred in the judgments, because it was not shown that the rate prescribed by the Legislature was unreasonable.

In Stone v. Farmers Loan & Trust Company, 116 U. S. 307 [29: 636], decided at October Term, 1885, the obligation of a contract, created by a charter granting similar powers to a railroad corporation and its directors, was held not to be impaired by a Statute of Mississippi, establishing a board of railroad commissioners, charged with the duty of preventing the exaction of unreasonable or discriminating rates upon transportation done within the limits of the State; and the Chief Justice said: "It is now settled in this court that a State has power to limit the amount of charges by railroad companies for the transportation of persons and property within its own jurisdiction, unless restrained by some contract in the charter, or unless what is done amounts to a regulation of foreign or interstate commerce." P. 325 [642]. He added, however: "From what has thus been said it is not to be inferred that this power of limitation or regulation is itself without limit. This power to regulate is not a power to destroy; and limitation is not the equivalent of confiscation. Under pretense of regulating fares and freights, the State cannot require a railroad company to carry persons and property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use, without just compensation, or without due process of law." P. 331 [644]. The opinions of the two dissenting justices were grounded upon the provisions of the charter, and upon its not having been expressly made subject to alteration or repeal by the Legislature. The cases, decided at the same time, of Stone v. Illinois Cent. R. R. Co. 116 U. S. 347 [29:650] and Stone v. New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company, Id. 352 [29:651] were substantially similar.

As applied to freights and fares for transportation not extending beyond the limits of the State by which the railroad company is incorporated, the authority of the Legislature is not affected by the later decision in Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557 [30:244].

The case at bar is quite clear of any of the questions upon which the members of the court have heretofore differed in opinion.

If the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company, as reorganized by the purchasers at the sale under the decree of foreclosure of the previous mortgages, was a lawful corporation of the State of Arkansas, it was not the same corporation as that chartered by the Legislature in 1853, but was a new corporation, subject to the provisions of the Constitution and laws in force when it first came into existence, that is to say, in 1877. Memphis & L. R. R. R. Co. v. Railroad Comrs. 112 U. S. 609 [28:837].

The Constitution of Arkansas of 1874 contains the following provisions:

'Corporations may be formed under general laws, which laws may, from time to time, be altered or repealed. The General Assembly shall have power to alter, revoke or annul any charter of incorporation now existing and revocable at the adoption of this Constitution, or that may be hereafter created, whenever, in their opinion, it may be injurious to the citizens of the State, in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators." Art. 12, sec. 6.

"The General Assembly shall pass laws to correct abuses and prevent unjust discrimination and excessive charges by railroad, canal and turnpike companies, for transporting freight and passengers, and shall provide for enforcing such laws by adequate penalties and forfeitures." Art. 17, sec. 10.

The Legislature of Arkansas, by the Statute of April 4, 1887, fixed the maximum fare that any corporation, trustees, or persons, operating a line of railroad, might charge and collect for carrying a passenger within the State, at eight cents a mile on a line fifteen miles long or less, five cents a mile on a line more than fifteen and less than seventy-five miles long, and three cents a mile on a line more than seventy-five miles long. The line of the road of the plaintiffs in error is more than seventy-five miles long, and they charged more than three cents a mile, and were therefore held to be subject to the penalty imposed by the statute for any violation of its provisions.

The plaintiffs in error do not contend that it is always or generally unreasonable to restrict the rate for carrying each passenger to three cents a mile. They argue that it is so in this case, by reason of the admitted fact, that with the same traffic that their road has now, and charging for transportation at the rate of three cents per mile, the net yearly income will pay less than 1 ½ per cent on the original cost of the road, and only a little more than 2 per cent on the amount of its bonded debt. But there is no evidence whatever as to how much money the bonds cost, or as to the amount of the capital stock of the corporation as reorganized, or as to the sum paid for the road by that corporation or its trustees. It certainly cannot be presumed that the price paid at the sale under the decree of foreclosure equalled the original cost of the road, or the amount of outstanding bonded debt. Without any proof of the sum invested by the reorganized corporation or its trustees, the court has no means, if it would under any circumstances have the power, of determining that the rate of three cents a mile fixed by the Legislature is unreasonable. Still less does it appear that there has been any such confiscation as amounts to a taking of property without due process of law.

It is equally clear that the plaintiffs in error have not been denied the equal protection of the laws.

The Legislature, in the exercise of its power of regulating fares and freights, may classify the railroads according to the amount of the business which they have done or appear likely to do. Whether the classification shall be according to the amount of passengers and freight carried, or of gross or net earnings, during a previous year, or according to the simpler and more constant test of the length of the line of the railroad, is a matter within the discretion of the Legislature. If the same rule is applied to all railroads of the same class, there is no violation of the constitutional provision securing to all the equal protection of the laws.

A similar question was presented and decided in Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co. v. Iowa, above cited. It was there objected that a statute regulating the rate for the carriage of passengers, by different classes of railroads, according to their gross earnings per mile, was in conflict with art. 1, sec. 4, of the Constitution of Iowa, which provides that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation," and "the General Assembly shall not grant to any citizen, or class of citizens, privileges or immunities which upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens." In answering that objection, the Chief Justice said: "The statute divides the railroads of the State into classes, according to business, and establishes a maximum of rates for each of the classes. It operates uniformly on each class, and this is all the Constitution requires." "It is very clear that a uniform rate of charges for all railroad companies in the State might operate unjustly upon some. It was proper, therefore, to provide in some way for an adaptation of the rates to the circumstances of the different roads; and the General Assembly, in the exercise of its legislative discretion, has seen fit to do this by a system of classification. Whether this was the best that could have been done is not for us to decide. Our province is only to determine whether it could be done at all, and under any circumstances. If it could, the Legislature must decide for itself, subject to no control from us, whether the common good requires that it should be done." 94 U. S. 163. 164 [24:95, 96].

Judgment affirmed.

JAMES DOOLAN ET AL., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

WILLIAM B. CARR.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 618-642.)

Jurisdiction of circuit court—patent for land—evidence to show it void—Mexican claim, not included in railroad grants—written evidence—oral evidence.

1. Where the controversy in an action turns upon the validity of a patent from the United States, under which plaintiff claims title, in ejectment, which is denied by defendant, the circuit court has jurisdiction of the case, although no citizenship of either party is alleged.

2. In an action at law it is competent to prove, by extrinsic evidence, that a patent of the United States is void for want of power in the officers to issue it, and the facts which show that want of power.

3. Land covered by a Mexican claim is not "public land," within the meaning of the Acts of Congress making grants to railroads, but was reserved from the granting clause of those statutes.

4. To the extent of such claims, when the grant was for land with specific boundaries, or known by a particular name, and also to the extent of the quantity named within outboundaries containing a greater area, Mexican claims are excluded from the grant to the railroad company.

5. Written evidence of the grant by the Mexican Government, of its confirmation by the land commission, of the affirmance of the award of that commission by the District Court of the United States, and by this court, and of the record of two surveys made by the Surveyor of the United States showing the location and confirmation of the Mexican grant, and their dates, is admissible in an action of ejectment, to show title under that grant.

6. Oral evidence, also, is admissible to identify the land in controversy as coming within the Mexican grant, and the surveys of the land office.

[No. 34.]

Argued Oct. 24, 25, 1887. Decided Nov. 21, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover possession of land in California. Reversed.

The case is fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Michael Mullany, for plaintiffs in error:

The United States Circuit Court has no jurisdiction.

Little York Gold W. & W. Co. v. Keyes, 96 U. S. 199 (24: 656); Romie v. Casanova, 91 U. S. 380 (23: 374); Hoadley v. San Francisco, 94 U. S. 4 (24: 34); Dowell v. Griswold, 5 Sawy. 40, 41; Trafton v. Nougues, 4 Sawy. 179; Provident Sav. L. Assur. Soc. v. Ford, 114 U. S. 635 (29: 261); Theurkauf v. Ireland, 27 Fed. Rep. 769.

The proof offered by defendants ought to have been admitted.

Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761 (23:769); Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Dunmeyer, 113 U. S. 642 (28:1126); Rosecrans v. Douglass, 52 Cal. 214; Leavenworth, L. & G. R. R. Co. v. U. S. 92 U. S. 733 (23:634); Patterson v. Winn, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 380 (6:500); Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 530 (24:848); Wilcox v. Jackson, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 509 (10:269); Easton v. Salisbury, 62 U. S. 21 How. 432 (16:183); Kissell v. St. Louis Public Schools, 59 U. S. 18 How. 27 (15:328); Reichert v. Felps, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 160 (18:849); Polk v. Wendal, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 87 (3:665); Carr v. Quigley, 57 Cal. 394; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Shaefer, 94 U. S. 458 (24:252); U. S. v. Minor, 114 U. S. 240 (29:112).

Messrs. A. T. Britton, A. B. Browne and Walter H. Smith, for defendant in error:

The plaintiffs in error did not appeal from the decision of the register. His decision thereupon became final.

Rev. Stat. §§ 441, 453, 2478; Favrey v. Lonsdale, 4 Copp, Land Cas. 12; Weber v. Western Pac. R. R. Co. 6 Copp, Land Cas. 19.

The deed of the Central Pacific Company to the plaintiff was executed by the president and secretary of the company, and was under its corporate seal. Upon such a state of facts the law presumes that the officers did not exceed their authority.

Ang. & Ames, Corp. § 224; Berks & D. Turnpike Road Co. v. Myers, 6 Serg. & R. 12; Antipœda Baptist Church v. Mulford, 8 N. J. L. 188; Adams v. His Creditors, 14 La. 455; Darnell v. Dickens, 4 Yerg. 7; Burrill v. Nahant Bank, 2 Met. 166; Commercial Bank v. Kortright, 22 Wend. 348; Lovett v. Steam Saw Mill Asso. 6 Paige, 54; Johnson v. Bush, 3 Barb. Ch. 207; Reed v. Bradley, 17 Ill. 321.

The question of reservation was a question of fact, or a mixed question of law and fact, for the Land Department to decide, and its decision is conclusive upon all parties.

Johnson v. Towsley, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 72 (20:485); French v. Fyan, 93 U. S. 169 (23:812); Ehrhardt v. Hogaboom, 115 U. S. 67 (29:346); U. S. v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 400 (26:178); Quimby v. Conlan, 104 U. S. 425 (26:802); Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 330-340 (23:424-428); Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 530 (24: 848); St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 640 (26:876).

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

William B. Carr, the defendant in error, brought his action of ejectment in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California against James Doolan and James McCue, to recover possession of 320 acres of land, described as "the east half of section 27, township 2, range 1 east of the Mount Diablo base and meridian, of the public land surveys of the United States of America, in the State of California," and he had judgment for the land.

No citizenship of either party is alleged, and this is urged as a ground of reversal in this court, to which the case has been brought by a writ of error. It, however, appears very clearly that the controversy turns upon the validity of the patent from the United States under which plaintiff claims title, and which was denied by the defendants. The Circuit Court for the District of California, therefore, had jurisdiction of the case as one arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States within the meaning of the Act of March 3, 1875, 18 U. S. Stat. at L. 470.

On the trial before the jury the plaintiff introduced in evidence a patent from the United States to the Central Pacific Railroad Company for the land in question, among many other tracts, dated February 28, 1874. This patent purported to be issued under "the Act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, as amended by the Act of July 2, 1864, to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the government the use of the same for postal, military and other purposes, and the Act of March 3, 1865," and in accordance with the laws of the State of California, by which the Central Pacific Railroad Company and the Western Pacific Railroad Company were consolidated. Although the introduction of this patent was objected to by the defendants, it appears upon its face to be valid, and it was therefore properly admitted as evidence. The plaintiff also introduced a deed of conveyance from the Central Pacific Railroad Company to himself, and, after further evidence as to the use and occupation of the land, its value, and that the amount in controversy was over $10,000, rested.

The defendants, thereupon, in order to show that the patent to the railroad company was issued without authority of law, and therefore void, offered evidence to show "that on, to wit, April 10, A. D. 1839, the Mexican Government granted to José Noriéga and Robert Livermore a certain tract of land known by the name 'Las Pocitas,' and which embraced all the land within the following boundaries, viz.: Bounded on the north by the Lomas de las Cuévas, on the east by the Siérra de Buenos Ayres, on the south by the dividing line of the establishment of San José, and on the west by the rancho of Don José Dolores Pacheco, containing in all two square leagues provided that quantity be contained within the said boundaries; and if less than that quantity be found to be contained therein, then that less quantity and all of said described tract of land.

"That the Departmental Assembly of the Mexican nation confirmed said grant to said Noriêga and Livermore on, to wit, May 22, 1840.

"That on, to wit, February 27, 1852, said Noriêga and Livermore petitioned to the board of land commissioners appointed under the provisions of the Act of Congress, approved March 3, 1851, entitled 'An Act to Ascertain and Settle the Private Land Claims in the State of California', to have said grant confirmed, and on, to wit, the 14th day of February, A. D. 1854, the said board of land commissioners confirmed the same to said Noriêga and Livermore, their heirs and assigns, and the decree of confirmation so made to said Mexican grant by said board of land commissioners described the boundaries thereof to be: On the north by the Lomas de las Cuêvas, on the east by the Siêrra de Buenos Ayres, on the south by the dividing line of the establishment of San José, and on the west by the rancho of Don José Dolores Pacheco, provided that within the same no greater quantity than two square leagues were found to be contained; and if a less quantity should be found therein, then that less quantity was confirmed and all of said described tract of land.

"That the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, on appeal to it from said decree of the board of land commissioners, duly confirmed said Mexican grant on, to wit, February 18, A. D. 1859, to the same extent and by the same description, and under the same conditions as said board of land commissioners had done, and the Supreme Court of the United States, at the December Term, A. D. 1860, affirmed the said decree of said United States District Court and every part thereof.

"That during the year 1865 an official survey of the lands so confirmed to said Noriêga and Livermore was made by or under the directions of the Surveyor-General of the United States for the State of California, and which was duly approved by said surveyor-general in the year A.D. 1866, and which survey included the half section of land described in the complaint herein; that said survey was set aside by the Secretary of the Interior in the year A. D. 1868, and a new survey ordered to be made of said Mexican grant within the boundaries set forth in said decrees, which should contain but two square leagues of land, or thereabouts.

"That in March, 1869, the United States Surveyor-General for California caused the said Mexican grant to be surveyed and designated in accordance with the claims thereof and within the boundaries set forth in said decrees of confirmation, the amount so segregated consisting of about two square leagues, in accordance with the said order of the Secretary of the Interior, and said survey was approved by said surveyor-general on, to wit, May 11, 1870; and the said survey was approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office on, to wit, March 1, 1871; and said survey was finally approved by the Secretary of the Interior on, to wit, June 6, 1871, and on said last named date the surplus (or sobrante) of the land embraced within the boundaries contained in said grant and in said decrees became freed and discharged from the claims and reservation of said Mexican grant, and became public land of the United States and a part of the public domain thereof.

"That the entire half section of land described in the complaint herein is located and embraced within the boundaries stated and tract described in and confirmed by the said decree of the board of land commissioners of the United States District Court and of the Supreme Court of the United States, but it was not included within the tract so surveyed in March, 1869, and finally approved on June 6, A. D. 1871, as aforesaid, as the final survey of said Mexican grant; and said half section of land described in the complaint herein was held and claimed as a part and parcel of said Mexican grant, and was reserved as such continually from the 10th day of April, A.D. 1839, down to the 6th day of June, A. D. 1871, and on said last named day it became for the first time public land of the United States.

"That the line of the road of said Western Pacific Railroad Company of California was definitely fixed under the provisions of said Act of Congress on, to wit, the 30th day of January, 1865, under and within the intent and meaning of the provisions of the Act of Congress of July 1, 1862, entitled 'An Act to Aid in the Construction of a Railroad and Telegraph Line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean,' and the Act amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto; and that, on the 31st day of January, 1865, the lands within the limits designated by said Acts of Congress as being granted to said railroad company were withdrawn from preemption, private entry, and sale under the provisions of said Acts, and that no part of the lands described in the complaint has been taken or used for any depot, shop, switch, turn-out or roadbed of said railroad or of said railroad company; that said railroad was completed prior to the year 1870.

The plaintiff objected to the proof thus offered to be made by the defendants and to other proof not material to the point now under consideration, on the ground "that the United States patent cannot be collaterally attacked in this action; that it can be attacked by bill in equity only; that the said United States patent and the recitals therein contained are conclusive evidence in this action that the legal title of the lands therein described was granted and transferred by the United States to the grantee named in said patent, and, taken in connection with the deed from the railroad company to the plaintiff, is conclusive evidence of the plaintiff's right to recover."

The court sustained the objection, and refused to allow said proof, or any part of it, to be made, to which the defendants excepted. The court then charged the jury that "the patent title to this land to the Central Pacific Railroad Company is conclusive in this case. It cannot be attacked in a collateral manner. If it can be attacked at all it is only by a direct proceeding for the purpose of vacating the patent; and, without further remark upon this, one way or the other, it may be sufficient to say that I charge you the law is that, so far as this case is concerned, the patent from the government to the railroad company, the first patent introduced here, is conclusive of the rights of the parties in this case."

To this charge the defendants excepted, and the case before us turns upon the correctness of the ruling of the court on the proposition that in this action at law none of the evidence offered by the defendants could be received to impeach the validity of the patent, and that such an issue as that attempted to be raised by the defendants could only be made by a suit in equity to set it aside.

There is no question as to the principle that where the officers of the government have issued a patent in due form of law, which on its face is sufficient to convey the title to the land described in it, such patent is to be treated as valid in actions at law, as distinguished from suits in equity, subject, however, at all times to the inquiry whether such officers had the lawful authority to make a conveyance of the title. But if those officers acted without authority; if the land which they purported to convey had never been within their control, or had been withdrawn from that control at the time they undertook to exercise such authority, then their act was void—void for want of power in them to act on the subject matter of the patent, not merely voidable; in which latter case, if the circumstances justified such a decree, a direct proceeding, with proper averments and evidence, would be required to establish that it was voidable, and should therefore be avoided. The distinction is a manifest one, although the circumstances that enter into it are not always easily defined. It is, nevertheless, a clear distinction, established by law, and it has been often asserted in this court, that even a patent from the Government of the United States, issued with all the forms of law, may be shown to be void by extrinsic evidence, if it be such evidence as by its nature is capable of showing a want of authority for its issue.

The decisions of this court on this subject are so full and decisive that a reference to a few of them is all that is necessary. Polk v. Wendal, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 87 [3: 665]; New Orleans v. U. S. 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 730 [9: 599]; Wilcox v. Jackson, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 509 [10: 269]; Stoddard v. Chambers, 43 U. S. 2 How. 317 [11: 282]; Easton v. Salisbury, 62 U. S. 21 How. 428 [16: 182]; Reichert v. Felps, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 160 [18: 849]; Best v. Polk, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 117 [21: 807]; Leavenworth, L. & G. R. R. Co. v. U. S. 92 U. S. 733 [23: 634]; Newhall v. Sanger, Id. 761 [23: 769]; Sherman v. Buick, 93 U. S. 209 [23: 849]; St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636 [26: 875]; Steel v. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. 106 U. S. 447 [27: 226]; Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Dunmeyer, 113 U. S. 642 [28: 1126]; Reynolds v. Iron Silver Mining Co. 116 U. S. 687 [29: 774].

The case of Polk v. Wendal is, perhaps, the earliest one in this court where the subject received full consideration. That was an action of ejectment in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Tennessee. On the trial, the plaintiff, who was also the plaintiff in error, introduced and relied upon a patent from the State of North Carolina, of the date of April 17, 1800, which included the land in controversy. The defendant then offered in evidence a patent issued by the same State, dated August 28, 1795, which also included the land in dispute. The reading of this prior patent was objected to, but, the objections being overruled, the patent was read in evidence. Testimony was then offered to impeach it, and it is upon this branch of the subject that the opinion of the court, delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, is pertinent. After considering the many guards which the statutes provide to secure the regularity of grants and the incipient rights of individuals, as well as to protect the State from imposition, he expresses the view, in language the substance of which has been often since repeated, that, in general, a court of equity appears to be a tribunal better adapted to the object of examining into objections to a patent which affect its validity than a court of law. He then says: "In general, a court of equity is the more eligible tribunal for these questions; and they ought to be excluded from a court of law. But there are cases in which a grant is absolutely void; as where the State has no title to the thing granted, or where the officer had no authority to issue the grant. In such cases the validity of the grant is necessarily examinable at law."

In that case, the court held that it could be shown, as a defense to the patent, that the entries on which it was granted were never made, and that the warrants were forgeries; in which case no right accrued under the Act of 1777, and, no purchase of the land having been made from the State, the grant was void by the express words of the law, and that in rejecting the testimony on this point the circuit court erred. The judgment was, therefore, reversed.

The case of Wilcox v. Jackson, [supra] was an action of ejectment brought against Wilcox, the commanding officer at Fort Dearborn, to recover possession of land held by him in that character. This land was entered under a preemption claim by one Beaubean, who paid the purchase money and procured the register's receipt therefor. He afterwards sold and conveyed his interest to the lessor of the plaintiff. The question was whether the register's certificate, which seems to have been treated as sufficient evidence of title if it was valid, could be impeached by testimony that the land was not subject to entry. In the opinion of the supreme court on this subject the language used in Elliott v. Peirsol, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 340 [7: 170], is quoted with approval:

"Where a court has jurisdiction it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause; and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment until reversed is regarded as binding in every other court. But if it act without authority, its judgments and orders are regarded as nullities. They are not voidable, but simply void."

The court then proceeds: "Now to apply this: Even assuming that the decision of the register and receiver, in the absence of frauds, would be conclusive as to the facts of the applicant then being in possession, and his cultivation during the preceding year, because these questions are directly submitted to them; yet if they undertake to grant preemptions in land in which the law declares that they shall not be granted, then they are acting upon a subject matter clearly not within their jurisdiction, as much so as if a court whose jurisdiction was declared not to extend beyond a given sum should attempt to take cognizance of a case beyond that sum."

In Stoddard v. Chambers, [supra], which was an action of ejectment, an attempt was made to show that the defendant's patent was void. This court said in that case:

"The location of Coontz was made in 1818, and his survey in 1818. At these dates there can be no question that all land claimed under a French or Spanish title, which claim has been filed with the recorder of land titles—as the plaintiff's claim had been—were reserved from sale by the Acts of Congress above stated. This reservation was continued up to the 26th of May, 1829, when it ceased, until it was revived by the Act of July 9, 1832, and was continued until the final confirmation of the plaintiff's title by the Act of 1836. The defendant's patent was issued the 16th of July, 1832. So that it appears that when the defendant's claim was entered, surveyed, and patented, the land covered by it, so far as the location interferes with the plaintiff's survey, was not 'a part of the public land authorized to be sold.' On the above facts the important question arises whether the defendant's title is not void. That this is a question as well examinable at law as in chancery will not be controverted. That the elder legal title must prevail in the action of ejectment is undoubted. But the inquiry here is whether the defendant has any title as against the plaintiff's. And there seems to be no difficulty in answering the question, that he has not. His location was made on lands not liable to be thus appropriated, but expressly reserved; and this was the case when his patent was issued. * * * No title can be held valid which has been acquired against law, and such is the character of the defendant's title, so far as it trenches on the plaintiff's. * * * The issuing of a patent is a ministerial act, which must be performed according to law. A patent is utterly void and inoperative which is issued for land that had been previously patented to another individual. * * * The patent of the defendant, having been for land reserved from such appropriation, is void; and also the survey of Coontz, so far as either conflicts with the plaintiff's title."

These principles were recognized in and governed the decision of the court in Easton v. Salisbury, [supra].

In Reichert v. Felps [supra], which was an action of ejectment, the plaintiff claimed under two patents, of the dates of 1838 and 1853, which the court says "exhibit conclusive evidence of title if the land had not been previously granted, reserved, or appropriated." This was permitted to be proved by the patent of Governor St. Clair, dated February 12, 1799, duly registered in 1804, with a survey made in 1798. This was held to be conclusive evidence that the land was so reserved, and defeated the patents of 1838 and 1853.

In Best v. Polk [supra], the plaintiff, in support of his title in an action of ejectment, produced a patent from the United States, dated March 13, 1847, which seemed in all respects to be regular, granting the section of land described to James Brown in fee, who conveyed to Polk. The defendant Best, being in possession, attempted to defeat this patent by showing that the land in question was reserved under the Treaties of 1832 and 1834 with the Chickasaw Nation of Indians, which authorized members of the tribe who desired to do so, and heads of families, to locate lands, which when so located were to be reserved from sale or other disposition by the United States. The defendant undertook to show that the land on which he was settled, which was the subject of controversy, had been properly located by an Indian, and was therefore not liable to sale at the time that Brown purchased it of the land officers. The court below rejected the evidence because of certain deficiencies in the certificate made by one Edmondson, a register of the land office at Pontotoc, who certified that the land in question was located as a reserve by a Chickasaw Indian, under the treaty, in July, 1839. This court reversed the judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff in the court below, holding that the certificate was sufficient, and that it showed that under the treaty, and by the action of the Indian in settling upon it, and procuring a certificate of that fact from the proper officer, the land had become reserved in the language of the treaty, and that the patent under which the plaintiff claimed was therefore void. Citing also Polk v. Wendal [supra], and Bagnell v. Broderick, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 436 [10:235].

In the case of Reynolds v. Iron Silver Mining Co. 116 U. S. 687 [29: 764], decided last year, which was an action to recover possession of part of a vein or lode of mineral deposit, plaintiff relied on a patent for a placer mine and the contested vein was within the lines of its superficial area extended perpendicularly. The statute on which this patent was issued declared that it should not confer any right to veins known to exist within it at the time the grant was made. Defendants offered evidence to show that the vein in controversy was known to the patentee to exist at the time of his application for the patent.

The circuit court charged the jury that because the defendants had shown no right whatever to the vein, but were in possession as naked trespassers, they could not, in defense of that possession, show this defect in plaintiff's title. But this court (the Chief Justice dissenting) held that this ruling was erroneous, and that, as in all other actions of ejectment, plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of defendants.'

With the principles so well established by these decisions, of the right in an action at law to prove by competent extrinsic evidence that a patent of the United States is void for want of power in the officers to issue it, and the facts which show that want of power, we come to the case of Newhall v. Sanger [supra], which establishes the proposition that land covered by a Mexican claim was not public land within the meaning of the Act of Congress making the grant to the railroads, but was reserved from the granting clause of those statutes.

In Leavenworth, L. & G. R. R. Co. v. U. S. [supra] decided at the same time with Newhall v. Sanger, the opinions in both cases being delivered by Mr. Justice Davis, the question of the right to show this want of authority was also very fully discussed. That was a case in which the railroad company had brought suit in equity to establish its title to tracts of land lying within the Osage country, in Kansas, which had been certified to the Governor of that State as part of the grant made by Congress to aid in the construction of certain railroads. This was done by the supposed authority of the Act of March 3, 1863, 12 U. S. Stat. at L. 772, granting every alternate section of land in the State of Kansas, designated by odd numbers, for ten sections in width, on each side of said road, and of each of its branches.

It also contained the usual reservation, that in case it should appear when the line or route of said railroad and branches was definitely fixed, that the United States had sold any of the land granted, or that the right of preemption or homestead settlement had attached to the same, then the right was given to select other lands; and it provided that any and all lands theretofore reserved to the United States by the Acts of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatever, "be, and the same are hereby, reserved to the United States from the operation of the Act."

The route of the road in that case was located through lands which had belonged to the Osage Indians, and to which their title was not extinguished until September 29, 1865. This court held that, notwithstanding the generality of the granting clause, it was not intended by that statute to grant anything but public lands of the United States at the date of the grant, and that the reservation clause was sufficient to except these lands, then in the possession of the Indians, out of the grant, even if the general language could be construed to include them. The court says: "A special exception of this land was not necessary in these grants, because the policy which dictated them confined them to land which Congress could rightfully bestow, without disturbing existing relations and producing vexatious conflicts. The legislation which reserved it for any purpose, excluded it from disposal as the public lands are usually disposed of."

In the case of Newhall v. Sanger, the object of the suit was to determine the ownership of a quarter section of land in California. The patent under which the appellee claimed was issued in 1870, under the Act of 1862 granting lands to railroad companies for the purpose of constructing a railroad to the Pacific Ocean. 12 U. S. Stat. at L. 492. One of the companies was the Western Pacific Railroad Company, to which was granted every alternate section of public land, designated by odd numbers, within ten miles on each side of its road, not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a homestead or preemption claim may not have attached at the time the line of the road was definitely fixed. The Act also declared, as in other cases, that it should not defeat or impair any preemption, homestead, swamp land, or other lawful claim, nor include any government reservation or mineral lands, or the improvements of any bona fide settler. The appellant asserted title under a patent of the United States of later date, which recited that the land was within the exterior limits of a Mexican grant called Moquelamos, and that a patent had, by mistake, been issued to the company. It was conceded that the land in controversy fell within the limits of the railroad grant as enlarged by the amendatory Act of 1864, 13 Stat. at L. 358, the same Act now under consideration, "and the question arises," said the court, "whether lands within the boundaries of an alleged Mexican or Spanish grant, which was then sub judice, are public within the meaning of the Acts of Congress under which the patent whereon the appellee's title rests was issued to the railroad company."

It will be seen that this is the precise question presented in the case under consideration, and the court, referring to the preceding case of Leavenworth, L. & G. R. R. Co. v. U. S., and reciting the fact that in that case they confined a grant of every alternate section of "land" to such whereto the complete title was absolutely vested in the United States, proceeds: "The Acts which govern this case are more explicit, and leave less room for construction. The words 'public lands' are habitually used in our legislation to describe such as are subject to sale or other disposal under general laws. That they were so employed in this instance is evident from the fact that to them alone could the order withdrawing lands from preemption, private entry, and sale apply." The court then goes on to show that the status of lands included in a Spanish or Mexican claim, pending before tribunals charged with the duty of adjudicating it, was such that the right of private property could not be impaired by a change of sovereignty, and that such lands were not included in the phrase "public lands" of these specific railroad grants, and that until such claims were finally decided to be invalid they were not restored to the body of public lands subject to be granted.

Those Mexican claims were often described, or attempted to be described, by specific boundaries. They were often claims for a definite quantity of land within much larger outboundaries, and they were frequently described by the name of a place or ranch. To the extent of the claim when the grant was for land with specific boundaries, or known by a particular name, and to the extent of the quantity claimed within outboundaries containing a greater area, they are excluded from the grant to the railroad company. Indeed, this exclusion did not depend upon the validity of the claim asserted, or its final establishment, but upon the fact that there existed a claim of a right under a grant by the Mexican Government, which was yet undetermined, and to which therefore the phrase "public lands" could not attach, and which the statute did not include, although it might be found within the limits prescribed on each side of the road when located.

It is objected that the testimony offered in the present case, and rejected by the court below, to prove the facts concerning the Mexican grant which would defeat the patent to the railroad company, is parol, and that even conceding the right to assail the patent in an action at law founded on the title conveyed by it, this cannot be done by parol testimony. But without deciding in this case how far such testimony can be received in an action at law for that purpose, it is sufficient to say that the evidence rejected by the court below in the present case is entirely documentary and matter of record, being the written evidence of the grant by the Mexican Government, of its confirmation by the Land Commission of California, of the affirmance of the award of that commission by the District Court of the United States, and by this court, and of the record of the two surveys made by the Surveyor of the United States, the latter confirmed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, showing the location and confirmation of the Mexican grant, and the dates at which all those transactions occurred. We do not doubt that this evidence was admissible for the purpose for which it was offered, and if any oral testimony were necessary to identify the land in controversy as coming within the Mexican grant, and the surveys of the land office, under the decisions of the courts, we do not think it would be inadmissible, although it is not clear that any such was necessary or was offered.

For the radical error of the court in rejecting this evidence and in the instructions given to the jury on the same point, the judgment is reversed, and the case remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite, dissenting:

I feel compelled to withold my assent to this judgment. The ground of my dissent is not that in a proper case the validity of a patent of the United States for the conveyance of lands may not be attacked in a suit at law by proving that it was issued without the requisite authority, but that this is not a proper case for the application of that rule. To show that I recognize the existence of the right to make such proof, if the person who offers it is in a position to do so, it is only necessary to refer to Simmons v. Wagner, 101 U. S. 260 [25: 910] where, as the organ of the court, I announced its decision, that one in possession under a certificate issued by a proper officer in the regular course of his official duty, showing that he had bought and paid for the land, might successfully defend an action of ejectment brought against him by the holder of a patent issued upon an entry by another party made long after his rights accrued; and this because, after the purchase under which he was in possession, the land was no longer a part of the public domain, and the officers of the United States had no authority in law to sell it a second time.

In my opinion, however, such proof can only be made by one who holds a right at law or in equity which is prior in time to that of the patentee, or by one who claims under the United States by a subsequent grant or some authorized recognition of title. Unless I have misinterpreted the cases on this subject, that has always been the doctrine of this court.

In Polk v. Wendal, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 87 [3: 665], the controversy was between two persons, one holding under a patent issued by the State of North Carolina, dated August 28, 1795, and the other under another patent for the same land, issued by the same State, dated April 17, 1800, and the question was whether, as against the second patent, the first was good. In Wilcox v. Jackson, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 498 [10: 264], the defendant was an officer of the United States, in possession of a military post under the authority of the government, and the plaintiff was the holder of certificates of the register and receiver of the proper land office, showing that he had bought and paid for the land under a preemption entry. The officer in possession, holding under and for the United States, was allowed to prove that at the time of the entry and purchase the land had been reserved from the mass of public lands, and that its sale by the officers of the government was unauthorized and void. In Stoddard v. Chambers, 43 U. S. 2 How. 284 [11: 269], the controversy was between one claiming under a Spanish grant and a patentee under the location of a New Madrid certificate. The confirmation of the grant was not made until after the location, but as the right of the grantee was prior in time to that of the New Madrid claimant, he was permitted to show that the land was reserved from sale, and consequently the location of the certificate was unauthorized, and the patent thereunder invalid. In Easton v. Salisbury, 62 U. S. 21 How. 426 [16:181], the question arose upon substantially the same facts, and was decided in the same way. In Reichert v. Felps, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 160 [18: 849], the holder of a French settler's claim, recognized in the grant by Virginia to the United States of the Northwest Territory, and confirmed or patented by Governor St. Clair, under the Act of June 20, 1788, was permitted to contest the validity of patents issued by the United States for the same land, one in 1838 and one in 1853, on the ground that the land had "been previously granted, reserved from sale, or appropriated," and therefore the patents were inoperative and void. In Best v. Polk, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 112 [21: 805], the parties were the holder of a title under a treaty of the United States with the Chickasaw Nation of Indians, and a junior patentee. The holder of the elder title was permitted to show that when the claim was made under which the subsequent patent was issued the land had been "previously granted, reserved from sale, or appropriated," and consequently no title could be acquired under it. In Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761 [23: 769], one side claimed under a patent issued upon the same railroad grant that is involved in the present suit, and the other under a subsequent patent which recited that "the land was within the exterior limits of a Mexican grant called Moquelamos, and that a patent had, by mistake, been issued to the [railroad] company." Such a junior patentee was allowed in that suit to contest the validity of the elder patent to the company. The case of Leavenworth, L. & G. R. R. Co. v. U. S. 92 U. S. 733 [23: 634], was a suit brought by the United States against the railroad company to quiet its title to lands claimed by the company under a land grant. That of Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Dunmeyer, 113 U. S. 629 [28: 1123], so much relied on, presented the question as between the claimant under a railroad grant and the holder of a patent from the United States issued on a homestead entry made subsequently. Sherman v. Buick, 93 U. S. 209 [23: 849], was between the holder of a patent of the United States and the holder of a patent from the State of California, claiming under a prior grant from the United States of the same land for school purposes. The Smelting Company Cases, 104 U. S. 636 [26: 875], and 106 U. S. 447 [27: 226], were between those claiming under a patent for a placer mining claim and certain occupants of lots in the town site of Leadville which had been reserved from sale prior to the location of the claim. In Reynolds v. Iron Silver Mining Co. 116 U. S. 687 [29: 774], the question was not one of admitting proof to invalidate a patent, but as to the legal effect of a patent for a placer mining claim, and it was held not to include veins or lodes within the boundaries of the claim as located on the surface and extended vertically downwards, if known to exist when the patent was issued. In Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488 [30:1039], decided at the last term, one party held under a conveyance by the State of California of a tract of land which the State claimed under the grant by the United States of swamp and overflowed lands, and the other under a patent from the United States issued upon a preemption entry. Many more cases of a similar character might be cited, but it is needless to pursue them further. They establish beyond all question that if one holds under an older title, or if he is in a position under a junior claim to represent the title of the government, he may attack the validity of a patent in a suit at law on the ground that it was issued without proper authority.

On the other hand, it seems to me equally well settled, that if he who seeks to contest the patent is a volunteer, a mere intruder, he will not be heard. Thus, in Hoofnagle v. Anderson, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 212 [5:437], the contest was between the holders of two Virginia military land warrants, who had made their entries on the same tract of land. One entered and got his patent eighteen months before the other located his warrant. At the trial the holder of the junior warrant sought to show that the former grant was "obtained contrary to law, being founded on a warrant which was issued by fraud or mistake;" but Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The title of the respondent to the particular tract included in his patent was complete before that of the appellant's commenced. It is not doubted that a patent appropriates land. Any defects in the preliminary steps, which are required by law, are cured by the patent. It is a title from its date, and has always been held conclusive against all those whose rights did not commence previous to its emanation. Courts of equity have considered an entry as the commencement of title, and have sustained a valid entry against a patent founded on a prior defective entry, if issued after such valid entry was made. But they have gone no farther. They have never sustained an entry made after the date of the patent. They have always rejected such claims. The reason is obvious. A patent appropriates the land it covers; and that land, being no longer vacant, is no longer subject to location. If the patent has been issued irregularly, the government may provide means for repealing it; but no individual has a right to annul it, to consider the land as still vacant, and appropriate it to himself." This seems to me to be the true rule; and one way the government may adopt to annul a patent which has been issued without authority of law is to grant the land to another, and thus clothe the new grantee with its own power to test the validity of the former proceedings to divest it of title. Such a grantee will thus be made to represent the United States by authority, and he may sue for the land. With such a title, or something equivalent to it, the courts may properly, as has been done heretofore, allow him to assert his own title, that is the title of the government, against one which was apparently granted before. Such an attack on the title would be direct, not collateral, as authority to proceed had been given by the government for that purpose.

In Cooper v. Roberts, 59 U. S. 18 How. 173 [15:338], the suit was brought by one holding title under a patent of the State of Michigan conveying a tract of what was claimed to be school land, against one who had got into possession under a lease by the Secretary of War for mining purposes. The title of the State was adjudged to be good as against the United States and the defendant in possession. The defendant then objected to the plaintiff's right of recovery because "the officers of the State violated the statutes of Michigan in selling the lands, after they were known, or might have been known, to contain minerals." As to this, Mr. Justice Campbell, speaking for the court, p. 182 [341], said: "Without a nice inquiry into these statutes, to ascertain whether they reserve such lands from sale, or into the disputed fact whether they were known, or might have been known, to contain minerals, we are of opinion that the defendant is not in a condition to raise the question on this issue. The officers of the State of Michigan, embracing the chief magistrate of the State, and who have the charge and superintendence of this property, certify this sale to have been made pursuant to law, and have clothed the purchaser with the most solemn evidence of title. The defendant does not claim in privity with Michigan, but holds an adverse right, and is a trespasser upon the land to which her title is attached. Michigan has not complained of the sale, and retains, so far as this case shows, the price paid for it. Under these circumstances we must regard the patent as conclusive of the fact of a valid and regular sale on this issue."

So in Field v. Seabury, 60 U. S. 19 How. 323 [15:650], the same rule appears. There it was said that the question whether a grant from a sovereignty or by legislative authority was obtained by fraud was exclusively between the sovereignty making the grant and the grantee. It seems to me clear that the same rule applies to questions of illegality. The case of Spencer v. Lapsley, 61 U. S. 20 How. 264 [15: 902], is equally significant. There the question was as to the validity of a Mexican grant, and the court refused to investigate the fairness of the grant at the instance of one who had "entered without a color of title," and in so doing said, again speaking through Mr. Justice Campbell, "Neither the State of Coahuila and Texas, nor the Republic of Texas, nor the State of Texas, has taken measures to cancel this grant, nor have they conferred on the defendant any commission to vindicate them from wrong. He is a volunteer. The doctrines of the court do not favor such a litigant."

The last case in this court to which I will refer in the present connection is Ehrhardt v. Hogaboom, 115 U. S. 67 [29:346]. There the suit was brought by one claiming title under a patent of the United States issued to a preemption settler, against one who contended the patent was void because the lands were, at the time of the preemption entry, swamp and overflowed lands which passed to the State of California under an Act of Congress passed in 1850. As a defense to the action the defendant offered to prove the character of the land, but we held this offer was properly denied because he was, as to the land in dispute, "a simple intruder, without claim or color of title. He was, therefore, in no position to call in question the validity of the patent of the United States, * * * and require the plaintiff to vindicate the action of the officers of the Land Department in issuing it."

In some of the state courts the same ruling has been made. Thus, in Crommelin v. Minter, 9 Ala. 594, before the Supreme Court of Alabama in 1846, it was decided that "a patent fraudulently obtained, or which has issued in violation of law, is void, and does not authorize a recovery against a party in possession under color of title. But a mere intruder cannot insist on the invalidity of the patent." And so in Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 295, it was held by the Supreme Court of California, in 1860, that "a patent not void upon its face cannot be questioned, either collaterally or directly, by persons who do not show themselves to be in privity with a common or paramount source of title;" and the court, in delivering its opinion, was careful to say, "the point here is as to the status of the party who can raise any question as to its [the patent's] validity, when it is regular on its face."

I cannot but believe this is the true doctrine. If the government is satisfied with what has been done, all others must be; and it will be deemed in law to be satisfied, unless it proceeds itself to correct the error or authorizes some one else to do so.

It only remains to consider what position Doolan and McCue occupy in this litigation. The land was patented to the Central Pacific Railroad Company February 28, 1874, and the railroad company conveyed to Carr, the plaintiff below, June 10, 1874. No attempt has been made by the United States, so far as this record discloses, to annul the patent. On the 10th of November, 1882, Doolan and McCue each entered on 160 acres of the land under a claim of preemption settlement. Each of them then made and subscribed a declaratory statement of his intention to claim and preempt the land on which he had settled under the laws of the United States, and presented it to the register of the proper land office, but he refused to receive it on the ground of the existence of the patent to the railroad company. This is all the claim of title which they have; but the decisions are uniform to the effect that what had thus been done conferred on them no rights as against the United States. Certainly it gave them no right to represent the United States in a suit to avoid the patent which had been issued.

In Frisbie v. Whitney, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 187 [19:668], it appeared that in March, 1862, this court decided that what had been supposed to be a valid Mexican grant of the Soscol Ranch was void for want of authority in the Mexican Government to make it. At the time of this decision Frisbie was in possession of the quarter section involved in the suit under the Mexican title. Whitney afterwards took forcible possession of the same quarter section and claimed to hold it as a settler under the preemption laws of the United States. He applied to the proper land officers to make his declaration under the statute, but they refused to receive it. On the 3d of March, 1863, Congress passed an Act, chap. 116, 12 Stat. at L. 806, by which the bona fide purchasers under the Mexican title were allowed to buy the lands from the United States. Frisbie availed himself of this statute and got his patent. Whitney then sued him for a conveyance of the legal title because of the alleged superior equity which he, Whitney, had acquired by his preemption settlement. This court however decided that a settlement on the public lands of the United States, no matter how long continued, conferred no right against the government, and, it was added, "the land continues subject to the absolute disposing power of Congress until the settler has made the required proof of settlement and improvement and has paid the requisite purchase money." For this reason the title of Frisbie was sustained and the bill dismissed. The Yosemite Valley Case, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 77 [21: 82], is to the same effect.

It has also been held that a right of preemption can never be acquired by intrusion upon the actual possession of another. Trenouth v. San Francisco, 100 U. S. 251 [25:626]; Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 513 [24:732]. In the present case, Carr alleges that he was in possession when the entry was made by Doolan and McCue, and this is not denied except by saying that Carr was not ousted at any time while he was the owner of the land.

As these parties have received from the government no recognition of their preemption entries, therefore, and have not paid the purchase money, they stand before the law as mere volunteers and intruders on the possession of the patentees. They do not and cannot represent the title of the United States as against the patent, and are not entitled to be heard in opposition to it. As to them, in their present situation, the land was as much segregated from the public domain by the issue of the patent as it would have been if there were no dispute about the authority for its issue.

To show that Congress has been accustomed to treat such preemption settlers as mere intruders and entitled to no consideration by the government, it is only necessary to refer to the Act for the relief of purchasers of parts of the Soscol Ranch, just cited, and the Act passed March 3, 1887, chap. 376, 24 Stat. at L. 556, which directs the Secretary of the Interior immediately to adjust, in accordance with the decisions of this court, each of the land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, and therefore unadjusted, and to demand from the several companies a relinquishment of their title to all lands that had been erroneously certified or patented. It there provides, § 4, that if any of the lands so erroneously certified or patented, with a few specified exceptions, have "been sold by the grantee company to citizens of the United States, or to persons who have declared their intention to become such citizens, the person or persons so purchasing in good faith, his heirs or assigns, shall be entitled to the land so purchased, upon making proof of the fact of such purchase at the proper land office, within such time and under such rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, after the grants respectively shall have been adjusted; and patents of the United States shall issue therefor, and shall relate back to the date of the original certification or patenting, and the Secretary of the Interior, on behalf of the United States, shall demand payment from the company which has so disposed of such lands of an amount equal to the government price of similar lands; and in case of neglect or refusal of such company to make payment as hereafter specified, within ninety days after the demand shall have been made, the attorney-general shall cause suit or suits to be brought against such company for the said amount."

I cannot believe that one whose claim to rights under the laws of the United States is thus ignored by Congress in what was decided in Frisbie v. Whitney, ubi supra, to be valid legislation, can avail himself of a want of authority in the officers of the government to issue a patent which is valid on its face, to protect himself against eviction from the patented land on which he has entered as a trespasser and without any color of title.

J. P. and Z. T. ADDINGTON, Plffs. in Err.,

v.

GEORGE ADAMS ET AL.

(See S. C. "Addington v. Burke," Reporter's ed. 696.)

Dismissal on settlement.

It having been suggested that this suit has been compromised, and that it has been stipulated by the parties that it shall be dismissed, the court orders that, unless the plaintiffs in error show cause to the contrary within the time fixed by the court, the suit will be dismissed; and, no cause having been shown at the time appointed, the suit is dismissed.

[No. 8.]

Submitted Oct. 13, 1887. Decided Dec. 5, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. L. Potter and Sawnie Robertson, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. M. L. Crawford, for defendants in error.

On October 17, 1887, Mr. Chief Justice Waite announced the following opinion and order of the court:

It having been suggested that this cause has been compromised and the debt paid, and that a stipulation has been entered into by the parties to the effect that the plaintiffs in error shall dismiss the suit,—

It is ordered that unless the plaintiffs in error show cause to the contrary on or before the fourth Monday in November, the writ be dismissed. The clerk will serve a copy of this order at once on the counsel for the plaintiffs in error of record, through the mail.

On December 5, 1887, the above order having been duly served, Mr. Chief Justice Waite announced the following order:

This cause is dismissed under the order made October 17, 1887, no cause having been shown to the contrary as then required.

The clerk will preserve as part of the record the evidence of service of the order of October 17.

EAST TENNESSEE, VIRGINIA AND GEORGIA RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

SOUTHERN TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 695, 696.)

Dismissal after settlement.

It having been shown to this court that there does not any longer exist any real controversy between the parties to this suit, about the matters originally involved, and that, by arrangement, the defendant in error is no longer a contestant in the cause, the court after notice to the parties and hearing, dismissed the case with costs.

[No. 107.]

Submitted Dec. 13, 1887. Argued March 20, 1888. Decided April 9, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Alabama, to review a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the Southern Telegraph Company, that it have and enjoy certain rights, ways and easements on making just compensation therefor to the plaintiff in error. Writ of error dismissed.

On January 9, 1888, Mr. Chief Justice Waite announced the following order, to wit:

It having been suggested to us that there is no longer any real controversy between the parties to this suit about the matters therein originally involved, and that the Western Union Telegraph Company is at this time practically both plaintiff and defendant, it is ordered that this writ of error be dismissed unless the plaintiff in error show cause to the contrary on or before the 17th day of February. The clerk will serve a copy of this order at once on the counsel of record for the plaintiff in error, through the mail.

The above order having been served as therein directed,—

On February 20, 1888, Mr. Chief Justice Waite announced the following further order, to wit:

The showing made in this case against the order to dismiss does not satisfy us that there exists any longer a real controversy in the suit. It is conceded that the Western Union Telegraph Company is now occupying the line under a contract with the Railroad Company which gives it an exclusive right in that behalf, and it is not denied that some arrangement has been made with the Southern Telegraph Company by which that Company no longer is a contestant in the cause. Time is given the Railroad Company until the 19th day of March next to make a further showing in the premises if it desires to do so.

Mr. Gaylord B. Clark, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. W. A. Gunter, and H. C. Semple filed a brief for defendant in error.

On April 9, 1888, Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

It was suggested by a letter from counsel employed on one side of this suit that his party had sold out the interest which it had to the other party, who was prosecuting it now and was dominus litis on both sides. A ruling was made some time ago, before the death of the late Chief Justice, in effect that there was sufficient evidence to that effect to require the case to be dismissed, unless the side now prosecuting it for decision would show satisfactory evidence that it was a bona fide suit. Two attempts have been made, and we are agreed in the opinion that they are both failures, and that the original order should now be carried out, dismissing the case on the grounds set forth in the opinion of the Chief Justice, delivered at the time.

Dismissed with costs.

QUIN BOHANAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
STATE OF NEBRASKA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 692.)

Review in criminal case where prisoner has escaped.

Where the plaintiff in error was convicted of murder in a state court, and the judgment on such conviction was affirmed by the highest court in the State, and, by a writ of error, the cause was removed to this court, and during the pendency of the writ the plaintiff in error escaped and is not within the control of the court below, the submission of the cause will be set aside; and, unless the plaintiff in error is brought within the jurisdiction and under the control of the court below within the time specified in the order of this court, the cause will be thereafter left off the docket, until directions to the contrary.

[No. 501.]

Submitted Oct. 11, 1887. Decided Oct. 17, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Nebraska, to review a judgment of that court affirming a judgment on a conviction for murder.

This case was before this court in April, 1886, on motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction. The motion was denied; the court holding that "Bohanan set up specifically an immunity from a second trial for the same offense, by reason of article V of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States. This was denied him by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the State, and we have jurisdiction to review that decision. Upon a motion to dismiss, we cannot consider the merits of the question on which our jurisdiction depends, and no motion has been made to affirm."

See 118 U. S. 231, 30 L. ed. 71.

Messrs. Chas. O. Whedon, Chas. E. Magoon and O. P. Mason, for plaintiff in error:

To hear or not to hear the claim of this man to his life lies within the discretion of the court; and the issue being not only one of life or death to this plaintiff in error, but of far-reaching power, unceasing interest and illimitable value, not only to the present citizens of the Republic but to the generations yet to be, we are persuaded that the court will direct its discretion in the way of the public interest, and hear and determine the questions of rights and immunities of American citizenship herein presented.

Smith v. U. S. 94 U. S. 97 (24:32).

Mr. William Leese, Atty-Gen. of Nebraska, for defendant in error:

It is a well settled rule that an escaped convict cannot successfully maintain an appeal; and this rule prevails in over one half of the States, as well as in this court.

McGowan v. People, 104 Ill. 100; People v. Redinger, 55 Cal. 290; Commonwealth v. Andrews, 97 Mass. 543; People v. Genet, 59 N. Y. 80; Wilson v. Commonwealth, 10 Busb. 526; 9 Crim. Law. Mag. 439; Smith v. U. S. 94 U. S. 97 (24:32); Sargent v. State, 96 Ind. 63.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

It appearing that during the pendency of this writ the plaintiff in error has escaped, and is not now within the control of the court below, either actually, by being in custody, or constructively, by being out on bail, it is ordered that the submission of the cause be set aside; and that, unless the plaintiff in error is brought or comes within the jurisdiction and under the control of the court below, on or before the last day of this term, the cause be thereafter left off the docket until directions to the contrary. Smith v. U. S. 94 U. S. 97 [24: 32].

CITY OF SHREVEPORT, LOUISIANA,
Plff. in Err.,
v.
JOHN R. HOLMES.

SAME, Plff. in Err., v. JOHN B. CROOKS.

SAME, Plff. in Err., v. E. H. CARTER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 694.)

Rehearing denied.

The judgments in these cases, having been affirmed by a divided court, petitions for rehearing of them are denied, no important constitutional question being involved.

[Nos. 1121, 1122, 1123.]

Submitted Oct. 17, 1887. Decided Nov. 14, 1887. Rehearing refused Jan. 9, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Louisiana.

On petitions for rehearing. Denied.

These actions were upon bonds of the City of Shreveport, and were originally commenced in the State Court of Louisiana, and were from thence removed to the Circuit Court of the United States. In that court judgment was rendered against the City, from which judgment a writ of error was taken to this court, where the judgments were affirmed with costs and interest, by a divided court. The plaintiff in error petitioned for a rehearing.

Messrs. N. C. Blanchard and T. Alexander, for plaintiff in error and for petitioner.

Mr. A. H. Leonard, for defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

These petitions are denied. The rehearing was granted in Home Insurance Co. v. New York, 119 U. S. 129 [30:350], after a decision by a divided court, because an important constitutional question was involved. The questions in these cases are not of that character.

WILLIAM L. ROYALL
v.
STATE OF VIRGINIA.

(See S. C. "In Re Royall." Reporter's ed. 696, 697.)

Motion to give effect to judgment.

Where a state judgment has been reversed by this court and the cause remanded, this court will not grant a motion to give effect to its judgment where it does not appear that application has been made to the state court to carry the mandate of this court into effect.

[No. 1351 of October Term, 1886.]

Submitted Feb. 17, 1888. Decided Feb. 20, 1888.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia.

For a report of the case see Book 30, p. 883, Reporter's ed. Vol. 121, p. 102.

Motion to give effect to the judgment of this court. Denied.

The following is the petition on which this motion is made:

To the Honorable Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Your petitioner, William L. Royall, would respectfully show that in a prosecution against him in the Hustings Court of the City of Richmond, by the Commonwealth of Virginia, he was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of fifty dollars. Your petitioner applied to the Supreme Court of Appeals of said State for a writ of error to reverse this judgment, but that court refused to award the same. Your petitioner then applied to this Honorable Court for a writ of error, which was awarded, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia was reversed at the last term of this court, and this court's mandate was sent to said supreme court of appeals directing it to reverse the judgment of said Hustings Court.

Your petitioner placed the mandate of this court in the hands of Hon. L. L. Lewis, president of the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia, in the month of June, 1887, and prayed that such proceedings might be taken as would cause the judgment of said Hustings Court to be reversed. Nevertheless, up to this day said Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia has taken no action in the matter, and the judgment and sentence of said Hustings Court of the City of Richmond against your petitioner remains in full force and unreversed. Your petitioner prays, therefore, that this Honorable Court will take such action in the premises as will cause said judgment to be reversed. The said Supreme Court of Appeals and the said Hustings Court are both in session at this time.

WM. L. ROYALL.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This motion is denied. It does not appear that the petitioner has ever applied to the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia to carry the mandate of this court into effect.

END OF VOL. 125.

CASES

ARGUED AND DECIDED

IN THE

SUPREME COURT

OF THE

UNITED STATES

IN

OCTOBER TERM, 1887.

Vol. 126.

REFERENCE TABLE

OF SUCH CASES

DECIDED IN U. S. SUPREME COURT,

OCTOBER TERM, 1887,

AND REPORTED HEREIN,

VOL. 126,

AS ALSO APPEAR IN

OFFICIAL REPORTER'S EDITION.

Off. Reg. 126 U. S.	Title.	Here in.	Off. Reg. 126 U. S.	Title.	Here in.
1	TELEPHONE CASES.	963	539–541	" "	991
	(Dolbear v. American Bell Tel. Co.		541–544	" "	992
			544–547	" "	993
	Molecular Tel. Co. v. American Bell Tel. Co.		547–550	" "	994
			550–553	" "	995
	American Bell Tel. Co. v. Molecular Tel. Co.		553–556	" "	996
			556–559	" "	997
	Clay Commercial Tel. Co. v. American Bell Tel. Co.		559–562	" "	998
			562–565	" "	999
	People's Telephone Co. v. American Bell Tel. Co.		565–568	" "	1000
			568–570	" "	1001
	Overland Telephone Co. v. American Bell Tel. Co.)		570–573	" "	1002
			573–576	" "	1003
531–532	" "	988	576–579	" "	1004
532–536	" "	989	579–582	" "	1005
536–539	" "	990	582–584	" "	1006

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

AT

OCTOBER TERM, 1887.

[Authenticated copy of opinion record strictly followed, except as to such reference words and figures as are inclosed in brackets.]

TELEPHONE CASES.

AMOS E. DOLBEAR ET AL., Appts., v. AMERICAN BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY.

MOLECULAR TELEPHONE COMPANY ET AL., Appts., v. SAME ET AL.

AMERICAN BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY ET AL., Appts.,
v.
MOLECULAR TELEPHONE COMPANY ET AL.

CLAY COMMERCIAL TELEPHONE COMPANY ET AL., Appts.,
v.
AMERICAN BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY ET AL.

PEOPLE'S TELEPHONE COMPANY ET AL., Appts., v. SAME.

OVERLAND TELEPHONE COMPANY ET AL., Appts., v. SAME.

Bell's telephone patent—scope of—process of transmitting speech—discovery and invention involved—right to a patent—case of O'Reilly v. Morse—useful art—perfection in—magnets and variable resistance method—Reis', McDonough's, Van der Weyde's, Varley's, and Drawbaugh's patents and discoveries considered—interpolation—incorporation—foreign patent—Bell's patent of 1887.

1. The 5th claim of the patent to Alexander Graham Bell of March 7, 1876, for "Improvement in Telegraphy," which is as follows:

"The method of, and apparatus for, transmitting vocal or other sounds telegraphically, as herein described, by causing electrical undulations, similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the said vocal or other sounds, substantially as set forth:"

Embraces the art of transferring to or impressing upon an undulatory current of electricity the vibrations of air produced by the human voice in articulate speech, in such a way that the speech will be carried to and received by a listener at a distance on the line of the current.

2. Articulate speech is included in the description of the patent, for it is an "uttered sound" produced by the human voice; and the sound of articulate speech is one of the "vocal or other sounds" referred to in the claim.

3. Bell discovered that this process of transmitting speech could be accomplished by gradually changing the intensity of a continuous electric current, so as to make it correspond exactly to the changes in the density of the air caused by the sound of the voice. This was his art. He then devised a way in which these changes of intensity could be made and speech actually transmitted. Thus his art was put in a condition for practical use.

4. In doing this, both discovery and invention were involved; discovery in finding the art, and invention in devising the means of making it useful.

5. For such discoveries and such inventions, the discoverer and inventor has the right to a patent, as discoverer, for the useful art, process or method of doing a thing he has found; and as inventor, for the means he has devised to make his discovery one of actual value.

6. The case of O'Reilly v. Morse, 15 How. 62, sustains Bell's claim. It was, in that case, held, that the use of magnetism as a motive power, without regard to the particular process with which it was connected in the patent, could not be claimed, but that its use in that connection could. Bell's claim is not one for the use of electricity distinct from the particular process with which it is connected in his patent.

7. The patent for the art does not necessarily involve a patent for the particular means employed for using it. An art or process which is useful is as much the subject of a patent as a machine, manufacture, or composition of matter.

8. The law does not require that a discoverer or inventor, in order to get a patent for a process, should have brought his art to the highest degree of perfection. It is enough if he describes his method with sufficient precision to enable those skilled in the matter to understand what the process is, and if he points out some practicable way of putting it in operation.

9. Bell's patent is not only for the particular apparatus he describes, but for the process that apparatus was designed to bring into use; the process can be operated "by the vibration or motion of bodies capable of inductive action, or by the vibration of the conducting wire itself in the neighborhood of such bodies," which is the magneto method; or "by alternately increasing and diminishing the resistance of the circuit, or by alternately increasing and diminishing the power of the battery," which is the variable resistance method. The patent is for both the magneto and variable resistance methods, and for the particular magneto apparatus described or its equivalent.

10. A patent for such a discovery is not to be confined to the mere means improvised to prove the reality of the conception.

11. Bell discovered that the intermittent current could not be made to reproduce the delicate forms of the air vibrations caused by the human voice in articulate speech, but that the true way was to operate on an unbroken current by increasing and diminishing its intensity, called a vibratory or undulatory current. This discovery was new.

12. Reis did not anticipate Bell's discovery. Reis discovered how to produce musical tones; but he did no more; he never succeeded in actually transmitting speech. He worked upon the principle previously suggested by Bourseul.

13. James W. McDonough, in what he asked for in his application for a patent filed April 10, 1876, was anticipated by Reis. Vander Weyde copied Reis. Bell taught him how to transmit speech.

14. Varley's English patents granted June 2, 1868, and October 8, 1870, did not include Bell's discovery.

15. Drawbaugh may have conceived the idea that speech could be transmitted to a distance by means of electricity, and was experimenting on the subject, but he did not discover the art of doing it before Bell did.

16. It is not established by the evidence in this case that Bell's application, as originally filed, did not contain his present fourth claim, or any description of the variable resistance method; nor that such claim and description were surreptitiously interpolated afterwards.

17. The Massachusetts Statutes duly authorized the organization of the American Bell Telephone Company as a corporation, and made the statutory certificate evidence of its corporate existence.

18. Section 4887 of the United States Revised Statutes does not make an American patent invalid which does not bear the same date as a foreign patent for the same invention, but only limits its term.

19. The fifth claim of Bell's patent of January 30, 1877, is not anticipated by the Schellen magnet. The patent is not for the magnet, but for the telephone of which it forms a part.

[Nos. 10, 361, 362, 709, 770, 771.]

Argued Jan. 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, Feb. 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 1887. Decided March 19, 1888.

NO. 10, the Dolbear Case, is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Affirmed.

Reported below in 15 Fed. Rep. 448, and 17 Fed. Rep. 604.

Nos. 361 and 362, in the Molecular Case, are appeals from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed so far as it is in favor of the Bell Company and reversed so far as it is against that company on the 5th claim of the patent of Jan. 30, 1877, and a decree directed to that extent in its favor.

Reported below in 32 Fed. Rep. 214.

No. 709, the Clay Commercial Case, is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Affirmed.

No. 770, the People's Company Case, is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

Reported below in 22 Fed. Rep. 309 and 25 Fed. Rep. 725. See also 31 Fed. Rep. 729 and 27 Fed. Rep. 663.

No. 771, the Overland Company's Case, is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

A statement of the proceedings in each of these cases is hereinafter given.

These actions were brought by the American Bell Telephone Company and others for infringement of two Letters Patent, issued to Alexander Graham Bell, of which the plaintiffs were owners, known as the Bell Telephone Patent, the one being No. 174,465, dated March 7, 1876, issued on an application sworn to January 20, 1876, and filed February 14, 1876, for "Improvements in Telegraphy," the other being No. 186, 787, dated January 30, 1887, issued on an application filed January 15,1887, for "Improvements in Electric Telephony." The decree in the court below in each case was against the defendants except in the case of the Molecular Telephone Company in which a decree was entered for the complainants upon the 5th claim of said Letters Patent No. 174,465, and the sixth, seventh and eighth claims of said Letters Patent No. 186,787, and in favor of the defendants upon the fifth claim of the last named patent; both the defendants and the complainants appealed in that case from the portions of the decree decided against them severally. In each of the other cases, the defendants appealed.

The following are copies of the drawings and specifications of Bell's two patents upon which the suits were brought:

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE.

ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL, OF SALEM, MASSACHUSETTS.

Improvement in Telegraphy.

Specification forming part of Letters Patent No. 174,465, dated March 7, 1876.

Application filed February 14, 1876.

To all whom it may concern:

Be it known that I, ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL, of Salem, Massachusetts, have invented certain new and useful improvements in Telegraphy, of which the following is a specification:

In Letters Patent granted to me April 6, 1875, No. 161,739, I have described a method of, and apparatus for, transmitting two or more telegraphic signals simultaneously along a single wire by the employment of transmitting instruments, each of which occasions a succession of electrical impulses differing in rate from the others; and of receiving instruments, each tuned to a pitch at which it will be put in vibration to produce its fundamental note by one only of the transmitting instruments; and of vibratory circuit-breakers operating to convert the vibratory movement of the receiving instrument into a permanent make or break (as the case may be) of a local circuit, in which is placed a Morse sounder, register, or other telegraphic apparatus. I have also therein described a form of autograph telegraph based upon the action of the above-mentioned instruments.

In illustration of my method of multiple telegraphy I have shown in the patent aforesaid, as one form of transmitting instrument, an electro-magnet having a steel-spring armature which is kept in vibration by the action of a local battery. This armature in vibrating makes and breaks the main circuit, producing an intermittent current upon the line-wire. I have found, however, that upon this plan the limit to the number of signals that can be sent simultaneously over the same wire is very speedily reached; for, when a number of transmitting instruments, having different rates of vibration, are simultaneously making and breaking the same circuit, the effect upon the main line is practically equivalent to one continuous current.

In a pending application for Letters Patent, filed in the United States Patent Office February 25, 1875, I have described two ways of producing the intermittent current—the one by actual make and break of contact, the other by alternately increasing and diminishing the intensity of the current without actually breaking the circuit. The current produced by the latter method I shall term, for distinction's sake, a pulsatory current.

My present invention consists in the employment of a vibratory or undulatory current of electricity in contradistinction to a merely intermittent or pulsatory current, and of a method of, and apparatus for, producing electrical undulations upon the line-wire.

The distinction between an undulatory and a pulsatory current will be understood by considering that electrical pulsations are caused by sudden or instantaneous changes of intensity, and that electrical undulations result from gradual changes of intensity exactly analogous to the changes in the density of air occasioned by simple pendulous vibrations. The electrical movement, like the aerial motion, can be represented by a sinusoidal curve or by the resultant of several sinusoidal curves.

Intermittent or pulsatory and undulatory currents may be of two kinds, accordingly as the successive impulses have all the same polarity or are alternately positive and negative.

The advantages I claim to derive from the use of an undulatory current in place of a merely intermittent one are, first, that a very much larger number of signals can be transmitted simultaneously on the same circuit; second, that a closed circuit and single main battery may be used; third, that communication in both directions is established without the necessity of special induction-coils; fourth, that cable despatches may be transmitted more rapidly than by means of an intermittent current or by the methods at present in use; for, as it is unnecessary to discharge the cable before a new signal can be made, the lagging of cable-signals is prevented; fifth, and that as the circuit is never broken a spark-arrester becomes unnecessary.

It has long been known that when a permanent magnet is caused to approach the pole of an electro-magnet a current of electricity is induced in the coils of the latter, and that when it is made to recede a current of opposite polarity to the first appears upon the wire. When, therefore, a permanent magnet is caused to vibrate in front of the pole of an electro-magnet an undulatory current of electricity is induced in the coils of the electro-magnet, the undulations of which correspond, in rapidity of succession, to the vibrations of the magnet, in polarity to the direction of its motion, and in intensity to the amplitude of its vibration.

That the difference between an undulatory and an intermittent current may be more clearly understood, I shall describe the condition of the electrical current when the attempt is made to transmit two musical notes simultaneously—first upon the one plan and then upon the other. Let the interval between the two sounds be a major third; then their rates of vibration are in the ratio of 4 to 5. Now, when the intermittent current is used the circuit is made and broken four times by one transmitting instrument in the same time that five makes and breaks are caused by the other. A and B, Figs. 1, 2, and 3, represent the intermittent currents produced, four impulses of B being made in the same time as five impulses of A. c c c, &c., show where and for how long time the circuit is made, and d d d, &c., indicate the duration of the breaks of the circuit. The line A and B shows the total effect upon the current when the transmitting instruments for A and B are caused simultaneously to make and break the same circuit. The resultant effect depends very much upon the duration of the make relatively to the break. In Fig. 1 the ratio is as 1 to 4; in Fig. 2, as 1 to 2; and in Fig. 3 the makes and breaks are of equal duration. The combined effect, A and B, Fig. 3, is very nearly equivalent to a continuous current.

When many transmitting instruments of different rates of vibration are simultaneously making and breaking the same circuit, the current upon the main line becomes for all practical purposes continuous.

Next, consider the effect when an undulatory current is employed. Electrical undulations, induced by the vibration of a body capable of inductive action, can be represented graphically, without error, by the same sinusoidal curve which expresses the vibration of the inducing body itself, and the effect of its vibration upon the air; for, as above stated, the rate of oscillation in the electrical current corresponds to the rate of vibration of the including body—that is, to the pitch of the sound produced. The intensity of the current varies with the amplitude of the vibration—that is, with the loudness of the sound; and the polarity of the current corresponds to the direction of the vibrating body—that is, to the condensations and rarefactions of air produced by the vibration. Hence, the sinusoidal curve A or B, Fig. 4, represents, graphically, the electrical undulations induced in a circuit by the vibration of a body capable of inductive action.

The horizontal line line a d e f, &c., represents the zero of current. The elevations b b b, &c., indicate impulses of positive electricity. The depressions c c c, &c., show impulses of negative electricity. The vertical distance b d or c f of any portion of the curve from the zero-line expresses the intensity of the positive or negative impulse at the part observed, and the horizontal distance a a indicates the duration of the electrical oscillation. The vibrations represented by the sinusoidal curves B and A, Fig. 4, are in the ratio aforesaid, of 4 to 5—that is, four oscillations of B are made in the same time as five oscillations of A.

The combined effect of A and B, when induced simultaneously on the same circuit, is expressed by the curve A + B, Fig. 4, which is the algebraical sum of the sinusoidal curves A and B. This curve A + B also indicates the actual motion of the air when the two musical notes considered are sounded simultaneously. Thus, when electrical undulations of different rates are simultaneously induced in the same circuit, an effect is produced exactly analogous to that occasioned in the air by the vibration of the inducing bodies. Hence, the coexistence upon a telegraphic circuit of electrical vibrations of different pitch is manifested not by the obliteration of the vibratory character of the current, but by peculiarities in the shapes of the electrical undulations, or, in other words, by peculiarities in the shapes of the curves which represent those undulations.

There are many ways of producing undulatory currents of electricity, dependent for effect upon the vibrations or motions of bodies capable of inductive action. A few of the methods that may be employed I shall here specify. When a wire, through which a continuous current of electricity is passing, is caused to vibrate in the neighborhood of another wire, an undulatory current of electricity is induced in the latter. When a cylinder, upon which are arranged bar-magnets, is made to rotate in front of the pole of an electro-magnet, an undulatory current of electricity is induced in the coils of the electro-magnet.

Undulations are caused in a continuous voltaic current by the vibration or motion of bodies capable of inductive action; or by the vibration of the conducting wire itself, in the neighborhood of such bodies. Electrical undulations may also be caused by alternately increasing and diminishing the resistance of the circuit, or by alternately increasing and diminishing the power of the battery. The internal resistance of a battery is diminished by bringing the voltaic elements nearer together, and increased by placing them farther apart. The reciprocal vibration of the elements of a battery, therefore, occasions an undulatory action in the voltaic current. The external resistance may also be varied. For instance, let mercury or some other liquid form part of a voltaic circuit, then the more deeply the conducting wire is immersed in the mercury or other liquid, the less resistance does the liquid offer to the passage of the current. Hence, the vibration of the conducting wire in mercury or other liquid included in the circuit occasions undulations in the current. The vertical vibrations of the elements of a battery in the liquid in which they are immersed produces an undulatory action in the current by alternately increasing and diminishing the power of the battery.

In illustration of the method of creating electrical undulations, I shall show and describe one form of apparatus for producing the effect. I prefer to employ for this purpose an electro-magnet, A, Fig. 5, having a coil upon only one of its legs, b. A steel-spring armature, c, is firmly clamped by one extremity to the uncovered leg d of the magnet, and its free end is allowed to project above the pole of the covered leg. The armature c can be set in vibration in a variety of ways, one of which is by wind, and, in vibrating, it produces a musical note of a certain definite pitch.

When the instrument A is placed in a voltaic circuit, g b e f g, the armature c becomes magnetic, and the polarity of its free end is opposed to that of the magnet underneath. So long as the armature c remains at rest, no effect is produced upon the voltaic current, but the moment it is set in vibration to produce its musical note a powerful inductive action takes place, and electrical undulations traverse the circuit g b e f g. The vibratory current passing through the coil of the electro-magnet f causes vibration in its armature h when the armature c h of the two instruments A I are normally in unison with one another; but the armature h is unaffected by the passage of the undulatory current when the pitches of the two instruments are different.

A number of instruments may be placed upon a telegraphic circuit, as in Fig. 6. When the armature of any one of the instruments is set in vibration all the other instruments upon the circuit which are in unison with it respond, but those which have normally a different rate of vibration remain silent. Thus, if A, Fig. 6, is set in vibration, the armatures of A^1 and A^2 will vibrate also, but all the others on the circuit will remain still. So if B^1 is caused to emit its musical note the instruments B B^2 respond. They continue sounding so long as the mechanical vibration of B^1 is continued, but become silent with the cessation of its motion. The duration of the sound may be used to indicate the dot or dash of the Morse alphabet, and thus a telegraphic dispatch may be indicated by alternately interrupting and renewing the sound. When two or more instruments of different pitch are simultaneously caused to vibrate, all the instruments of corresponding pitches upon the circuit are set in vibration, each responding to that one only of the transmitting instruments with which it is in unison. Thus the signals of A, Fig. 6, are repeated by A^1 and A^2, but by no other instrument upon the circuit; the signals of B^2 by B and B^1; and the signals of C^1 by C and C^2—, whether A, B^2, and C^1 are successively or simultaneously caused to vibrate. Hence by these instruments two or more telegraphic signals or messages may be sent simultaneously over the same circuit without interfering with one another.

I desire here to remark that there are many other uses to which these instruments may be put, such as the simultaneous transmission of musical notes, differing in loudness as well as in pitch, and the telegraphic transmission of noises or sounds of any kind.

When the armature c, Fig. 5, is set in vibration the armature h responds not only in pitch but in loudness. Thus, when c vibrates with little amplitude, a very soft musical note proceeds from h; and when c vibrates forcibly the amplitude of the vibration of h is considerably increased, and the resulting sound becomes louder. So, if A and B, Fig. 6, are sounded simultaneously (A loudly and B softly), the instruments A^1 and A^2 repeat loudly the signals of A, and B^1 B^2 repeat softly those of B.

One of the ways in which the armature c,

Fig. 5, may be set in vibration has been stated above to be by wind. Another mode is shown in Fig. 7, whereby motion can be imparted to the armature by the human voice or by means of a musical instrument.

The armature c, Fig. 7, is fastened loosely by one extremity to the uncovered leg d of the electro-magnet b, and its other extremity is attached to the centre of a stretched membrane, a. A cone, A, is used to converge sound-vibrations upon the membrane. When a sound is uttered in the cone the membrane a is set in vibration, the armature c is forced to partake of the motion, and thus electrical undulations are created upon the circuit E b e f g. These undulations are similar in form to the air vibrations caused by the sound—that is, they are represented graphically by similar curves. The undulatory current passing through the electro-magnet f influences its armature h to copy the motion of the armature c. A similar sound to that uttered into A is then heard to proceed from L.

In this specification the three words "oscillation," "vibration," and "undulation," are used synonymously, and in contradistinction to the terms "intermittent" and "pulsatory." By the term "body capable of inductive action," I mean a body which, when in motion, produces dynamical electricity. I include in the category of bodies capable of inductive action brass, copper, and other metals, as well as iron and steel.

Having described my invention, what I claim, and desire to secure by Letters Patent, is as follows:

1. A system of telegraphy in which the receiver is set in vibration by the employment of undulatory currents of electricity, substantially as set forth.

2. The combination, substantially as set forth, of a permanent magnet or other body capable of inductive action, with a closed circuit, so that the vibration of the one shall occasion electrical undulations in the other, or in itself; and this I claim, whether the permanent magnet be set in vibration in the neighborhood of the conducting wire forming the circuit, or whether the conducting wire be set in vibration in the neighborhood of the permanent magnet, or whether the conducting wire and the permanent magnet both simultaneously be set in vibration in each other's neighborhood.

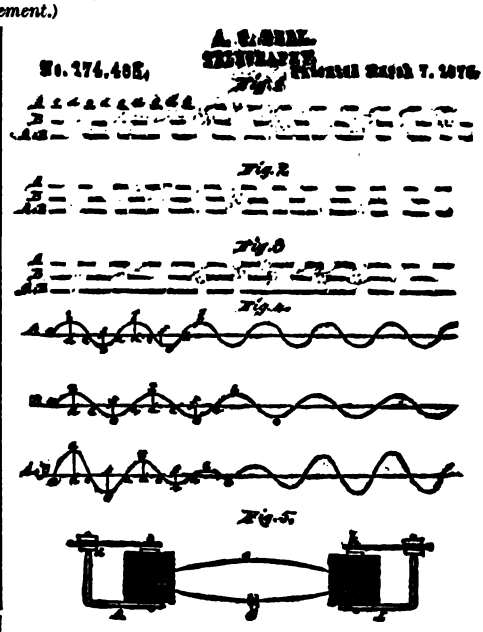
3. The method of producing undulations in a continuous voltaic current by the vibration or motion of bodies capable of inductive action, or by the vibration or motion of the conducting wire itself, in the neighborhood of such bodies, as set forth.

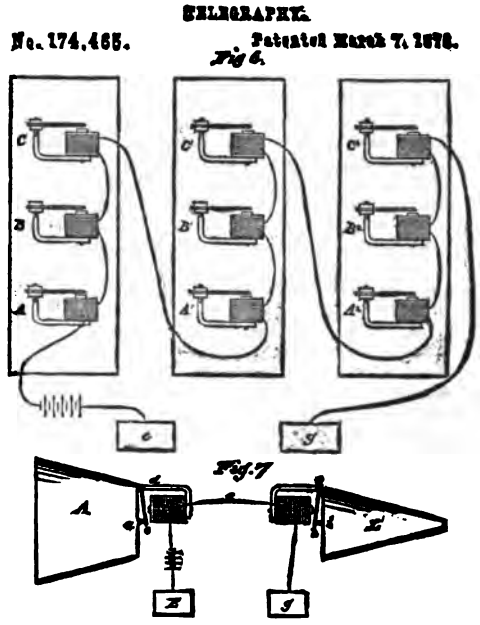
4. The method of producing undulations in a continuous voltaic circuit by gradually increasing and diminishing the resistance of the circuit, or by gradually increasing and diminishing the power of the battery, as set forth.

5. The method of, and apparatus for, transmitting vocal or other sounds telegraphically, as herein described, by causing electrical undulations, similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the said vocal or other sounds, substantially as set forth.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name this 20th day of January, A. D. 1876.

Witnesses: ALEX. GRAHAM BELL.
THOMAS E. BARRY,
P. D. RICHARDS.





UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE.

ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL, OF BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

Improvement in Electric Telegraphy.

Specification forming part of Letters Patent No. 186,787, dated January 30, 1877.

Application filed January 15, 1877.

To all whom it may concern:

Be it known that I, ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL, of Boston, Massachusetts, have invented certain new and useful Improvements in Electric Telephony, of which the following is a specification:

In Letters Patent granted to me the 6th day of April, 1875, No. 161,789, and in an application for Letters Patent of the United States now pending, I have described a method of and apparatus for producing musical tones by the action of a rapidly-interrupted electrical current, whereby a number of telegraphic signals can be sent simultaneously along a single circuit.

In another application for Letters Patent now pending in the United States Patent Office I have described a method of and apparatus for inducing an intermittent current of electricity upon a line-wire, whereby musical tones can be produced and a number of telegraphic signals be sent simultaneously over the same circuit, in either or in both directions; and in Letters Patent granted to me March 7, 1876, No. 174,465, I have shown and described a method of an apparatus for producing musical tones by the action of undulatory currents of electricity, whereby a number of telegraphic signals can be sent simultaneously over the same circuit, in either or in both directions, and a single battery be used for the whole circuit.

In the applications and patents above referred to, signals are transmitted simultaneously along a single wire by the employment of transmitting instruments, each of which occasions a succession of electrical impulses differing in rate from the others, and are received without confusion by means of receiving instruments, each tuned to a pitch at which it will be put in vibration to produce its fundamental note by one only of the transmitting instruments. A separate instrument is therefore employed for every pitch, each instrument being capable of transmitting or receiving but a single note, and thus as many separate instruments are required as there are messages or musical notes to be transmitted.

My invention has for its object, first, the transmission simultaneously of two or more musical notes or telegraphic signals along a single wire in either or both directions, and with a single battery for the whole circuit without the use of as many instruments as there are musical notes or telegraphic signals to be transmitted; second, the electrical transmission by the same means of articulate speech and sound of every kind, whether musical or not; third, the electrical transmission of musical tones, articulate speech, or sounds of every kind, without the necessity of using a voltaic battery.

In my patent No. 174,465, dated March 7, 1876, I have shown as one form of transmitting instrument a stretched membrane, to which the armature of an electro-magnet is attached, whereby motion can be imparted to the armature by the human voice, or by means of a musical instrument, or by sounds produced in any way.

In accordance with my present invention I substitute for the membrane and armature shown in the transmitting and receiving instruments alluded to above a plate of iron or steel capable of being thrown into vibration by sounds made in its neighborhood.

The nature of my invention and the manner in which the same is or may be carried into effect will be understood by reference to the accompanying drawings, in which—

Figure 1 is a perspective view of one form of my electric telephone. Fig. 2 is a vertical section of the same, and Fig. 3 is a plan view of the apparatus. Fig. 4 is a diagram illustrating the arrangement upon circuit.

Similar letters in the drawings represent corresponding portions of the apparatus.

A in said drawings represents a plate of iron or steel, which is fastened at B and C to the cover or sounding box D. E represents a speaking tube, by which sounds may be conveyed to or from the plate A. F is a bar of soft iron. G is a coil of insulated copper wire, placed around the extremity of the end H of the bar F. I is an adjusting screw, whereby the distance of the end H from the plate A may be regulated.

The electric telephones J, K, L, and M are placed at different stations upon a line, and are arranged upon circuit with a battery, N, as shown in diagram, Fig. 4.

I have shown the apparatus in one of its simplest forms, it being well understood that the same may be varied in arrangement, combination, general construction, and form, as well as material of which the several parts are composed.

The operation and use of this instrument are as follows:

I would premise by saying that this instrument is and may be used both as a transmitter and as a receiver—that is to say, the sender of the message will use an instrument in every particular identical in construction and operation with that employed by the receiver, so that the same instrument can be used alternately as a receiver and a transmitter.

In order to transmit a telegraphic message by means of these instruments, it is only necessary for the operator at a telephone (say J) to make a musical sound in any way in the neighborhood of the plate A—for convenience of operation, through the speaking tube E — and to let the duration of the sound signify the dot or dash of the Morse alphabet, and for the operator who receives his message (say at M) to listen to his telephone, preferably through the speaking tube E. When two or more musical signals are being transmitted over the same circuit all the telephones reproduce the signals for all the messages; but as the signals for each message differ in pitch from those for the other messages, it is easy for an operator to fix his attention upon one message and ignore the other.

When a large number of despatches are being simultaneously transmitted it will be advisable for the operator to listen to his telephone through a resonator, which will re-enforce to his ear the signals which he desires to observe. In this way he is enabled to direct his attention to the signals for any given message without being distracted or disturbed by the signals for any other messages that may be passing over the line at the time.

The musical signals, if preferred, can be automatically received by means of a resonator, one end of which is closed by a membrane, which vibrates only when the note with which the resonator is in unison is emitted by the receiving telephone. The vibrations of the membrane may be made to operate a circuit-breaker, which will actuate a Morse sounder or a telegraphic recording or registering apparatus.

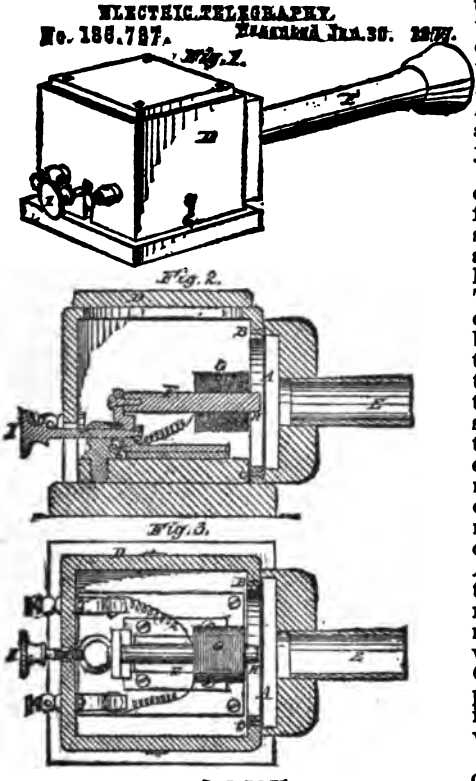
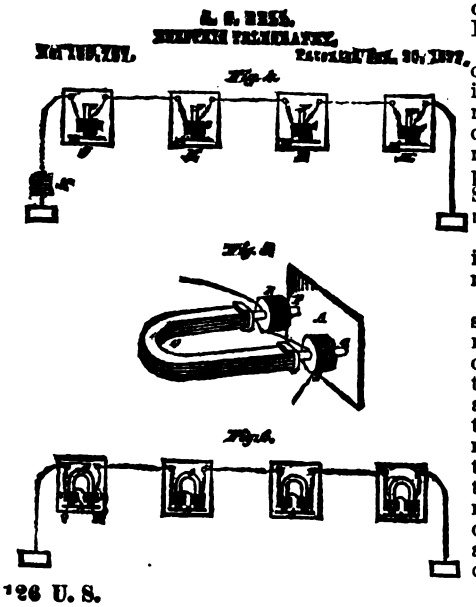
One form of vibratory circuit-breaker which may be used for this purpose I have described in Letters Patent No. 178,399, June 6, 1876. Hence by this plan the simultaneous transmission of a number of telegraphic messages over a single circuit in the same or in both directions with a single main battery for the whole circuit and a single telephone at each station is rendered practicable. This is of great advantage in this, that for the conveyance of several messages, or signals, or sounds over a single wire simultaneously, it is no longer necessary to have separate instruments, correspondingly tuned for each given sound, which plan requires nice adjustment of the corresponding instruments, while the present improvement admits of a single instrument at each station, or if for convenience several are employed, they all are alike in construction, and need not be adjusted or tuned to particular pitches.





Whatever sound is made in the neighborhood of any telephone—say at J, Fig 4—is echoed in facsimile by the telephones of all the other stations upon the circuit; hence this plan is also adapted for the use of the transmitting intelligibly the exact sounds of articulate speech. To convey an articulate message it is only necessary for an operator to speak in the neighborhood of his telephone, preferably through the tube E, and for another operator at a distant station upon the same circuit to listen to the telephone at that station. If two persons speak simultaneously in the neighborhood of the same or different telephones, the utterances of the two speakers are reproduced simultaneously by all the other telephones on the same circuit; hence by this plan a number of vocal messages may be transmitted simultaneously on the same circuit, in either or both directions. All the effects noted above may be produced by the same instruments without a battery by rendering the central bar F H permanently magnetic. Another form of telephone for use without a battery is shown in Fig. 5, in which O is a compound permanent magnet, to the poles of which are affixed poll-pieces of soft iron, P Q, surrounded by helices of insulated wire, R S.

Fig. 6 illustrates the arrangement upon circuits of similar instruments to that shown in Fig. 5.

In lieu of the plate A in above figures, iron or steel reeds of definite pitch may be placed in front of the electro-magnet O, and, in connection with a series of such instruments of different pitches, an arrangement upon circuit may be employed similar to that shown in my patent No. 174,465, and illustrated in Fig. 6 of Sheet 2 in said patent. The battery, of course, may be omitted.

This invention is not limited to the use of iron or steel, but includes within its scope any material capable of inductive action.

The essential feature of the invention consists in the armature of the receiving instrument being vibrated by the varying attraction of the electro-magnet so as to vibrate the air in the vicinity thereof in the same manner as the air is vibrated at the other end by the production of the sound. It is, therefore, by no means necessary or essential that the transmitting instrument should be of the same construction as the receiving instrument. Any instrument receiving and transmitting the impression of agitated air may be used as the transmitter, although, for convenience and for reciprocal communication, I prefer to use like instruments at either end of an electrical wire. I have heretofore described and exhibited such other means of transmitting sound, as will be seen by reference to the proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, Volume XII.

For convenience, I prefer to apply to each instrument a call-bell. This may be arranged so as to ring, first, when the main circuit is opened; second, when the bar F comes into contact with the plate A. The first is done to call attention; the second indicates when it is necessary to readjust the magnet, for it is important that the distance of the magnet from the plate should be as little as possible; without, however, being in contact. I have also found that the electrical undulations produced upon the main line by the vibration of the plate A are intensified by placing the coil G at the end of the bar F nearest the plate A, and not extend it beyond the middle, or thereabout.

Having thus described my invention, what I claim, and desire to secure by Letters Patent, is:

1. The union upon, and by means of, an electric circuit of two or more instruments, constructed for operation substantially as herein shown and described, so that, if motion of any kind or form be produced in any way in the armature of any one of the said instruments the armatures of all the other instruments upon the same circuit will be moved in like manner and form, and if such motion be produced in the former by sound, like sound will be produced by the motion of the latter.

2. In a system of electric telegraphy or telephony, consisting of transmitting and receiving instruments united upon an electric circuit, the production, in the armature of each receiving instrument, of any given motion by subjecting said armature to an attraction varying in intensity, however such variation may be produced in the magnet; and hence I claim the production of any given sound or sounds from the armature of the receiving instrument by subjecting said armature to an attraction varying in intensity, in such manner as to throw the armature into that form of vibration that characterizes the given sound or sounds.

3. The combination, with an electro-magnet, of a plate of iron or steel, or other material capable of inductive action, which can be thrown into vibration by the movement of surrounding air or by the attraction of a magnet.

4. In combination with a plate and electro-magnet, as before claimed, the means herein described, or their mechanical equivalents, of adjusting the relative position of the two so that, without touching, they may be set as closely together as possible.

5. The formation in an electric telephone such as herein shown and described, of a magnet with a coil upon the end or ends of the magnet nearest the plate.

6. The combination, with an electric telephone such as described, of a sounding-box, substantially as herein shown and set forth.

7. In combination with an electric telephone as herein described, the employment of a speaking or hearing tube for conveying sounds to or from the telephone, substantially as set forth.

8. In a system of electric telephony, the combination of a permanent magnet with a plate of iron or steel, or other material capable of inductive action, with coils upon the end or ends of said magnet nearest the plate, substantially as set forth.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name this 18th day of January, A. D. 1877.

A. GRAHAM BELL.

Witnesses:
HENRY R. ELLIOTT,
EWELL A. DICK.

The above-mentioned letters patent were both duly assigned July, 1877, by Alexander Graham Bell to Gardiner C. Hubbard, trustee, and were further duly assigned July 20, 1878, by said Hubbard, trustee, to the Bell Telephone Company, a corporation created by the laws of Massachusetts, located at Boston; and were further duly assigned by the Bell Telephone Company to the American Bell Telephone Company, a corporation created by the laws of said State, the complainant in these actions.

The American Bell Telephone Company was incorporated by a law of Massachusetts, chapter 117, March 19, 1880, "for the purpose of manufacturing, owning, selling, using, and licensing others to use electric speaking telephones," etc., with authority to "become interested with other corporations" for like purposes; the certificate of the president, treasurer, and directors of said corporation, duly approved by the Commissioner of Corporations, was recorded in the office of the Secretary of State of Massachusetts; and the Secretary of the Commonwealth issued his certificate, in the form required by section 11, of chapter 224, of the Acts of 1870, that the persons named, their associates and successors, were legally organized and established and made an existing corporation, under the name of the American Bell Telephone Company. This section made such certificate conclusive evidence of the existence of the corporation organized under that chapter.

The Dolbear Case.

This case first came up for hearing on a motion for a preliminary injunction, which was elaborately argued before Mr. Justice Gray and Judge Lowell.

The question was, whether, assuming Mr. Bell to have been the inventor of the speaking telephone, his patent reached the somewhat peculiar apparatus of the defendant. The motion was argued in May, 1882, and January 24, 1883, the opinion, written by Mr. Justice Gray, was filed. The court sustained the plaintiff's claim and granted the injunction. The case then went to final hearing, and the defendants again contended that Mr. Bell was not the first inventor of the speaking telephone, but that it was invented and described in printed publications by Philip Reis ten years or more before Mr. Bell's time; and, as a consequence, that Mr. Bell had merely invented a special form of the speaking telephone, which they said was not used by the defendants. It was heard at final hearing before His Honor Judge Lowell, June 30, 1883. It was argued for the defendants by Messrs. Causten Browne, and J. E. Maynadier, and on August 25, 1883, Judge Lowell decided that the patent was valid and was of the scope contended for by the complainants, that the defendants infringed it, and that Reis had not invented a speaking telephone.

This case is reported sub nom. American Bell Telephone Co. v. Dolbear. The opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Gray on granting the injunction pendente lite is in 15 Fed. Rep. 438; that of Judge Lowell on final hearing is in 17 Fed. Rep. 604.

The bill in this case charges infringement of Letters Patent No. 174,465, dated March 7, 1876, granted to Alexander Graham Bell. The answer denies the validity of the patent, and also denies infringement. The final decree was that the defendants have infringed the 5th claim of the Bell patent of 1876.

The errors assigned by the appellants in this case are:

"1. That the court below construed the method of the 5th claim to consist in causing electrical undulations similar in form to the sound waves.

"2. That the court below held the 5th claim so construed to be for a patentable subject.

"3. That the court below decided that the method and apparatus used by defendants infringed the 5th claim."

The appellants in this case contend:

"1. That the 5th claim, as construed by the Circuit Court of the District of Massachusetts, is not for an art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, and is therefore void.

"2. That the 5th claim, as construed by the Circuit Court of the District of Massachusetts, is not for any invention or discovery, and is therefore void.

"3. That causing electrical undulations similar in form to the vibrations of air accompanying vocal or other sounds, is not a method or an art, but simply an object to be accomplished.

"4. That the only invention or discovery possible in regard to causing such electrical undulations, was as to some method of, or apparatus for, causing them, and for using them.

"5. That transmitting articulate sounds by undulatory vibrations of electricity is not an art or a process, and is not the subject of either invention or discovery, but is merely a result to be attained, or an object to be accomplished; and that the only invention or discovery possible in relation to such result or object is of some method of, or apparatus for, attaining such result or accomplishing such object.

"6. That neither the method nor the apparatus patented by said Letters Patent of 1876 has ever been used by the appellants, nor has any method or apparatus substantially like said patented method or apparatus ever been used by the appellants."

The appellees claim that Dolbear's apparatus differs from those of the other defendants only by the employment of a condenser-receiver instead of a magneto receiver; that Dolbear and all his experts employ Bell's method and in substance his apparatus; that they necessarily produce the electrical undulations of the form described and claimed in Bell's patent; that they employ the part of Bell's invention which is the most novel and characteristic, and this is what makes their instrument to be a speaking telephone; that they copy Mr. Bell in the great step of employing electrical undulations similar in form to the sound-waves; that the gist of Bell's invention patented lies in the employment of electrical undulations of the new form, which implies their creation by the voice, their conveyance and their reconversion into sound-waves; that Dolbear employs them and cannot speak without them; that his precise mode of creating them is the legal equivalent of Bell's; that his form of conductor was a well-known equivalent for Bell's precise form; that the only difference is that when the peculiar measured quantities reach the receiving station, Bell lets them announce themselves by virtue of one well-known property which attracts the announcing plate; and Dolbear lets them announce themselves by virtue of another well-known property which attracts the announcing plate.

The following are the drawings and specifications of the Dolbear Patent:

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE.

AMOS E. DOLBEAR, OF SOMERVILLE, MASSACHUSETTS.

Apparatus for Transmitting Sound by Electricity.

Specification forming part of Letters Patent No. 239,742, dated April 5, 1881.

Application filed October 11, 1880. (Model.)

To all whom it may concern:

Be it known that I, AMOS E. DOLBEAR, of Somerville, in the county of Middlesex and State of Massachusetts, have invented a new Apparatus for Transmitting Sound by Electricity, of which the following is a full, clear, concise, and exact description, reference being had to the accompanying drawings, making a part hereof, in which—

Figures 1 and 2 are two views of the best form of apparatus for practicing my invention. Fig. 3 is a cross-section, enlarged, of the receiver shown in Fig. 1. Fig. 4 is a plan of one of the plates. Fig. 5 is a diagram illustrating the system.

My invention consists, mainly, in a new mode of transmitting articulate and other sounds by an open circuit.

It also consists in new apparatus for this purpose.

My receiver is based upon the well-known principle that one terminal of an open circuit will attract the other terminal when both are charged; and my invention consists, mainly, in the arrangement of the enlarged terminal of the secondary coil of an induction-coil so that it will be vibrated toward and from the other terminal by variations in the electric state of the coil, and in such a manner as to reproduce sound-vibrations of all qualities, including articulate speech, when the primary circuit of the induction-coil contains a suitable transmitter.

Another feature of my invention relates to the system of connecting two or more receivers and two or more transmitters for practical use; and it consists in the combination of two induction-coils, two receivers, and two transmitters in a novel manner, fully described below.

The best form of my receiver is that shown in elevation in Fig. 1, and in cross-section in Fig. 3.

In Fig. 3 the case of the receiver A is shown as made up of three pieces—a back piece, r, an ear-piece, s, and an annular connecting piece, t, for connecting the pieces r and s together.

a b are thin elastic plates, preferably of iron, forming terminals of the secondary coil of an induction-coil. These plates are securely fastened about the edges and brought very near to each other, but not in contact, a thin annulus, d, lying between them. This is best effected by forming a thin flange, d, on the interior of the connecting piece, t, and placing the terminals a b on opposite sides of this flange. The ear-piece s of the case holds the terminal a in place with the proper tension around the edge to insure mass vibrations of that terminal. The terminal b is held in place by the back piece, r, of the case. Each of the plates a and b is formed with a small tongue, a^3 (see Fig. 4), with which the binding screws are connected, as shown.

As the section-plane in Fig. 3 will pass through but one of the binding screws (that for the wire a'), the receiver is shown broken away at x, in order to show the binding screw for the wire b'. Both are shown in Fig. 1. One of the binding screws connects with plate a, the other with plate b. By the use of the tongues an even pressure around the whole edge of the plate is possible.

The adjustment of the instrument is effected by the screw A'; and this screw, by contact upon the back plate, b, prevents any vibrations of that plate which interfere with the proper vibrations of the front plate, a.

My system requires electricity of a very high electro-motive force, and this is best obtained by means of a secondary coil with a high resistance, the best results having been obtained from four or five thousand ohms of No. 36 copper wire.

Transmitters such as are in common use will answer with my receiver; but the best form of transmitter is that shown in the drawings (which is not here described, as it forms the subject of an application for a patent filed by me May 31, 1880).

The main advantages of my new system over all others known to me are, that it is not appreciably affected by ordinary induced currents on the line, it has no magnet to deteriorate, the adjustment is more simple and is not affected by barometric and hygrometric variations, and it lacks the fine-wire helix of the common receiver, which is very liable to get out of repair. It is very efficient also on very long lines.

[A. E. DOLBEAR.
Apparatus for Transmitting Sound by Electricity.
No. 239,742; Patented April 5, 1881.

A. E. DOLBEAR.
Apparatus for Transmitting Sound by Electricity.
No. 239,742 Patented April 5, 1881.

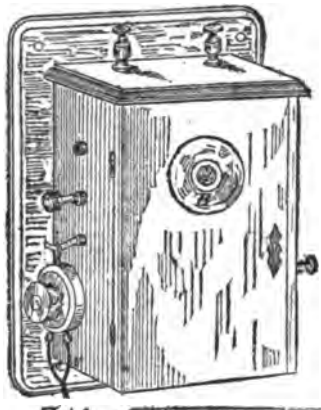

Fig. 1.

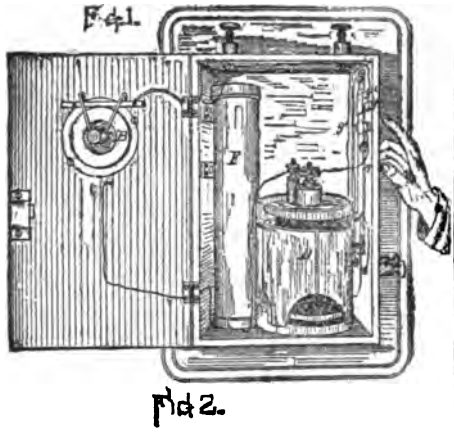

Fig. 2.

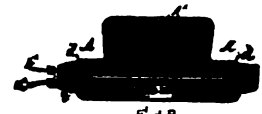

Fig. 3.

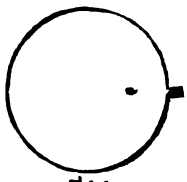

Fig. 4.

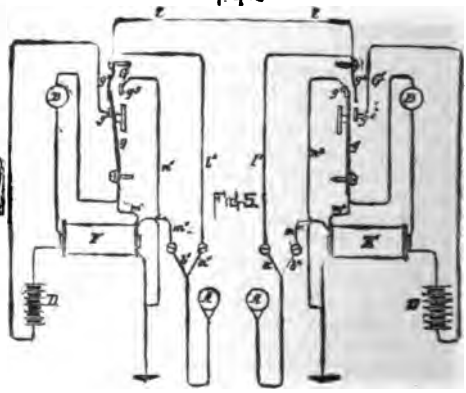

Fig. 5.

The best system for the practical use of my invention is illustrated in the diagram, Fig. 5, and the best form of apparatus is that shown in Figs. 1 and 2. In these figures, A represents the receivers, B the transmitters, D the batteries, F the induction-coils, and G switches.

The transmitter B and battery D are in the circuit with the primary coil of the induction-coil F, and this circuit is completed, when the transmitter is to be used, by throwing over the member g of switch G until it makes contact with the member g', thereby completing the battery-circuit through the transmitter and primary coil. The electricity induced in the secondary coil affects the plates in the distant receiver by means of that branch of wire m' which extends from one end of the secondary coil to member g of switch G, members g and g^2 of switch G, the line-wire l, which is a continuation of member g^2 of switch G, wire l^2, which is a branch of line-wire l, receiver-wires a' b', wire m^3, members g g^3 of switch G, wire n^3, to earth, thus cutting out the receiver at the sending-station (on the left of the diagram) and the secondary coil on the right of the diagram.

When the sending-station is at the right of the diagram, the switch G at the right will be arranged as is the switch G at the left, and the receiver at the left is electrified by means of wire l', receiver-wires a' b' (at the left of the diagram), wire m', members g g^3 of switch G (at the left of the diagram), wire n', to earth.

The switch G is composed of two springs, g g^3, and two stops, g' g², arranged as shown, so that when spring g is brought in contact with stop g' it will also be in contact with spring g^3, and when spring g is in contact with stop g^2 it will be out of contact with both spring g^3 and stop g'. One end of the secondary coil on the left of the diagram is connected with spring g on the left of diagram by means of one branch of wire m', and with receiver-wire b' on the left of diagram by means of the other branch of wire m', and one end of the secondary coil on the right of the diagram is connected with spring g on the right of diagram by means of one branch of wire m^2, and with receiver-wire b' on the right of the diagram by means of the other branch of wire m^2.

I am aware of the apparatus mentioned as used by Dr. Wright in "Ferguson's Electricity," published by William and Robert Chambers, of London and Edinburgh, in 1867, pages 258 and 259, in which two sheets of paper silvered on one side were placed back to back and connected with the two ends of an induction-coil, the primary circuit of which contained a Reis transmitter; and I disclaim that apparatus. My receiver differs from it in that the sounds transmitted are reproduced by the mass vibrations of one of the terminals, while in the Wright receiving apparatus the sound produced was mainly, if not altogether, due to molecular motion, and not to mass vibrations. Moreover, Wright's sheets of silvered paper were so arranged that each would damp any mass vibrations of the other; and in his apparatus any slight mass vibrations, even if not wholly damped, would be necessarily so irregular as to be worthless as a means of reproducing sounds. The fact, also, that the mass vibrations of each sheet damped those of the other sheet would make all the mass vibrations worthless for this purpose.

I am also aware of English Patents No. 4,934 of 1877 and No. 2,896 of 1878, and disclaim all therein shown.

What I claim as my invention is—

1. The receiver above described, consisting of the plates a b, mounted in case r s t, and separated by the annulus d, in combination with induction-coil F, substantially as described.

2. In combination, two induction-coils, the primary of each containing a battery, D, and transmitter B, and the secondary circuits, each containing receiver A, by means of switches G, consisting of members g g' g² g³, whereby the receiver at the sending-station and coil at the receiving-station are switched out of the line, substantially as described.

AMOS. E DOLBEAR.

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE.

AMOS E. DOLBEAR, OF SOMERVILLE, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mode of Transmitting Sound by Electricity.

SPECIFICATION forming part of Letters Patent No. 240,578, dated April 26, 1881.

[Application filed February 24, 1881. (Model.)

To all whom it may concern:

Be it known that I, AMOS E. DOLBEAR, of Somerville, in the county of Middlesex and State of Massachusetts, have invented a new Mode of Transmitting Sounds by Electricity, of which the following is a full, clear, concise, and exact description, reference being had to the accompanying drawings, making a part hereof.

My invention consists, mainly, in a new mode of transmitting articulate and other sounds by an open circuit.

It also consists in new apparatus for this purpose.

My receiver is based upon the discovery that one terminal of an open circuit will attract and be attracted by a neighboring body when the terminal is charged.

Figure 1 shows two modifications of my receiver, in section, connected in circuit with a transmitter and induction-coil. Fig. 2 shows another modification of my receiver.

Three forms of my receiver are shown in the drawings. In each the casing is formed of three pieces, r being the back-piece, s the ear-piece, and t the connecting-piece which connects r and s together. The plate a of receiver I is a thin elastic disc, preferably of iron, the vibrations of which reproduce the sound which causes the diaphragm of the transmitter T to vibrate, T representing a transmitter of suitable construction, the form preferred being that shown in my application for a patent filed May 31, 1880, the transmitter T and the battery B being in circuit with the primary coil, as will be clear without further description.

In receiver I the plate a is one terminal of the secondary coil F, and any change in the electrical state of coil F varies the potential of this plate a in receiver I and causes it to attract plate b, which is mounted close to, but not in contact with, plate a; but as plate b in receiver I is so mounted that it cannot vibrate, plate a will vibrate as its potential varies. In receiver I the plate b and back-piece r and adjusting screw u are all of metal.

A. E. DOLBEAR.
Mode of Transmitting Sound by Electricity.
No. 240,578. Patented April 26, 1881.

It will be seen that neither the plate b nor back-piece r nor screw u of receiver I is connected to the coil F, but that only one terminal of coil F—viz., plate a—forms any part of the receiver I. The plate b may be made in one piece with back-piece r, but for purposes of adjustment is best made as shown.

The force of the attraction between the charged terminal a and any neighboring body is slight, unless the neighboring body be many times larger than the terminal and itself capable of being readily electrified, and for this reason, when the neighboring body is a plate, (as it is best made for purpose of adjustment) it should be electrically connected with a larger body. Consequently the back-piece r of the case of receiver I is made of metal, and is in metallic contact with plate b. The neighboring body, which is attracted by plate a in receiver I, (being, in fact, the plate b, piece r and screw u, which are all of metal and in metallic contact) acts as one body in this receiver I; but, as will be clear, the back-piece r, plate b, and screw u may be one single piece of metal, and some other provision be made for the necessary adjustment.

In receiver I I the terminal a is mounted upon back-piece r, so that it cannot vibrate, and must therefore be insulated. Consequently the back-piece r is made of hard rubber. The plate b, which is the neighboring body in receiver II, is connected by the wire b^3 with a metal band, r^2, upon back-piece r, in order to increase the attractive force due to the electrification of a greater mass than plate b, and without interfering with the proper vibration of plate b, which, in receiver II, vibrates as the potential of terminal a varies.

It will be clear that either of the plates b may be grounded, and thereby increase the electrification of these plates; but it is not necessary to ground either of them, and the audibility of the sounds reproduced is practically as great when the back-piece of the receiver is held in the hand as when the plates b are both grounded; and it makes no difference whatever whether both be grounded or only one. In other words, receiver I will reproduce articulate and other sounds, even if back-piece r be of hard rubber or other non-conductor and plate b be wholly disconnected from coil F, but the sounds reproduced are faint, although distinct and audible. The sounds will be louder if the piece r be of metal, as above described, or if the plate b or metallic piece r be grounded; but the difference is very slight, the sounds being practically as loud when the metal piece r is used as when the plate b is grounded. And so of receiver I I the sounds are distinct and audible when wire b^3 and metal band r^2 are omitted, but louder when metal band r^2 and wire b^3 are used, as shown, or when plate b of receiver I I is grounded. Moreover, the reproduction of sound by receiver I does not depend at all upon the grounding of any part of receiver I I, for receiver I will act with plate b of receiver I I not grounded precisely as it does when plate b of receiver I I is grounded, and receiver I I will act when plate b of receiver I is not grounded precisely as it acts when that plate of receiver I is grounded.

In my application filed October 31, 1880, I have described a receiver in which both the plates a and b are connected with the coil F, and I therefore disclaim in this application any receiver having both the plates connected with that coil, my present invention consisting in a receiver in which only one terminal of the coil is used, as above explained.

Instead of making plate b of metal and connecting it metallically with back-piece r or band r^2, it may be made of any non-conductor, and in this case the increased loudness is produced by electrifying plate b before it is put in place; or, as shown in receiver I I I, where b is a rubber plate, and b^3 is a disc of felt fast to the hard-rubber support b^4, which is turned by the thumb and finger to electrify rubber plate b by friction.

What I claim as my invention is—

In combination, a primary coil in circuit with battery B and transmitter T, and a secondary coil with its enlarged terminal a mounted in case r s t, and arranged near plate b, plate b being also mounted in case r s t, but not connected with the secondary coil, all substantially as described.

AMOS E. DOLBEAR.

The Molecular Case.

On July 17, 1883, the Bell Company brought a suit in equity in the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York against the Molecular Telephone Company and others. The bill charges the infringement of Bell's Letters Patent above stated. The answer denies the validity of the letters; and the alleged infringement; and sets up several alleged prior inventors, but the chief stress was laid upon the work and publications of Philip Reis, either to destroy the Bell patent or to narrow it to a patent for a mere change of form. All the prior publications, set up in Spencer's Case, and all the prior publications set up in Dolbear's Case were also introduced in the Molecular Case, and a few more added; and substantially all the testimony taken in the Hopkins and Overland Cases and in Spencer's Case were introduced, and the same experts were recalled and further examined by the defendants. The case was argued before Judge Wallace, in March and April, 1885.

On final hearing upon the pleadings and proofs, a decree was entered for the complainants upon the fifth claim of said Letters Patent No. 174,465; and the sixth, seventh and eighth claims of said Letters Patent No. 186,787; and the defendants appealed.

Upon the fifth claim of said Letters Patent No. 186,787 the decree was for the defendants and complainants appealed.

The defenses set up in the answer, and relied upon by the defendants, are the invalidity of Letters Patent No. 174,465, because:

1. As a patent for a machine, the instrument or machine described and claimed is an inoperative device.

2. As a patent for a new art, there is in the patent no disclosure of what the art is, nor any description of the art process that would enable a skilled person to beneficially use it.

3. Because the claims of the patent include and appropriate mere forces of nature and things which are not subject matter of patent.

4. Because all the claims of the patent are anticipated or limited by the inventions and discoveries of Reis, Gray, Dolbear, Holcomb, Van der Weyde, McDonough, Varley and others. As to Letters Patent No. 186,787, the defendants' contention is:

1. That the claims are all anticipated by the inventions and discoveries of the persons named and others.

2. As to both said letters the defendants deny that they infringe any of the claims therein set forth.

Defendants say that proof of infringement was founded upon the mechanical construction of the defendant's instrument, given by Daniel M. Adee and the evidence of Prof. Charles R. Cross, that he had examined and tested the instruments marked Exhibit Defendant's Transmitter and Exhibit Defendant's Receiver, and found that from their construction and method of operation they are adapted, when suitably connected with a battery, to transmit articulate speech; and that when so connected and so operated they use "the method invented by Bell and described in his specification No. 174,465, for transmitting vocal or other sounds telegraphically, by causing electrical undulations similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying any sound."

The following are the errors assigned:

"First. The court below erred in holding that the 5th claim of Patent 174,465 was valid.

"Second. The court below erred in holding that defendants infringed the 5th claim of Patent 174,465.

"Third. The court below erred in holding that the 6th, 7th and 8th claims respectively of Patent 186,787 were valid." Separate errors were assigned as to the holding valid of each of said claims.

"Fourth. The court below erred in holding that the defendants infringed the 6th, 7th, and 8th claims of Patent 186,787." Separate errors were assigned in respect to the infringement of each of said claims, 6th, 7th, and 8th, Patent 186,787. For the final decree in this case see 23 Blatchf. 253.

In the Molecular Case, the validity of the fifth claim under the second patent, for a combination of a peculiarly shaped magnet and diaphragm, was questioned, but no oral argument was made upon it by either side, the claim having been sustained in the previous cases. Judge Wallace, in his opinion in the Molecular Case, adverting to the fact that this question had not been argued, said that he read the claim as a claim for a form of magnet which clearly was not new, but did not read it as a claim for a combination of that old magnet with a diaphragm in a speaking telephone. The same question came up, upon substantially the same evidence, in the Overland Case and People's Telephone and Telegraph Cases, and the complainants there argued the question and pointed out that the claim was not for a new magnet, but was for a novel combination constituting an important improvement in speaking telephones. Judge Wallace then sustained the claim, and decreed its validity.

Following are the Molecular Co. patents:

(No. 52.) Defendants' Exhibit, Lockwood & Bartlett's Patent for Transmitter for Telephones.

J. A. Welch, Special Examiner, May 14, 1884.

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE.

ROBERT M. LOCKWOOD AND SAMUEL H. BARTLETT, OF NEW YORK, N. Y., ASSIGNORS OF ONE HALF OF THEIR RIGHT TO CHARLES F. LIVERMORE, OF THE SAME PLACE.

Transmitter for Telephones.

Specification forming part of Letters Patent No. 228,884, dated June 15, 1880.

Application filed March 9, 1880. (No model.)

To all whom it may concern:

Be it known that we, ROBERT M. LOCKWOOD and SAMUEL H. BARTLETT, both of the City County and State of New York, have invented certain new and useful improvements in transmitters for telephones or Vocal Telegraphs, of which the following is a full, clear and exact description, reference being had to the accompanying drawing, which represents our improved transmitter in section.

In the telephones as heretofore constructed the transmitting instrument, or that which received the sound-waves and transmits them to the electrically-charged conductors, has been organized upon the theory of mechanical vibration due to the action of the sound-waves, and from this has arisen the device of a thin flexible metallic diaphragm, the vibrations of which were transmitted by the electric current to the receiver; and all telephones in what may be termed successful operation in one form or another, so far as we are acquainted with them, employ this so-called "mechanical vibration." We propose to dispense with this mechanical vibration, and as a substitute therefor we employ what we term "molecular" disturbance or vibration, the construction of our apparatus being such as to prevent, as far as practicable, anything in the nature of mechanical vibration. This feature was partially developed in an application for letters patent filed by us Nov. 3, 1879, but in that the carbon plates, while supported by the non-resonant material, were left uncovered at their inner adjacent ends, and sound chambers were formed in the non-resonant block on opposite sides, thereof, one of which communicated with the external atmosphere rendering the plates and the connecting button liable to be more or less affected or mechanically disturbed by the direct action of the sound-waves. In the present instance we embed the carbon or conducting plates solidly throughout their entire length in and cover or surround said plates and the button with the non-resonant material, as hereinafter explained.

In the accompanying drawing, A represents a base plate of wood, upon which is secured a block or cylinder, B, of cork or other suitable non-resonant material. Near the upper end of this block two bars or plates of carbon, b b, or other suitable conductors of electricity, are secured by being solidly embedded in the cork, as shown. These bars are arranged transversely of the block, extending from near its centre to or nearly to its outer face, on opposite sides as shown. Between the inner adjacent ends of these bars is placed a headed pin of carbon or other suitable conducting material similar to that of which the bars are composed, the head of said pin constituting what we term a "button," which connects the two plates and rests upon the adjacent ends of the bars by its own gravity. A cavity is formed in the block B directly over this button, to give access to it for removing or replacing it, and this cavity, when the button is in place, is closed by a plug B′, of similar material to that of which the body of the block is formed, and which rests in close proximity with and prevents accidental displacement of the button. The block B thus formed, with the carbon bars embedded within it, is by preference fitted snugly in a metal cylinder D, the open end of which rests against the base plate A, the other end being covered by a metal cup or cover D′, screwed upon or otherwise firmly secured thereto, and the metal case is in turn covered with leather, rubber, canton-flannel, or other soft non-resonant material, as shown, but the metal cylinder and its covering may be dispensed with.

Wires e e, are connected with the carbon plates b b, one to each, and extend thence out through the body B of the block in any convenient direction, and are connected at their outer ends to screw posts f f on the base plate A. The main-line wires connected with the battery are also connected with these screw posts in the same manner as in an ordinary telegraph instrument, and as will be seen, the wires e e, carbon plates b b, and button b^2 serve to connect said main-line wires and thereby complete the circuit.

The sound-waves in speaking, &c., are received upon the face or sides of the block of non-resonant material, or upon its covering described, and are communicated through said block and the carbon plates to the button *b*2, and through what we term a "molecular disturbance" the action or disturbance of the latter is communicated through the plates to the electrically charged wires e e, which complete the battery circuit, and thence over the main-line wires to the point connected therewith. We thus make use of the direct current from the battery in the transmission of the sound-waves, and are thus enabled to transmit them like distances and with the same precision as an ordinary telegraphic message is transmitted.

As will be seen, our construction of the transmitter is such as is calculated to, and we believe it does as far as practicable, obviate all so called "mechanical vibration" of the parts, for the carbon or conducting bars or plates being solidly cushioned or embedded in some firm non-resonant substance, (such as cork) the disturbance caused must be other than mechanical and constitutes what we call "molecular" disturbance.

The means for repeating or transmitting the vocal sounds over long lines or a series of circuits and for receiving the same are embraced in other applications filed herewith, and need not therefore be here described.

Having now described our invention we claim—

1. In a transmitter for telephones or vocal sound telegraphs, a block of non-resonant substance provided with strips or plates of carbon or other conducting material embedded in it, for

2. The block of non-resonant material having conductors embedded within it, and wires extending therefrom for connecting with the main line current, substantially as described.

3. The non-resonant block in which the carbon plates are embedded, in combination with the enclosing metallic case or cylinder, substantially as described.

4. The combination of the non-resonant block B, enclosing metal case D, and flexible cover thereto, substantially as described.

ROBT. M. LOCKWOOD.
SAMUEL H. BARTLETT.

(No. 53.) Defendants' Exhibit, Lockwood & Bartlett.

J. A. Welch, Sp. Exr., May 14, '84.

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE.

ROBERT M. LOCKWOOD AND SAMUEL H. BARTLETT, OF NEW YORK, N. Y., ASSIGNORS OF ONE HALF OF THEIR RIGHT TO CHARLES F. LIVERMORE, OF SAME PLACE.

Telephone Receiver.

Specification forming part of Letters Patent No. 228,825, dated June 15, 1880.

Application filed April 30, 1880. (No model.)

To all whom it may concern:

Be it known that we, Robert M. Lockwood and Samuel H. Bartlett, of the City, County and State of New York, have invented a new and useful Improvement in Telephone Receivers, of which the following is a full, clear, and exact description, reference being had to the accompanying drawings, making part of this specification, in which—

Figure 1 represents our improved telephone or vocal sound telegraph receiver. Fig. 2 is a similar view, showing a modification in the manner of connecting the diaphragm with the magnet. Fig. 3, G is an end view of the construction shown in Fig. 2, with the ear-piece and diaphragm removed and Figs. 4 and 5 are prospective views of the end of the magnet, having one the spring arm and the other the spring arm and diaphragm applied.

Similar letters of reference denote corresponding parts whenever used.

Our invention relates to a novel construction of the end of the magnet to which the diaphragm is connected, whereby, through disturbance or variations of magnetic power between parts of the same pole of the magnet, vocal sounds are transmitted to the diaphragm or sounding-board; and it consists in extending the pole in the form of a flat U-shaped spring, the outer free end of which overhanging the end of the magnet of which it is an extension is expanded into or has the diaphragm connected with it, as hereinafter explained.

In the accompanying drawings, A represents the body or handle of the receiver, made of wood or other suitable material, cylindrical in form, and enlarged at one end, A′, to accommodate the diaphragm B and ear-piece C secured thereto.

The body or handle A is perforated longitudinally to receive the magnet D, the perforation in the enlarged end A′ being enlarged into a socket for a, the reception of a spool or helix, E, surrounding the end D′ of the magnet as shown. The magnet at the end D′ is drawn out, reduced in size, and bent at a right angle to the body D of the magnet, or nearly so, extends to one side thereof in the form of a flat spring, d, recurved upon itself in U form until the outer arm or end, d′, overhangs the end D′ of the body of the magnet, as shown.

Where the end d′ is expanded to form the diaphragm B, as shown, the spring portion passes out through an opening in the head A′, and is there recurved so as to bring the diaphragm over the end thereof, where it is held in place by the ear-piece C, which is secured to said head or end by screws or other suitable fastening devices; but as good practical results have been obtained by making the diaphragm of different materials from the magnet, such as wood, paper, parchment, brass, &c., constituting a sounding-board, the end d′ of the spring arm may terminate at a point overhanging the end D′ of the body of the magnet, and the diaphragm or sounding-board may be bolted or otherwise firmly fastened to it, as shown in Fig. 2. Where the latter form of construction is employed the magnet should be made adjustable longitudinally by means of a thumb-screw or equivalent device, as shown, for adjusting the tension of the disc or sounding-board B as may be necessary to give it the utmost efficiency.

Under the arrangement described it will be seen that the spring arm d d′ forms an extension of the pole D′ of the magnet, reduced in size, and its normal condition will be one of rest in relation thereto. Thus calling the current in the helix E one, the amount of magnetism in the magnet D at D′ will be one and that in the arm d′ one, and the latter will be at rest. The body of the magnet lies within the helix, and is more easily and quickly affected by it, and constitutes, as it were, a reservoir from which the smaller arm d d′ is supplied. Now, supposing the current in the helix to be suddenly increased to two, the end D′ becomes two in advance of the end d′, and for the instant attracts the latter until it becomes also two, when it again instantly repels it; then its normal condition as a part of the same pole is restored, and it returns to its position of rest, until again attracted or repelled through another disturbance of the current in the helix. Thus for each disturbance in the current there will be three distinct movements of the arm d′ or diaphragm B connected therewith. First, it will be drawn down or toward the end D′, then it will be repelled beyond its normal position, and finally, the equilibrium being restored, it moves back to rest. Thus it will be seen that the diaphragm is operated by differences or disturbances of degree of polarity or attraction and repulsion in the same pole.

In Fig. 4 the magnet is shown made up of a number of strips, an extension of one of which forms the spring arm. This form obviates the necessity of drawing out the body of the magnet and facilitates its construction.

We are aware that the pole or poles of a horseshoe magnet have been expanded to form a disc or diaphragm; but in such cases, so far as we are advised, the diaphragm has been brought into such relation to the opposite pole of the magnet as to be acted upon and controlled or held under restraint by said pole by intercharge of polarity. This we do not claim; but,

Having now described our invention, we claim—

1. The pole of the magnet extended in the form of a laterally-projecting recurved arm and connected with the diaphragm or sounding-board substantially as described.

2. The curved spring and diaphragm, made in one piece with and forming an extension of the pole of the magnet, substantially as described.

3. The diaphragm connected with the magnet through the spring-extension of one pole of the latter and arranged with relation to said pole substantially as shown and described.

In testimony whereof, we have hereunto set our hands this 29th day of April, A. D. 1880.

ROBERT M. LOCKWOOD.
SAMUEL H. BARTLETT.

Witnesses:
C. H. HANKINSON.
T. W. HARTFIELD.

The Clay Commercial Case.

April 24, 1884, the Bell Company brought a suit in equity in the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania against the Clay Commercial Telephone Company and others for infringement of the above described Bell Patents Nos. 174,465 and 186,787. The defendants set up the same line of defense which had been set up in the Molecular Case and other previous cases.

The Clay Commercial Telephone Company answered denying that the said Bell was the original and first inventor of the alleged improvements described and claimed in the said letters patent, and that the same had not been known or used by others in this country, nor patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country before his alleged invention or discovery, and that the same had not been in public use or on sale for more than two years prior to his said application for the said respective letters patent, but alleged the contrary thereof.

The material allegations in the answer were as follows:

That, inasmuch as the letters patent, No. 186,787, do not bear even date with the foreign letters patent and are not limited to expire therewith, the letters patent of January 30, 1877, No. 186,787, are null and void.

That it has no knowledge that the complainants are corporations duly established under the laws of the State of Massachusetts and of the State of Pennsylvania; that the alleged title as set forth in the bill does not authorize the complainants to bring or maintain the bill, or to assert the rights and claim the relief in manner and form therein and thereby asserted and claimed; that the bill is defective for want of proper and sufficient parties thereto; and it prays that the complainants may be required to make due proof of all and singular the grants, assignments, and licenses in said bill mentioned, and of their allegations in this behalf.

It denies that electric speaking telephones had never been publicly known or used before the grant to Bell of said patent, No. 174,465; or that they were first publicly made known and introduced into public use by Bell, under the said patents No. 174,465 and No. 186,787; or that Bell was the original and first inventor of said alleged inventions.

It denies that the transmission of articulate speech, telegraphically, according to the method alleged to have been invented by Bell, and patented to him by the two several patents aforesaid, constituted an entirely new industrial art; and alleges that, on the contrary, these allegations and claims are in direct conflict with the publicly well known and the printed and published history of telephony; that his alleged discoveries or inventions, without the aid and employment of the inventions and discoveries of others, were incapable of accomplishing such results as those claimed in said bill, and could not produce, and never did produce, a practically effective, satisfactorily working, or commercially successful telephone; that speaking telephones arranged and constructed in the manner mentioned and set forth in said patent of Bell, No. 174,465, have never been put in use, are of no commercial value, and are, for practical purposes, without utility and inefficient and worthless.

It denies that it has made, used, and furnished to others, electric speaking telephones constructed according to the method described and claimed in said patents to Bell, No. 174,465, and No. 186,787, respectively; and alleges that, on the contrary, the telephones made, used, and sold by it have been made and constructed under letters patent of the United States issued and granted in conformity with law to Henry Clay, as the first and original inventor of said patented improvements, and by him duly assigned to it: to wit, May 8, 1883, No. 277,112, for a new and useful improvement in telephones; July 3, 1883, No. 280,351, for switch-board for telephones; July 3, 1883, No. 280,451, for telephone call-bell; July 3, 1883, No. 280,580, for transmitter for telephone; November 6, 1883, No. 288,017, for telephonic transmitter; that the alleged inventions or discoveries described or claimed in the said letters patent of Bell, or the substantial and material parts thereof claimed as new and original, had, prior to the alleged invention or discovery thereof by Bell, been mentioned, described, or claimed in divers letters patent granted and issued to divers persons, mentioning the persons, and mentioning among others Cromwell Fleetwood Varley; that the said respective letters patent of Bell are null and void.

This case was argued in June, 1885, before His Honor, Judge McKennan.

In April, 1886, the court made a decree whereby it was decided that the several letters patent granted to Alexander Graham Bell, No. 174,465 and No. 186,787, are good and valid in law; that the said Alexander Graham Bell was the original and first inventor of the inventions described in said several letters patent, and that the said defendants have infringed the fifth claim of said letters patent No. 174,465, and the third, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth claims of said letters patent No. 186,787, and that the defendants be perpetually enjoined from making, selling or using the said improvements.

From this decree the said, the Clay Commercial Telephone Company and other defendants appeal to this court.

In its answer this company claims "; that the telephones made, used and sold by it have been made and constructed under and in pursuance of certain Letters Patent of the United States, issued and granted, upon due application, and in conformity with law, unto one Henry Clay, as the first and original inventor of said patented improvements respectively, and by him duly assigned to this respondent, which said Letters Patent are respectively of the dates, numbers, and titles, following: to wit, May 8, 1883, No. 277,112, for a new and useful improvement in Telephones; July 3, 1883, No. 280,351, for Switch-board for Telephones; July 3, 1883, No. 280,451, for Telephone Call-bell; July 3, 1883, No. 280,580, for Transmitter for Telephones; Nov. 6, 1883, No. 288,017, for Telephonic Transmitter. And that the devices and methods of operation set forth in these said several Letters Patent are not similar to, but are wholly different from, the devices described and claimed in the said Letters Patent of the said Bell, and are not violations or infringements of said Letters Patent, and do not embody or embrace the method, principle, operation, or construction therein or thereby set forth, described and claimed."

The People's (or Drawbaugh) Case.

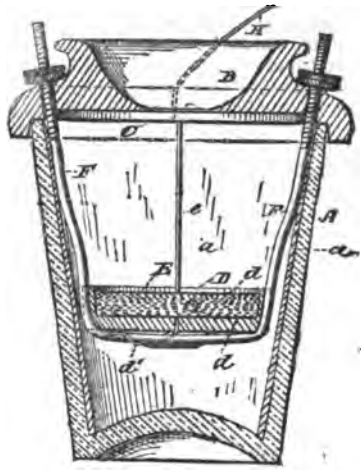
October 20, 1880, the American Bell Telephone Company sued, in equity, the People's Telephone Company, sometimes known as the Drawbaugh Company and others, for infringement of Bell's Patents No. 174,465 and No. 186,787 in the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York.

The issues made by the pleadings are practically resolved into the single question, whether the patentee Bell, or Daniel Drawbaugh, of Milltown, in Cumberland County, Pennsylvania, was the first inventor of the electric speaking telephone.

The defendants in this case contended that, long before Bell had perfected his invention, and long before its mental conception by him, Drawbaugh had not only made the same invention, but had perfected improvements in organization and detail which Bell never reached, and which were only reached years afterwards by the work of many other inventors in the same field of improvement. Their history of the facts is stated with substantial accuracy in the answer to the bill of complaint.

Following are the exhibits referred to in the statement of the People's (or Drawbaugh) Case.

Instrument "F" reproduced Full Size—Tin Cup and Mustard Can.



REFERENCES.

A. Glass tumbler.
a. Plaster-paris lining to same.
B. Wooden mouthpiece.
C. Diaphragm; tin.
D. Carbon holding cup; wood.
d. Metallic plate at bottom of D.
d'. Wire from plate d to adjusting posts.
E. Upper metallic plate in cup D.
e. Bar from plate E to diaphragm.
F. Adjusting posts.
G. Carbon in cup D.
H. Conductor to diaphragm.

NOTE.—The conductor H is attached to the edge of the diaphragm; the opposite edge of the diaphragm is notched, to allow passage for a conducting wire (not on instrument) through the cap to the wire d'.

The answer, among other things, avers that Drawbaugh "was and is the original and first inventor and discoverer of the art of communicating articulate speech between distant places by voltaic and magneto electricity, and of the construction and operation of machines and instruments for carrying such art into practice; * * * that the said electric speaking telephones so constructed and successfully and practically used by him contained all the material and substantial parts and inventions patented" in the two patents granted to Bell; and also contained other important and valuable inventions in electric and magneto telegraphy; * * * "that some of the original machines and instruments invented, made, used and exhibited to many others long prior to the alleged inventions of Bell are still in existence, and capable of successful practical operation and use, and are identified by a large number of persons who personally tested and used and know of their practical operation and use in the years 1870, 1871, 1872, 1878, 1874, and both subsequently and prior thereto; * * * that said Drawbaugh for more than ten years prior to 1880 was miserably poor, in debt, with a large and helpless family dependent upon his daily labor for support, and was from such cause alone utterly unable to patent his said invention or caveat it, or manufacture and introduce it upon the market; and that said Drawbaugh never abandoned nor acknowledged the claims of any other person thereto, but always persisted in his claim to it, and intended to patent it as soon as he could obtain the necessary pecuniary means therefor.

Drawbaugh, in his testimony, describes instruments which he says were made by him from to time, as experiments led him from one improvement to another. He testifies that he thinks he made his first telephone apparatus prior to November 1866, and is positive he had it before he moved his shop to the "Clover Mill" in 1867.

As he describes it, the body of the transmitter was a porcelain teacup, the diaphragm was of membrane, the electrodes interposed in the circuit were two copper discs, the upper one of which was connected to the diaphragm by a wire, so as to vary its pressure upon a low conductor of fine earth or pulverized charcoal interposed between the discs through the action of the sound-waves upon the diaphragm; and the receiver was a tin can without a top or bottom, having a membrane diaphragm stretched over one end, connected by a tense cord to an armature supported on a spring, and arranged close to the poles of an electro-magnet in the electric circuit. He testifies that subsequently he constructed apparatus upon the same general principle, with some change of detail; and he produces Exhibits F and B,—the former a transmitter and the latter a receiver—as the remnants of the original instruments. Exhibit F is a glass tumbler; and he states that at first he used a membrane diaphragm over it, and then one of thin metal; and that for the conductor he used pulverized carbon or carbon mixed with bronze powder, and used various tops or mouthpieces to speak into it. The Exhibit B, he says, was the receiver; and in this he had discarded the string and the spring of his earlier receiver. He says that experiment led him to improve the transmitter F by substituting a metal diaphragm in place of membrane, and he produces a sketch. A reproduction of this Instrument "F." Full Size—Tumbler.

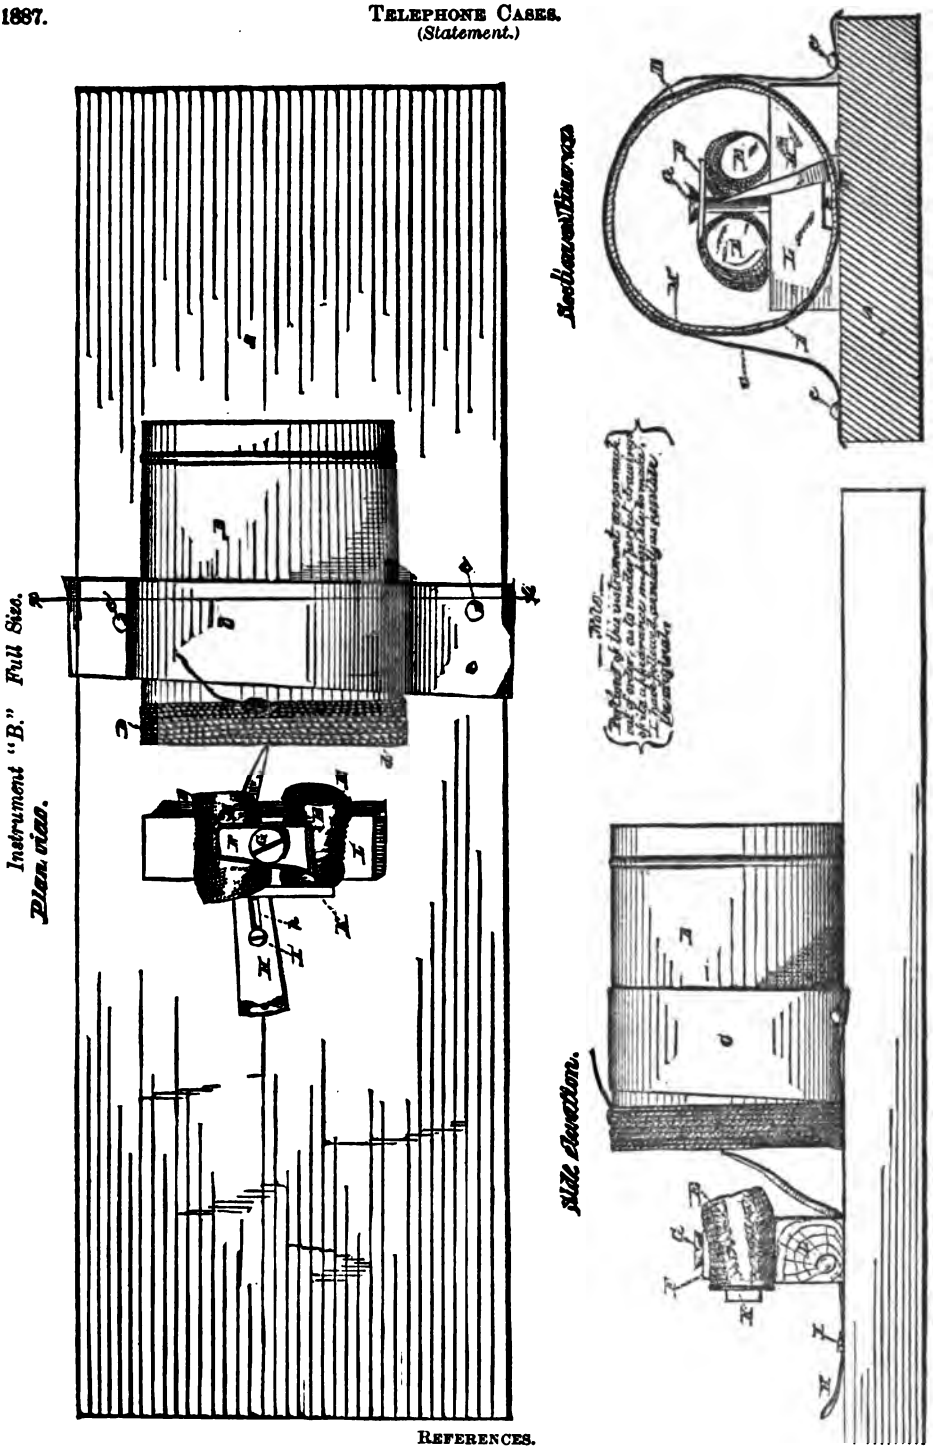
REFERENCES.

A. Glass tumbler; bottom broken off.
B. Wooden cap.
B'. Plaster-paris lining to cap.
A'. Plaster-paris lining to tumbler.
a. Breaks in lining A'.
C. Adjusting rod for lower plate.
D. Lower plate.
d. Solder joint.
E. Upper plate.
e. Wire to plate E.



REFERENCES.

A. Base board, of pine.
B. Tin box, evidently a mustard box.
C. Strap of tin.
c. Nails or tacks.
D. Twine wrapped about box, to hold membrane composing diaphragm in place.
d. Projecting edge of membrane.
E. Electro-magnets.
F. Retaining plate of copper.
G. Screw securing same to base board.
H. Tension plate, to tighten diaphragm.
h. Slot in same.
I. Regulating screw in slot h.
K. Plate to which magnets are attached.
M. Plaster of paris lining to box from 1-16 to 3-32 of an inch in thickness; the lining is broken away at different points.
L. Wooden block upon which magnets rest.

instrument has been made by him for use in the proofs, which is designated as "Exhibit F reproduced." In this the mouthpiece is modified in size and in distance from the diaphragm.

He made, according to his testimony, a new receiver of more perfect construction, and produces the remnant of the original which is designated as "Exhibit C."

A reproduction of such an instrument as he describes is made and referred to in the proofs as "Exhibit Reproduced C." After Exhibit C, he produces Exhibits I, A, E, and D, as likewise original instruments, made respectively in the chronological order of their production as exhibits. He states that "I" was used by him as a companion instrument to "C". Exhibit A discloses a modification of form and a higher degree of mechanical adaptation.

The last two, "D" and "E", are concededly perfect, practical instruments, and, according to the testimony of Mr. Benjamin, an expert witness for the defendants, would compete successfully for public patronage with any magneto telephone which had been introduced into use in 1882. It is asserted of these instruments by counsel that no higher development of the magneto telephone has been reached at the present time than is indicated by Exhibits E and D. Drawbaugh does not attempt to fix the time at which he made any of these instruments, or even the year. He testifies, however, that he made all of them prior to the time the Axle Company commenced business, which was in December, 1874, except E and D, which were made about that time.

The theory of the defendants is, that Exhibits F and B were used by Drawbaugh in 1867, 1868 and 1869, Exhibit C in 1869 and 1870, Exhibit I in 1870 and 1871, Exhibit A in 1873 and 1874; and that Exhibits E and D were made in January, or February, 1875.

The defendants introduce the testimony of nearly two hundred witnesses tending to prove the priority of invention by Drawbaugh.

The general theory of the defense is substantiated by three classes of witnesses: those who heard of the existence of Drawbaugh's "talking machines" at various times; those who talked through the machines on various occasions, or heard others talk through them; and those who attempt to identify one or more of the exhibits as the instruments they saw used. More than fifty witnesses testify to having heard of the talking machines prior to February 14, 1879.

Sixty witnesses do not attempt to identify any particular instrument, but testify that they saw a talking machine or talked through it, or heard it talked through at Drawbaugh's shop on occasions subsequent to 1867, and most of them fix the occasion as prior to 1876.

The third class of witnesses is those who Reproduction of instrument & Plan view

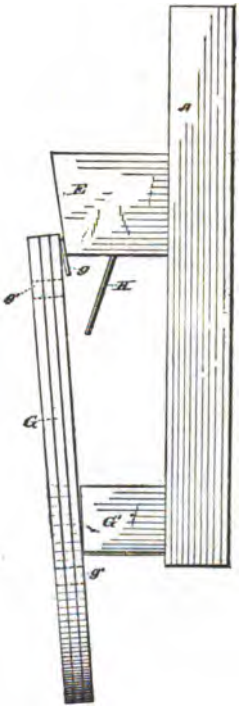
Side elevation of base board, magnet, and its supporting block



REFERENCES.

A. Base board.
B. Upright to hold body of instrument.
C. Supports of B.
D. Body of instrument.
d. Band on rim of D to hold diaphragm in place.
E. Block to support electro-magnets.
e. Plate to hold electro-magnets in place, brass.
e'. Screw to secure e and E to A.
F. Electro-magnets.
f. Wires to F.
G. Permanent magnet.
G'. Block to support G.
g. Paper to raise end of G.
g'. Rivets in G.
H. Studs in block E to receive wire.

NOTE.

This instrument is similar in all respects to original instrument marked C, having armature attached to diaphragm; therefore I have thought two views sufficient in this case.

identify more or less positively one or more of the several exhibits as the instruments used by them, or which they saw used by others prior to March 7, 1876. Exhibits F and B are identified by over forty witnesses.

The identification of Exhibits C, I and A is made by a smaller number of witnesses. Some of them think they saw "C" in 1870, and others at various dates after that and as late as March, 1876.

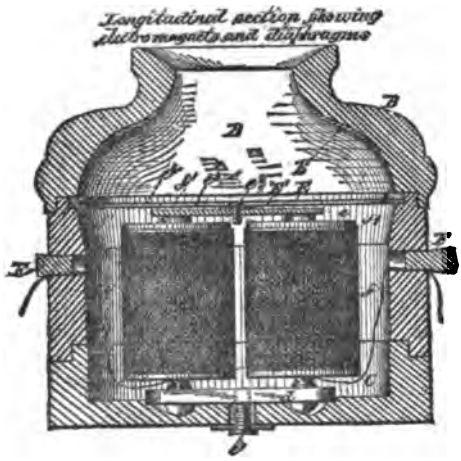
One of the witnesses thinks he saw "I" in 1871; the others locate the occasions in 1873, 1874 and 1875. Some of the witnesses think they saw "A" as early as 1872, one of them in 1870; but most of them saw it, they think, in 1875.

Some of the witnesses who identify one or more of the instruments exhibited to them by Drawbaugh as the Exhibits F, B or C saw or used them in 1875 or 1876.

That the talking machines referred to by the witnesses were electric instruments is clearly established. Drawbaugh testifies explicitly that they were always used with a closed circuit, and without breaking the current, some of them being battery telephones, and some magneto telephones. He always represented them as actuated by electricity, to those to whom he explained or described them, and claimed his invention would supersede the telegraph. His assertions show them to have been electrical instruments.

He stated to the witness Shank "it was the greatest invention ever known. If he had the means to go on with it, they could talk, or rather be a time to come as to talk, to the old country, same as we can talk here." To Zacharias, that "he could run it out for miles, and parties could talk in at one end and be heard at the other end, the same as persons in a room together." To Smith, that "parties between Harrisburg and Philadelphia could communicate as if they were speaking together; there would hardly be any limits;" it was an "instrument to convey the voice, to supply the place of the telegraph;" to Smyser, that it would work "from here to California;" to Fry, that one "can talk as far as the wire goes;" to Carl, that "he could hear a man talk from that place to New Cumberland or Harrisburg, and understand distinctly what he said;" to Sherwick, that it was "better and handier than the telegraph; that you could just talk through it in place of writing;" to Balsley, that "by attaching two wires you can hear it away off; the telegraph is nowhere with it;" to Kahney, that "he could talk the same for miles as he could for a short distance;" to Shettel, that, "if he had a wire from the shop in connection with the telegraph wires at White Hill, he could talk to Mechanicsburg by having a machine there or an instrument in the office; that it would be better than telegraphing, and that it would be worth a great deal of money;" to Reneker, that "he thought he could make it that he could talk through to Harrisburg; he thought they would take the place of telegraphing;" to Weber, that "it beats all the others of my inventions; he could carry sound, or rather talk, as far as Shiremanstown;" to Hawn, that "he would be able to operate that a man preaching in New York, that a congregation in Philadelphia would hear the same sermon;" to Kahney, that "he could just as easy speak ten miles as one, or any distance he would choose to;" to Rupp, who was there with Hamacher, that "it was worked by electricity, would take the place of the telegraph, and that he could make it so that he could talk to San Francisco;" to Musser, that "he was going to make a machine to talk from Harrisburg to Philadelphia, and it would be cheaper and quicker way than telegraphing;" to Smith, that "he believed they could talk for a hundred miles;" to Fettrow, that "I could speak ten, fifteen or twenty miles, or even to California, if there was a wire extended;" to Wisler, that "he could attach a wire to it and talk for ten miles, as far as he could have a circuit around;" to H. F. Drawbaugh, that "he could talk across the continent;" to Free, that "the talking machine could be used to talk at a long distance—from Philadelphia to California;" to Landis, "that it could be used a thousand miles; it would take the place of the telegraph;" to Lenig, that "he could talk hundreds of miles through that;" to Updegraff, that, "instead of using the old mode of telegraphing, he could talk directly through the wire; he thought he could talk as far as you could use the ordinary telegraph wire;" to Draper, that "he thought it was, or would be, one of the greatest inventions of the age, and would take the place of telegraphing;" to A. Evans, that "he could take this machine and talk clear out to Europe, cross the ocean;" to Eicholz, that "if he could only get some one to help him once, he would run it to Harrisburg, and convince them, and then he would run it from Harrisburg to Philadelphia."

Instrument "I." Full Size.



REFERENCES.

A. Body of instrument; black walnut.
B. Cap of instrument.
b. Plaster-paris lining to B.
C. Lower cap.
D. Electro-magnets.
d. Bar supporting magnets.
E. Upper diaphragm.
E'. Lower diaphragm.
e. Armature of magnets.
e1. Screw holding d in place.
e2. Screw holding E' to e.
e3. Paper ring between E and E'.
e4. Paper ring or gasket above E.
F. Plugs to hold wire.
f. Wires or conductors.

He stated to the witness Shank, that "it works by electricity;" to Smith, "it was by electricity;" to Nichols, that "the sound was conducted by electricity;" to C. Eberly, that the instruments were "to convey sound by electricity;" to Coudry, that "they were operated by electricity;" to Shoop, that "it operated by a battery;" to Shireman, that "they operated by magnetism;" to Hawn, that "they would be operated on by a battery;" to N. W. Kahney, that "the machine was operated by electricity, by a battery;" to Zimmerman, that "it was electricity that would pass it over the wires; that it would carry the sound right along;" to Hale, that "it was driven by a magnet;" to H. K. Drawbaugh, that "the sound could be carried to a distance on a wire by the use of electricity;" to Lenig, that "electricity was used in connection with it;" to Prof. Heiges, that "in connection with a talking machine both magnetism and electricity were applied;" to Goodyear, that "his talking machine was also done by electricity over wires;" to Woods, that "it was to be an electric machine used in place of telegraphing;" to Young that "it was an electric talking machine, which he had invented."

Thus Drawbaugh is corroborated by a cloud of witnesses whose testimony tends to substantiate his narrative.

Five hundred witnesses were examined by the parties on both sides.

Judge Wallace, in the opinion of the court below, after a recital of the facts and testimony from which the foregoing is taken, says: "In cases where such a chaos of oral testimony exists, it is usually found that the judgment is Instrument "A." ½ Size.

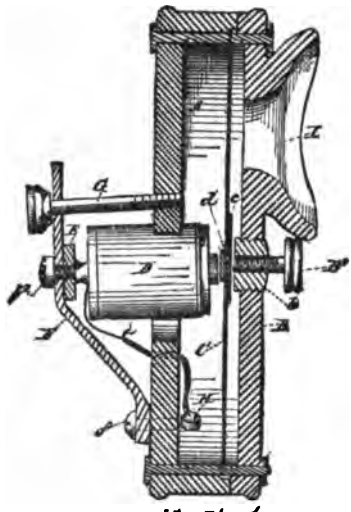
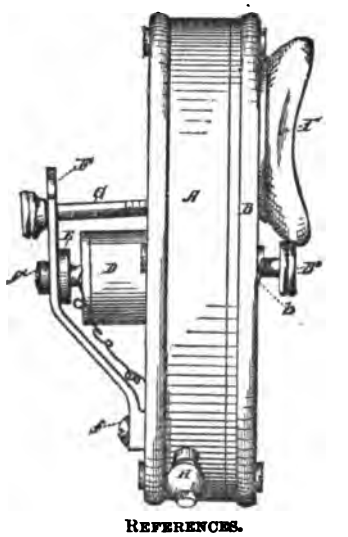
Longitudinal section on line x, y, z of front elevation



Side elevation

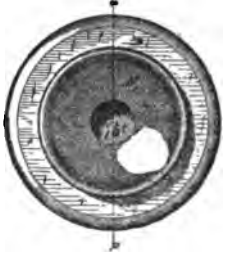


REFERENCES.

A. Case of black walnut.
B. Cover or cap to same.
B'. Adjusting screw for diaphragm; brass.
b. Screw block in cap through which B' passes.
C. Diaphragm; of thin black walnut.
c. Rubber cemented to C.
D. Electro-magnets.
d. Armature on diaphragm.
E. Plate connecting magnets.
F. Bracket to support magnets.
f. Screws securing same to case.
f2. Screw holding plate E to bracket.
G. Adjusting screw for bracket.
H. Screw cups.
I. Mouth or ear piece.
t. Conductors or wires.

Instrument "D."

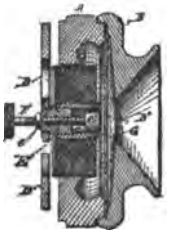
Front elevation



Side elevation

Rear elevation

Section on line x, x



REFERENCES.

A. Body of instrument.
B. Cap of instrument.
B'. Mouthpiece.
C. Electro-magnet.
c. Hollow core of C; iron.
c'. Adjustable plug in c.
D. Permanent magnet.
E. Screw plug to support D.
e. Jam nut on adjusting screw.
F. Adjusting screw for c'.
G. Diaphragm; tin.
O'. Conductors or wires.

convinced by a few leading facts and indicia, outlined so clearly that they cannot be obscured by prevarication or the aberrations of memory. Such facts and indicia are found here; and they are so persuasive and cogent that the testimony of a myriad of witnesses cannot prevail against them."

"The proofs on both sides lead to the general conclusion that Drawbaugh was not an original inventor of the speaking telephone, but had been an experimenter without obtaining practical results until the introduction of the instruments into Harrisburg."

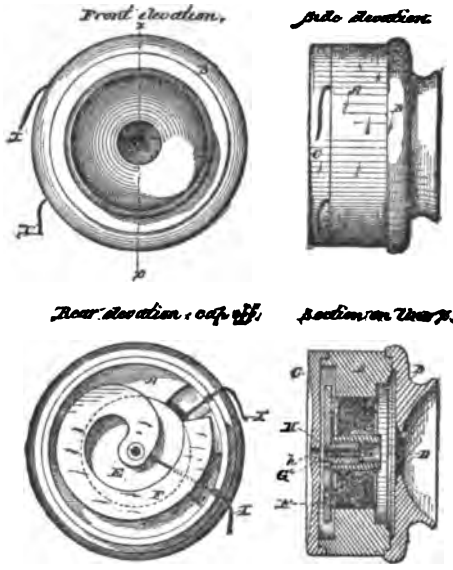
"Without regard to other features of the case it is sufficient to say that the defense is not established so as to remove a fair doubt of its truth, and such doubt is fatal."

The case was argued before His Honor Judge Wallace, by Hon. Geo. F. Edmunds and Lysander Hill, Esq., for the defendants. Judge Wallace decided in favor of the patent, filing an opinion Dec. 1, 1884.

All the Drawbaugh testimony had been stipulated into the Overland Cases then pending. After the Drawbaugh Company had by the argument and by Judge Wallace's opinion, learned the grounds of his decision, they arranged with the Overland Company to take more testimony in support of Drawbaugh in the Overland suit.

By stipulation, this was put in the original Drawbaugh Case, with an agreement that it should be considered by the court. It was presented for the consideration of the court, Dec. 2, 1885, and argued before Judge Wallace, who thereupon affirmed his former decision, filing his opinion Dec. 4, 1885. See the decree below 22 Blatchf. 531, and see also 22 Fed. Rep. 309 and 25 Fed. Rep. 725.

Instrument "E."



REFERENCES.

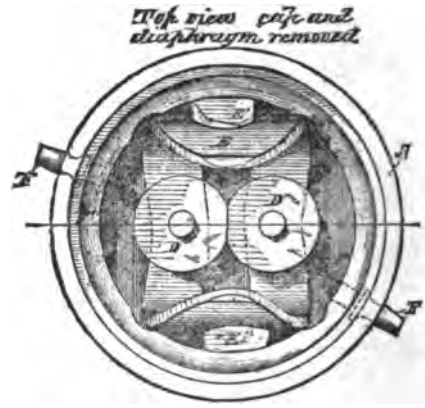
A. Body of instrument.
B. Cap of instrument.
C. Rear cap of instrument.
D. Diaphragm.
E. Electro-magnet.
F. Permanent magnet.
G. Hollow core of E; iron.
G'. Screw plug to support F.
H. Female screw in G'.
h. Aperture in C.
I. Wires.

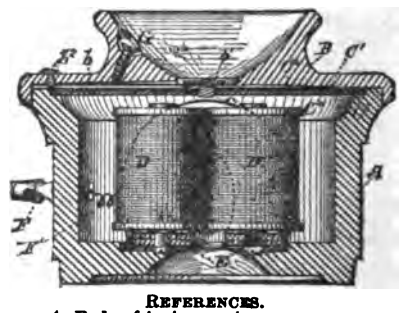
"The chronological order of Drawbaugh's machines, as established by the evidence, is as follows:

Teacup transmitter and receiver.	1866–1867
F and B. (Tumbler and tin can.)	1867–1869
C. (Breastwork instrument.)	1869–1870
I. (Cuspidor shape.) - - -	1870–1871
A. With mouthpiece at centre	1873
A. With mouthpiece at side of centre	1874
D and E. (Finished Magneto-Instruments) January and February,	1875
L. M. G. O. (Microphones.) From February, 1875, to August,	1876
H. (The copy of the Blake transmitter.) August, - - - -	1876
J. N. P - - - - - - - -	1868"

The following are representations of those instruments not already given so far as is necessary for the understanding of the case:

Instrument "L." ½ size.





REFERENCES.

A. Body of instrument.
b. Pressure spring.
b². Rivet in same.
C'. Upper diaphragm.
C². Perforations in C'.
C³. Paper ring between C' and C⁴.
E. Permanent magnets.
F. Binding posts.
G. Adjusting screw to spring b.
B. Cap of same.
b'. Metal block on spring.
C. Compound diaphragm; two part.
C⁴. Lower diaphragm.
c. Rivet connecting C' and C⁴.
D. Electro-magnets.
E'. Wood wedges to hold E in place.
F'. Wires from D to F.
b². Rivet holding spring b to cap.

NOTE. The upper diaphragm is made of copper, perforated; the lower one is made of iron.

Instrument "M."

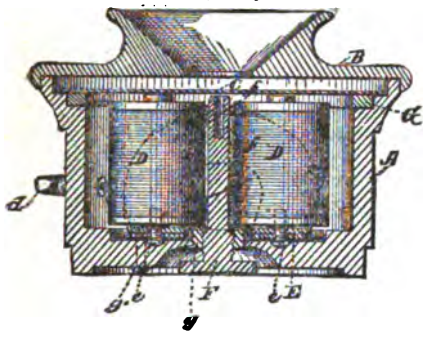
Top view, cap and diaphragm removed Longitudinal section on line x, x. Top view



REFERENCES.

A. Body of instrument.
C. Diaphragm.
d. Binding posts.
E. Permanent magnet.
F. Adjusting screw or post.
G. Rubber ring.
g'. Screw to secure E to A.
B. Cap of instrument.
D. Electro-magnets.
d'. Wires.
e. Screws connecting E to D.
f. Recess for screw in end of F.
g. Nut in end of body A for adjusting post F.

NOTE.

The magnet E is secured to the body of the instrument by screws, one of which is shown by dotted lines at g'.

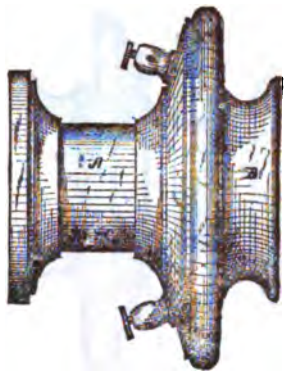
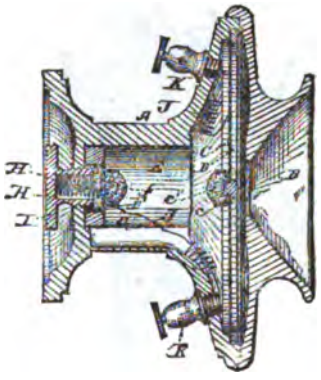
At one time the diaphragm of this instrument was made of tin, and was rigidly attached to the post F by a screw which entered the recess f in the post F.

Instrument "O." Full size.

Side elevation.



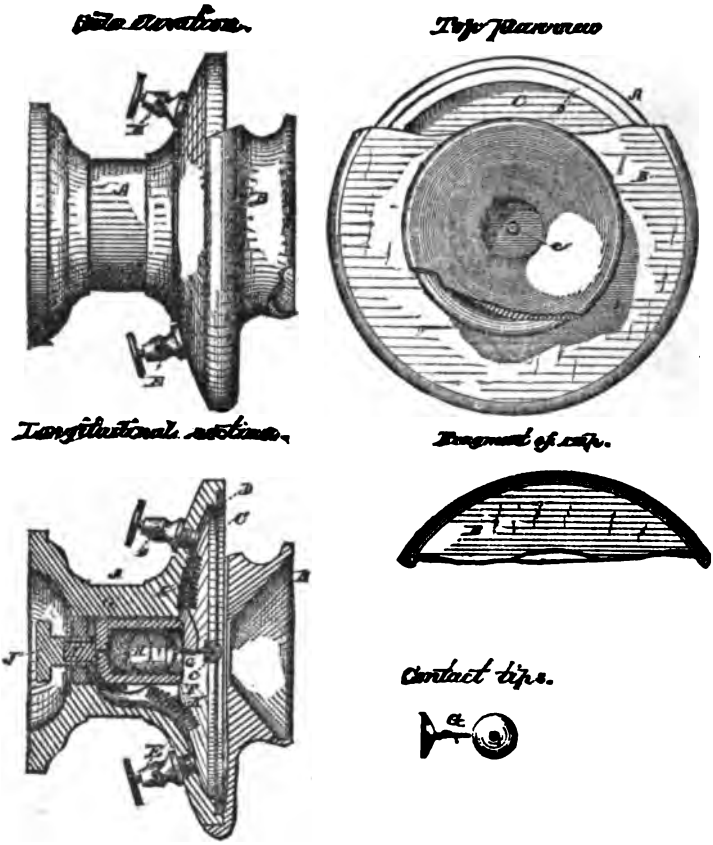
Longitudinal section.



REFERENCES.

A. Body of instrument.
B. Cap of same.
C. Diaphragm.
c. Carbon cup on diaphragm; brass.
c'. Carbon ball in cup c.
D. Cardboard ring.
E. Recess for carbon holder.
F. Lower carbon cup; brass.
f. Carbon ball in same.
G. Wood ring.
H. Recess in adjusting screw.
H'. Spiral spring in same.
I. Screw; adjusting.
J. Wires or conductors.
K. Screw cups.

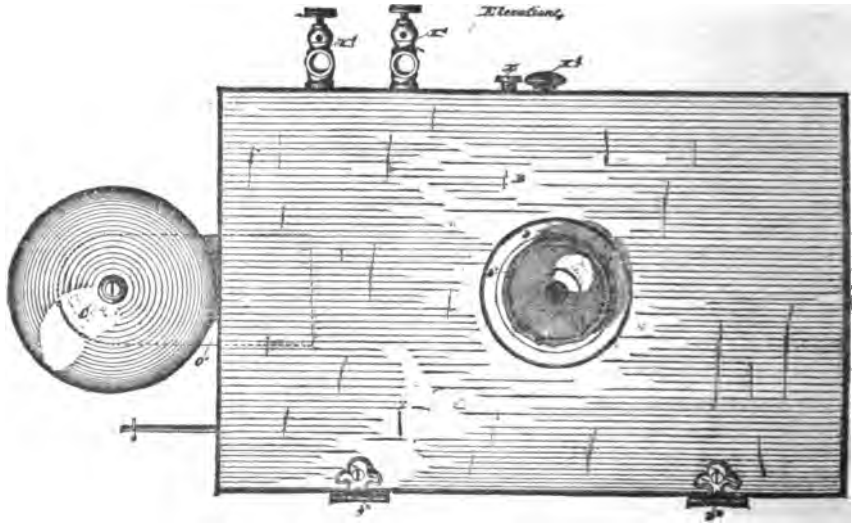
Instrument "G." Full size.

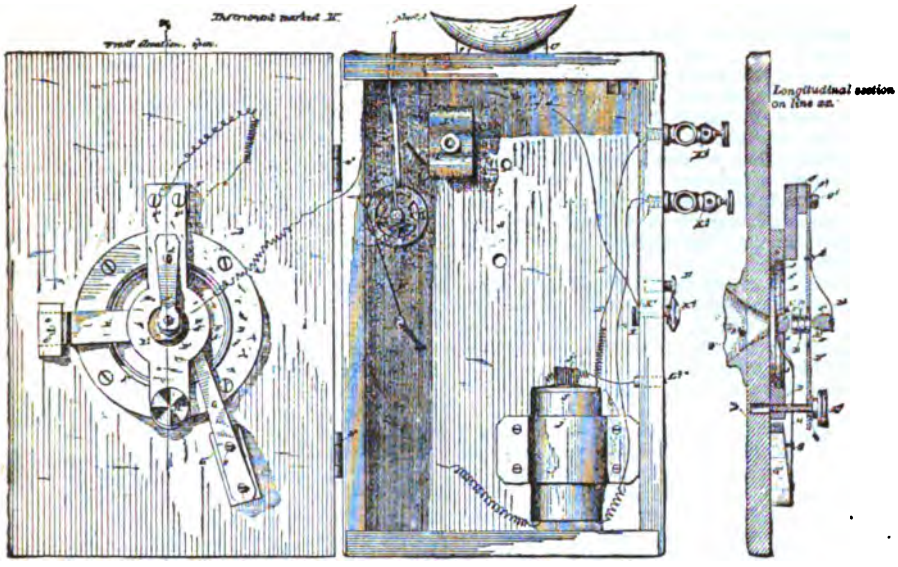


REFERENCES.

A. Body of instrument.
B. Cap of instrument.
C. Diaphragm.
c. Contact cup on diaphragm.
D. Paper ring.
E. Screw Cups.
F. Carbon holder; wood.
GG. Contact tips in holder.
H. Carbon ball.
I. Rubber spring to adjusting screw.
J. Adjusting screw.
K. Conductors.

Instrument "H." Sheet 1.





REFERENCES TO THE DRAWINGS OF INSTRUMENT "H."

A. Body of instrument.
B. Door of instrument.
b. Mouthpiece.
b'. Break in b.
b^2. Hinges to door.
C. Bell to instrument.
C'. Support to bell.
D. Casting for supporting diaphragm; iron.
D'. Plate to support contact spring.
D^2. Contact spring.
d. Screw securing D^2 to D'.
d'. Aperture through D'.
d^2. Carbon holding cup; brass.
d^3. Carbon block in d^2.
E. Plate or bracket to hold intermediate carbon cup; brass.
e. Block of wood on end of E.
e'. Screw securing e and E to B.
F. Diaphragm; corrugated iron.
f. Rubber ring.
f'. Wire to hold diaphragm in place.
G. Pressure spring for diaphragm.
G'. Block to which G is attached.
g. Adjusting screw to G.
g'. Wood insulator between D and D'.
g^2. Screw securing D' to D.
g^3. Rubber sleeve insulating D' from g^2.
H. Adjusting screw to D'.
h. Rubber sleeve insulating D' from H.
h'. Wire to diaphragm; conducting wire.
I. Carbon holding cup.
I'. Carbon ball in I.
I^2. Intermediate carbon holding tube; wood.
J. Induction coil.
j. Band holding J in place; brass.
j'. Wire core of J.
K. Signal plate. K'. Contact spring.
K^2. Key. K^3. Binding posts.
L. Screw to secure switch.
L'. Conductors.
L^2. Switch contacts.
L^3. Plate to hold electro-magnets for bell in place.
l. Bolt to plate L^3.
M. Armature connected with bell hammer.
m. Pivotal point of M.
m'. Spring to M.
N. Cord to increase power of spring m'.

The Overland Case.

These were a number of suits brought in 1883, in New York, in New Jersey, and in Pennsylvania, against the Overland Telephone Company and various of its branches. Motions for preliminary injunctions were made in them, and were very fiercely contested through many days of argument before Judges McKennan, Nixon and Butler, and were finally granted. The cases went to final hearing on testimony, entitled in all the suits. Some of the counsel and the principal experts for the defense in the Molecular Case were also counsel and experts in the Overland Cases. Substantially the same testimony was used by stipulation in both cases, some more being added in the Overland Cases after the Molecular Case was decided. When these cases were reached for hearing, the Molecular Case had been decided, and the Overland Cases were not argued, so far as the first patent was concerned. The court found that there was nothing to distinguish them from the Molecular Case, and a decree was rendered for the complainants.

From the decree in the New York Overland Case, an appeal was taken to this court.

The following is a statement of the defenses in the People's or Drawbaugh Case and in the Overland Case, taken from one of the briefs filed in their behalf:

"The defenses in these actions are, first, a denial of the validity of both of said patents, on the ground that Alexander Graham Bell was not the original and first inventor of any of the inventions claimed therein, constituting or applicable in connection with electric speaking telephones, but that Daniel Drawbaugh, of Eberly's Mills, otherwise known as Milltown, Cumberland County, Pennsylvania, was the original and first inventor of all such inventions and improvements described and claimed in said two patents, or in either of them.

Secondly, a denial that either of the said Bell patents is infringed by the defendants.

Thirdly, a denial that either of said Bell patents is valid in law.

Fourthly, a denial that Bell had achieved the invention of the electric speaking telephone at the date of his patent of March 7, 1876.

Fifthly, a denial that the matters described in said patent of March 7, 1876, were original with Bell; but that he derived many of them from Elisha Gray, a prior inventor of the electric speaking telephone.

Sixthly, a denial that the matters described in Bell's patent of January 30, 1877, were original with Bell; but that he derived many of them from said Gray.

Seventhly, a denial that Bell had any right to incorporate into either of his said patents any principles, inventions, methods, or devices, knowledge of which he derived from said Gray, and that his patents have any validity, in view of the fact that he so appropriated Gray's inventions."

Following is the Statement of Errors relied upon by the defendants in these two cases, the People's (Drawbaugh) and Overland Cases, as taken from the briefs of their counsel:

"1. The court below erred in holding the Bell patents in suit, or either of them, valid.

"2. It erred in holding said patents, or either of them, to have been infringed by the defendants, or any of them.

"3. It erred in holding that Daniel Drawbaugh was not the first and original inventor of the inventions here in suit.

"4. It erred in not holding Elisha Gray to have invented the electric speaking telephone, in its variable resistance method.

"5. It erred in not holding the Bell patent of March 7, 1876, here in suit, to be fraudulent and void, in view of the evidence as to fraudulent changes in the application therefor, and the fraudulent introduction of Gray's inventions into said application, while pending in the patent office.

"6. It erred in not holding the Bell patent of January 30, 1877, here in suit, to be fraudulent and void, in view of the evidence as to fraudulent introduction of Elisha Gray's said inventions into the same.

"7. It erred in not holding Bell to have surreptitiously and unjustly obtained both of said patents for that which was in fact invented by another (to wit, by Elisha Gray), who was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same.

"8. It erred in not holding Bell to have surreptitiously and unjustly obtained both of said patents for that which was in fact invented by another (to wit, by Daniel Drawbaugh), who was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same in his various improved instruments.

"9. It erred in not dismissing the appellees' bill for want of equity and right, in view of the frauds shown by the appellees' own evidence to have been perpetrated upon the Patent Office, Elisha Gray and the public in the procurement of the patents, and remaining in the patents, on which said bill is founded.

"10. It erred in construing said patent of March 7, 1876, here in suit, to cover anything more than a magneto-electric current generated by the vibration, by sound-waves, of a body of inductive material in the presence of a body susceptible of receiving induction therefrom; and it further erred in not holding such a patent for a current to be a patent for an 'effect,' 'mode of operation' or 'principle,' and therefore void.

"11. It erred in not holding said patent of March 7, 1876, to be limited to the described apparatus of its figure 7–there being, as the appellees contend, no 'art' then known, and there being no equivalents for this apparatus described in the specification.

"12. It erred in not holding said patent of January 30, 1877, to be invalid and void, by reason of its claiming matters described and shown, but not claimed in Bell's prior patent of March 7, 1876, the application not having been filed till after the former patent was issued, and said matters not having been reserved in said prior patent as matters to be afterwards applied for, but having been abandoned to the public by describing and showing without claiming them, in said prior patent.

"13. It erred in not limiting the scope of the claims of the patent of January 30, 1877, here in suit, to mere improvements in the form of the parts mentioned in said claims.

"14. It erred in holding that the specification of Bell's patent of March 7, 1876, describes the speaking telephone invention with the clearness, fullness and exactness which the statute requires in such cases; and that the patent is not invalid for want of a proper description and specification of said alleged invention.

"15. It erred in holding that Bell, in the sense of the patent law, completed or made any invention of an electric speaking telephone before a date later than March 7, 1876, and, therefore, in not holding the patent void, as being for an invention not made, at or prior to its date, by the patentee.

"16. It erred, throughout its opinion in the case against the People's Telephone Company, in treating of the evidence as to Drawbaugh's priority of invention, by ignoring, misconstruing, misstating, and misunderstanding the evidence; by assuming things of which there was no evidence, or which were contrary to the evidence; by misunderstanding and misapplying the law; and by attributing different degrees of probative force to the same kinds of evidence accordingly as it found the same on the one side or on the other side of the case."

There are certain questions common to all these cases. The meaning and construction of the Bell patent and understanding of what the speaking telephone is; the comparison of the invention set forth in the Bell patent with the previous state of the art, and particularly with what is known as the Reis telephone; the question of the meaning and scope of Mr. Bell's claims on which the issue of infringement turns, and some questions sought to be raised upon his history and work,—were subjects of discussion in all these cases.

The burden of the controversy turns on the first patent. Its language is criticised.

The attempt is made to narrow the legal effect of the claim, on the ground that it is broader than the law allows to any inventor.

It is contended that at the time of the Bell patent such electrical knowledge existed, and the state of the art was such, that it required no invention to make electric speaking telephones.

It is alleged that, before Mr. Bell, certain named persons had invented the electric speaking telephone.

Except in the case of one alleged prior inventor,—the Pennsylvania claimant, Drawbaugh,—the controversy chiefly turns upon a comparison of Mr. Bell's speaking telephone with the previous state of the art.

Extracts from the Answer of The Molecular Telephone Company.

10. This defendant, further answering said bill, denies that the said Bell Patent No. 174,465, dated March 7, 1876, is valid, and alleges that it is invalid and void for the following reasons, to wit:

(a.) Because the instrument or machine shown, described and claimed therein is not a patentable invention, but an inoperative, useless and worthless device.

(b.) Because the said Alexander Graham Bell was not the original and first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented in said Letters Patent or of any material or substantial part thereof, but that long prior to his said alleged invention and discovery in telegraphy the same or substantially the same thing or things had been invented, discovered and used in public by, and were known to the following named persons of and at the following named places, to wit:

Philip Reis, then of Friedrichsdorf, Germany, now dead, at Friedrichsdorf and Frankfort, Germany.

Elisha Gray, of Highland Park, Ill., at Oberlin and Cleveland, Ohio; Highland Park and Chicago, Ill.; Milwaukee, Wis., Washington, D. C., and New York City.

Thomas A. Edison, of Menlo Park, N. J., at Menlo Park, N. J., and New York City.

Daniel Drawbaugh, of and at Eberly's Mills, in the county of Cumberland and State of Pennsylvania.

Amos E. Dolbear, of Somerville, Mass., at Somerville, Mass., and elsewhere in the United States.

Alfred G. Holcomb, of Granby, Conn., at New York City, N. Y., and elsewhere in the United States.

Philip H. Van der Weyde, of Brooklyn, at New York City, N. Y., and elsewhere in the United States.

James W. McDonough, of Chicago, Ill., at said Chicago, at New York City and elsewhere.

W. F. Channing, of Providence, R. I., at Providence, R. I.

Benjamin F. Edwards, now deceased, formerly of Boston, Mass., at Boston, Mass., Washington, D. C., and New York City, N. Y.

James Hamblet, Jr., of Brooklyn, N. Y., at Boston, Mass., Washington, D. C., and New York City.

Edward Farran, of Keene, N. H. at Keene, N. H.

Antonio Mencci, of Clifton, Staten Island, N. Y., at Staten Island and New York City.

W. S. Voelker, of Morton, Delaware County, Pa., at Philadelphia, Pa., Morton, Delaware County, Pa., and other places in the United States.

Edward C. Pickering, of Cambridge, Mass., at Boston, and Cambridge, Mass.; and also by numerous other persons whose names and residences are now unknown to these defendants, but which, when known, these defendants pray leave, by proper amendments, to insert in this answer.

* * * * * * *

(j.) Because, as defendants are informed and believe, long prior to any invention by said Bell of the alleged improvement specified as his invention in said Letters Patent, numbered 174,465, the same was described in and patented by the following Letters Patent, viz.:

Letters Patent granted by the United States to Thomas A. Edison and George Harrington, dated Aug. 12, 1873, numbered 141,777.

Letters Patent of the United States granted to William Thompson, dated Nov. 17, 1874, numbered 156,897.

Letters Patent of the United States granted to Elisha Gray, July 27, 1875, No. 166,096.

Letters Patent of the United States granted to Elisha Gray, July 27, 1876, No. 166,094.

Letters Patent of the United States granted to Elisha Gray, July 27, 1875, No. 166,095; caveat filed by Elisha Gray in the United States Patent Office Feb. 14, 1876.

Letters Patent of the United States granted to Elisha Gray, April 11, 1876, No. 175,971.

Letters Patent of the United States granted to Elisha Gray, Jan. 16, 1877, numbered 186,340.

British Letters Patent granted to C. F. Varley, 1870, No. 1,044.

British Letters Patent granted to J. H. Johnston, July 29, 1874, No. 2,646.

British Letters Patent granted to George T. Bousfield, dated May 4, 1876, and numbered 1,874.

French patent granted to Leon Scott, dated March 25, 1857; certificate of addition to same dated July 29, 1859.

British Letters Patent granted to John Henry Johnston, dated March 16, 1875, No. 974.

British Letters Patent granted to Charles Wheatstone, dated Jan. 21, 1840, No. 8,345.

British Letters Patent granted to David Hughes, dated April 27, 1858, No. 938.

United States Letters Patent granted to Elisha Gray, dated Feb. 15, 1876, No. 173,460.

Also in other Letters Patent which are now unknown to these defendants, but which when known these defendants pray leave by proper amendments to insert in this answer.

(k.) Because, long before any invention or discovery by said Bell of the alleged improvement specified as his invention in said Letters Patent numbered 174,465, the same was described in the following printed publications:

"Electricity and Magnetism" by Jenkins, a book printed and published in London, England, and in the City of New York, in the year 1873, at p. 334.

"Der Electromagnetische Telegraphe," by H. Schellen, a printed book published in Brunswick, Germany, in the year 1867, at pp. 468 and 469.

"The Electric Telegraph" by R. Sabine; a book printed and published in London, England, 1867, at pp. 164, 165, 166 and 167.

"L'Eco d'Italia," 1860.

"Lehrbuch der Technischen Physik," by Hassler Pisko, a book published at Vienna, 1866, Vol. 1, p. 648.

Also in a printed publication in the German language entitled "Jahresbericht des Physikalischen Vereins zu Frankfurt am Main," a book printed and published in 1862, and particularly at pages 57–64.

A printed publication in the German language entitled "Zeitschrift des Deutsch-Oesterreichischen Telegraphen-Vereins," Vol. 9, a book printed and published at Berlin, in 1862, particularly at pp. 125–130.

A printed publication in the German language entitled "Die Neueren Apparate der Akustik," von Dr. Prof. Fr. Jos. Pisco, printed and published in 1865, particularly at pp. 96–108 and pp. 241, 242.

Yearly report of the Physical Society at Frankfurt-a-M., 1860, 1861, at p. 57, etc.

A French publication entitled "Petit Traité de Physique," par M. J. Jamin, Paris, 1870, and particularly at p. 421.

The "Telegraphic Journal," published in London, in the year 1872, Vol. 1, at p. 4.

"Electricity" by R. M. Ferguson, a printed book published in London and Edinburgh in 1867, at pp. 257 and 258.

"The Telegrapher," published in the city of New York in 1869, Vol. 5, No. 39, at pp.

"The Manufacturer and Builder" for May, 1869, a newspaper published in the city of New York in 1869, Vol. 1, at p. 129.

"Wonders of Electricity," by J. Baile, published in New York City in 1872, at pp. 140, 141, 142 and 143.

"The Telegraphic Journal;" published in London in the year 1875, Vol. 3, at pp. 286, 287 and 288.

"Dingler's Polytechnic Journal" for 1863, Vol. 168, pp. 28 and 185, a book published at Leipsic in 1863.

"Cosmos" for 1864, Vol. 24, pp. 349, 352, a printed book published in Paris in 1864; article by M. St. Edmé.

"Description Reis Telephone, Koenig's Catalogue of Apparatus for 1865," a book printed and published in Paris.

"Applications de l'Électricité by Du Moncel," Vol. 2, p. 255, etc., a printed book published in Paris in 1854 (Bourseul Apparatus).

"L'Anneé Scientifique," by Louis Figuier, 1858, Vol. 1, p. 62, a book printed and published at Paris, France, in 1858.

"Cosmos," by l'Abbé Moigno, 1859, eighth year, Vol. 14, No. 11; article about the "Scott Phonautograph;" a book printed and published in Paris in 1859.

"Traité Elementaire de Physique," by M. Ganot; eleventh edition, 1854, p. 224; a book published in Paris in 1854; article "Scott Phonautograph."

"Comptes Rendus de l'Académie des Sciences," Vol. 53, p. 108, 1861.

"Poggendorf Annalen," 1843, Vol. 59, p. 177, a book printed and published at Leipsic, 1843.

"Didaskalia," a journal published in Frankfort-on-the-Main, Sept. 28, 1854, No. 232, and on May 11, 1862, No. 130, and on May 14, 1862, No. 133.

"Du Moncel's Exposé des Applications de l'Électricité," a book published in Paris, France, in 1856 (p. 246), and in 1857 (p. 110).

"Frankfurter Conversationsblatt," a journal published in Frankfort-on-the-Main, Nov. 29, 1861, and June 30, 1863.

"Die Fortschritte der Physik," a journal published in Berlin (pp. 171, 173), and in 1863 (p. 96).

"Aus der Natur," published in Leipsic, 1862 (Vol. 21, pp. 470, 471 to p. 484).

"Müller Poillet's Lehrbuch der Physik und Meteorologie," published in 1862 in Germany, and in 1863, Vol. 2. p. 352, Fig. 325, and 1868, pp. 386, 388, Figs. 348–350.

"Friederichsdorf Zeitung," a journal published in Homburg in 1862, and also that of 1867 and 1868 (pp. 386, 387, 388, 389).

"Jahresbericht des Physikalischen Vereins" (Vol. 4. pp. 129 to 135), annual report for 1860, 1861, published in 1863, in Frankfort-on-the-Main.

"Böttger's Polytechnisches Notizblatt," Nos. 1–24 inclusive, pp. 65, 81–255, published in 1863.

"Deutsche Klinik," No. 48, pp. 468, 469, published in 1863 in Berlin.

"Deutsche Industrie Zeitung," published in 1863, in Chemnitz (pp. 184–208, 239 and 249).

"Die Gartenlaube," published at Leipsic, 1863 (pp. 807–809).

"Prospectus of Philip Reis," published in 1863 in Frankfort, and in "Pisko's Die Neueren Apparate der Akustik," published in Vienna in 1863.

A further circular, or addition to the preceding, published in Frankfort in 1863.

The two were published with the circular or prospectus of J. Wilh. Albert, mechanician in Frankfort, in 1863.

"Polytechnisches Centralblatt," published in 1863, pp. 857, 858.

Letter of Philip Reis to W. Ladd, Aug. 13, 1863.

"Tagesblatt der 39 Versammlung Deutscher Naturforscher," published in Giessen, in September, 1864.

"Zöllner's Buch der Erfindungen," published in Leipsic and Berlin in 1865 and in 1872.

"Von Karl Kuhns Handbuch der Angewandten Elektricitätslehre," pp. 1021–1026, published in 1866.

"Albert's Catalogue," in 1866 and 1872 and 1873.

"Kneeland's Annual of Scientific Discovery," in 1866 and 1867.

"New York Tribune," Jan. 8, 1869.

"Christian Union," New York, Dec. 25, 1875.

"Scientific American," New York, March 4, 1876.

"Scientific American" (Supplement), Feb. 5, 1876.

"Scientific American" (Supplement), No. 48, 1876.

"Electricity and Magnetism," by Jenkins, in London, 1876.

"Journal of the Franklin Institute of the State of Pennsylvania," Vol. 42, published in Philadelphia in 1869, pp. 419 et seq.

"The Manufacturer and Builder," April, 1870.

"Dublin Medical Press," 1863, Vol. 50, No. 1,293, p. 471.

"Cosmos," 1863, Vol. 23, p. 705.

"Zeitschrift des Architectur und Ingenieur Vereins," 1866, Vol. 12, p. 147.

"The Electric Telegraph," by Dr. Lardner, new edition, revised by E. B. Bright, published in London, Eng., in 1867, at pp. 164, 165, 166 and 167.

"Transactions Royal Scottish Society of Arts," Edinburgh, Vol. 6, 1864, Appendix Q, pp. 184–187.

"Annual Report of American Association for the Advancement of Science," for 1869.

"Knight's American Mechanical Dictionary," 1876, Article, Telephone.

* * * * * * *

11. And these defendants, further answering said bill, deny that the said second Bell patent, No. 186,787, is valid, but upon information and belief allege that it is invalid and void for the following reasons, to wit:—

(a.) Because the machine and instrument shown, described and claimed therein is not a patentable invention, but is an inoperative, useless and worthless device.

(b.) Because the said Alexander Graham Bell was not the original and first inventor or discoverer of any material or substantial part of the thing patented, but before his alleged invention or discovery thereof, the same or substantially the same thing or things had been invented and used by, and were known to the following named persons, of and at the following named places, to wit:

[Here follow substantial repetitions of the foregoing lists. Ed.]

(c.) Because in view of the state of the art at the time of the alleged invention of said Bell the claims of said patent are too broad, covering inventions before made by others, and of which he was not, and his assigns are not, entitled to the exclusive use and enjoyment.

(d.) Because the said Bell, in obtaining said patent, surreptitiously and unjustly obtained a patent for that which was in fact invented by another, to wit, Elisha Gray, who was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same.

(e.) Because the said Bell, in obtaining said Letters Patent, surreptitiously and unjustly obtained a patent for that which was in fact invented by another, to wit, said Thomas A. Edison, who was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same.

(f.) Because the said Bell, in obtaining said patent, surreptitiously and unjustly obtained a patent for that which was in fact invented by another, to wit, said Daniel Drawbaugh, who was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same.

(g.) Because the said Bell, in obtaining said patent, surreptitiously and unjustly obtained a patent for that which was in fact invented by another, to wit, said James W. McDonough, who was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same.

(h.) Because if said Bell ever had any right to a patent for the alleged improvement specified as his invention in said Letters Patent No. 186,787, or any right to have the same secured by Letters Patent, he abandoned and forfeited the same, and lost all such right by his delay in applying for Letters Patent and by the same having been put into public use and on sale more than two years before his application for a patent therefor.

(i.) Because the specification of said Letters Patent numbered 186,787 does not sufficiently describe the things attempted to be covered by the claims thereof to enable persons skilled in the art or science to which it appertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, construct and use the same; and that the alleged improvement attempted to be patented in said Letters Patent did not involve or require invention, and did not differ in any patentable respect from what was before said alleged invention known and used in this country or described in patents and printed publications.

(j.) Because there is no mechanical combination between the elements constituting the sixth claim of said Letters Patent No. 186,787, and no invention was required to produce the same.

(k.) Because long before any invention of said Bell of the alleged improvement specified as his invention in said Letters Patent No. 186,787, the same was described in and patented by the following Letters Patent, viz.: Letters Patent of the United States granted to Elisha Gray, July 27, 1875, No. 166,095; Letters Patent of the United States granted to Elisha Gray, April 11, 1876, No. 175,971; Letters Patent of the United States granted to A. G. Holcomb, May 16, 1860.

British Letters Patent granted to J. H. Johnston, July 29, 1874, and numbered 2,646.

Letters Patent granted by the Patent Office of the Dominion of Canada in 1875 to Elisha Gray, July 7, 1875, numbered 4,749.

British Letters Patent granted to J. H. Johnston, March 16, 1875, and numbered 974.

British Letters Patent granted to George T. Bousfield, May 4, 1876, and numbered 1,874.

Letters Patent of the United States granted to said Elisha Gray, July 20, 1875, and numbered 165,728.

Letters Patent of the United States granted to said Elisha Gray, Feb. 15, 1876, and numbered 173,460.

Letters Patent of the United States granted to said Elisha Gray, Feb. 15, 1876, and numbered 173,618.

Letters Patent of the United States granted to said Elisha Gray, Jan. 16, 1877, and numbered 186,340.

Letters Patent of the United States granted to said Bell, March 7, 1876, No. 174,465.

And also other Letters Patent, which are now unknown to these defendants, but which, when known, they pray leave by proper amendments to insert in this answer.

(l.) Because long before any invention by said Bell of the alleged improvement specified as his invention in said Letters Patent numbered 186,787, the same was described in the following printed publications, viz.:—

"Der Electromagnetische Telegraph," by Dr. H. Schellen, published at Brunswick, Germany, in the year 1867, at pp. 411, 412, 413, 414, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 468 and 469.

"Zeitschrift des Deutsch-Oesterreichischen Telegraphen-Vereins," published at Berlin, Prussia, in the year 1862, Vol. 9, p. 125.

Yearly report of the Physical Society at Frankfurt-a-M., 1860, 1861, p. 67, etc.

"Die Neueren Apparate der Akustik," von Dr. Prof. Jos. Pisko, printed and published in 1865.

"Journal of the German-Austrian Telegraph Association," Vol. 9, p. 125, 1862, and pp. 94–104.

"The Electric Telegraph," by R. Sabine, published in London, England, in 1867, at pp. 136, 137 and 138.

"The Telegraphic Journal," published in London, in 1872, Vol. 1, p. 4.

"Electricity," by R. M. Ferguson, published in London and Edinburgh, in the year 1867, at pp. 257 and 258.

"The Telegrapher," published in the city of New York, in the year 1869, Vol. 5, No. 89, at p.

"The Manufacturer and Builder," published in the city of New York, in the year 1869, Vol. 1, at p. 129.

Similar allegations and lists appear in the answers of the Overland and Clay Commercial Companies.

PUBLICATIONS RELATING TO BOURSEUL.

L'Illustration, Journal Universel, Paris, August 26, 1854, Vol. XXIV., No. 600, p. 139.

Bourseul's Communication.

"The electric telegraph is based on the following principle: An electric current, passing through a metallic wire, circulates through a coil around a piece of soft iron which it converts into a magnet. The moment the current stops, the piece of iron ceases to be a magnet. This magnet, which takes the name of electro-magnet, can thus in turn attract and then release a movable plate (plaque mobile) which by its to-and-fro movement produces the conventional signals employed in telegraphy. Sometimes this movement is directly utilized, and is made to produce dots or dashes on a strip of paper which is drawn along by clockwork. The conventional signals are thus formed by a combination of those dots and dashes. This is the American telegraph which bears the name of Morse, its inventor. Sometimes this to-and-fro movement is converted into a movement of rotation. In that way we have either the dial telegraph used on railroads, or the telegraph used in the government system, which by means of two line-wires and two indicating needles reproduce all the signals of the aerial telegraph or semaphore which was formerly used. Suppose, now, that we arrange upon a movable horizontal circle, letters, figures, signs of punctuation, etc. One can understand that the principle we have stated can be used to choose at a distance such and such a character, and to determine its movement, and consequently to print it on a sheet of paper appropriately placed for this purpose. This is the printing telegraph.

"We have gone still further. By the employment of the same principle, and by means of a mechanism rather complicated, it has been possible to reach a result which at first would seem to be almost a miracle. Handwriting itself is produced at a distance, and not only handwriting, but any line or any curve; so that, being in Paris, you can draw a profile by ordinary means there, and the same profile draws itself at the same time at Frankfort. Attempts of this sort have succeeded. The apparatus has been exhibited at the London exhibition. Some details, however, remain to be perfected. It would seem impossible to go beyond this in the region of the marvellous. Let us try, nevertheless, to go a few steps further. I have asked myself, for example, if the spoken word itself could not be transmitted by electricity; in a word, if what was spoken in Vienna may not be heard in Paris? The thing is practicable in this way:

"We know that sounds are made by vibrations, and are made sensible to the ear by the same vibrations, which are reproduced by the intervening medium. But the intensity of the vibrations diminishes very rapidly with the distance; so that even with the aid of speaking tubes and trumpets it is impossible to exceed somewhat narrow limits. Suppose that a man speaks near a movable disc, sufficiently flexible to lose none of the vibrations of the voice; that this disc alternately makes and breaks the connection with a battery; you may have at a distance another disc which will simultaneously execute the same vibrations.

"It is true that the intensity of the sounds produced will be variable at the point of departure, at which the disc vibrates by means of the voice, and constant at the point of arrival, where it vibrates by means of electricity; but it has been shown that this does not change the sounds. It is, moreover, evident that the sounds will be reproduced at the same pitch.

"The present state of acoustic science does not permit us to declare a priori if this will be precisely the case with syllables uttered by the human voice. The mode in which these syllables are produced has not yet been sufficiently investigated. It is true that we know that some are uttered by the teeth, others by the lips, etc.; but that is all.

"However this may be, observe that the syllables can only reproduce upon the sense of hearing the vibrations of the intervening medium. Reproduce precisely these vibrations, and you will reproduce precisely these syllables.

"It is, at all events, impossible, in the present condition of science, to prove the impossibility of transmitting sound by electricity. Everything tends to show, on the contrary, that there is such a possibility. When the application of electro-magnetism to the transmission of messages was first discussed, a man of great scientific attainments treated the idea as Utopian; and yet there is now direct communication between London and Vienna by means of a simple wire. Men declared it to be impossible, but it is done.

"It need not be said that numerous applications of the highest importance will immediately arise from the transmission of speech by electricity. Any one who is not deaf and dumb may use this mode of transmission, which would require no apparatus except an electric battery, two vibrating discs and a wire. In many cases, as, for example, in large establishments, orders might be transmitted in this way, although transmission in this way will not be used while it is necessary to transmit letter by letter, and to make use of telegraphs which require use and apprenticeship. However this may be, it is certain that in a more or less distant future, speech will be transmitted by electricity. I have made some experiments in this direction. They are delicate, and demand time and patience; but the approximations obtained promise a favorable result."

"CHARLES BOURSEUL.

"Paris, August 18, 1854."

Didaskalia, Blätter für Geist, Gemüth und Publicität.

Frankfort-on-the-Main, Germany, No. 232, September 28, 1854.

(Magazine for Intelligence, Humor and News.)

"The wonders with which electricity has lately astonished us are about, as it seems, to be increased by a new one, that would not only prepare a great revolution in the electric telegraph as practiced up to the present, but would increase its usefulness in an incalculable manner.

"It is a question of nothing more nor less than an electric transmission of the spoken word. The idea originates with a young and educated, though modest young man, Charles Bourseul, who was a soldier of the African army in 1848, where he attracted the attention of the governor-general by a mathematical course which he delivered to his comrades of the garrison in Algeria, and he is now living in Paris. Bourseul's problem, of the practicability of which he is completely persuaded, belongs, perhaps, to those discoveries which the scientific world afterwards declares very easy, and which they would gladly make us believe could easily have been discovered much earlier if they had chosen to give themselves the trouble.

"As is well known, the principle upon which electric telegraphy is based is as follows: An electric current traversing a metallic wire changes a piece of soft iron in the vicinity of which it passes into a magnet. As soon as the current ceases, the magnetic quality also ceases. This magnet, the electro-magnet, can thus alternately attract or let go a movable plate, which by its movements back and forth produces the conventional signals used in telegraphy. Now it is farther known that all tones are brought to the ear only by vibrations of the air, hence are really nothing more than these vibrations of the air, and that the endless variety of tones depends entirely upon the rapidity and amplitude of the sound-waves. Could there now be invented a metallic plate which should be so movable and pliable that it reproduces all the vibrations of tones (like the air), and should this plate be so connected with an electric current that it should alternately make and break the electric current according to the air vibrations by which it was affected, it would thereby be possible also to arrange electrically a second similarly constructed metal plate, so that it repeated simultaneously exactly the same vibrations as the first plate, and it would then be exactly the same as if one had spoken in the immediate vicinity against this second plate, or the ear would be affected precisely as if it received the tones directly through the first metallic wall. The electric telegraph formerly stamped by the Academy as nonsense is now spread throughout all the world as a common phenomenon; if we question in regard to this new idea of a young physicist the principles of physics, they have not only nothing to offer against the possibility of its being carried out, but its success appears in fact to be more probable than did a short time ago that of the electric telegraph itself. If it be practically carried out, the electric telegraph could be operated by every one. There would be need of no farther device and knowledge than a galvanic battery, two vibrating plates and a metal wire; without any other preparation the one must talk against one metallic plate, and the other hold his ear near the other plate, and they could converse with each other as if face to face. The young inventor believes in the success of his efforts, and challenges scientific men to prove that the laws of physics contradict the above-mentioned principles, and thereby make the attempt seem impossible. Meanwhile may the affair enjoy in high degree the attention which it is certainly attracting."

PUBLICATIONS BY REIS AND OTHERS RELATING TO THE REIS TELEPHONE.

Report of Reis Lecture.
Frankfurter Conversationsblatt, Nov. 29, 1861.
Reproduction des Schalles durch den galvanischen Strom. (Frankfurt.)

(Reproduction of Sound by the Galvanic Current. Frankfort).

"For this new discovery, which rightly excites the greatest interest, we have to thank Mr. Reis, teacher in Friedrichsdorf. He has succeeded after many experiments in solving, up to a certain point at least, this problem, which up to the present has been considered insolvable.

"Of all the new discoveries in natural science there are none of so general advantage and which so enter into our practical life as those in the domain of chemistry and physics; in the latter, galvanism in its application to electroplating and telegraphy has achieved remarkable results. At the moment when telegraphy has attained a place in our social life, there begins, perhaps, for the same a new era in the fact that as we in telegraphy make ourselves understood by means of signs, in this we can make ourselves understood by means of tones at a distance.

"Mr. Reis has constructed in a very ingenious manner an apparatus by means of which he has shown some perfectly successful experiments before a large audience in the Physical Society in this city.

"He has made a very happy use of the earlier discovery that the iron core of a wire helix produces tones by the interruptions of the current following each other at very short periods.

"His apparatus for receiving the sound is based upon the arrangement of the human ear. It consists in the first place of a funnel-shaped cavity (to represent the cartilage of the ear) to receive the sound, closed at its narrower part by a membrane, upon which is fastened an elastic strip of platinum which is connected with one of the circuit wires, while the former is in electric connection with the other pole of the battery.

"As soon, then, as the sound-waves set the membrane in vibration, the elastic strip of metal fastened to the same will make the same vibrations,—will alternately rise and fall, thereby touching the other elastic strip and so making and breaking the current.

"The reproduction of the sound by the galvanic current, for it is only such and not a conduction of the sound, is brought about in the manner specified above. Into a wire helix, included in the circuit, is placed a thin metal rod,—e. g., a knitting needle,—which apparatus, in order to increase the tone, is placed upon an easily vibrating support, a resonant box. By means of the current now made, now broken, the iron rod is also set into vibrations, which are communicated to our ear and there reproduce the sound.

"The vibrations of the iron rod correspond with those of the membrane; but as the pitch of the tones is dependent upon the times of vibration of the sounding body, the lower tones escape our notice, while the higher ones are especially noticed.

"Up to the present the reproduction of the tones is indeed weak, and words cannot be reproduced. We leave here the question as to whether this hereafter will be successfully accomplished.

"Mr. Fritz, instrument maker, has just constructed a new instrument with some improvements, and Prof. Böttger will hereafter make experiments with it in the Physical Society, to which we shall at times call attention.

REIS LECTURE.

Jahresbericht des Physikalischen Vereins zu Frankfurt am Main, für das Rechnungs Jahr, 1860–1861.

(Yearly Report of the Physical Society at Frankfort-a-M., 1860–1861, pp. 57–64, published in 1832).

"On Telephony by means of the Galvanic Current, by Philip Reis."

"The extraordinary results in the field of telegraphy have probably often raised the question, If it might not be possible to transmit musical tones themselves [Tonsprache] to a distance? Experiments made in this direction could not, however, produce any result at all satisfactory, because the vibrations of sound-conducting media soon lose their intensity to such an extent that they are no longer appreciable by our senses.

"A reproduction of tones [Tönen] at certain distances by means of a galvanic current has probably been thought of, but the practical solution of this problem has certainly seemed the most doubtful to the very persons who, from their knowledge and appliances, were in the best condition to attack it. To a person having only a superficial knowledge of physics the problem presents far less difficulties, simply because the most of them are unperceived. About nine years ago I also (having an extraordinary enthusiasm for what was new, and an insufficient knowledge of physics) had the boldness to attempt the solution, but was soon forced to desist because the very first experiment convinced me of the impossibility of its solution.

"Later, after further study and experience, I came to see that my first experiment had been a very rough and by no means conclusive one; I did not, however, follow up the subject seriously, because I did not feel myself equal to the difficulties in the way.

"Youthful impressions, however, are strong, and therefore not easily effaced. I could never get rid of the thought of that first experiment and its occasion, notwithstanding all that reason says to the contrary, and thus, half unwillingly, this project of my youth was reviewed in hours of leisure, the difficulties and the means for overcoming them were weighed, but for the present, at least, no experiment was made.

"How indeed could a single instrument reproduce the combined effect of all the organs occupied in human speech? This was always the cardinal question; finally I got the notion of putting the question in another way.

"How is our ear affected by the totality of vibrations produced by the organs of speech all simultaneously active? Or, more generally,—

"How are we affected by the vibrations of several simultaneously sounding bodies?

"To answer this question, we must, in the first place, understand what must happen in order that we may perceive a single tone.

"Without our ear, any tone is nothing else than a recurrent condensation and rarefaction of some body repeated at least seven or eight times in a second. If this occurs in the same medium in which we are, the membrane of the ear is at each condensation forced towards the middle ear, to be moved at the subsequent rarefaction in the opposite direction. These vibrations produce a synchronous raising and falling of the hammer upon the anvil (according to other authorities, an approach or receding of the ear-bone particles), and a similar number of tremors in the fluid of the cochlea, in which the filaments of the auditory nerve are distributed. The greater the condensation of the sound-conducting medium at any given moment, the greater is the amplitude of vibration of the membrane and hammer, and consequently the more powerful the blow upon the anvil and the vibration of the nerves by means of the fluid.

"The office of our organs of hearing is, therefore, to transmit with certainty up to the auditory nerve every condensation and rarefaction occurring in the surrounding medium. But the office of the auditory nerve is to bring to our consciousness the vibrations of matter which have occurred in a given time, both as regards number and amplitude. Here, for the first time, certain combinations receive a name; here, certain vibrations are tones or noises (Töne oder Misstöne).

"What our auditory nerve perceives is, then, simply the effect of a force coming within the range of consciousness, and this force can be represented, both as to duration and magnitude, graphically by a curve.

"Let a b represent any given time, and the curve above the line condensation (+), the curve below the line rarefaction (—), then any ordinate raised from the end of any abscissa will represent the degree of condensation, at the time represented by its base, in consequence of which the drum of the ear vibrates.

"Our ear can under no circumstances appreciate more than can be represented by these curves, and this indeed is entirely sufficient to give us a clear perception of any tone [ton] or any combination of tones.

"If several tones [Töne] are produced at the same time, the conducting medium is subjected to the influence of several simultaneous forces, and the two following laws will hold good: if the forces act all in the same direction, the amplitude is proportional to the sum of the forces, if the forces act in opposite directions, the amplitudes are proportional to the difference of the opposing forces.

"If, for example, in the case of three tones, we draw the curve of condensation of each separately, then by a summation of the ordinates of corresponding abscissas, we can determine new ordinates and develop a new curve, which might be called the combination curve. This represents exactly what our ear perceives of the three simultaneous tones. The fact that the musician can distinguish the three tones need not surprise us any more than the fact that any one acquainted with the theory of colors can in green discover blue and yellow; but the combination curves in Plate I. show that this difficulty is a slight one, for in these curves all the relations of the components successively recur. In the case of chords of more than three notes the relations are not so readily seen from the drawing, Plate II., for example. In the case of such chords, however, the skilled musician also finds difficulty in recognizing the separate notes.

Umkehrungen eines Dreiklanges. Plate I.

"Plate III. illustrates discord [Dissonanz]. Why discords impress us unpleasantly I will leave my readers to judge at this time, though I may perhaps return to the subject subsequently in another paper.

"From the preceding it follows:

"First. Every tone [Ton] and every combination of tones, on striking our ear, causes vibrations on the drum of the ear, the succession of which may be represented by a curve.

"Second. The succession of these vibrations alone gives us a conception (sensation) of the tone, and every alteration changes the conception (sensation).

"As soon, then, as it is possible to produce, anywhere and in any manner, vibrations whose curves shall be the same as those of any given tone or combination of tones, we shall receive the same impression as that tone or combination of tones would have produced on us.

"With the above principles as a foundation, I have succeeded in constructing an apparatus with which I am enabled to reproduce the tones of various instruments, and even to a certain extent the human voice. It is very simple, and by means of the figure will be easily understood from the following explanation:

"In the cubical block of wood r s t u v w x there is a conical perforation a, closed at one end by a membrane b (pig's intestine), upon the middle of which there is cemented a conducting strip of platinum; this is connected with the binding screw p [auf deren Mitte ein stromleitendes Streifchen Platin festgeklittet ist. Dieses steht mit der Klemme p in Verbindung]. From the binding screw n, another thin strip of metal [ein dünnes Metallstreifchen] extends until over the middle of the membrane, and ends here in a platinum wire placed at right angles to its length and surface.

"From the binding screw p, a conducting wire runs through the battery to a distant station, being connected with a coil of silk-covered copper wire, and this again is connected with a conductor leading back to the binding screw n.

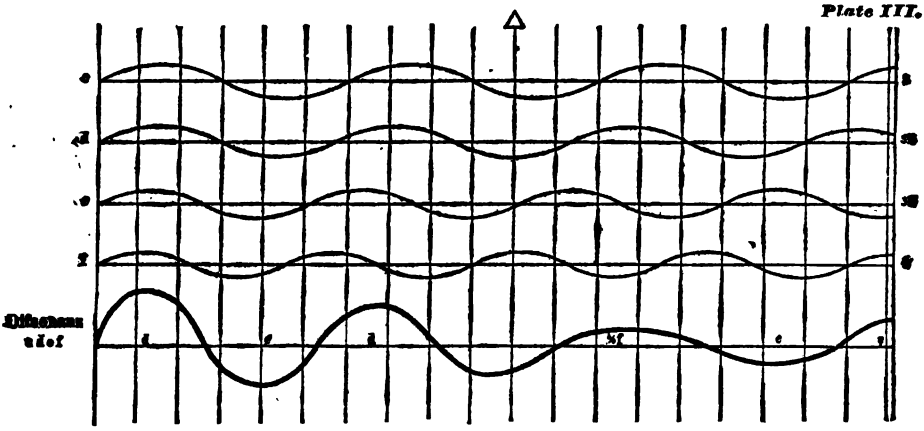
Plate III.



"The coil at the distant station is about six inches long, is composed of six layers of fine wire, and, as a core in its centre, has a knitting needle which projects about two inches at both ends. By means of the projecting ends, the coil rests upon two bridges of a resonant case. (All this part can of course be replaced by any other apparatus by means of which the well known 'galvanic tones' can be produced).

"If, now, tones or combinations of tones are produced in the neighborhood of the block, so that sufficiently powerful waves enter the opening a, then these sounds cause the membrane b to vibrate. At the first condensation the hammer-like wire d is pushed back; at the rarefaction it cannot follow the retreating membrane, and the current traversing the strips remains broken [Strom bleibt so lange unterbrochen bis, &c.], until the membrane forced by a new condensation again presses the strip (proceeding from p) against d. In this way each sound-wave causes a breaking and closing [ein Oeffnen und ein Schliessen] of the current [Stromes].

"At each closing [Schliessen] of the circuit [Kette] the atoms of the iron wire inside the distant spiral are moved away from each other (Pouillet Müller, page 804, Vol. II., fifth edition); on breaking the circuit [beim Unterbrechen des Stromes] these atoms seek to regain their position of equilibrium. When this happens, in consequence of the reciprocal actions of elasticity and inertia, a number of vibrations are produced, and they give the longitudinal sound of the rod (see as above). This is the case if the making and breaking of the current [Unterbrechungen und Schliessungen des Stromes] occur with comparative slowness. If they occur more rapidly than the oscillations of the iron core, due to its elasticity, the atoms cannot complete their course. The paths described become shorter in proportion as the interruptions are more frequent, but then are just as numerous as these.

"The iron wire no longer gives its longitudinal normal tone, but a tone whose pitch corresponds to the number of the interruptions [Unterbrechungen] (in a given time); this is the same as saying that the rod reproduces the tone [Ton] impressed upon the interrupter [dem Unterbrechungsapparat]. The intensity also of this tone is proportional to that of the original one, for in proportion as this is more intense the motions of the membrane are greater; the motions of the hammer, also, and finally the time during which the circuit remains opened, is greater, and consequently, up to a certain limit, the motions of the atoms in the reproducing wire are greater, we perceiving them as greater vibrations, in just the same way as we would have perceived the original sound-wave.

"As the length of the conducting wire can undoubtedly be made as great as in direct telegraphy, I have called my instrument 'telephone.'

"Now in reference to the capabilities of the telephone, it may be stated that I was enabled to render audible to the members of a large assembly (The Physical Society at Frankfort-a-M.), melodies which were sung (not very loud) into the apparatus in another house (three hundred feet away), with closed doors.

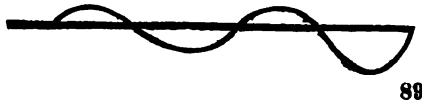
"Other experiments showed that the sounding wire was capable of reproducing complete chords of three tones of a piano, upon which the telephone was placed, and that it reproduces equally well the tones of other instruments, accordion, clarinet, horn, organ-pipes, &c., provided that the tones are within the compass F—f.

"Of course, in all experiments, sufficient precautions were taken to insure that there was no direct conduction of sound. This is very easily done by making a momentary short circuit immediately in front of the coil, by which means its action is temporarily interrupted.

"Hitherto it has not been possible to reproduce the tones of human speech [Tonsprache des Menschen] with a distinctness sufficient for every one. The consonants are for the most part reproduced pretty distinctly, but the vowels as yet not in an equal degree. The cause of this I will attempt to explain.

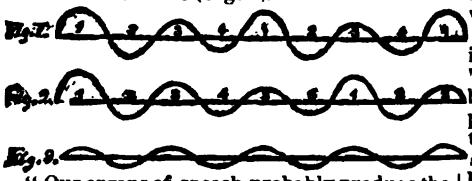
"According to the experiments of Willis, Helmholtz, and others, vowel tones can be produced artificially, if the vibrations of one body are from time to time augmented by those of another, somewhat as follows:—

"An elastic spring is set in vibration by the blow of a tooth on a toothed wheel; the first vibration is the greatest, and each subsequent one is smaller than the preceding.



"If, after a few vibrations of this kind (the spring not coming to rest in the mean time), the tooth wheel imparts a new stroke the following vibration will be again a maximum, and so on.

"The pitch of the tone produced in this way depends upon the number of vibrations in a given time, but the character of the tone upon the number of swellings [Anschwellungen] in the same time. Two vowels having the same pitch would differ in about the way represented by the curves (Figs. 1, 2), while the same tone without any vowel character would be represented by the curve (Fig. 3).



"Our organs of speech probably produce the vowels in the same manner, through the combined action of the upper and lower vocal chords, or of these latter and the cavity of the mouth.

"My apparatus reproduces the number of vibrations, but with an intensity much less than that of the original ones; though, as I have reason to believe, to a certain degree proportional among themselves. But in the case of these generally small vibrations, the difference between large and small vibrations is more difficult to perceive than in the case of the original waves, and the vowel is therefore more or less indistinct.

"Whether or not my views as to the curves corresponding to sound combinations are correct could perhaps be decided by means of the new phonautograph of Duhamel ('Vierordt Physiology,' page 245).

"It may be that for the practical application of the telephone much remains to be done; for physics it has already sufficient interest, from the fact that it opens a new field for research. Friedrichsdorf, near Frankfort-a-M., December, 1861."

Reis Exhibition of 1861.

Fortschritte der Physik, XVII., for 1861, pp. 171–3.

Ph. Reis. Telephony by means of the Electric Current.

(Annual Report of the Physical Society of Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1860–1, pp. 57–64.)

"By the name 'Telephone,' the author designates the following apparatus of his own construction by means of which and with the help of the galvanic current he is enabled "to reproduce at a distance the tones [Töne] of different instruments and even to a certain degree the human voice."

"A wooden cube is bored through from one of the faces to the opposite one, the cavity taking the shape of a cone; the smaller opening is closed by means of a membrane (hog's intestine, Schweinsdünndarm). On the middle of the membrane and parallel with it is a thin strip of platinum cemented fast at one end whilst the other end is held by a binding post [Klemme] p. From another binding post q extends a similar thin strip of metal as far as over the centre of the membrane, and carries a little platinum wire directed towards the membrane at right angles to the strip and the surface of the membrane. From binding post p a conductor leads through a battery to a distant coil, which again is connected by another wire to binding post q.

"The coil at the distant station is about six inches long, consists of about six layers of thin wire, and encloses as a core a knitting needle which protrudes about two inches at each end. By these protruding ends the coil is supported on two bridges of a sound-board. If, now, tones or combinations of tones are produced in the vicinity of the large opening of the conical cavity so that sufficiently strong waves enter it, these waves will set the membrane into vibrations; by the outward motion of the membrane the platinum strip cemented on it is pressed against the hammer-shaped wire d and the galvanic current [Strom] is closed [geschlossen]; by the inward motion of the membrane the current is reopened. The alternate magnetizings and demagnetizings of the core of the coil resulting therefrom will bring forth, if the alternation is slow, the longitudinal tone of the core, and if the alternation [Aufeinanderfolge] is quicker, a longitudinal vibration of the same, the period of which corresponds to the period of the interruptions of the current [Unterbrechungen des stromes] or of the vibrations of the membrane, and consequently to the rate or pitch of the tone which entered the conical cavity. That means, according to the author, that "The rod [Stab] reproduces the tone which was impressed upon the interrupting apparatus [Unterbrechungsapparat]." "The strength of this tone is also proportionate to the original tone, for," as the author, though not very accurately, explains: "The stronger this is the greater the motion of the little hammer, the greater finally the time during which the circuit remains open, and consequently the greater, up to a certain limit, the motion of the atoms in the reproducing rod, which motions affect us as greater vibrations, as the original wave itself would have done." By means of this telephone the author made audible to the members of a large meeting of the Physical Society in Frankfort-a-M., melodies sung not very loud into the apparatus, in a house situated about 800 feet distant, with closed doors. "Other trials showed that the resounding rod is capable of reproducing full chords [Dreiklänge] of a piano on which the telephone rests, and that, in short, it reproduces just as well the tones of other instruments, such as the harmonica, clarinet, horn, organ pipe, &c., provided the tones are within a certain range, from F to f' or thereabout.

"As a matter of course, sufficient care was taken to ascertain whether direct transmission of the sounds had not a share in the result. This was ascertained very simply by establishing for a given time a good shunt circuit directly before the coil, in consequence of which, of course, the activity of the latter ceased for that time.

"It was not possible thus far to reproduce spoken tones [Tonsprache des Menschen] with a distinctness satisfactory to all; the consonants are for the most part distinctly reproduced, the vowels not in the same degree." The author attempts to explain this imperfect reproduction of the vowels by saying that the apparatus reproduces the vibrations to a certain extent indeed with proportionate, but also reduced, strength, and the ear can no longer satisfactorily discern the relation of the proportionately great vibrations which determine the pitch [Tonhöhe] to the small vibrations on which vocal quality [vocal Farbe] depends."

Reis-Legat Article.

Zeitschrift des Deutsch-Oesterreichischen Telegraphen-Vereins, Berlin, 1862, Vol. IX, p. 125.

(Journal of the German-Austrian Telegraph Association, V. 9, p. 125, 1862.)

Concerning the reproduction of sounds by means of galvanic electricity: by V. Legat, Royal Prussian Telegraph Inspector at Cassel, accompanied by copperplates VIII. and IX.

"It might not be uninteresting to make known, in wider circles, the following ideas lately communicated by Mr. Philip Reis to the Society of Physics, and to the meetings of the Free German Institute, at Frankfort-on-the-Main, concerning the reproduction of tones [Tönen] by means of galvanic electricity, and, also, what has been hitherto accomplished towards the realization of this project, in order that the accumulated experiments may serve as a foundation to build upon, and that the capacity of the electric current, which by human ingenuity has already been made serviceable for correspondence, may be developed in this direction also.

"In this essay we shall not deal with the electric current as to its capacity for operating telegraphic apparatus of whatever construction for the reproduction of visible signs, but of the application of this current to the production of audible signals, of tones [Tönen].

"The air waves, which by acting upon the ear excite in us the sensation of sound by primarily setting the tympanum of the ear into vibratory motion, are, as is well known, transmitted to the interior parts of the ear and to the auditory nerves there located by means of a lever apparatus of wonderful delicacy, the auditory bones (hammer, anvil, stirrup); and the attempt to reproduce tones therefore depends upon this: to actuate an artificial imitation of this lever apparatus by means of the vibrations of a membrane corresponding to the membrane of the ear drum, and thereby to open and close [zum Oeffnen u. Schliessen] a galvanic circuit, connected with a distant station by a metallic conductor.

"Before describing the apparatus to be used, it would be proper to inquire how our ear apprehends the vibrations of any one particular tone, and the combined vibrations of all simultaneous tones acting upon it, because thereby we may determine the operations which are to be performed by the transmitting and receiving apparatus in the solution of the problem.

"Examining first the processes which take place in order that the human ear may apprehend any single tone, we find that each tone is the result of alternate rarefactions and condensations repeated within a fixed time. If this operation occurs in the same medium in which the ear is placed, then at each condensation the membrane is forced toward the cavity of the drum, and toward the opposite side at each rarefaction.

"These vibrations cause corresponding movements in the auditory bones, and are thereby transmitted to the auditory nerves.

"The greater the degree of condensation of the sound-conducting medium is at a given time, the greater will be the amplitude of vibration of the membrane and auditory bones, and the greater the consequent result; and in the opposite case, so much the weaker. Hence it is evidently the function of the auditory apparatus to impart with faithfulness to the auditory nerves every condensation and rarefaction which occurs in the surrounding medium. On the other hand, the function of transmitting to our consciousness both the number and amplitude of the resulting vibrations occurring within a given time devolves upon the auditory nerves.

"It is here, in our consciousness, that a certain complex phenomenon receives a specific name; it is here, in our consciousness, that the transmitted vibrations become tones [Tönen].

"Accordingly, that which is apprehended by the auditory nerves is the effect of a force, reaching to our consciousness, and which can be made more easy of comprehension, as to its duration and strength, by graphical delineation.

"For example, let the length of the line a——b represent a definite period of time, the curves above this line the condensations(†), and the curves below this line the rarefactions(—); then every ordinate erected at the end of any abscissa will indicate, at the moment of time indicated by this abscissa, the degree of condensation in consequence of which the membrane of the drum vibrates.

"The ear is not capable of perceiving more than can be represented in this way, or more than can be represented by similar curves; this is, however, sufficient to convey to our consciousness any single tone [Ton] or any required combinations of tones. For if several tones are generated simultaneously, then the tone imparting medium is influenced by several forces, acting at the same time, and subject to mechanical laws.

"If all the forces act in the same direction, then the amount of motion is in proportion to the sum of all the forces; if on the other hand the forces act in opposing directions, then the amount of motion is in proportion to the difference between the opposing forces.

"From these principles it follows that the curves representing the condensations of a number of simultaneously generated tones may be combined in a single curve of condensation, which will indicate with precision what our ear apprehends through the reception of these simultaneously acting tones.

"The objection generally made to this proposition, that a musician, or any person, is able to distinguish the simple tones out of which these composite curves are formed or arise, should not be allowed to militate against it, as it is also possible for some who are familiar with the study of colors to distinguish, in green, for example, the mixture of yellow and blue, in their varied shades; and the one phenomenon as well as the other is referable to the fact that each observer is very familiar with the factors of that product which has been conveyed to his consciousness.

"By the explanations heretofore given, it is easy to construct the curves representing the condensations of various tones, chords, &c., and a few examples are given by way of illustration:

"Fig. 1, Plate VIII, represents a composite curve formed of three tones, in which all the proportions of the components recur successively.

"Fig. 2 represents a similar curve formed of more than three tones; in this case, however, it is no longer possible to represent the proportions so clearly in the drawing, yet an experienced musician will be able to discern them even here, although in practice it might be difficult for him to recognize the separate tones in such a chord.

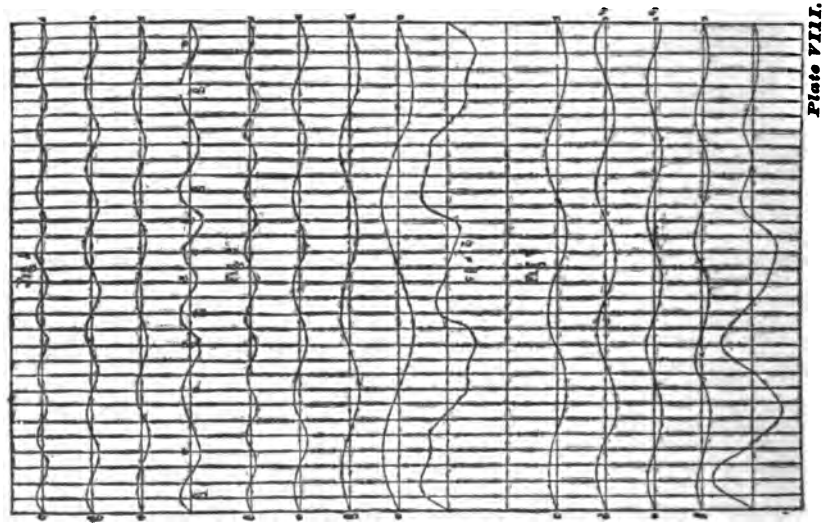
"The advantage of representing the operation of tones upon the human ear after this manner is that it gives the clearest view possible of the course of the process; the representation here given also shows why a discord [Dissonanz], Fig. 3, must affect the ear disagreeably.

"This apparent digression from the subject under consideration was necessary to demonstrate that as soon as we are able, in any place and in any manner, to reproduce vibrations of such curves and intensities as are equivalent to the curves and intensities of the vibrations of any particular tone, or of any particular combination of tones, we shall have the same impressions as were produced upon us by this original tone, or these original combinations of tones.

"The apparatus described hereafter offers the possibility of producing these vibrations in every manner desired; and by the use of galvanic electricity it is possible to evoke, at any distance, vibrations like [gleiche] those which have been so produced, and in this way to reproduce at any place the tones which have been generated at another place.

"In Plate IX, Fig. 4, A is the tone transmitter [Tonangeber], and B the tone receiver [Tonempfänger], and these two instruments are set up at different stations. I must observe at the outset that the arrangement of the instruments for sending backwards and forwards is omitted for greater clearness; and likewise, as the whole thing is not presented as a completed fact, but only to call to the notice of a wider circle what has been already ascertained, the possibility of the working of the apparatus at a distance greater than the limited direct working allows at present is left out of consideration, since these points are easily accomplished by mechanical arrangements and since the most important facts of the phenomena treated are not influenced thereby.

"Let us now turn to the tone transmitter, Fig. 4, A. This on the one hand is connected by the metallic conductor with the tone receiver, Fig. 4, B, at a neighboring station; on the other hand it is connected by means of the electric battery C with the earth, or with the metallic return conductor. The tone transmitter, Fig. 4, A, consists of a conical tube a b, about 15 centimetres in length, having a front opening of about 10 centimetres, and a rear opening of about 4 centimetres.



Legal Reproduction von Tönen auf elektro galvanischem Wege.

Plate VIII.

"It appears by practical experiments that neither the material of this tube nor any increase in its length influenced the accuracy of the action of the apparatus. An enlargement of the diameter of the tube impairs the working of the apparatus, and it is desirable that the inner surface of the tube be as smooth as possible. The smaller or rear end of the tube is closed by a collodion membrane o, and upon the centre of the circular surface of this membrane rests one end c of the lever c d, the supporting point e of which is sustained by a bracket, and is kept in electrical connection with the metallic conductor. The proper lengths of the respective arms c e and e d of this lever are regulated by the laws of the lever. It is advisable to make the arm c e longer than the arm e d, in order that the least motion at c may operate with greatest effect at d. It is also desirable that the lever itself be made as light as possible, that it may follow the movements of the membrane. Any inaccuracy in the operation of the lever c d in this respect will produce false tones at the receiving station. When in a state of rest the contact at d g is closed, and a delicate spring n maintains the lever in this position.

"The second part of the apparatus, the standard f, consists of a metallic support, connected with one pole of the battery C, the other pole of which is connected to the earth, or to a metallic return wire leading to the other station.

"Upon the standard f is arranged a spring g, with a contact-point corresponding to the contact-point d of the lever c d; the position of g is regulated by the screw h.

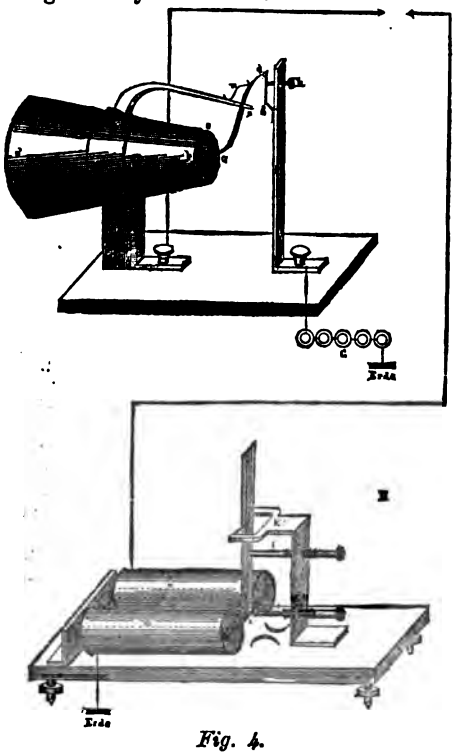

Fig. 4.

"In order not to impair the operation of the apparatus by the action of the air-waves against the rear side of the membrane, it is desirable to place a disc of about fifty centimetres in diameter at right angles to the longitudinal axis of the tube a b; this disc may be attached to the tube by a fastening surrounding its outer circumference.

"The tone receiver, Fig. 4, B, consists of an electro-magnet m m, which rests upon a sounding-board n w; its coil is connected respectively with the metallic conductor and the earth or the metallic return conductor.

"Facing the electro-magnet m m is an armature, to which is attached a very long but light and broad lever i.

"The lever i with the armature is suspended from the standard k in the manner of a pendulum, its motion being regulated by means of the screw l and the spring q.

"In order to increase the capacity of the apparatus, the tone receiver may be placed at one of the focal points of an elliptical chamber of suitable size, and the listener may place his ear at the other focus of this chamber.

"The operation of the apparatus described is as follows:

"When at rest the galvanic circuit [Kette] is closed. When the air, which is in the tube a b of the apparatus, Fig. 4, A, is alternately condensed and rarefied, by speaking into it (or by singing or introducing the tones of an instrument), a movement of the membrane closing the smaller opening of the tube is produced, corresponding to such condensation or rarefaction. The lever c d follows the movements of the membrane, and opens and closes [öffnet und schliesst] the galvanic circuit [Kette] at d g, so that at each condensation of the air in the tube the circuit is opened, and at each rarefaction the circuit is closed [ein Oeffnen und ein Schliessen erfolgt].

"In consequence of this operation, the electro-magnet of the apparatus, Fig. 4, B, in accordance with the condensations and rarefactions of the column of air in the tube a b, Fig. 4, A, is correspondingly demagnetized and magnetized [demagnetisirt und magnetisirt] and the armature of the magnet is set into vibrations like those of the membrane, in the transmitting apparatus. But the beam [Balken] i attached to the armature communicates these corresponding vibrations of the armature to the air surrounding the apparatus Fig. 4, B, which finally transmits the vibrations so produced to the ear of the listener.

"We have not here to consider the question of the transmission [Fortpflanzung] of tones by means of the galvanic current, but only of the conveyance [Uebertragung] of generated sounds to another place, and in this way that at the latter place a similar cause is produced, and a similar effect obtained. It must not be ignored, however, that while the apparatus described reproduces the exact number of the original vibrations, but not of the same strength [die gleiche Stärke der reproducirten Schwingungen noch nicht erreicht wurde]; [and that the achievement of this result is reserved for an improvement of the apparatus.

"In consequence of the imperfection of the apparatus at this time, the minor differences of the original vibrations are distinguishable with more difficulty—that is, the vowel sounds appear more or less indistinct—inasmuch as each tone depends not merely upon the number of the vibrations of the medium, but also upon its condensation and rarefaction.

"This also explains why chords and melodies were transmitted with marvelous accuracy in the practical experiments hitherto made, while single words in reading, speaking, &c., were less distinctly recognizable, although even in these the inflections of the voice, as in interrogation, exclamation, surprise, calling, etc., were clearly reproduced.

"There is no doubt that the subject we have been considering before it becomes practically valuable for use, will require considerable improvement; it will especially be necessary to perfect the mechanism of the apparatus to be employed; but I am convinced, by repeated practical experiments, that it is of the greatest theoretic interest to pursue these investigations, and also that a development of practical value will not elude our intelligent century."

INDUSTRIAL GAZETTE.

"Deutsche Industrie Zeitung, 1863, Chemnitz. April 17, 1863, No. 16, page 184.

"Industrial Queries for Exciting Interest and Eliciting Responses."

"Of late there has been talk in newspapers about producing definite tones at a distance, similarly to telegraphic dispatches, such, for instance, as conducting the acoustic effects of an instrument far beyond the reach of the audibility of its sound. Do these communications rest upon actual facts?"

(From same Gazette. May 1, 1863, No. 18, page 208):

"Answers. Answer to question in No. 16, page 184. Transmission of Tones by Electricity. According to 'Böttger's Notizblatt,' 1863, No. 6, successful experiments in 'telephony' were made in October, 1861, at Frankfort-a-M. by Professor Ph. Reis, so that it seems not impossible to carry on conversations at miles distance, and even to convey the voice itself with its peculiar undulations, and also the tones of a musical instrument. Heretofore the voice could be reproduced from one house to another only for a distance of 300 feet by means of a peculiar and ingenious apparatus. The arrangement of the same was essentially as follows: The waves of sound were taken up by an elastic surface, and transmitted to a light commutator introduced into the circuit of a galvanic battery (einer federnden Commutator eingeschaltet in den Leitungsdraht). At the other end of the line was introduced a coil of copper wire, inside of which was an iron wire resting upon a sounding board, that was thrown into sonorous vibrations by the changes of current depending upon the waves of sound."

(May 29, 1863, No. 22, page 249.)

"The reproduction of tones by electro-galvanic means (with a drawing which is the same as the drawing of the apparatus in the Legat article, No. 8, pp. 539–545, supra).

"Although this subject has already been discussed by us (No. 18, page 208), on account of the great interest it offers we shall return to it more in detail. We enclose a drawing of an apparatus used by Mr. Ph Reis, in Frankfort-a-M, taken from the Zeitschrift des Deutsch-Oesterreichschen Telegraphen Vereins, 1862, folios 6, 7, and 8. We take the liberty of following the lead of the above-mentioned source in entering into a short discussion of the nature of tones.

"The undulations of the air that excite in us, by operating upon the ear, the sensation of sound, by setting the drum of the ear into vibration, are transmitted, as is well known, by a series of levers of admirable delicacy; that is, by the small bones of the ear (hammer, anvil, and stirrup) to the inner portion of the ear, and to the nerves that lie at that point. The attempt to reproduce tones depends upon the following: To set in motion an artificial imitation of this series of levers by the vibration of a membrane which takes the place of the drum, and to make use of them to open and close a galvanic circuit which is connected by a metallic conductor with a remote station.

"If we take into consideration the phenomena that take place when we perceive a sound by the sense of hearing, we find that every tone is the result of rarefactions and condensations of the air repeated several times in a certain period. At every condensation the membrane of the drum is pressed inwards, and at every rarefaction outwards. These vibrations produce a simultaneous motion of the small bones of the ear and a consequent transmission to the nerves of the ear. The greater the compression of the sound-conducting medium at any particular moment, the greater is also the amplitude of vibration of the membrane and small bones of the ear, and vice versa. The object, therefore, of the organs of hearing is to transmit with certainty the rarefactions and condensations of the sound-conducting medium to the nerves of hearing. On the other hand, it remains their object to bring to our perception the vibrations occurring in a given time with reference to number as well as to amplitude. It is only in our perceptions that a given combination receives a definite name; that vibrations become sounds.

"Anything other than the effect of such single vibrations the organs of hearing are unable to take up, and these organs themselves are competent to perceive single tones as well as combinations of tones, for if several tones are produced at the same time, the sound-conducting medium is under the influence of several simultaneous forces which, according to the laws of mechanics, can be replaced by a force which produces the same effect as all the single ones together. If all the forces operate in the same direction the magnitude of the motion is proportional to the sum; if they operate in opposite directions the magnitude of the motion is proportional to the difference of the opposite forces. In that way several simultaneous tones operate upon our hearing simply by a definite alternation of rarefactions and condensations of the sound-conducting medium as in the case of single tones. The tone itself depends apparently only upon the number of vibrations and the power upon the amplitude of the vibrations (perhaps also the strength).

"Now, as regards the apparatus, the upper figure is the transmitter and the lower one the receiver or reproducer.

* "The transmitter consists of a metallic conical pipe a b, about 15 centimetres in length, 10 in diameter at a and 4 in diameter at b. At b the opening is closed by a membrane o of collodion stretched tight. Upon the centre of the same rests the end c of lever c d, whose fulcrum is placed at e on a support. The lever is to be made as light as possible, and its arm c longer than its arm d, so that the smallest motion at c will operate at d with the greatest amount of force. In the condition of rest the contact d g is closed and a weak spring n holds the lever fast in this position of rest. Besides, there is attached to the apparatus a metallic standard f, connected with one pole of the battery, while the other pole is led to the ground through e. On the standard f is secured the spring j opposite the contact-point d of lever c d at d, the position of which (spring) can be regulated by a screw h.

(* The letters refer to the preceding cut.)

"The receiver consists of an electro-magnet m m resting upon a sounding-board R, and whose coils are in connection with a metallic conductor and with the earth at E. Opposite the electro-magnet is an armature connected with a lever, as long as possible but light and broad. This lever is fastened to the support k after the manner of a pendulum, and its motions are regulated by a screw b and spring g.

"To increase the efficiency of the apparatus the receiver and reproducer can be set up in one focus of an elliptical concavity of proper size, while the listening ear of the hearer is placed in the other focus.

"The operation of the apparatus is now as follows: The tones of the voice or of an instrument are conducted into the conical pipe a b. By reason of their vibration the membrane is set into similar vibration, and in this way operates the opening and closing of the electric conductor. In consequence of this the magnet in the receiver will be magnetized and demagnetized corresponding to the vibration of the tones, and the armature of the lever i is set in vibrations corresponding to those of membrane o. The wide surface of lever i transmits these vibrations to the air, and by this means they reach the ear of the hearer. In this transmission of tones, the only question is one of transmission of vibrations, a problem that magneto-electric telegraphy is certainly sufficiently far advanced to deal with.

"A friendly communication was sent us some time ago by Mr. J. F. Quilling of Frankfort-a-M., according to which the capacity of the apparatus to transmit tones to a considerable distance clearly and with their characteristic timbre [Klangfarbe] is fully established. Mr. Q. writes us that by means of the telegraphic conductor with which the apparatus of Mr. Ph. Reis was connected, two remote parts of the city were united, and although it was not possible with the present construction of the apparatus to transmit spoken words [gesprochenen Wörter], they succeeded so well with the tones that were sung that not only were the melodies of songs reproduced distinctly and perfectly at a tolerably remote station, but known voices could be recognized. All present capable of judging, Mr. Q. adds, who availed themselves of the opportunity of witnessing the experiment, agreed that the possibility is before us of making one's self understood verbally at any distance in the way shown by Mr. Reis."

BÖTTGER'S ARTICLE.

Böttger's Polytechnisches Notizblatt, 1863, No. 61, p. 81.

On the Transmission of Tones at any desired Distance, by Means of Electricity. (Telephony).

"Two decades ago the problem of giving signs, by means of electricity, from distances had not yet been entirely solved. Since then telegraphy has reached such a perfection and telegraph wires have so greatly spread that even the keenest desires have not much left to ask for.

"Now there appears a first earnest trial to reproduce tones at any desired distance, by means of electricity.

"This first trial, which has been crowned with success, has been repeated in the lecture room of the Physical Society of Frankfort-on-the-Main, before numerous assembled members, on the 26th of October, 1861, by Mr. Ph. Reis, teacher of natural sciences at Friedrichsdorf, near Frankfort. Into one part of his apparatus, located in a building about three hundred feet distant, and having all the doors and windows closed, melodies were sung, but not very loudly. The same could be heard by the members in the lecture room, through the second part of the apparatus.

"These wonderful results were attained with the following very simple apparatus: A small, light box, a kind of hollow wooden tube, has a larger opening in the front, and a smaller one on the opposite side. The latter is covered with a very fine membrane (sausage skin), and the same is tightly stretched; a small, flexible piece or strip of platina, fastened to the wood of the box, touches the membrane at its centre, and a second strip of platina is fastened by one end to the wood at a different place, and has at its other end a fine horizontal point touching the other strip of platina, where it lies on the membrane.

"As is known, tones are produced by the rapid succession of condensations and rarefactions of the air. If the vibrations of the air, called waves, strike the thin membrane, they push the same against the strip of platina that touches it, and then allow it to immediately vibrate back into the hollow cube (called the artificial ear), and so cause the membrane to assume forms alternately bent towards the cube and from the same. The strip of platina lying against the membrane is thus set into a swinging motion, so that it is alternately pressed on to the platinum point of the second strip and then leaves the same.

"If one of the strips is connected by a wire to one of the poles of a voltaic battery, and the electricity is conducted to any desired distance by a wire connected to the other pole and is then carried through a helix six inches in length, wound with six layers of thin silk-covered copper wire, and from there is carried back to the second strip of platina on the wooden cube by means of an insulated wire, then, at every vibration of the membrane, an interruption of the current of electricity [Unterbrechung in der Strömung der Electricität] will be caused, as the point on the one strip of platina no longer touches the other strip. Through the hollow of the spiral a thin iron wire (a thick knitting needle) about ten inches in length is passed, so that it projects out of each end of the spiral about two inches, and these projecting ends each rest on a bridge of a sounding-board.

"It is known that if an electric current is passed through a helix that surrounds an iron wire, at every interruption a tone, produced by the vibrations of the iron wire, is audible. If the makings and breakings of the current [Unterbrechungen des Stromes] follow each other rather slowly, the different positions (in regard to the length of the bar) which the molecules will be caused to assume by the electricity will produce a tone, its so-called proper longitudinal tone, which depends on the length and thickness of the bar or wire.

"If the interruptions and reconnections of the current [Unterbrechungen des electrischen Stromes] in the spiral take place faster than the vibrations of the smallest parts of the wire, which in turn depends upon the elasticity of the wire, they cannot complete their course, receive new shocks, the vibrations get to be smaller but more rapid, and as numerous as the interruptions follow each other. The piece of wire no longer gives its longitudinal tone, but a tone which, according to the number of interruptions in a certain time, is higher if they are more frequent and lower if they are less frequent. It is known that the pitch of a tone depends on the number of air-waves that follow each other in one second. We have seen that the number of interruptions of the electric current [Unterbrechungen des electrischen Stromes] by the membrane and the strips of platina is dependent upon this.

"Consequently the iron wire must give a tone of the same pitch as the sound which was received by the membrane. As electricity is hardly impaired when conducted a great distance, if the proper apparatus is used, it is evident that a tone acting on a membrane in one place can be made audible at any desired distance by the iron wire.

"That the tone is made audible only by electric vibrations and not by direct transmission of the air-waves through the wires can be most strikingly proved by noticing the fact that no tone is heard at the spiral if a good short circuit be established; i. e., if, for instance, a small strip of metal is laid across the two wires, directly in front of the spiral. The reproduced tones are weaker than the originals, but the number of vibrations is the same. It is easy to reproduce the tones in the proper pitch. As the vibrations are smaller, which is the cause of the weakness of the tone, it is much more difficult, however, for our ear to estimate the difference in the size of the vibrations.

"The character of a tone depends upon the number of swellings it has; i. e., with tones of the same depth, consequently of the same number of waves per second, such as having the fourth, sixth, eighth, tenth, or sixteenth wave stronger than the rest.

"The physicists have shown that if a spring is vibrated by the teeth of a cog-wheel, the first vibration is the greatest, and every following one is smaller. If, however, before the spring comes to rest, another tooth strikes it, then the next vibration will be equal to the first strongest one, but the vibrations of the spring will not be any more numerous than before. Vowel tones can be artificially produced in this way.

"Although we may be far from being able to converse with a friend a hundred miles away and recognize his voice, as though he was sitting alongside of us, the impossibility of attaining this result can no more be claimed.

"The probability that this result will be attained is almost as great as, by the wonderful experiments of Niepce, the reproduction of natural colors by photography."

REIS'S LETTER TO LADD.

Journal of the Society of Telegraph Engineers, and of Electricians for March, 1883, No. 46.

Reis's Telephone.

"The following is a copy of an autograph description of Reis's telephone which has been presented to the library by Mr. William Ladd, Member:—"

"INSTITUT GARNIER,
FRIEDRICHSDORF.

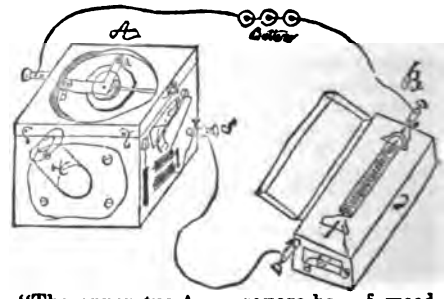
"DEAR SIR:

I am very sorry not to have been in Frankfort when you where there at Mr. Albert's, by whom I have been informed that you have purchased one of my newly-invented instruments (Telephone), though I will do all in my power to give you the most ample explanations on the subject. I am sure that personal communications would have been preferable, specially as I was told that you will show the apparatus at your next scientifical meeting, and thus introduce the apparatus in your country

"Tunes and sounds of any kind are only brought to our conception by the condensations and rarefactions of air or any other medium in which we may find ourselves. By every condensation the tympanum of our ear is pressed inwards, by every rarefaction it is pressed outward, and thus the tympanum performs oscillations like a pendulum. The smaller or greater number of the oscillations made in a second gives us, by help of the small bones in our ear and the auditory nerve, the idea of a higher or lower tune.

"It was no hard labor, either to imagine that any other membrane besides that of our ear could be brought to make similar oscillations, if spanned in a proper manner and if taken in good proportions, or to made use of these oscillations for the interruption of a galvanic current. However, these were the principles which guided me in my invention; they were sufficient to induce me to try the reproduction of tunes at any distance. It would be long to relate all the fruitless attempts I made until I found out the proportions of the instrument and the necessary tension of the membrane. The apparatus you have bought is now what may be found most simple, and works without failing when arranged carefully in the following manner:

"The apparatus consists of two separated parts, one for the singing station, A, and the other for the hearing station, B.



"The apparatus A is a square box of wood, the cover of which shows the membrane, c, on the outside, under glass. In the middle of the latter is fixed a small platina plate to which a flattened copper wire is soldered, on purpose to conduct the galvanic current. Within the circle you will further remark two screws: one of them is terminated by a little pit in which you put a little drop of quicksilver, the other is pointed. The angle, which you will find lying on the membrane, is to be placed according to the letters, with the little hole a on the point a, the little platina foot b into the quicksilver screw, the other platina foot will then come on the platina plate in the middle of the membrane.

"The galvanic current coming from the battery (which I compose generally of three or four good elements) is introduced at the conducting screw near b, wherefrom it proceeds to the quicksilver, the movable angle, the platina plate and the complementary telegraph to the conducting screw s. From here it goes through the conductor to the other station B, and from there returns to the battery.

"The apparatus B, a sonorous box on the cover of which is fixed the wire spiral with the steel axis, which will be magnetic when the current goes through the spiral. A second little box is fixed on the first one, and laid down on the steel axis to increase the intensity of the reproduced sounds. On the small side of the lower box you will find the corresponding part of the complementary telegraph.

"If a person sing at the station A, in the tube x, the vibrations of air will pass into the box and move the membrane above, thereby the platina foot c of the movable angle will be lifted up, and thus will open the stream at every condensation of air in the box. The stream will be re-established at every rarefaction. In this manner the steel axis at station B will be magnetic once for every full vibration, and, as magnetism never enters nor leaves a metal without disturbing the equilibrium of the atoms, the steel axis at station B must repeat the vibrations at station A, and then reproduce the sounds which cause them. Any sound will be reproduced if strong enough to set the membrane in motion.

"The little telegraph which you find on the side of the apparatus is very useful and agreeable for to give signals between both of the correspondents. At every opening of the stream, and next following shutting, the station A will hear a little clap, produced by the attraction of the steel spring. Another little clap will be heard at station B in the wire spiral. By multiplying the claps and producing them in different measures, you will be able as well as I am to get understood by your correspondent.

"I am to end, sir, and I hope that what I said will be sufficient to have a first try; afterwards you will get on quite alone.

I am, sir,

Your most obedient servant,

PH. REIS.

FRIEDRICHSDORF, 13-7-63.

To Mr. William Ladd.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION REPORT ON REIS.

Report of the Thirty-third Meeting of the British Association for the advancement of Science, in August and September, 1863, published 1864.

On an Acoustic Telegraph, by W. Ladd.

"This instrument consists essentially of two distinct pieces of apparatus; that for transmitting the signal has a small mouthpiece. On the right-hand side there is a finger key forming part of the circuit, and an electro-magnet, with a vibrating armature and binding screw to connect with one of the line-wires. Within a case under a glass cover is an elastic membrane, in the centre of which is fixed a platinum plate in connection with the finger key. A like piece of angular metal resting on three pins is so placed that the pin at the angle rests on the plate in the centre of the membrane, the other two resting in cups on its edge so as to allow a free motion on the points. In the body of the receiver box is suspended a soft-iron core surrounded by a coil of silk-covered wire, one end of which is in connection with a finger key and the other with the binding screw. The method of producing sound in the receiving instrument depends upon the fact that at the moment of magnetizing or demagnetizing a piece of iron there is an alteration in the arrangement of the particles which gives rise to a slight ticking noise. Having connected the transmitter by means of an insulated wire with the receiver, and the binding screws having been brought in connection with a battery of three or four elements, if the finger key on the transmitter be pressed the person at the receiving station hears the ticking noise. To convey a musical note or sound the operator places his mouth to the tube in front of the instrument and sings a note, when immediately the membrane begins vibrating in accordance with the note sounded, and at each vibration breaks contact between the pin and plate in its centre. This forming part of the circuit causes the iron core in the receiving instrument to be magnetized and demagnetized a number of times equal to the number of vibrations of the membrane, and so conveys to the receiver an impression of a musical sound. The finger keys and small magnet at the sides of the instruments are for the purpose of varying the methods of communication by the combination of single sounds, and can also be used with the other parts for the purpose of regulating the lengths of the notes and dividing them into varying portions, so as to form a sound alphabet somewhat similar to the signals written by Morse's telegraph."

PROSPECTUS OF MR. ALBERT.

J. Wilh. Albert,
Mechanician,
Frankfort on the Main.

FRANKFORT-A-M., August, 1863.

"SIR:

I take the liberty of sending you the accompanying prospectus, begging you to give it your kind attention; it relates to the very interesting apparatus of Mr. Reis, for the production of tones with the aid of galvanism:

"THE TELEPHONE.

"This apparatus, which can be had through me, is at all times exhibited for inspection in my warehouse, and besides I am quite willing to give every information regarding it. My warehouse of physical, optical, and chemical instruments and apparatus is now: Neue Mainzerstrasse-No. 34 AM. Taunusthor, only three minutes' walk from the several railroad stations, and therefore may be visited by any one, however short his stay in Frankfort may be."

"Awaiting your kind order, I am,
Respectfully yours,
J. Wilh. Albert."

CIRCULAR OF REIS OF AUGUST, 1868.

(This is on the same sheet of paper as the foregoing.)

"SIR:

Having succeeded two years ago in demonstrating the possibility of reproducing tones with the aid of the galvanic current and in manufacturing an apparatus for that purpose, the subject has been so highly appreciated by the most renowned men of science, and I have received so many encouragements, that I have striven since that time to improve my originally very imperfect apparatus, in order to give to others also the facility of experimenting.

"I am now able to offer an apparatus which satisfies my expectations, and with which every physicist will succeed in repeating these interesting experiments regarding the reproduction of tone (Tonreproduction) at distant stations.

"I believe that it is the wish of many that these instruments should come into the possession of laboratories; as however, their manufacture demands a complete knowledge of the leading principles and a great experience in this matter, I have resolved to make the most important part myself, and to intrust to the mechanician only the secondary parts and the external outfit. Mr. J. Wilh. Albert, mechanician at Frankfort on the Main, is commissioned to sell them. I have enabled him to offer them at the prices of 21 and 14 florins (12 and 8 Prussian thalers) in two qualities, which differ only in the external outfit. The instruments can also be had directly from me at the same price by cash payment. Every apparatus is examined by me before being shipped, and has attached my name, the serial number, and the date of construction."

Friedrichsdorf b. Homburg, v. d. Höhe,
August, 1863.

PHIL. REIS,
Teacher at L. F. Garnier's Boys' Institute.

"(In manuscript on the foregoing is the following:)"

"Descriptions of the above are to be found in Müller-Pouillet's Lehrbuch der Physik Braunschweig, Vieweg & Son; Pisko, die Neueren Apparate der Akustik, Wien, Gerold's Son; 1865.

REIS'S DESCRIPTIVE CIRCULAR.

(This and the foregoing are on two similar printed sheets.)

"The apparatus consists of two parts, as may be seen in the woodcuts above, the telephone proper A, and the reproducing apparatus C. These two parts are to be placed at such a distance from each other that singing or the sound of a musical instrument can be heard in no other manner except through the apparatus from one station to another.

"Both parts are connected with each other and with the battery B, the same as in an ordinary telegraph. The battery must be sufficient to produce at station A the attraction of the armature of the electro-magnet placed at one side (three or four six-inch Bunsen cells are sufficient for several hundred feet of distance).

"The galvanic current then goes from B to the binding post d, from there through the copper strip, to the platina disc in the centre of the membrane, then through the foot c, of the angle towards the binding post B, in the small hollow of which a drop of quicksilver is inserted. From here the current goes through the small telegraph apparatus e f; then to the key of the station C, and through the coil surrounding i back to B.

"If now sufficiently strong tones are produced before the mouthpiece, their vibrations will put in motion the membrane and the angular little hammer [winkelförmige Hämmerchen] which lies on it; for every full vibration the circuit is once opened and again closed [einmal geöffnet und wieder geschlossen], and thereby are produced at station C in the core of the coil, just the same number of vibrations [ebensoviele Schwingungen hervorgebracht] which are there perceived as tones or as combinations of tones [Accords]. By placing the cover tightly over the axis of the coil the tones at C are greatly strengthened. Besides the human voice [Menschenstimme] there can be reproduced (according to my experience) just as well the tones [Töne] of good organ pipes from F to C and those of the piano; to that end the box a must be placed on the sounding board of the piano; out of thirteen chords a skilled experimenter could make out ten clearly. The telegraph apparatus placed on one side is evidently unnecessary for the reproduction of tones, but it is a very useful addition for convenient experimenting. With its aid it is possible to easily and surely make one's self intelligible [sich verständigen] with the person at the other station.

"This may be done somewhat in the following simple manner: After the apparatus has been put up completely, one satisfies one's self of the continuity of the connection and the strength of the battery by opening and closing the circuit whereby at A is heard a striking of the armature and at C a very perceptible ticking of the coil.

"By a quick succession of makes and breaks at A, C is asked whether he is ready for experimenting, whereupon C answers in the same manner.

"By agreement between the two stations simple signals can be given by opening and closing the circuit 1, 2, 3, or 4 times, e. g., one stroke—sing; two strokes—speak, etc.

"I telegraph words by numbering the letters of the alphabet and communicating their numbers.

"1 stroke A,
2 strokes B,
3 strokes C,
4 strokes D,
5 strokes E, etc.

"Z would consequently be indicated by 25 strokes.

"But these numbers of strokes would take too much time and not be sure in counting. Therefore I put a dactyl for every 5 strokes, hence

"—U U for E, —U U and 1 stroke for F, etc.

"Z: —UU—UU—UU—UU—U, which is quicker, and more easily executed and better understood.

"Still better is it to indicate the letters by numbers which are in inverse proportion to the frequency of their occurrence.

9 August, 1863, Friedrichsdorf, b Homburg, v. d. Höhe.

PHIL. REIS,
Teacher of A. L. Garnier's Boys' Institute."

BÖTTGER'S ACCOUNT OF REIS'S IMPROVED APPARATUS.

Dingler's Polytechnic Journal, Vol. 169, p. 399.
Concerning the Improved Telephone.

"In the meeting of the Physical Society, held on July 4, at Frankfort-a-M, a member of the society, Mr. Philip Reis, from Friedrichsdorf, near Homburg before the Heights, exhibited some of his improved telephones (Apparatus for the Reproduction of Tones at any desired distance by means of the Galvanic Current). It is two years since Mr. Reis first gave publicity to his apparatus, and although the performances of the same in their simple primitive form were astonishing, yet they had this great defect, that experimenting with the same was possible only for the inventor. The instruments exhibited in the above-mentioned meeting scarcely reminded one of the earlier forms.

"Mr. Reis has striven to give the same a form pleasing to the eye, so that they now will worthily fill a place in every physical cabinet. This new apparatus can now be easily managed (worked) by every one, and works with great certainty. Melodies sung quite lightly at a distance of about three hundred feet were reproduced by the instrument set up, much more distinctly than formerly. The musical scale was especially sharply reproduced.

"The experimenters could even reproduce words, although, indeed, only such as had been often heard by them.

"In order now that others, less experienced, may be able to even make themselves understood through the apparatus, the inventor has fixed at the side of the same a small, yet, according to his explanation, entirely sufficient arrangement, whose speed of communication indeed is not so great as that of the more recent telegraphs, but which works very surely, and assumes no especial skill in the person working it. We would call the attention of gentlemen busying themselves with physics to the fact that the inventor now has this interesting apparatus manufactured for sale under his supervision (the principal [important] parts he makes himself), and the same can be had of him directly or through the instrument maker, Wilhelm Albert, at Frankfort-on-the-Main, in two qualities, differing only in outward finish, at 14 and 21 florins, respectively (Böttger's Polytechn. Notizblatt, 1863, No. 15)."

Reis Improved Apparatus.

Die Fortschritte der Physik, Berlin, 1863, p. 96.
Ph. Reis Improved Telephone (Dingler, CLXIX., 399).

"Herr Reis is said to have improved, quite essentially, his telephone. With the former instrument, experimentation was possible at the hands of the inventor himself, only.

"The instrument (to be had at Albert's, in Frankfurt-a-M, for 14-21 fl.) has now, it is reported, a shape more pleasing to the eye, and can be operated easily by any one. At a distance of 300 feet tunes were reproduced far more distinctly than ever before. The scales are reproduced with peculiar precision. The experimenters were able even to communicate words, only such, however, as had been already often heard by them."

Gartenlaube Reis Improved Apparatus.
(The "Gartenlaube," No. 51, December, 1863.)
The Musical Telegraph.

"The surprising results in telegraphing have often excited the question whether it may not be possible to communicate the language of sound itself to a distance. The trials made in this direction had till now produced no satisfactory results, because the vibrations of sound-conducting bodies soon diminish so much in force that they are no more perceptible for our senses.

"People, perhaps, had already thought of a reproduction of sound at certain distances with the aid of the electric current, but those who have been the best fitted to attack the question by their knowledge and resources, were the ones who doubted the most of a practical solution of that question. Those who are but superficially acquainted with natural science do not see the many difficulties this problem offers, if they are at all acquainted with it. Thus, about eleven years ago, a young man, Mr. Philip Reis, at present teacher of natural science at the Garnier Institute for Boys at Friedrichsdorf, near Homburg, had the hardihood to work at the solution of this problem. But soon he was obliged to desist from it because his very first effort seemed to convince him of the impossibility of a solution. Later, however, after further studies and many experiments, he saw that his first effort was but a rudimentary one, and by no means convincing. However, he did not recommence to attack the question seriously for some time, not feeling himself strong enough to vanquish the obstacles on his road, although he never banished his early idea entirely from his thoughts.

"How can a single instrument reproduce simultaneously 'the combined effects of all the organs active in human speech?' This seemed to him the chief question. Later he put this question more methodically: 'How does our ear perceive the composite vibrations of all the organs of speech acting at the same time?' or, expressed more generally, 'How do we perceive the vibrations of several bodies sounding simultaneously?'

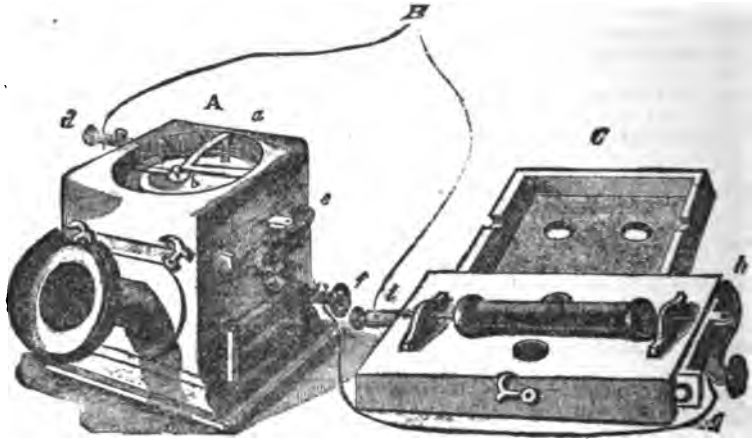
"If we throw a stone into quiet water there are produced on the surface uniform waves which progress symmetrically outward; the further they go the weaker they become, till they finally disappear.

lea, in which the auditory nerves terminate. The latter are excited and produce the sensation of sound.

"Now, if the waves of vibration follow regularly and with a certain swiftness (sixteen in the second at least), we shall have the sensation of a musical tone. The latter is the higher the quicker the condensations follow each other, and the louder the stronger or higher the waves rise, as it were.

"Our ear cannot perceive anything except condensations and rarefactions, wave crests and wave hollows. And, nevertheless, we receive the most varied auditory impressions, we distinguish the sound of the voices, we hear at the same time in quite different directions and can distinguish the different sources; nay, in a complete large orchestra, each of the numerous instruments is specially noticed by its peculiar sound, so that we decompose at every moment the total impression into its several parts according to the height and depth, strength and weakness, or according to the timbre (or quality) [Klangfarbe].

"Referring to our simile, this is about the same as if we throw two or more stones at different places into a calm pond. The wave lines cross each other, strengthen each other at some points, weaken each other at others, and the surface has a ruffled, hillocked aspect. But, nevertheless, our eye can detect the different systems of rings, and can trace them back to their several causes. If we succeed in transmitting with the galvanic current the oscillations of a sounding body to a distance, so that there another body is put to equally rapid and, in respect to each other, equally strong oscil-



"It is quite similar with that what we call sound and tone. A body made to vibrate through any impulse affects the surrounding air, and causes waves in it, which follow each other at the same rate as the vibrations of the body. As those rings on the water consist in swellings and depressions, so also the vibrations of the air consist of alternate condensations and rarefactions. If they reach our ear, every condensation presses the tympanum towards the interior of the cavity, and puts in motion the adjacent group of small bones which communicates the motion to the liquid of the cochlations, the problem of 'Telephoning' is solved.

"For then exactly the same phenomena of waves are called forth on the distant points as the ear receives at the place of origin; therefore they also must make the same impression. The ear will distinguish at the distant points, not only the single tones, according to their varying height and depth, but also to the proportionate force of the vibrations, and not only single melodies, but the performance of a whole orchestra; yes, even speech must be heard at the same time in places very distant from each other. Mr. Reis was the first one to prove by experiments the possibility of solving this problem. He has succeeded in constructing an apparatus to which he gives the name Telephone, and which enables one to reproduce tones, with the aid of electricity, at any given distance. Already, in October, 1861, he made rather successful experiments with a very simple, rudely made apparatus, before a numerous audience at Frankfort. On July 4 of the present year he presented an essentially improved apparatus at an assembly of the 'Physical Union,' which transmitted by closed doors and windows a melody sung moderately loud, to a distance of about three hundred feet, so that it could be heard plainly.

"In order to give an opportunity to larger circles, especially to scientific men, to convince themselves of the efficiency of this essentially improved apparatus, Prof. Böttger, of Frankfort-a-M., made lately (at an assembly of German physicists and doctors in Stettin, in the sectional meetings for natural sciences) several experiments which certainly would have been crowned with still more success if the hall in which the session was held had been located in a less noisy part of the city and filled with a less numerous audience.

"Although, for the present, we are not so far along as to be able to converse with a friend at a distance of several hundred miles, so much at least is certain, that with the aid of the telephone songs of all kinds, melodies, especially in the middle registers, can be reproduced most clearly at unlimited distances. These wonderful results are obtained with the following simple apparatus, which we show here in one fourth of its size.

"A small box A (the telephone proper), a kind of hollow cube has a mouthpiece S on the front side, and a somewhat smaller opening on the upper side of the box. The latter is closed with a fine membrane (skin from the intestines of a hog) tightly stretched. A narrow strip of platina m, connected with the screw post d, touches directly the membrane on its centre; a slender platina point k, attached to the angle a b, touches the strip of platina which rests on the membrane. If one sings into the mouthpiece S (by filling the same entirely with the mouth) the thin membrane vibrates and the attached platina strip receives likewise a vibrating motion so that it is alternately pressed against and leaves the platina point k.

"From the binding post d which communicates with the platina strip resting on the membrane a conducting wire is connected with one of the poles of a galvanic battery B (about three to four six-inch Bunsen elements), and then the electricity is led through a wire attached to the second pole of the battery to the distant station C; there at i it passes through a coil l l formed of copper wire covered with silk thread, then back again to screw f, and there to the platina point k. At every vibration of the membfane an interruption of the electric current [Unterbrechung des electrischen Stromes] takes place by the platina point parting from the platina strip.

"Within the wire coil at station C is a thin iron wire (a strong knitting needle) which is about ten inches long, and which with its two ends projecting out of the coil for about 2 inches, each rests on two bridges of a sounding box. This is the reproducing apparatus.

"At every interruption of the current [Unterbrechung des Stromes] in the coil the iron rod is made to vibrate. If the motions follow with a certain rapidity they produce a tone which is rendered audible by the sounding box. As the rate of the interruptions depends on the pitch of the tone that has been sung into the mouthpiece, the same tone is sounded with the same pitch from the sounding box. The length of the circuit has no influence upon this. It is true the electric current loses force the farther it goes, but there is no reason why relays should not be employed, the same as in telegraphing, and with their aid any number of reproducing apparatuses be set into simultaneous vibrations. Mr. Reis has endeavored to give to his improved apparatus a form which should also be pleasing to the eye, so that it might fill worthily its place in any physical laboratory. He has applied, moreover, to the side of the telephone, as well as to the reproducing apparatus, a small telegraph arrangement, which is a very good addition for convenient experimenting. (It is indicated in the drawing by the letters e f h g). By alternately opening and closing the circuit with the key e or h the most varied signals may be given after mutual agreement; for instance, if one is ready for singing; if everything has been understood; whether one should stop singing or commence anew, etc.

"Mr. Reis himself manufactures the principal parts of the telephone, for which no small amount of physical knowledge and experience is necessary. The mechanician, Wilhelm Albert, at Frankfort, is charged with manufacturing the less important parts and the external outfit, as well as with the sale of the instrument at a low price."

KUHN'S DESCRIPTION OF REIS.

Handbuch der Angewandten Elektricitätslehre, Von Karl Kuhn, 1865, pp. 1017–1021.

"The experiments made by Reis in Frankfurt-a-M, on the 26th October, 1861, have proved, however, that when the breaks of the current [Stromunterbrechungen] follow each other almost continuously and very quickly in a coil provided with a thin iron core, the iron wire can enter into longitudinal vibrations, and in this way be enabled to reproduce sounds of different pitch. An exact reproduction of the sounds does not take place, however, but only an imitation; for this reason it cannot be questioned here of transverse vibrations [transversal Schwingungen]. A phenomenon [Erscheinung] has otherwise been heard of, which belongs to the afore-mentioned class, in which the intensity and the timbre [Klang] of the sound accompanying it (the phenomenon) depend among other things on the strength of the current [Strom stärke] and on the number of breaks of the same, and in which, as it seems, the pitch of the tones also can vary under different circumstances. We can, however, hardly imagine by what arrangements it could be feasible to coax tones of any given height or depth out of an iron or metal tube split on one side, while it (the tube) is affected by the alternate currents of an induction apparatus the coil (Rolle) of which surrounds it. Yet the possibility cannot be controverted that the principle of Neef's circuit-breaker (Unterbrecher) might contribute to the solution of the problem in question. It has been employed for local purposes, either with or without modifications, in the study and investigation of acoustic phenomena. Thus Petrina has used the principle of Neef's circuit-breaker [Unterbrecher] for his electric harmonica in this way,—that instead of the Neef hammer a little rod was chosen, the transverse vibrations of which rendered the tone. "There are four little rods of various lengths side by side, the motions of which are checked by means of levers managed by finger keys." That principle was used previously by Dove, in a modified manner, to set strained strings and elastic springs into acoustic vibrations of constant amplitude by means of an electric magnet, and, in this way, to be enabled to investigate constant tones. It appears from Legat's published communications that "the ideas submitted by Ph. Reis of Friedrichsdorf in the Physical Society and in the meetings of the German Hochstift in Frankfurt-a-M, about the reproduction of sounds by means of electricity" referred to arrangements of a similar kind. Legat mentions in his paper all that has been done thus far towards the realization of that project, and we borrow from it that part only which throws some light on the construction of a telegraphic apparatus with which it is said to be possible to produce vibrations and make sounds in any desired manner, and through which the employment of electricity is said to make it feasible to bring forth at any given distance vibrations similar to the first produced ones, and in this way to reproduce at a certain place tones originally produced at another place.

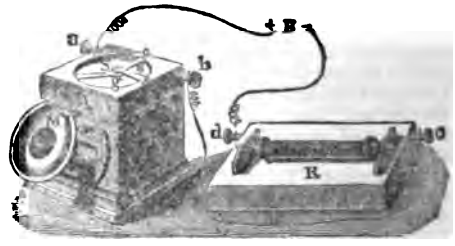
"This apparatus is composed of a transmitter and of a receiver. (See cut ante, page 910.)

"The transmitter consists in a conical tube a b about 15 cm. long, 10 cm. at the front, 4 cm. at the back opening; the choice of the material as well as a greater length is indifferent; a greater width, on the contrary, is disadvantageous; the surface of the interior must be as smooth as possible. The narrower back opening is closed by a membrane of collodion o, and on the middle of the circular surface formed by this membrane rests one end c of lever c d, the fulcrum of which is held by a support and remains connected with the metallic circuit. This lever, one arm c e of which must be considerably longer than e d, should be as light as possible so as to follow easily the motions of the membrane, as an uncertain obedience [folgen] on part of lever c d would produce imperfect tones at the receiving station. In the state of rest, the contact d g is shut and a weak spring n holds the lever fast at rest. On the metallic support f which is connected with one of the poles of the battery is a spring g, with a contact which touches the contact of lever c d at d and the position of which is regulated by screw h; over tube a b a disc must be placed which encircles the outer circumference of the tube closely, so that the efficacy of the apparatus may not be impaired through the effect of the air-waves coming round and striking against the rear end. This disc at right angles with longitudinal axis of the tube measures about fifty (?) cm. in diameter The receiver (Fig. 505) consists of an electro-magnet m m which rests on a sounding-board, and the coil of which is in connection with the metallic conductors, and with the ground. Opposite the electro-magnet is an armature connected with a lever as long as possible, but light and broad, which latter with the armature, is fastened pendulum-like on the support k. Its motions are regulated through screw l or spring o. "In order to increase the efficacy of the apparatus, this receiver can be placed in one focus of an ellipsoidal enclosing box of suitable size, while the ear of the hearer is placed at the other focus." The working of the two apparatuses (the mode of connection of which is visible in the woodcuts), the transmitter being placed at one station and the receiver at the other, is as follows: By speaking, singing, or the intromission of instrumental sounds into tube a b, in consequence of the condensation and rarefaction of the column of air, a motion of the membrane c corresponding to these changes is brought about. Lever c d follows the motions of the membrane, and opens or closes the circuit, according as a condensation or a rarefaction of the air inside takes place. As a consequence the electro-magnet m m (Fig. 505) is correspondingly demagnetized or magnetized, and the armature affixed to it (as well as the armature lever) is set into similar vibrations as the membrane of the transmitter. Through lever i connected with the armature, similar vibrations are communicated to the surrounding air and (the increasing effect of the sounding-board helping) the tones so produced finally reach the ear of the listener. In respect to the operations of this apparatus, the author remarks that the receiver does reproduce the exact number of the original vibrations, but that a reproduction of the original intensity has not yet been attained. For that reason, it is added, small differences in the vibrations are appreciated with difficulty, and in the practical experiments made thus far, it was possible to transmit with astonishing faithfulness chords, airs, etc., whilst in reading, speaking, etc., single words were more indistinctly heard. The apparatus just described is said to have been one of the constructions which Reis has used himself in his experiments. The underlying principles might give hopes of a farther improvement of the apparatus, but the telephone which, according to later reports, Reis has finally decided upon, has the disposition represented in Fig. 506, although the principle on which it is founded does not stand quite in harmony with the above-mentioned investigations of Wertheim, for instance:



"The telephone proper A consists of a hollow wooden box provided with a short sound-funnel S, and the upper side of which is open in the centre and covered over tightly with a delicate membrane. On the middle of the latter a thin platinum disc is fastened, from which on one side a platinum strip establishes circuit connection with the contact of the key at e, from which place the metallic connection is effected with one end of the coil of a small electro-magnet provided with a spring armature, whilst the other end is in contact with screw f. The reproducing apparatus C set up at the receiving station consists simply of a coil about six inches long formed by winding six layers of copper wire; in the axis of the coil a thin iron wire ten inches long (a knitting needle), protruding out of each end of the coil about two inches, is so disposed that with its bridge-like supports it rests on a sounding-board. By means of screw i and of the key at h g the coil is thrown into the circuit and the connection of both apparatus is effected in the manner mentioned; a battery being placed at B, the course of the current is easily followed out. It can flow from B through d c and c b to e and f, and from here to the receiving station, and at i return to the battery, or it can start in the opposite direction according as d or i forms the starting point of the current. The circuit can be broken at will at each of the two stations by pressing the key lever, and a connection can be established thus in either direction; but the discontinuous currents which are to produce the sounding of the iron wire at C are obtained in this way: By singing or the blowing of instruments towards the sound-funnel S the membrane at A is made to vibrate; if this can be brought about, it will happen, as was demonstrated by the experiments, that the iron wire of the receiver assumes isochronal vibrations, and whenever this is the case, it reproduces the same tones which set the membrane to vibrating at the transmitting stations.

"My own experiments have demonstrated that every melody starting from c and embracing the entire extent of an average male voice, when sung into the telephone can be reproduced by the receiver at C. The timbre [Klang] or quality of the sounds thus reproduced is not pleasant—they are almost like the sounds of toy trumpets, at times also like the buzz of a fly caught in a spider's web, and the like; yet the experiments of Reis are certainly interesting enough to challenge attention.

"A reproduction of the words spoken in the telephone with or without variation of pitch was audible at the receiver only in a corresponding noise [entsprechendes Geräusch], while a discriminate perception of single vocal sounds, syllables or words could not be had. According to communications made on this subject by Reis, he has succeeded in reproducing the tones of organ pipes not covered, and those of a piano; in this latter case the transmitter was placed on the sounding-board of the piano."

Catalogue of J. Wilh. Albert, Mechanician at Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1866.

Extract from preface. "All instruments and apparatus will always be constructed according to the latest designs and improvements. In order that the construction may be better understood we have printed herein references where a description can be found as follows:

"M-P. Müller-Pouillet's Lehrbuch der Physik, vi Auflage."

[Other books also named.]

From body of catalogue.

"839. Telephone of Reis for reproduction of tones by electricity with description, 21 fl.

"M-P. Fig. 325–327. Pisco, Akustik, Fig. 60."

"840. The same in simpler design, fl. 14."

"Electricity," by Robert M. Ferguson, William and Robert Chambers, London and Edinburgh, 1867, p. 257.

"The Telephone.—This is an instrument for telegraphing notes of the same pitch. Any noise producing a single vibration of the air, when repeated regularly a certain number of times in a second (not less than thirty-two), produces, as is well known, a musical sound. In Art. 115, we found that when a rod of iron was placed in a coil of insulated wire, and magnetized by a current being sent through the coil, it gave out a distinct tick when it was demagnetised by the stoppage of the current. A person when singing any note causes the air to vibrate so many times per second, the number varying with the pitch of the note he sings, the higher the note the greater being the number of vibrations. If we then, by any means, can get these vibrations to break a closed circuit in which the coil just mentioned is included, the note sung at one station can be reproduced, at least so far as pitch is concerned, at another. Reis's telephone (invented 1861) accomplishes this in the following way:

"A A (Fig. 141) is a hollow wooden box with two round holes in it, one on the top, the other in front. The hole at the top is closed by a piece of bladder S, tightly stretched on a circular frame; a mouthpiece M is attached to the front opening.

"When a person sings in at the mouthpiece, the whole force of his voice is concentrated on the tight membrane, which in consequence vibrates with the voice. A thin strip of platinum is glued to the membrane, and concentrated with the binding screw a, in which a wire from the battery B is fixed. A tripod e f g rests on the skin. The feet e and f lie in metal cups on the circular frame over which the skin is stretched. One of them f rests in a cup containing mercury, and is connected with the binding screw b. The third foot, g, consisting of a platinum point, lies on the circular end of the strip of platinum just mentioned. This point, being placed on the centre of the oscillating membrane, acts like a hopper, and hops up and down with it. It is easy to understand how, for every vibration of the membrane, the hopper will be thrown up for the instant from connection with its support, and how the close circuit is thus broken at every vibration. The receiving apparatus R consists of a coil of wire placed in circuit, enclosing an iron wire, both being fixed on a sounding box. The connections of the various parts of the circuit are easily learned from the figure. Suppose a person to sing a note at the mouthpiece which produces three hundred vibrations a second, the circuit is broken at the bladder three hundred times, and the iron wire ticking at this rate gives out a note of the same pitch. The note is weak, and in quality resembles the sound of a toy trumpet. Dr. Wright uses a receiving apparatus of the following kind: The line current is made to pass through the primary coil of a small induction coil. In the secondary circuit he places two sheets of paper, silvered on one side, back to back, so as to act as a condenser. Each current that comes from the sending apparatus produces a current in the secondary circuit which charges and discharges the condenser, each discharge being accompanied by a sound like the sharp tap of a small hammer. The musical notes are rendered by these electric discharges, and are loud enough to be heard in a large hall."

From The Manufacturer and Builder, A Monthly Journal devoted to the Advancement and Diffusion of Practical Science, New York, May, 1869, Vol. I., No. 5, pp. 129, 130.

The Telephone, by Dr. Van der Weyde.

"One of the most remarkable recent inventions connected with telegraphy is the telephone, an instrument which transmits directly the pitch of the sound by means of a telegraph wire,—either an air wire or submarine cable,—so that, for instance, when the operator at one end of the wire sings or plays on an instrument any tune, as 'Yankee Doodle' or 'Hail Columbia,' it will be heard and distinguished plainly at the other end. This invention may, in its present state, have no direct practical application, but be a mere scientific, although highly interesting, curiosity; but who can say that it does not contain the germ of a new method of working the telegraph, or some other useful practical purpose.

"The telephone is not the result of an accidental discovery, but of a thorough study of the laws of electro-magnetism and of sound. It is founded on the fact that the difference in pitch of different tones is caused by different velocities of vibrations of the elastic sounding body; which vibrations are transmitted to and by the air with exactly the same velocity, and from the air may be communicated to a properly stretched membrane, like a piece of bladder or very thin sheet of india rubber, stretched like a drumhead, which these also will vibrate with exactly the same velocity as the air and the original sounding body, be it the human voice, organ pipe, string or any musical instrument. If, now, at the centre of this little drumhead there be attached a small disc of some metal not easily burned by electric currents,—for instance, platinum,—while at the same time a platinum point may, by means of a screw, be so adjusted as to come very nearly in contact with this small platinum disc, it is clear that, when the membrane is put in vibration, a succession of contacts between the disc and point will be produced, of which the number in each second will exactly correspond with the number of vibrations in each second of the sounding body or the tone produced by it. That part of the apparatus which serves to send off the tune or melody is represented in the illustration, Fig. 2. It consists simply of a square wooden box, provided at the side with a kind of mouthpiece similar to that of a speaking tube, and at the top with an opening, over which the membrane just mentioned has been stretched. The small piece of platinum attached to the centre of this little drumhead is, by means of a very flexible strip of some metal that conducts well, attached to one pole of the galvanic battery, of which only one cup is represented in the figure, although for a long wire several cups will, of course, be required. The reason why this connection near the platinum disc is a flat, thin and flexible strip is, that any rigidity would interfere with the freedom of vibration of the membrane to which it is attached. The point coming in contact with this small vibrating disc is connected with the ground wire, the other pole of the battery with the air wire or submarine cable. It is clear, from this explanation, that at every contact of the platinum point a wave of electricity will be sent over the wire, and as many waves in a second as there are contacts; and as there are as many contacts as there are vibrations in every second, the number of electric waves will be always exactly equal to the number of vibrations corresponding with the pitch of each tone, be it fifty, one hundred, two hundred or five hundred in every second.

"The instrument in which this succession of waves is made audible at the other end of the telegraph wire is founded on the fact—first investigated by Professor Henry, of the Smithsonian Institute at Washington—that iron bars, when becoming magnetic by means of electric currents passing around them, become slightly elongated, and at the interruption of the current are at once restored to their original length. It is represented in the cut, Fig. 3, and consists of an elongated wooden box, of which the top is made of thin pine wood, similar to the sounding-board of a stringed musical instrument, to which are attached two bridges carrying long pieces of moderately thick and very soft iron wire, which, for nearly their whole length are surrounded by a coil similar to the coil of the electro-magnets used in telegraphing. One end of this coil is attached to the telegraph wire, the other to the ground wire, as represented in the figure. At every instant that a contact is established at the station where the sound is produced, and a current wave thus transmitted, these wires will become magnetic, and consequently elongated; and they will be shortened again at every interruption of the current. And as these currents and interruptions succeed each other with the same velocity as the sound vibrations, the elongations and shortenings of the magnetized iron wires will succeed each other with exactly the same velocity, and consequently they will be thrown into a state of longitudinal vibrations corresponding with the original musical tone, which vibrations will then be communicated to the sounding-board in exactly the same manner as is the case with the vibrations of the strings in all stringed instruments, thus becoming more audible at the receiving station.

"It is clear, from the foregoing explanations, that no quality of tone can be transmitted. Much less can articulate words be sent, notwithstanding the enthusiastic prediction of some persons, who, when they first beheld this apparatus in operation, exclaimed that now we would talk directly through the wire. It is from its nature able to transmit only pitch and rhythm,—consequently melody, and nothing more. No harmony nor different degrees of strength or other qualities of tone can be transmitted. The receiving instrument, in fact, sings the melodies transmitted, as it were, with its own voice, resembling the humming of an insect, regardless of the quality of the tone which produces the original tune at the other end of the wire.

"This instrument is a German invention, and was first exhibited in New York, at the Polytechnic Association of the American Institute, by Dr. Van der Weyde. The original sounds were produced at the farther extremity of the large building (the Cooper Institute), totally out of hearing of the association; and the receiving instrument, standing on the table of the lecture room, produced with its own rather nasal twang the different tunes sung at the other end of the line, rather weakly, it is true, because of the weak battery used, but very distinctly and correctly."

Das Buch der Erfindungen, Gewerbe und Industrien, Leipzig, 1872.

[Book of Inventions, Trades and Industries.]

Telephony.

"It sounds more than wonderful when the possibility is asserted of carrying on a conversation with another person at a distance of hundreds of miles through the electric telegraph wire, so that he can hear with his bodily ear our voice with all its peculiarities, that he should hear the melody we are singing, and that he should feel, when we laugh, precisely as if he was standing alongside of us.

"But this possibility has, to a certain degree, already become to be a fact.

"The master teacher, Reis, in Frankfurt-on-the-Main, had the good idea to make of the electro-magnetic telegraph 'which has heretofore been an eye reaching over many lands,' an ear which should reach full as far.

"In this strange organ of hearing, the electro-magnetic apparatus takes the part of those bones of the ear which carry the commotion from one membrane to another, and the only difference between the cavity of the ear and the union of two such stations is, that in one case we are made sensible of the striking of the sound-waves against the ear drum by means of a lever, and in the other by means of the commotion of an iron rod. * * *

"As early as October, 1861, Reis had made successful trials with his apparatus. A melody sung with a medium loud voice was reproduced perfectly at a distance of one hundred metres. Although the problem of 'far speaking' may so far only be considered solved in theory, and the apparatus has not yet that perfection which would make it possible for a speaker to interest large gatherings at numerous distant parts of the earth, it is nevertheless interesting enough to be described in this place."

From Scientific American, New York, March 4, 1876.

The Invention of the Telephone, by P. H. Van der Weyde, M. D.

"In connection with Mr. Gray's application of the telephone to the simultaneous transmission of several different telegraphic messages over one wire at the same time, and his paper read before the American Electrical Society (published on p. 92, Scientific American, Supplement for Feb. 5), it may be interesting for the readers of this paper to obtain some information in regard to the invention of the telephone, by Reuss. As mentioned in the article above referred to, Page and Henry observed that, by rapid magnetization and demagnetization, iron could be put into vibrations isochronic with the interruptions of the current; and later, Marian experimented extensively in this direction, while Wertheim made a thorough investigation of the subject, which induced Reuss, of Friedrichsdorf, near Hamburg, Germany, to apply this principle to the transmission of musical tones and melodies by telegraph; and he contrived an apparatus which we represent in the engravings.

"The telephone of Reuss consists of two parts, the transmitting and receiving instrument. Fig. I represents the former, and is placed at the locality where the music is produced; Fig. II, the latter, is placed at the station where the music is to be heard, which may be at a distance of 100, 200 or more miles; in fact, as far as the battery used can carry the current; while the two instruments are connected with the battery and the telegraph wire in the usual manner. One pole of the battery is connected with the ground plate, the other with the screw, marked 2 in our Fig. I., and thence over a thin copper strip n, with the platinum disc o, attached to the centre of the membrane stretched in the large top opening of the hollow and empty box K, intended to receive and strengthen the vibrations of the air, produced by singing before the funnel-shaped short tube attached to the opening in T. Over the platinum disc c, attached to the elastic membrane, is a platinum point attached to the arms b c and b K, while a set screw brings this point in slight contact with the platinum disc mentioned. A part of the box is represented as broken and removed, in order to show the internal construction. The strip a b c, is connected with the end s, of the switch t s, and the screw connection, 1, at the lower right hand corner, and also through the telegraph wire, to the instrument Fig. II, at the receiving station, which may be situated at a distance of many miles. Here the current enters by the screw connection 3, and passes through the spiral g, surrounding the soft iron wire d d, of the thickness of a knitting needle, and leaves the apparatus at the screw connection 4, whence it obtains access to the ground plate, and so passes, through the earth, back to the battery. The spiral and iron wire d d, is supported on a hollow box B, of thin board; while a cover D, of the same material is placed on top, all intended to strengthen the sound produced by the vibrations which the interruption of the current caused in the iron wire d d, so as to make these vibrations more audible by giving a large vibratory surface, in the same way that the sounding-board of a pianoforte strengthens the vibrations of the air caused by the strings, and makes a very weak sound quite powerful.

"If a flute be played before the opening T, or if a voice be singing there, the vibration of the air inside the box K causes the membrane m to vibrate synchronically, and this causes the platinum disc o to move up and down with corresponding frequency. At every downward motion the contact of this disc with the platinum point, under b, is broken, and therefore the current is interrupted as rapidly as the vibrations occur. Let, for instance, the note C be sounded; this note makes sixty-four full vibrations in a second, and we have, therefore sixty-four interruptions of the electric current, which interruption will at once be transmitted through the telegraph lines to the receiving instrument, and put the bar d d, into exactly similar vibrations, making the very same tone C audible, and so on for all other rates of vibration. It is clear that in this way not only the rhythm of music can be transmitted (and this can be done by the ordinary telegraph), but the very tones, as well as the relative durations and the rests between them, can thus be sent, making a full and complete melody. The switch t s, Fig. I, is intended, in connection with a similar one in Fig. II, to communicate between the stations, with the help of the electro-magnet E, to ascertain if station, Fig II, is ready to received the melodies; then it gives the signal, by manipulating the switch, which is received by the attraction of the armature A, the latter arrangement being a simple Morse apparatus attached to the telephone.

Professor Heisler, in his Lehrbuch der Technischen Physik (3d edition, Vienna, 1866), says, in regard to this instrument: "The telephone is still in its infancy; however, by the use of batteries of proper strength, it already transmits, not only single musical tones, but even the most intricate melodies, sung at one end of the line to the other, situated at a great distance, and makes them perceptible there with all the desirable distinctness." After reading this account in 1868, I had two such telephones constructed, and exhibited them at the meeting of the Polytechnic Club of the American Institute. The original sounds were produced at the further extremity of the large building (the Cooper Institute), totally out of hearing of the Association, and the receiving instrument, standing on the table in the lecture room, produced (with a peculiar and rather nasal twang) the different tunes sung into the box K, at the other end of the line; not powerfully, it is true, but very distinctly and correctly. In the succeeding summer I improved the form of the box K, so as to produce a more powerful vibration of the membrane, by means of reflections effected by curving the sides; I also improved the receiving instrument by introducing several iron wires in the coil, so as to produce a stronger vibration. I submitted these, with some other improvements, to the meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and on that occasion (now seven years ago) expressed the opinion that the instrument contained the germ of a new method of working the electric telegraph, and would undoubtedly lead to further improvements in this branch of science, needing only that a competent person give it his undivided attention, so as to develop out of it all that it is evidently capable of producing.

"Before leaving this subject, I wish to draw special attention to the fact that the merits of this invention consist chiefly in the absence of musical instruments, tuning forks, or their equivalents, for producing the tones; any instrument will do,—flute, violin, human voice, etc. If the aërial vibrations are only connected into the box, Fig. I, the apparatus will send the pitch as well as the duration of the different tones, with the rests between, therefore not only transmitting perfect rhythm, but a complete melody, with its long and short notes. The two parts of the apparatus may even be connected each to a separate pianoforte; and if this were done in a proper manner, a melody played on the pianoforte connected with the transmitting instrument, Fig. I, would be heard in the pianoforte at a great distance connected with the receiving instrument, Fig. II.

The defendants in these actions all alleged that Bell's invention or discovery, mentioned in his Letters Patent were not new or original, but had been, prior to his alleged invention or discovery, invented or discovered by other persons to whom Letters Patent had been issued; among whom were Elisha Gray, to whom several patents have been issued; Cromwell Fleetwood Varley, to whom English Patents had been issued, and others a long list of whom is mentioned in the answer of the Clay Commercial Telephone Company

In this court it was claimed, and the charge made in briefs for the Overland and Drawbaugh Companies, that Bell's application, as originally filed in the Patent Office, did not contain his present fourth claim or any description of the Variable Resistance Method, and that all which now appears in his specification on that subject, including the fourth claim, were surreptitiously interpolated afterwards. Bell's application was filed Feb. 14, 1876, and during the same day, Elisha Gray filed a caveat in which he claimed as his invention the art of transmitting vocal sounds telegraphically through an electric circuit. The charge was made in the printed brief of Mr. Hill (as stated in the opinion in this case) that "Mr. Bell's attorneys had an underground railroad in operation between their office and Examiner Wilbur's room in the Patent Office, by which they were enabled to have unlawful and guilty knowledge of Gray's papers as soon as they were filed in the Patent Office," and "that an important invention and a claim therefor were bodily interpolated into Bell's specification between February 14, 1876, and February 19, 1876," in consequence of knowledge of Gray's caveat improperly obtained. The following is a copy of Gray's said caveat referred to in said charge:

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE,

ELISHA GRAY, OF CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

Transmitting Vocal Sounds Telegraphically.

Gray's Caveat.

Filed February 14, 1876.

"To all whom it may concern:

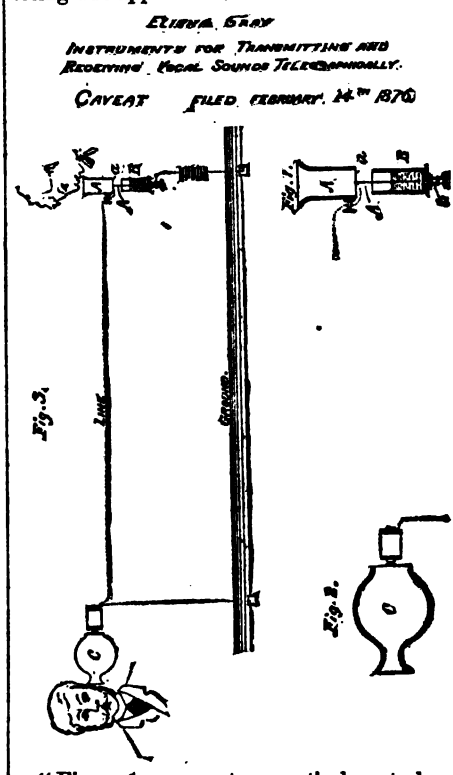
"Be it known that I, ELISHA GRAY, of Chicago, in the county of Cook, and State of Illinois, have invented a new Art of transmitting vocal sounds telegraphically, of which the following is a specification:

"It is the object of my invention to transmit the tones of the human voice through a telegraphic circuit, and reproduce them at the receiving end of the line, so that actual conversations can be carried on by persons at long distances apart.

"I have invented and patented methods of transmitting musical impressions or sounds telegraphically, and my present invention is based upon a modification of the principle of said invention, which is set forth and described in Letters-Patent of the United States, granted to me July 27, 1875, respectively numbered 166,095, and 166,096, and also in an application for Letters-Patent of the United States, filed by me February 23, 1875.

"To attain the objects of my invention, I devised an instrument capable of vibrating responsively to all the tones of the human voice, and by which they are rendered audible.

"In the accompanying drawings I have shown an apparatus embodying my improvements, in the best way now known to me, but I contemplate various other applications, and also changes in the details of construction of the apparatus, some of which would obviously suggest themselves to a skillful electrician, or a person versed in the science of acoustics, on seeing this application.



"Figure 1 represents a vertical central section through the transmitting instrument.

"Figure 2, a similar section through the receiver; and figure 3 a diagram representing the whole apparatus.

"My present belief is, that the most effective method of providing an apparatus capable of responding to the various tones of the human voice is a tympanum, drum or diaphragm, stretched across one end of the chamber, carrying an apparatus for producing fluctuations in the potential of the electric current, and consequently varying in its power.

"In the drawings, the person transmitting sounds is shown as talking into a box or chamber, A, across the outer end of which is stretched a diaphragm a of some thin substance, such as parchment or gold beaters' skin, capable of responding to all the vibrations of the human voice, whether simple or complex. Attached to this diaphragm is a light metal rod A, or other suitable conductor of electricity, which extends into a vessel B, made of glass or other insulating material, having its lower end closed by a plug, which may be of metal, or through which passes a conductor b, forming part of the circuit.

"This vessel is filled with some liquid possessing high resistance, such, for instance, as water, so that the vibrations of the plunger or rod A, which does not quite touch the conductor b, will cause variations in resistance, and, consequently, in the potential of the current passing through the rod A.

"Owing to this construction, the resistance varies constantly, in response to the vibrations of the diaphragm, which, although irregular, not only in their amplitude but in rapidity, are nevertheless transmitted, and can, consequently, be transmitted through a single rod, which could not be done with a positive make and break of the circuit employed, or where contact points are used.

"I contemplate, however, the use of a series of diaphragms in a common vocalizing chamber, each diaphragm carrying an independent rod, and responding to a vibration of different rapidity and intensity; in which case contact points mounted on other diaphragms may be employed.

"The vibrations thus imparted are transmitted through an electric circuit to the receiving station, in which circuit is included an electro-magnet of ordinary construction, acting upon a diaphragm to which is attached a piece of soft iron, and which diaphragm is stretched across a receiving vocalizing chamber c, somewhat similar to the corresponding vocalizing chamber A.

"The diaphragm at the receiving end of the line is thus thrown into vibration corresponding with those at the transmitting end, and audible sounds or words are produced.

"The obvious practical application of my improvement will be to enable persons at a distance to converse with each other through a telegraphic circuit, just as they now do in each other's presence, or through a speaking tube.

"I claim, as my invention, the art of transmitting vocal sounds or conversations telegraphically through an electric circuit."

Witnesses: ELISHA GRAY.
WILLIAM J. PEYTON,
WILLIAM D. BALDWIN.

One item of evidence, on which the charge of the fraudulent interpolation into Bell's Specifications above mentioned is rested, is a paper handed by Bell to George Brown of Toronto, describing his invention which was intended to be used in England to secure a British Patent in which what is now claimed to be an interpolation in the American application is not to be found. The following is a copy of such paper:

*Bell's George-Brown Specification, No. V.

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE.

[ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL, of Salem, Assignor to himself and Thomas Sanders, of Haverhill, and Gardiner G. Hubbard, of Cambridge, Massachusetts.]

To all whom it may concern:

Be it known that I, ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL, of Salem, Massachusetts, have invented certain new and useful improvements in telegraphy, of which the following is a specification:

In [another application for] letters patent granted to me [in] April 6th, 1875 (No. 161,739), I have described a method of and apparatus for transmitting two or more telegraphic signals simultaneously along a single wire by the employment of transmitting instruments, each of which occasions a succession of electrical impulses differing in rate from the others; and of receiving instruments each tuned to a pitch at which it will be put in vibration to produce its fundamental tone by one only of the transmitting instruments; and of vibratory circuit-breakers operating to convert the vibratory movement of the receiving instrument into a permanent make or break (as the case may be) of a local circuit in which is placed a Morse sounder register, or other telegraphic apparatus. I have also therein described a form of autograph telegraph based upon the action of the above-mentioned instruments.

In illustration of my method of multiple telegraphy I have shown in the [application] PATENT aforesaid, as one form of transmitting instrument an electro-magnet having a steel spring armature which is kept in vibration by the action of a local battery. This armature in vibrating makes and breaks the main circuit, producing an intermittent current upon the line-wire. I have found, however, that upon this plan the limit to the number of signals that can be sent simultaneously over the same circuit is very speedily reached; for when a number of transmitting instruments, having different rates of vibration, are simultaneously making and breaking the same circuit, the effect upon the main line is practically equivalent to one continuous current.

My present invention consists in the employment of a vibratory or undulat[ing]ORY current of electricity in place of a merely intermittent one; and of a method of, and apparatus for, producing electrical undulations upon the line-wire. The advantages [claimed for the undulatory current over the] I CLAIM TO DERIVE FROM THE USE OF AN UNDULATORY CURRENT IN PLACE OF A merely intermittent one, are—

1. That a very much larger number of signals can be transmitted simultaneously over the same circuit.

2. That a closed circuit and single main battery may be employed.

3. That communication in both directions is established without the necessity of using special induction-coils.

4. And that—as the circuit is never broken—a spark-arrester becomes unnecessary.

It has long been known that when a permanent magnet is caused to approach the pole of an electro-magnet a current of electricity is induced in the coils of the latter, and that when it is made to recede a current of opposite polarity to the first appears upon the wire. When, therefore, a permanent magnet is caused to vibrate in front of the pole of an electro-magnet, an undulatory current of electricity is induced in the coils of the electro-magnet, the undula-

*NOTE.—Accompanying this were sketches of first seven figures in this Vol. and to which reference is made by letters and figures. Ed.

Words in square brackets [ ] erased in original.

tions of which correspond in rate of succession to the vibrations of the magnet, in polarity to the direction of its motion, and in intensity to the amplitude of its vibration. That the difference between an undulatory and an intermittent current may be more clearly understood, I shall describe the condition of the electrical current when THE ATTEMPT IS MADE TO TRANSMIT two musical notes [of different pitch are] simultaneously [transmitted along the same wire] FIRST UPON THE ONE PLAN AND THEN UPON THE OTHER. Let the interval between the two sounds be a major third. Then their rates of vibration are in the ratio of 4 : 5.

Now, when the intermittent current is used the circuit is made and broken four times by one TRANSMITTING instrument in the same time that five makes and breaks are caused by the other [instrument].

A and B (Figs. I, II, and III) represent the intermittent currents produced; four impulses of A being made in the same time as five impulses of B. c c c, etc., show where and for how long time the circuit is made, and d d d, etc., indicate the duration of the breaks of the circuit.

The line A + B shows the total effect upon the current when the transmitting instruments for A and B are caused [to] simultaneously to make and break the same circuit. The resultant effect depends very much upon the duration of the make relatively to the break. In Fig. I the rate is as 1: 4; in Fig. II as 1: 2; and in Fig. III the makes and breaks are of equal duration.

The combined effect A + B (Fig. III), is very nearly equivalent to a continuous current.

When many transmitting instruments of different [pitch] RATES OF VIBRATION are simultaneously making and breaking the same circuit, the current upon the main line [loses altogether its intermittent character and] becomes for all practical purposes continuous.

[But now] next consider the effect when an undulatory current is employed.

Electrical undulations induced by the vibration of a body capable of inductive action can be represented graphically without error by the same sinusoidal curve, which express the vibration of the inducing body itself, and the effect of its vibration upon the air.

For, as above stated, the rate of oscillation in the electrical current corresponds to the rate of vibration of the inducing body; that is, to the pitch of the sound produced; the intensity of the current varies with the amplitude of vibration; that is, with the loudness of the sound; and the polarity of the current corresponds to the direction of the motion of the vibrating body; that is, to the condensations and rarefactions of air produced by the vibration. Hence the sinusoidal curve A or B* (Fig. IV) represents graphically the electrical undulations induced in a circuit by the vibration of a body capable of inductive action.

The horizontal line (a b d f) represents the zero of current; the elevations (c c c) indicate impulses of positive electricity; the depressions (e e e) show impulses of negative electricity; the vertical distance (cd or ef) of any [point on] PORTION OF the curve from the zero line expresses the intensity of the positive or negative impulse at the part OBSERVED; and the horizontal distance (a a) indicates the duration of the electrical oscillation.

The vibrations represented by the sinusoidal curves A and B (Fig. IV) are in the ratio aforesaid, of 4: 5; that is, four oscillations of A are made in the same time as five oscillations of B.

The combined effect of A and B, when induced simultaneously on the same circuit, is expressed by the curves A + B (Fig. IV), which is the algebraical sum of the sinusoidal curve and B. This curve (A + B) also indicates the actual motion of the air when the two musical notes considered are sounded simultaneously.

Thus, when electrical undulations of different rates are simultaneously induced in the same circuit, an effect is produced exactly analogous to that occasioned in the air by the vibration of the inducing bodies.

Hence the coexistence [of] UPON a telegraphic circuit of electrical vibrations of different pitch is manifested—not by the obliteration of the vibratory character of the current, but by peculiarities in the shapes of the electrical undulations; or, in other words, by peculiarities in the shapes of the curves which represent those undulations.

[Undulatory currents of electricity may be produced in many other ways than that described above, but all the methods depend for effect upon the vibration or motion of bodies capable of inductive action.]

There are many [other] ways of producing undulatory currents of electricity, but all of them depend for effect upon the vibration or motion of bodies capable of inductive action. A few of the methods that may be employed I shall here specify.*

[I shall specify a few of the methods that may be used to produce the effect.]

When a wire through which a continuous current of electricity is passing is caused to vibrate in the neighborhood of another wire an undulatory current of electricity is induced in the latter.

When a cylinder upon which are arranged bar-magnets is made to rotate in front of the pole of an electro-magnet an undulatory current is induced in the coils of the electro-magnet.

Undulations may also be caused in a continuous voltaic current by the vibration or motion of bodies capable of inductive action, or by the vibration of the conducting wire itself in the neighborhood of such bodies.

In illustration of the method of creating electrical undulations I shall show and describe one form of apparatus for producing the effect.

I prefer to employ for this purpose an electro-magnet (A, Fig. 5) having a coil upon only one of its legs (6). A steel spring armature (c) is firmly clamped by one extremity to the uncovered leg (d) of the magnet, and its free end is allowed to project above the pole of the covered leg. The armature (c) can be set in vibration in a variety of ways (one of which is by wind), and in vibrating it yields a musical note of a certain definite pitch.

When the instrument (A) is placed in a

Words in small capitals interlined in original.
Words in square brackets [ ] erased in original.
* "A or B" interlined in original.

*This paragraph (four lines) interlined in original.
Words in square brackets [ ] erased in original.
Words in small capitals interlined in original.

voltaic circuit (g b e f g) the armature (c) becomes magnetic, and the polarity of its free end is opposed to that of the magnet underneath. So long as the armature (c) remains at rest no effect is produced upon the voltaic current, but the moment it is set in vibration to produce its musical note a powerful inductive action takes place and electrical undulations traverse the circuit (g b e f g). The vibratory current passing through the coils of the distant electro-magnet (f) causes vibration in its armature (h), when the armatures (c h) of the two instruments (A I) are normally in unison with one another; but the armature (h) is unaffected by the passage of the undulatory current when the pitches of the two instruments (A I) are different [from one another].

A number of instruments may be placed upon a telegraphic circuit (as in Fig. VI). When the armature of any one of the instruments is set in vibration all the other instruments on the circuit which are in unison with it respond, but those which have normally a different rate of vibration remain silent. Thus if A (Fig. VI) is set in vibration, the armatures of A^1 and A^2 will vibrate also, but all the others on the circuit remain still. So also if B^1 is caused to emit its musical note the instruments B B^2 respond. They continue sounding so long as the mechanical vibration of B^1 is continued, but become silent the moment its motion stops. The duration of the sound may be made to signify the dot or dash of the Morse alphabet, and thus a telegraphic despatch can be transmitted by alternately interrupting and renewing the sound.

When two or more instruments of different pitch are simultaneously caused to vibrate all the instruments of corresponding pitches upon the circuit are set in vibration, each responding to that one only of the transmitting instruments with which it is in unison. Thus the signals of A are repeated by A^1 and A^2, but by no other instruments upon the circuit; the signals of B^2 by B and B^1, and the signals of C^1 by C and C^2, whether A, B^2, and C^1 are successively or simultaneously set in vibration.

Hence, by these instruments, two or more telegraphic signals or messages may be sent simultaneously over the same circuit without interfering with one another.

I desire here to remark that there are many other uses to which these instruments may be put, such as the simultaneous transmission of musical notes differing in loudness as well as in pitch, and the telegraphic transmission of noises or sounds of any kind.

When the armature c (Fig. V) is mechanically set in vibration the armature h responds not only in pitch but in loudness. Thus when c vibrates with little amplitude, a very soft musical note proceeds from h, and when c vibrates forcibly the amplitude of vibration of h is considerably increased, and the sound becomes louder. So if A and B (Fig. VI) are sounded simultaneously (A loudly and B softly) the instruments A^1 A^2 repeat loudly the signals of A, and the instruments B^1 B^2 repeat gently those of B.

One of the ways in which the armature (c), Fig. VI, may be set in vibration has been stated above to be by wind. Another mode is shown [by] IN Fig. VII [which], WHEREBY motion can be imparted to the armature by means of the human voice or by the tones of a musical instrument.

The armature c (Fig. VII) is fastened loosely by one extremity to the uncovered pole (d) of the electro-magnet (b), and its other extremity is attached to the centre of a stretched membrane (a). A cone, A, is used to converge sound vibrations upon the membrane. When a loud sound is uttered in the cone the membrane (a) is set in vibration, the armature (c) is forced to partake of the motion, and thus electrical undulations are caused upon the circuit E b e f g. These undulations are similar in form to the air vibrations caused by the sound —that is, they [are] CAN BE represented graphically by similar curves. The undulatory current passing through the electro-magnet (f) influences [the] ITS armature (h) to copy the motion [s] of the armature (c). A similar sound to that uttered into A is then heard to proceed from L.

[Having described my invention, what I claim and desire to secure by letters patent is as follows:

1. A system of telegraphy in which the receiver is set in vibration by the employment of (vibratory or) undulatory currents of electricity.

2. The method of creating an undulatory current of electricity by the vibration of a permanent magnet or other body capable of inductive action.

3. The method of inducing undulations in a continuous voltaic current by the vibration or motion of bodies capable of inductive action.

4. The method of and apparatus for transmitting vocal or other sounds telegraphically by (inducing in a continuous voltaic circuit) CAUSING ELECTRICAL undulations similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying said vocal or other sounds, the whole for operation substantially as HEREIN shown and described.]

In this specification the three words "oscillation," "vibration," and "undulation" are used synonymously.

By the term "body capable of inductive action" I mean a body which, when in motion, produces dynamical electricity. I include in the category of bodies capable of inductive action brass, copper, and other metals, as well as iron and steel.

Having described my invention, what I claim and desire to secure by letters patent, is as follows:

1. A system of telegraphy in which the receiver is set in vibration by the employment of undulatory currents of electricity.

2. The combination of a permanent magnet or other body capable of inductive action with a closed circuit, so that the vibration of the one shall produce electrical undulations in the other or in itself.

Thus (a.) The permanent magnet or other body capable of inductive action may be set in vibration in the neighborhood of the conducting wire forming the circuit.

(b.) The conducting wire may be set in vi-

Words in small capitals interlined in original.
Words in square brackets [ ] erased in original.

Words in small capitals interlined in original.
Words in square brackets [ ] erased in original.

bration in the neighborhood of the permanent magnet.

(c.) The conducting wire and the permanent magnet may both simultaneously be set in vibration in each other's neighborhood; and in any or all of these cases electrical undulations will be produced upon the circuit.

3. The method of producing undulations in a continuous voltaic current by the vibration or motion of bodies capable of inductive action, or by the vibration or motion of the conducting wire itself in the neighborhood of such bodies.

4. The method of and apparatus for transmitting vocal or other sounds telegraphically, as herein described, by causing electrical undulations similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the said vocal or other sounds.

(Indorsement.)

These papers were received by me from Professor Alex. G. Bell in the winter of 1875–'6, shortly before I left for England. I can fix the exact date by reference to my books and papers, but have not these at hand now.

Toronto, 12 Novem., 1878.

GEO. BROWN.

In regard to this defense of fraudulent interpolation in Bell's specification, it is to be observed, as is stated by this court in its opinion, "that during the whole course of the protracted litigation upon the Bell patent no argument was ever presented based on this discrepancy until the brief of Mr. Hill was filed in this court on the 18th of January, 1887, six days before the argument in these appeals was begun." "Certainly there is nothing in the pleadings in any of the cases to direct attention to the materiality of this fact." The facts in regard to this alteration are quite particularly stated by this court in its opinion.

Gray's caveat was sworn to at Washington, February 14, 1876, and filed on the same day.

When the electrical examiner took up Bell's application for examination in February, he found that the caveat of Gray had been filed on the same day. The statute about interferences between applications and caveats (R. S. 4902) provides:

"Such caveat shall be filed in the confidential archives of the office, and preserved in secrecy, and shall be operative for the term of one year from the filing thereof; and if application is made within the year by any other person for a patent with which such caveat will in any manner interfere, the commissioner shall deposit the description, specification, drawings and model of such application in like manner in the confidential archives of the office, and give notice thereof, by mail, to the person by whom the caveat was filed."

After receiving the notice, the caveator may, "if he desires to avail himself of his caveat," file an application within three months.

The examiner gave to Mr. Bell's solicitors the following notice:

"Feb. 19, 1876.

"Telegraphy.—In this case it is found that the first, fourth, and fifth clauses of claim relate to matters described in a pending caveat.

"The caveator has been notified to complete, and this application is suspended for ninety days, as required by law."

"Z. F. WILBUR, Ex'r."

At the same time he sent to Gray the following notice:

Feb. 19, 1876.

"Sir,—You are hereby notified that application has been made to this office for Letters Patents for telephonic telegraph, etc., with which the inventions described in your caveat, filed on the 14th day of February, 1876, apparently interferes, and that said application has been deposited in the confidential archives of the office, under provision of Sec. 4902 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which section reads as follows:" (Then follows copy of R. S. 4902).

"If you would avail yourself of your caveat, it will be necessary for you to file a complete application within three months from this date, three days additional, however, being allowed for the transmission of this notice to your place of residence."

"Very respectfully,
R. H. DUELL,
Commissioner."

"Elisha Gray, care W. D. Baldwin, present."

Also the following notice:

"Examiner's Room, No. 118, U. S. Patent Office, Washington, D. C., Feb. 19, 1876.

"E. Gray, care W. D. Baldwin:

"In relation to the following notice in relation to your caveat, it may be well to add that the matters in the app'n referred to seem to conflict with your caveat in these particulars, viz.:

"1st. The receiver set into vibration by undulatory currents.

"2d. The method of producing the undulations by varying the resistance of the circuit.

"3d. The method of transmitting vocal sounds telegraphically by causing these undulatory currents, etc.

"Z. F. WILBUR, Examiner."

Mr. Bell's solicitors, believing that their application was filed early in the day, doubted whether the caveat was filed as early as the application, and thereupon addressed to the Commissioner of Patents a communication on the subject.

On this the examiner then added the following indorsement:

"Examiner's Room, 118, Feb'y 25, 1876.

"The cash blotter in the chief clerk's room shows conclusively that the application was filed some time earlier on the 14th than the caveat.

"The app'n was received also in 118 by noon of the 14th; the caveat not until the 15th.

"Z. F. WILBUR, Ex'r."

Upon this, he sent to Mr. Bell's solicitors the following communication:

"Examiner's Room, No. 118, U. S. Patent Office, Washington, D. C., Feb. 25, 1876.

"A. G. Bell, care Pollock & Bailey, present:

"Feb. 14, 1876. Telegraphy.—The suspension of this application, having been declared under a misapprehension of app't's rights, is withdrawn.

"Z. F. WILBUR, Ex'r."

The memorandum or fee-ticket says that the money was paid February 14, 1876, and adds, "Paper will be filed to-day."

Mr. Gray wrote to Mr. Bell Feb. 21, 1877, that he was aware that the caveat was filed some hours later than the application.

The defendants also set up that James W. McDonough, of Chicago, was a first inventor of the speaking telephone. He was called as a witness.

His original apparatus was long before destroyed, and even his model was lost in the Patent Office fire. A few experimental pieces remain, but essentially the whole proof as to what his instrument was, rests on the description in his application of April 10, 1876, and the memories in 1881 of himself and of the members of his family. He never tried it except in his own room in his house. It was never seen except there and by the members of his household.

He was a large furniture manufacturer in Chicago, and had taken several patents for furniture, casters, etc.

McDonough's application is explicit in its description of the operation of the apparatus by which he wished to transmit speech. It is

Fig. 1

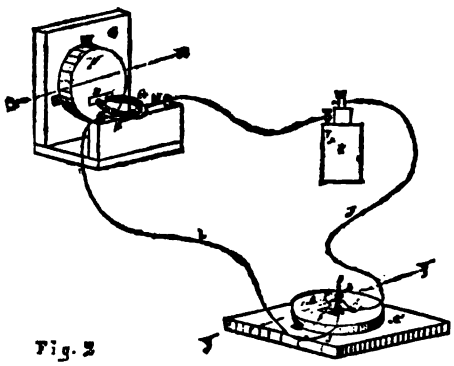

Fig. 2

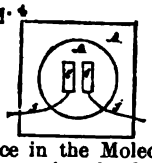
Fig. 3

Fig. 4



given in full in the evidence in the Molecular and Overland Cases and contains the following:

"The object of my invention is to provide a means for transmitting articulate sounds from one place to another through the medium of electricity; and it consists in the combination with an electrical battery circuit wires, armature, magnet and circuit-breaker, of a transmitting and a receiving membrane or sounding apparatus, so constructed as to vibrate in accord with the vibrations of articulate sound, and so arranged relative to the magnet and circuit-breaker that the vibrations of the transmitting membrane or apparatus, produced by articulate sounds, are transmitted by the electrical current to the receiving membrane or apparatus, and so as to cause a like vibration of the receiving membrane or apparatus, and* it to produce the articulate sounds transmitted from and by the transmitting membrane or apparatus. My invention also consists in the novel construction of the circuit-breaker, as is hereafter more fully described." "D′ is the circuit-breaker which consists of an arch-shaped piece of metal loosely secured at its centre upon the bolt D, and is bent upwards at each end, and from the membrane A, as shown in Fig. 3, so as to form depending V-shaped points adapted to rest upon the respective plates C, C′. The circuit-breaker D′ is so fitted upon the bolt D as to admit of a free and easy ascending and descending movement, the limit of its ascending movement being determined by its contact with the nut E on the bolt, and the descending movement being limited by its contact with plates C, C.

"The operation of my said telelogue is as follows: The transmitting membrane A, being sensitive to the vibrations of articulate sounds produced thereon, is caused to vibrate in sympathy therewith, thereby imparting an upward movement of the circuit-breaker at each vibration, and disconnecting it from the plate C C and alternately breaking and closing the circuit, when the intermittent current alternately magnetizes and demagnetizes the magnet G′, attracting the armature H, and causes it and the membrane F to vibrate simultaneously with the vibrations of the transmitting membrane A, and in accord therewith, and so that the said membrane F reproduces the articulate sounds transmitted from and by the membrane A.

"I do not limit myself to the construction and arrangement of the circuit-breaker D′, as shown and described, as other means may be employed; as, for example, one of the plates C may be attached to the membrane; and the other made either in the form of a plate or needle, and attached direct to the connecting wire, and adjusted to rest upon the plate so as to break the connection by the vibrations of the membrane, which will accomplish the same result. It will be observed that each end of the circuit-breaker D′ is bent upward from the membrane; the object being to prevent local attraction and render its action more sensitive to the lighter vibrations of the membrane. The articulate sounds may be taken direct from the magnet or through any substance or material sufficiently sensitive to the vibration of sounds to reproduce them by contact with the magnet.

"Having thus described my invention, what I claim as new, and desire to secure by Letters Patent, is:

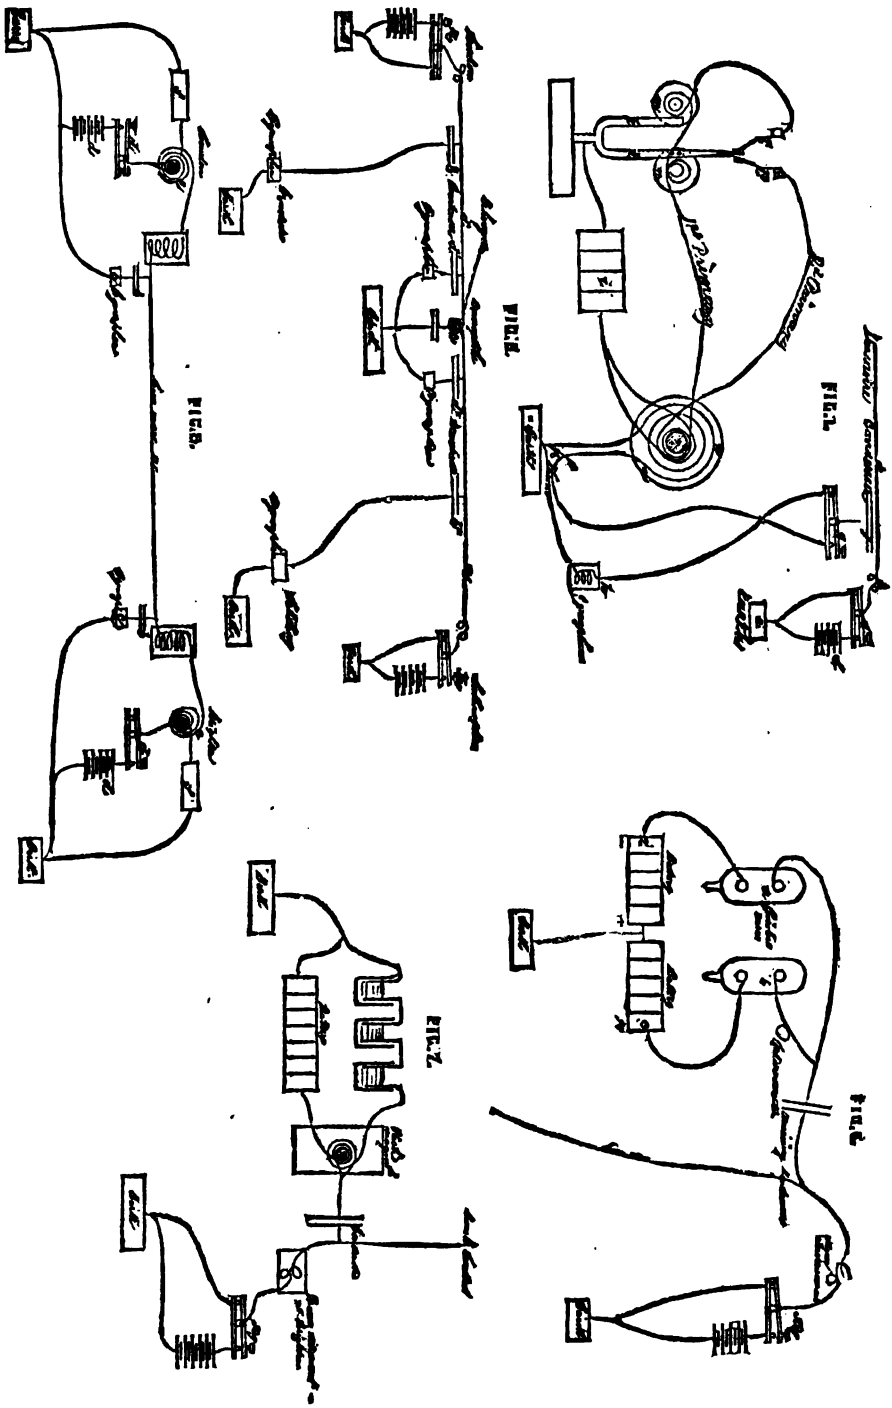
"1. The combination with the battery, circuit wires, magnet, armature and circuit-breaker of the transmitting membrane A, and receiving membrane F, substantially as, and for the purpose, specified.

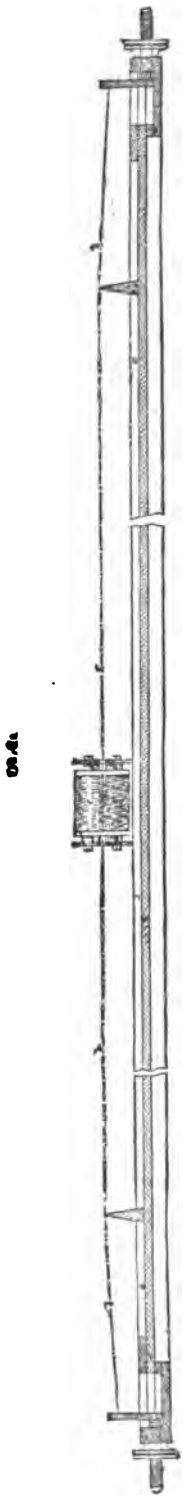
"2. The combination with the plates C, C, of the circuit-breaker D′, whereby the circuit is alternately opened and closed by the vibrations of the membrane A, substantially as specified.

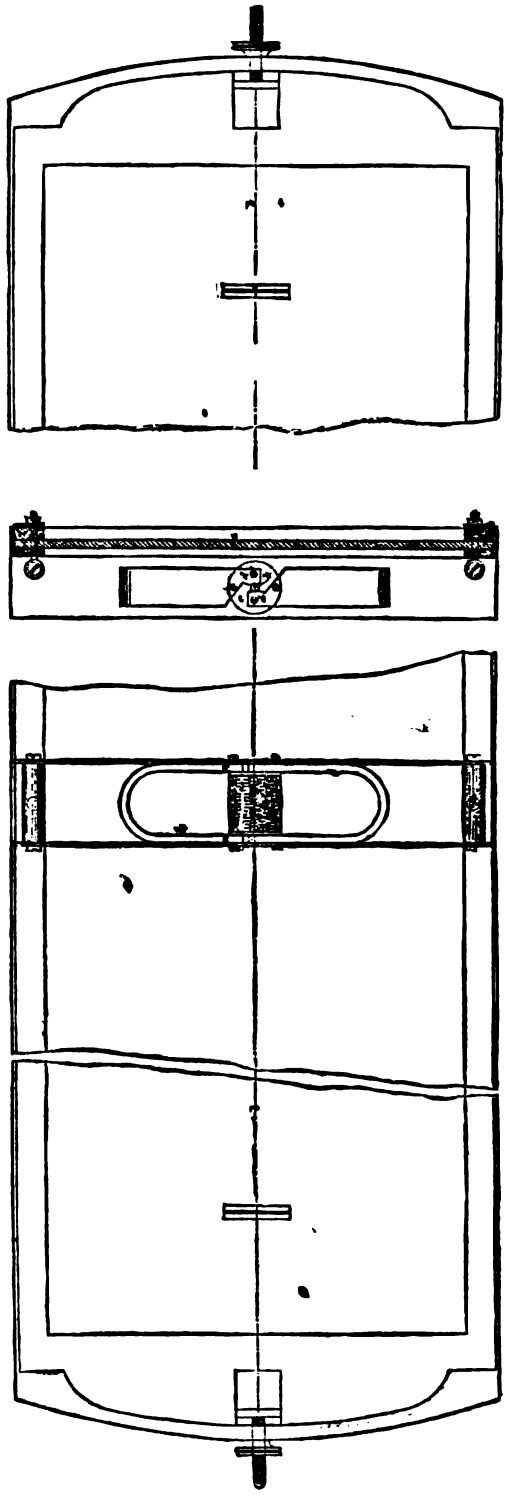
*A word, probably "cause," is wanting in the original.—Ed.

"8. The combination of the bolt D, and adjusting nut E, of the circuit-breaker D', substantially as and for the purpose specified."

The following are the specifications of the two patents of Cromwell Fleetwood Varley of London, England, granted, one June 2, 1868, in the United States, and the other Oct. 8, 1870, in England, for "Improvements in Electric Telegraphs" which are claimed to have anticipated the invention of Bell.







UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE.

CROMWELL FLEETWOOD VARLEY, OF LONDON, ENGLAND.

Improvements in Telegraphing.

Specification forming part of Letters Patent No. 78,495, dated June 2, 1868.

To all whom it may concern:

Be it known that I, CROMWELL FLEETWOOD VARLEY, of London, England, temporarily residing in New York, County of New York, and State of New York, have invented certain new and useful Improvements in Electric Telegraphs; and I hereby declare the following to be a full, clear and exact description of the same.

The objects of my invention are to cut off the disturbance arising from earth-currents, to obtain a high speed of signalling through long circuits, and, should the conductor become partially exposed, to preserve it from being eaten away by electrolytic action.

No means, prior to my invention, had been devised for effecting the first and third of these results. I have devised several other methods less perfect than those hereinafter described, but all embodying the general principle of my invention.

The invention consists of the arrangement of well-known apparatus, whose action, being of an electric and magnetic character cannot be explained by drawings or models; but the accompanying diagrams and specification will enable those skilled in the art to understand the invention.

The telegraphic signals in this invention are made to depend upon the rate of change of electrical potential, and not upon the strength of the current or charge in the cable.

As the earth-currents—i. e., the electric variations in the earth itself—change their strength slowly, the indications produced by them with this invention, in which the strength of the signals depends upon the rate of change of strength, are so feeble as to escape notice, and the embarrassment arising from this cause on long lines is, to all practical purposes, avoided.

There are two modes by which this is effected, and a higher rate of signalling through long cables obtained. The first plan is by means of an induction-coil. The cable at the receiving end of the circuit is connected to the primary wire of an induction-coil, and through it to the earth. The secondary wire is connected to the telegraph instrument. This arrangement is represented by Diagram No. 1.

Explanation of its action: On a current passing through the primary wire of the induction-coil, the iron core becomes magnetized, and this magnetization produces a current in the secondary wire, which acts upon the telegraphic instrument.

When the current in the primary wire has reached its maximum force, and is flowing steadily through, the iron core is magnetized to a certain fixed amount, and then the current in the secondary wire ceases. If, now, any change in the strength of the current through the primary wire occurs, the amount of magnetization of the iron core will vary, and a corresponding current in the secondary wire will result.

The earth-currents seldom pass from zero to their maximum and back again to zero (prior to changing sign) in less than five or six minutes, while the telegraphic signals are generally produced in a small fraction of a second.

With the former, although the currents are often very strong, the rate of change of strength is extended over several minutes, and consequently the current in the secondary wire is very feeble, as its strength is mainly dependent upon the rate of variation of the magnetism of the iron core.

The signaling currents or impulses are much more rapid or sudden, and consequently the variation of the magnetism of the iron core is much more sudden, and the currents generated thereby in the secondary wire are comparatively powerful and distinct.

Thus, then, suppose the earth to send a current through the line—say a positive (+) current from the sending to the receiving station—and to slowly magnetize the iron core, and, for ease of explanation, suppose this earth-current to remain for a time steady and uniform in strength; let, now, the sending station make a signal. In doing so his battery adds its strength to or opposes the earth-current, according as the signal sent is + or— (positive or negative).

This sharp and comparatively sudden addition to or subtraction from the earth-current produces a rapid augmentation or diminution of the magnetism in the iron core, and thus produces a distinct signal in the secondary wire.

For still further explanation, suppose the earth-current to be +, and to have a strength of 100 plus or positive, and the signal current to have a strength of 10, if a positive signal be sent, the current will rapidly rise at the receiving end in the proportion of 100 to 110. This rapid increment of magnetism will produce a positive signal in the secondary wire, corresponding to the increment 10. But if a negative signal be sent, then the battery will be opposed to the earth-current, and the current will rapidly fall at the receiving end in the proportion of 100 to 90, the magnetism in the iron coil will experience a rapid decrease, and a negative signal will be produced in the secondary wire corresponding to the decrement (or negative increment) 10, although the current through the line or cable still remains strongly positive.

As the strength of those secondary signals is almost entirely dependent upon the rate of increment and decrement of the current through the primary wire, and as the slowest line yet constructed need not require so much as half a second to produce a clear signal, while the earth takes five minutes or six hundred half seconds, the current arising in the secondary wire from the earth-current (which, although assumed to be ten times stronger, is six hundred times slower) is $\frac{10}{1000}=\frac{1}{100}$ part only of the strength of the signal, and the effects of the earth-current are consequently practically cut off.

When signaling through a very long cable, a rapid succession of signals charges the cable and produces an electric wave which is a long while subsiding, and acts at the receiving end in a somewhat analogous manner to the earth-current just described. This prevents signals from being transmitted in rapid succession by the ordinary means.

The above apparatus, which may be popularly described as disentangling the short high crested waves from the large long swells, enables clear distinct signals to be produced rapidly one after the other.

The strength of the signals through the cable or telegraph circuit is produced by the rate of the increments and decrements of current, and not by the current itself; and as an imperfect illustration, if the great earth-current through the cable be compared with an Atlantic swell whose height is five fathoms, but spreading horizontally over five or six hundred fathoms, and whose sides will have an angle of say one hundred and seventy-eight degrees, and if the signals be compared with the ripples produced by the wind upon the back of the swell, and whose angles are each, say, sixty degrees, then an apparatus that will indicate these angles would scarcely notice the angle of one hundred and seventy-eight degrees, which is nearly a straight line (or one hundred and eighty degrees), while the small waves, with an angle each of sixty degrees, would be distinct, and such apparatus would disentangle the small signals from the big swell, paying almost no attention to the latter. Electric waves are entirely different from water waves; but the illustration may serve to explain the action of the former.

The second plan of effecting the above is more expensive in construction, but more perfect in action. A large condenser is inserted in the circuit at one or both ends, according to the circumstances of the case. At the receiving end of the line I prefer the following arrangement (Diagram No. 2), which gives a rapid rate of signaling.

The cable is connected to the one armature of the condenser through the telegraph receiving instrument, and the other armature is connected with the earth. The cable is also connected to the earth by means of a resistance coil, which is best when made of a long length of insulated copper wire, wound round an iron core.

On a current running through the line or cable it finds at the distant end two routes or channels, viz., the resistance coil and the condenser. The condenser route at the first moment offers no other sensible resistance than that of the receiving instrument, while the other, owing to the magnetic inertia of the iron core, offers at the first moment a considerable resistance. The condenser is rapidly charged, and as soon as it is charged to the full force or potential of the current in the cable, all the rest of the electric current goes through the resistance coil to earth, and no more current is shown upon the receiving instrument. If, now, the potential in the cable be reduced or increased a little the change in the condenser is reduced or increased in proportion and a negative or positive signal can be distinctly produced at pleasure, although the electric current or charge in the line or cable has not changed sign, but only varied in strength. The resistance coil, between the cable and the earth, may be dispensed with; but then the little signal wave does not reach its maximum so rapidly, and consequently the signals are not so rapid (vide Diagram 6).

Observe, the receiving instrument may be placed between the second armature of the condenser and the earth or ground, instead of between the cable and the first armature. A condenser may also be employed at the sending end of the line or cable, either with or without a condenser at the receiving end of the line or cable. When a condenser is inserted at the sending end only of the line the resulting signal is very similar to that produced by a condenser at the receiving end only; but the disturbing action of the earth-current, however, is more felt when the condenser is only placed at the sending end, because the earth-current has to charge the cable in addition to the condenser, all of which charging current has to pass through the receiving instrument. When the condenser is used at the sending end of the cable or line (Diagram 3), the cable is connected to the one armature of the condenser, and the telegraph key to the other armature of the condenser. An ordinary double or reversing key is generally used, so that when the one is depressed a positive charge is communicated to the condenser armature attached to it, and when the other is depressed a negative charge is communicated to it.

If the key had been connected to the line or cable in the usual manner, a constant or permanent current would have been produced through the cable so long as the contact was maintained, and this current would only begin to die away when the contact with the battery was broken or reversed. But when the condenser is interposed in the circuit, as described, so soon as the current from the battery has charged the condenser, the current from the condenser is arrested and variations in the length of the battery-contact beyond a fixed amount will produce no change in the amount of current thrown into or induced in the cable. In this way great uniformity and regularity of signals are obtained.

At the sending end of the line it is sometimes advisable to use a smaller condenser than at the receiving end, and higher battery power, because the more sharp and sudden the impulse is given the quicker will the signal appear at the distant end.

If the dimensions of the condenser be reduced, say halved, and the battery power be augmented in the inverse ratio, then the shock or impulse will be the same in amount but more sudden, producing a rather more rapid signal at the distant end; but the disturbing action of the earth-currents is reduced as the dimensions of the condenser are reduced at the receiving end.

In some cases, such, for example, as where the Morse instrument is used, it is advisable to connect together the two armatures by means of a very large resistance, as shown in Diagram 6, so that after the condenser is charged the current through the cable shall not entirely cease. Thus the sharp sudden impulse of the condenser charges the cable and would produce a dot, but not a line or dash. The weak current through the large resistance, however, maintains the current in the cable, and a dash is produced, the Morse armature being held down by this weak current so long as the key is held down.

On the key being elevated the charged condenser is connected to the ground if the condenser be at the sending end; and in discharging itself the condenser produces a short, sharp current in the cable in the opposite direction, which rapidly terminates the signal at the distant end of the cable.

All cables are liable to have their insulation impaired. When this is the case, and the proper conductor is exposed to the sea water the copper is decomposed whenever a positive current is permitted to flow from the copper into the water, forming a chloride of copper, which is soluble and effuses itself and floats away.

If the cable be kept always negative to the water the action of the positive current flowing into the wire from the water is to preserve the wire from decomposition.

To effect this I place a condenser at each end of the cable (Diagram 7), and also connect to the cable, through a large resistance (or long coil of fine wire), a battery whose positive pole is connected to the earth at a negative pole to the resistance coil. This keeps the cable always negative to the water, and yet the signals through it and the condensers are either positive or negative, at pleasure. Suppose the signal impulse to be a positive one it weakens the negative character of the charge in the cable, and also in the distant condenser, and immediately a corresponding positive signal is produced in the distant instrument.

If the signal impulse be negative it increases the negative charge in the cable and also in the distant condenser, and therefore produces a negative signal in the distant instrument, and thus, although positive and negative impulses are produced at the distant end, the cable has been only less or more negative, but never positive to the sea, and therefore the conductor has been constantly under the preservative action of the negative current.

Thus, then, the action of the condensers and battery has not been only to cut off the effect of the earth-currents and to expedite the transmission of signals, but also to preserve the conductor of the cable from destruction if exposed to the sea water.

In Diagram 7 the place of the switches or commutators is shown. These have been omitted in the other diagrams to simplify them. These commutators are of the ordinary well known form, common to most systems of submarine telegraphing, and are not a part of this invention.

Having now described my invention and the manner in which the same is or may be carried into effect, what I claim and desire to secure by letters patent is:

1. In so arranging telegraphic apparatus as to work by the variation of the increment and decrement of electric potential, and not by the direct action of the electric current itself, as and for the purposes set forth.

2. The use of an induction-coil at the receiving end of the cable, one of its wires being connected between the cable and the ground, and the other or secondary wire connected with the receiving instrument, as and for the purposes set forth.

3. The use of a condenser or condensers between the receiving end of the cable and the earth, with or without resistance coils between the cable and the earth, as and for the purposes set forth.

4. The use of a condenser at the sending end of the cable, with or without resistance coils, connecting its two armatures, as and for the purposes set forth.

5. The use of a condenser at each end of the cable, the cable being connected with the ground through a resistance coil and a battery so as to keep the cable always negatively electrified, as and for the purposes set forth.

In testimony whereof I have signed my name to this specification before two subscribing witnesses. C. F. VARLEY.

(Diagrams omitted correspond to those on pp. 923 & 924.)

A. D. 1870, 8TH APRIL, No. 1044.

Electric Telegraphs.

Letters Patent to Cromwell Fleetwood Varley, of Beckenham, in the County of Kent, for the Invention of "Improvements in Electric Telegraphs."

Sealed the 7th June, 1870, and dated the 8th April, 1870.

PROVISIONAL SPECIFICATION LEFT BY THE SAID CROMWELL FLEETWOOD VARLEY AT THE OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS, WITH HIS PETITION, ON THE 8TH APRIL, 1870.

I, CROMWELL FLEETWOOD VARLEY, of Beckenham, in the County of Kent, do hereby declare the nature of the said Invention for "Improvements in Electric Telegraphs," to be as follows:

This Invention has for its object the increase of the transmitting power of telegraph circuits by enabling more than one operator to signal independent messages at the same time upon one and the same wire to and from independent stations.

In working land lines it is usual to produce the signals by means of the passage of a current of electricity producing magnetic action, as in the Morse or Hughes instruments, or chemical action, as in the Baines machines.

By my invention I superpose upon the currents used for working the ordinary telegraphs rapid undulations or waves which do not practically alter the mechanical or chemical power of the ordinary signal currents, and by new apparatus hereinafter described these undulations are made to produce distinct and independent audible or other signals so long as these undulations are produced, whether ordinary signal currents be flowing or not.

As a rough mechanical illustration of the way in which I propose to pass two sets of elastic signals simultaneously and in either direction through the same line-wire without interference I will suppose a rope stretched over two distant pulleys by means of weights at each end; if the near weight be raised the distant one falls. In this way signals are transmitted by the connecting rope, which may be called current signals; if now two small pulleys capable of rising and falling rest upon the rope between but near to the supports they will simply rotate when the rope is shifted backwards and forwards; if now an operator at one end strike the rope, vibrations or waves will be produced which will cause the other small pulley to dance or make vibration signals. Consequently the operator who shifts and the operator who strikes the rope can each produce independent signals on one and the same rope. Suppose the rope to travel over several fixed pulleys the operation of shifting the rope will produce distinct current signals from end to end of the line as before, but between each fixed pulley vibrations can be produced, and so a number of intermediate stations can communicate independently of each other and independently of the current signals through the line.

With this mechanical simile the following will be more easily understood.

The way in which I carry my electric invention into operation is as follows:

An electro-magnet offers at the first moment great opposition to the passage of a current of electricity, and therefore it may be considered as partially opaque to the transmission of very rapid alternations or electric waves. I attach to the line at desirable parts condensers. In the first instance I will assume only two condensers, one at each end, attached near each end of an ordinary telegraph line. The first or communicating station produces in its condenser rapid charges and discharges; these add to and take from the line a number of small electric impulses without affecting the mean magnetizing power of the currents through the line. These impulses charge and discharge the second condenser at the other end.

These undulations in the second condenser can be utilized in the following manner:

1. If the condenser be made of paper and metal foil the rapid charges and discharges produce a musical sound.

2. If those rapid alternations be made to pass round a helix containing an iron rod a musical sound is produced.

3. If these currents pass round a helix containing a magnetized harmonium tongue the currents make it vibrate audibly if the currents be properly timed, and the effect is increased if a feeble current of air be passing the tongue. By adding tubes of proper length and sounding-boards and other appliances for communicating vibrations the power of the signal is increased.

4. By placing the magnetized tongue of a musical comb between the poles of an electro-magnet with only a small iron core, or inside a coil, it is made to vibrate whenever these undulations are passing.

5. Another method of producing sound from the undulations consists of stretching a music wire through hollow helices; the currents magnetize and demagnetize the tone, this wire being also placed between the poles of permanent magnets. Harmonious currents cause this wire to vibrate. In some cases it may be useful to employ inharmonious currents to stop or silence the vibrations. The two latter methods will only speak when vibrations of harmony with the tongue are made to pass, and consequently in some cases two or more distinct sets of vibrations can be made to act on two or more sets of apparatus differently tuned, and to permit of several distinct communications to be transmitted simultaneously upon the same section of a single line-wire. By introducing between the receiving condenser and a Morse or other ordinary receiving instrument a current reverser keeping time with the vibrations, these alternating currents are made to flow through the receiving instrument in one direction, and are then competent to work the Morse or other ordinary receiving instrument.

6. When it is desirable to subdivide the vibrating sections of a line an electro-magnet, or, what is better, two electro-magnets are inserted in the circuit, and a condenser may with advantage be placed between the circuit and the earth, connecting the condenser with the circuit between the two electro-magnets. In this way, without interfering materially with the ordinary signals through the line, the vibrating sections are separated from each other, by withdrawing the iron cores from the electro-magnets, or, short circuiting the electro-magnets, the vibrations are passed through to the next station.

7. Another method consists of inserting a reflecting galvanometer between the condenser and the earth (or between the line and the condenser); the vibratory or secondary signals can be read off by observing its vibrations.

8. Vibrations are rendered sensible by placing a movable iron bar between the poles of an electro-magnet or inside a helix, and one or both of its ends between the poles of permanent magnets; the latter are covered with brass or any non-magnetic matter; the vibration currents cause it to vibrate between the poles of the electro or permanent magnets, and so produce distinctly audible sounds.

9. There are other methods of utilizing these superposed vibrations, such as connecting to the condenser an electrometer like that of Milner or Pettier. An intermediate Morse or other such line instrument would cut off the vibration signals or reduce them much; this opposition of the intermediate electro-magnet may be cut off by connecting the terminals of a condenser to the circuit on each side of the magnet.

There are several methods of producing these vibrations in the wire:

1. If a tuning fork be placed between the poles of an electro-magnet with a spring contact so arranged that when at rest the battery current flows through the electro-magnet the latter will attract the tuning fork and break the circuit; the magnetism then ceases and the tuning fork springs back and renews the circuit; in this way it keeps vibrating so long as the battery is in action. A secondary wire around this magnet produces currents in opposite directions, and by placing this secondary wire in circuit with the line-wire the necessary vibrations are produced.

2. The secondary wire may be connected between the earth and the condenser attached to the line-wire; this method does not add to the resistance of the main circuit, and is therefore preferable.

3. A tongue similar to those used in harmoniums is made to vibrate by air between contact points, and so connect the condenser alternately with the battery and the ground, and so produce the alternations, or it may be made to connect the condenser alternately to the + or — pole of a battery whose opposite poles are connected to the earth.

4. A magneto machine rapidly rotating will do the above duty equally well if its speed of rotation be controlled by a good governor. The tuning fork and vibrating tongue arrangement can be set to and can keep up any desirable rate of vibrations. The ordinary telegraph keys and switches are used for connecting the various parts of the apparatus together. In constructing the dry paper condensers it is best to dip the paper in varnish and attach metal leaf (such as gold, silver, or copper) to the paper, and lay these metal-coated papers between metal foil.

The double speaking apparatus of Dr. Gintl, or of Firschen, can be used on lines working with the above-described vibrations. When these are used I prefer inserting a hollow helix between the double speaker and the line, and by inserting iron rods in this helix the difficulty arising from the inductive capacity of the line is almost wholly removed. This is a new improvement, and will render these apparatus actually useful instruments.

SPECIFICATION in pursuance of the conditions of the Letters Patent, filed by the said Cromwell Fleetwood Varley in the Great Seal Patent Office, on the the 8th October, 1870.

To all to whom these presents shall come, I, CROMWELL FLEETWOOD VARLEY, of Beckenham, in the County of Kent, send greeting.

Whereas Her most Excellent Majesty Queen Victoria, by Her Letters Patent, bearing date the Eighth day of April, in the year of our Lord One thousand eight hundred and seventy, in the thirty-third year of Her reign, did, for Herself, Her heirs and successors, give and grant unto me, the said Cromwell Fleetwood Varley, Her special license that I, the said Cromwell Fleetwood Varley, my executors, administrators, and assigns, or such others as I, the said Cromwell Fleetwood Varley, my executors, administrators, and assigns, should at any time agree with, and no others, from time to time and at all times thereafter during the term therein expressed, should and lawfully might make, use, exercise, and vend, within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Channel Islands, and Isle of Man, an Invention for "Improvements in Electric Telegraphs," upon the condition (amongst others) that I, the said Cromwell Fleetwood Varley, my executors or administrators, by an instrument in writing under my, or their, or one of their hands and seals, should particularly describe and ascertain the nature of the said Invention, and in what manner the same was to be performed, and cause the same to be filed in the Great Seal Patent Office within six calendar months next and immediately after the date of the said Letters Patent.

Now know ye, that I, the said Cromwell Fleetwood Varley, do hereby declare the nature of the said Invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed, to be particularly described and ascertained in and by the following statement thereof, that is to say:

This Invention has for its object the increase of the transmitting power of telegraph circuits by enabling more than one operator to signal independent messages at the same time upon one and the same wire to and from independent stations.

In working land lines it is usual to produce the signals by means of the passage of a current of electricity producing magnetic action, as in the Morse or Hughes instruments, or chemical action, as in the Baines machines.

By my Invention I superpose upon the currents used for working the ordinary telegraphs rapid undulations or waves which do not practically alter the mechanical or chemical power of the ordinary signal currents, and by new apparatus hereinafter described these undulations are made to produce distinct and independent audible or other signals so long as these undulations are produced, whether ordinary signal currents be flowing or not.

As a rough mechanical illustration of the way in which I propose to pass two sets of electric signals simultaneously and in either direction through the same line-wire without interference, I will suppose a rope stretched over two distant pulleys by means of weights at each end. With such an apparatus, if the near weight be raised the distant one falls, and in this way signals may be transmitted by the connecting rope, which may be called current signals. If now two small pulleys capable of rising and falling rest upon the rope between but near to the supports they will simply rotate when the rope is shifted backwards and forwards; but if now an operator at one end strike the rope vibrations or waves will be produced, and will cause the small pulley at the other end to dance, and so vibration signals may be given. Consequently the operator who shifts and the operator who strikes the rope can each produce independent signals on one and the same communicating cord. Suppose the rope to travel over several fixed pulleys, the operation of shifting the rope will produce distinct current signals from end to end of the line as before, but between each fixed pulley and the next to it vibrations can be produced, and so a number of intermediate stations can communicate independently of each other and independently of the current signals through the line.

With this mechanical simile the following will be more easily understood.

The way in which I carry my electric invention into operation is as follows:

Condensers are attached to the line at the places where the wave signals are to be communicated and received. In the first place, let us assume only two condensers, one at each end, attached near each end of an ordinary Morse telegraph circuit. The first or communicating station to make a signal produces in its condenser rapid charges and discharges by means described; further on these add to and take from the line a number of small electric impulses without affecting the mean magnetizing power of the ordinary Morse currents through the line. These impulses charge and discharge the second condenser at the other end, and this condenser is coupled with a receiving instrument which is sensitive to these undulations and renders them apparent by sound or otherwise.

Figure 1 is a diagram of the instruments at one of the stations of such a line; a is the line-wire, I will suppose it to be an ordinary land line-wire 50 miles long and suspended in the usual way; b is the Morse instrument, c the sending key for the Morse signals, d the battery in connection with this key, and e its earth connection; f is a condenser of about 8 micro-farads, one armature of which I couple with the line-wire and the other with a key g, which when not depressed puts the condenser in communication with the wave signal receiving instrument h, which I call a "cymaphen;" this instrument is shown at Figures 2, 3 and 4. The key g when depressed for sending a wave signal puts the condenser in connection with the apparatus by which such waves are generated; this apparatus consists of a battery i; ten quart cells of Daniel's battery will be suitable.

One pole of the battery i is connected with the tuning fork k; this fork may conveniently be of such dimensions as to make 200 vibrations in a second. l^1, l^2 are two platina pointed contact-making springs, capable of fine adjustment by means of screws. The spring l^1 when the fork is at rest is in metallic contact with it or with a metal arm attached to it, and the spring l^2 is removed just out of contact. The current from the battery i then passes in the coils of the electro-magnet m, the poles of which have between them the two horns of the tuning fork. The coils of this magnet may be about 8¼ inches long and 1¼ inches diameter, and of No. 16 (B.W. G.) silk-covered copper wire. When the current is flowing through the coils of the electro-magnet the horns of the fork k are drawn apart and the spring l^1 loses its contact; then as the attraction of the magnet ceases the horns of the fork spring back; this remakes the contact, and so a continual tremor is communicated to the tuning fork. In the same circuit with the electro-magnet there is at n a primary coil wound upon a bundle of iron wires as a core, and on the same core but wound in the opposite direction is a second primary coil which is in connection with the spring l^2, so that currents pass alternately in the two primary coils, and at each alternation the polarity of the core is reversed. On the core there is also another or secondary coil, in which currents are induced by the changes of polarity of the iron core. One end of this secondary coil is connected with the earth, and the other when a wave signal is to be sent is by the key g put in connection with the condenser f, and produces in it rapid charges and discharges. The core may conveniently consist of a bundle of thin soft-iron wires, 1 inch in diameter and 32 inches long. On the centre of the bundle is wound for a length of eight, the first primary coil consisting of four layers of No. 16 silk-covered copper wire. Over this is wound the second primary coil consisting also of four layers, and outside this again is wound the secondary coil, consisting of eight layers of No. 24 silk-covered wire. The ends of the bundle composing the core are folded over so as completely to enclose the coils.

A small resistance coil o, or a condenser of about two micro-farads, is placed between the poles of the secondary coil to take off the violence of the shock, so that the operator shall not be inconvenienced. The wave signal receiving instrument h is shown in plan at Figure 2, in longitudinal section at Figure 3, and in transverse section at Figure 4. It consists of an iron frame containing a sounding-board a over bridges, at the ends of which a hard drawn iron or steel wire b is stretched from one end to the other; this wire is about four feet and six inches long between the bridges; it is of No. 14 gauge, and is strained so as to sound the same note as the tuning fork of the sending instrument. This wire passes through a hollow helix c, three inches in length, ⅛ of an inch internal diameter and 1¼ inches external diameter. The helix is wound with No. 35 B. W. G. copper wire insulated with silk. This coil is attached to the frame supporting the sounding-board, but does not touch the latter. Two horse-shoe magnets d are placed one on each side of the wire. The currents magnetize the wire inside the helix, and so cause it to be attracted and repelled from one magnet to the other. When the wire is properly tuned so as to vibrate synchronously with the apparatus at the distant end, making the alternations in the current, the sound from very feeble currents is distinctly audible. A piece of felt or leather resting against the wire is sometimes used to "damp" the wire and stop its vibrations as soon as the impulses cease. A small piece of metal similar in dimensions to a gold five-franc piece may be made to rest by a spring lightly against the sounding-board somewhere near its centre. When the vibrations of the latter are powerful enough to make this piece of metal dance, the sound is increased in power four or five times by this little disc or sound reinforcer, or the sound may be augmented by clipping on to the wire near the helix a disc of about the size of a penny piece of thin sheet metal; this causes the vibration of the wire to produce a greater disturbance in the air than it otherwise would, and a louder sound is perceived.

By attaching a stethescope to the sounding-board for the reader to rest his ear against, very feeble sounds are rendered sufficiently audible; I prefer to use a Scott Allison's stethescope.

The sounding-board may be replaced by a strained diaphragm or drumhead, on which one of the bridges over which the wire is strained is supported; this arrangement gives a better sound with very feeble currents, but with moderate currents the sounding-board appears to have the advantage.

Two sets of wave signals may be transmitted and received simultaneously through the same wire, and independently of the current signals if a sufficient difference be made in the periods of the two sets of waves. Thus, if waves of 200 vibrations in the second, and waves of 850 or 900 vibrations in the second, be simultaneously transmitted and received by two separate cymaphens, the one adjusted to the slow, and the other to the rapid vibrations, they may be separately read, as the vibrations which affect the one are inoperative on the other. This arrangement is not applicable when working long distances, as the rapid waves would in a long distance be lost.

Figure 5 is a diagram illustrating the arrangements I make when the wave signals are used to communicate between intermediate or branch stations without interfering with the working by ordinary instruments of the main line; a is the line-wire, say between London and Southampton, and through it it is desired that the intermediate station, Basingstoke, shall without interference with the through messages be able to communicate to and fro with the branch stations, Windsor and Salisbury. At these branch stations I provide wave signal apparatus such as already described in respect to Figure 1, coupled with condensers b^1, b^2, at the places where the branches run into the main line. At the intermediate station, Basingstoke, I divide the line-wire into two sections (as far as the wave signals are concerned) by introducing at c an instrument which is opaque to these waves, whilst it allows the ordinary long current signals to pass freely. This opaque instrument c I call "echocyme," and on either side of it I connect with the line-wire a condenser d^1, d^2, and wave signaling apparatus, as already described.

An electro-magnet offers at the first moment great opposition to the passage of a current of electricity, and may be considered as nearly opaque to the transmission of very rapid alternations of current or electric waves. The "echocyme" may consequently be a simpie electro-magnet, or what is better is to wrap an induction-coil with two wires so as to form one continuous coil; this is put into the line circuit. The junction between these coils is connected to the one armature of the condenser, whose other armature is connected to the earth. The momentary action of a current on passing through one wire charges the condenser. The secondary action upon the other wire checks the current that the condenser would have sent on through the other wire on to the remainder of the main line circuit; by varying the size of the condenser according to the nature of the line and currents employed a nearly absolute stopper of the vibration signals is produced. The coil which I have used for this purpose has the following dimensions: iron bundle one inch in diameter, length of coil 8 inches, and wound with No. 26 insulated copper wire to a diameter of two inches. The condenser connected between the "echocyme" and the earth in the case which I have taken for illustration should be of about $\frac{1}{10}$ of a micro-farad. At the termini Morse or other ordinary instruments may be used.

There are various ways in which the wave signal receiving apparatus may be constructed, although that which I have already described I prefer; thus the condenser itself may be the receiving instrument.

If the condenser be made in the following manner the rapid charges and discharges will produce a musical sound. Sheets of tinfoil (for example, one foot square) are separated by one or more sheets of thin dry paper; the 1st, 3rd, 5th, &c. sheets are joined together; the the 2nd, 4th, 6th, &c. also joined together. The odd-numbered sheets are connected to a binding screw or terminal, and the even-numbered sheets to another terminal. Such a condenser consisting of from 20 to 50 sheets will be found to be much agitated and to produce a loud note with 500 alternations of current per second if the potential be 50 to 100 volts.

In constructing the dry-paper condensers the following method seems to answer best: Very thin uniform paper is dipped in shellac varnish, coated on one side with gold leaf, and then dried. The non-gilt surfaces of 2 sheets of paper are put together so as to leave the gilt surfaces outside; the tinfoil plates are placed outside of these and built up in the usual manner, connecting the 1st, 3rd, 5th, 7th, &c., plates to one armature of the condenser, the 2nd 4th, 6th, 8th, &c., being joined to the other armature of the condenser. If the rapid alternations of current be made to pass round a helix containing an iron rod, the iron rod will issue a feeble but distinct sound. The rod used may be $\frac{1}{4}$th of an inch in thickness, 18 inches in length, and covered to a diameter of one inch with No. 35 insulated copper wire. This arrangement requires strong currents. If the currents pass round a flat coil in which a magnetized harmonium tongue is placed, the currents will act upon it like the needle of a galvanometer and cause it to vibrate.

The sound is increased by causing a feeble current of air to pass the tongue. If a steel tongue, similar to one of those used in a musical box, be magnetized and placed inside a helix of fine wire, and its lip is placed between the poles of a powerful permanent magnet, the alternating currents will cause the tongue to vibrate and produce a musical sound so long as the alternations are operating. By coating a wire, strained, as is shown in Figures 2 and 3, near the coil, with a short tube of gold or platinum, and letting a light spring formed of the same metals rest against the wire, a relay is produced, which, bringing into operation a local battery, can be used to increase the sound or to relay on the signals to another line.

A thick music wire, much thicker than those used in pianofortes, is found to give the best results for sound. A thin wire is thrown into greater oscillation than a thick one, and admits of being utilized for visible signals in the following way: A steel wire of about No. 40 gauge is stretched through the helix in front of a very narrow slit. A flame is passed behind the slit, but the light coming through is checked by the wire; the moment, however, the wire is put into vibration light passes, a lens is placed in front, and by it a magnified image of the luminous slit is projected upon a white screen so long as the wire vibrates. Vibrations are rendered sensible by placing a movable iron bar between the poles of an electro-magnet or inside a helix, and one or both of its ends between the poles of permanent magnets; the latter are covered with brass or any non-magnetic matter. The vibration currents cause it to vibrate between the poles of the electro or permanent magnets, and so produce distinctly audible sounds.

Another method of utilizing these alternations is by introducing between the receiving condenser and a Morse or other ordinary receiving instrument a current reverser keeping time with the vibrations; these alternating currents may be made to flow through the receiving instrument in one direction, and are then competent to work the Morse or other ordinary receiving instrument. Or a similar result may be obtained by the arrangement shown at Figure 6, which consists in connecting the receiving condenser to two "Geisler's" vacuum tubes a and b; the latter are connected with voltaic batteries C, Z, consisting of a large number of elements. The one tube a is connected to the "positive pole" of a battery whose "negative pole" is connected to the earth. The second tube b is connected to the "negative pole" of a battery whose "positive pole" is to earth. These batteries must have nearly power enough to make a current pass through the tubes; for example, supposing three hundred cells of a battery be able to leap across the exhausted tube 290 should be used with each tube. When a positive current arrives it will help the battery whose positive pole is connected to the earth and cause a current to pass through its tube b. The next instant the current is reversed; this causes a current to pass through the other tube a; in this way an electric valve is produced separating the positive from the negative currents, and producing a rapidly intermittent current in one direction only. If a reflecting galvanometer be enclosed in the circuit formed by the batteries and the tubes the wave signals will be indicated by it.

Another method of producing an electric valve for separating the positive from the negative currents, is illustrated by Figure 7, and consists in connecting, say, 5 cells of Daniell's battery with 8 cups containing dilute sulphuric acid with platinum plates joined up so as to form 8 decomposition cells in series. Between the battery and the 8 cups is inserted the galvanometer or other instrument that is to be worked; the junction between the instrument and the cups or decomposition cells is connected to the condenser. The other junction between the battery and the decomposition cells is connected to the earth. The first action of the battery is to polarize the platinum plates, when the current almost entirely ceases, the three pairs of polarized platinum plates balancing the 5 Daniell's cells. The moment a current arrives from the condenser it finds two channels open to the earth,—the one the battery, the other the decomposition cells. Suppose the positive pole of the battery to be in connection with the earth and a positive current arriving from the condenser; at first it divides itself, part going through the battery, part through the decomposition cells. The action of the current upon the latter is to depolarize them; and they then immediately resist its flow. The next moment a negative current flows from the condenser, this negative current is assisted by the partly depolarized plates, and the battery and the former become repolarized. It is best to wrap the instrument, as the diagram shows, with two wires connecting the one with the cups, the other wire with the battery, and their junction with the condenser. The result is that whether it be a negative or positive current that is sent into this arrangement the action upon the instrument is the same, and thus out of alternating currents a continuous action is produced. The platinum plates for this purpose must be very small and very close together, to reduce as much as possible their inductive capacity and resistance.

Another method consists of inserting a reflecting galvanometer between the condenser and the earth (or between the line and the condenser); the vibratory or secondary signals can be read off by observing its tremor. The mirror of this galvanometer must be deadened by water or other damper, and it is best to produce the signals by interrupting the vibrations instead of the reverse. The vibrations keep the mirror oscillating, the image becomes spread out, and the light enfeebled. The moment the vibrations are cut off the light contracts. The effect is the "spread out" light is feeble, the "concentrated" is bright, and thus the signals can be flashed by long and short duration like the Morse alphabet.

Another method of utilizing these superposed vibrations is to connect to the condenser an electrometer like that of Milner or Pettier. A resistance coil of about 1,000 ohms is connected between the condenser and the earth as a shunt to the electrometer to prevent the Morse signals from affecting it to any sensible extent; or the wave signals may be read by the sense of touch. For this purpose I use a handle made of hard charcoal, and divided into two parts longitudinally. The parts are separated by a sheet of gutta percha, and are connected the one with the armature of the condenser, the other with the earth. The handle being moistened and covered with a rag wetted with weak salt and water is firmly grasped in the hand.

An intermediate Morse or other such line instrument would cut off the vibration signals or reduce them too much; this opposition or opacity of the intermediate instrument is destroyed by connecting the terminals of a condenser to the circuit on each side of the magnet. Thus, if I wish wave signals to pass a Morse instrument I couple the armatures of a condenser of 8 to 10 micro-farads with the line-wire, one on either side of the Morse instrument. The working of the Morse line, if there are many instruments in circuit, is also in this way improved.

There are several methods of producing electric waves in the lines in addition to that already described.

A tongue similar to those used in harmoniums is made to vibrate by air between contact-points, and so connect the condenser alternately with the battery and the ground, and so produce the alternations; or it may be made to connect the condenser alternately to the + or — pole of a battery whose opposite poles are connected to the earth.

A magneto machine rapidly rotating will do the above duty equally well if its speed of rotation be controlled by a good governor.

The double-speaking apparatus of Dr. Gintl, or of Frischen, can be used on lines working with the above-described vibrations.

Figure 8 is a diagram of this arrangement. a is the line wire; b, b, the condensers; c, c, the cymaphens, wave signal transmitters, and parts connected therewith; d d are the current signal keys and batteries; and e e are the magnets of Dr. Gintl or Frischen's receiving instruments; and f f are their resistance coils. I prefer wrapping the magnets e, e, with 3 or 4 wires, using one wire between the key and the earth through its resistance coil, and the two or three wires joined into one circuit attached to the line-wire. I insert a hollow helix between the double speaker and the line, and by putting iron rods in this helix the difficulty arising from the inductive capacity of the line is almost wholly removed; this is a new improvement and will render these apparatus actually useful instruments. The helix may conveniently be of No. 26 silk-covered wire and 10 inches long, with a diameter inside of 1¼ inches, and outside of 4 inches; small iron rods are placed in this helix one by one until it is found that the finger-key does not affect the indicator of the home receiving instrument. By using these instruments, these apparatus together with cymaphens, as is shown in figure 8, three messages can be sent from end to end of such a circuit at the same time independently of each other; for this purpose the cymaphen key must have a spring contact, so that the circuit between the condenser and the earth is never broken until the contact with the secondary coil is complete.

I would remark that in electric telegraphs the use of sound signals is not claimed by me and is not new; for example, in working step by step instruments in which a pointer should indicate the desired letter on a dial, it has been common, when the instrument is out of order and fails to indicate correctly, to give sound signals; by its means such sound signals are read according to the Morse alphabet, a short sound such as the escapement of the receiving instrument makes when moving a few steps only representing a dot, and a long sound such as the escapement makes when moving over many steps representing a dash.

Having thus described the nature of my invention, and the manner of performing the same, I would have it understood that I claim the construction of electric telegraphs in such manner that current signals and wave signals may be simultaneously transmitted through the same line-wire, and may be rendered sensible at the receiving station by separate instruments, the one sensitive to currents of appreciable duration and the other to electric waves or vibrations.

I also claim the construction of electric telegraphs with, at the transmitting station, an instrument capable of originating in the line-wire a succession of rapid and regular electric waves, and at the receiving station a strained wire, a tongue, or such like instrument adjusted to vibrate in unison with the electric waves, and, being magnetized by them, oscillating to and from the pole or poles of a magnet in its vicinity.

I also claim in the construction of electric telegraphs the dividing a conducting wire into sections by instruments which I have called "echocyme," which allow current signals to pass freely but stop wave signals, so that whilst the wire is being used as a whole for through signals the sections into which it is divided may each or all be employed for the transmission of local messages.

I also claim the construction of electric telegraphs with, at the transmitting station, an instrument capable of originating in the line-wire a succession of rapid and regular electric waves, and at the receiving station a condenser consisting of thin sheets capable of being agitated by such waves.

I also claim the construction of electric telegraphs with, at the transmitting station, an instrument capable of originating in the line-wire a succession of rapid and regular electric waves, and at the receiving station an instrument which on receiving such waves delivers a current of electricity to an indicating or receiving instrument suitable to be worked with ordinary current signals.

I also claim the combination with Dr. Gintl and Frischen's double-speaking apparatus of a hollow helix connected between the receiving instrument and the line-wire, such helix having rods or pieces of iron inserted into it.

In witness whereof, I, the said Cromwell Fleetwood Varley have hereunto set my hand and seal, this Seventh day of October, in the year of our Lord One thousand eight hundred and seventy.

CROMWELL F. VARLEY. [L. S.]

The following, as to the meaning of some of the words employed in the Bell patent and in the art, is taken from counsel's brief in behalf of the Bell Company:

"Sound-Waves" and "Undulations."

When the wind blows on a sheet of water, waves rise on its surface; a chip dances up and down on the surface of these waves; a boat or a ship rocks, rolls and pitches by reason of them; painters draw or try to draw, their contour—the line of their curiously-curved surfaces. But nothing of this sort takes place in the air where we are. We are not on the surface of the air. There is no surface to be thrown into waves and show a line. It is all about us; it always presses on all sides, but not always equally.

If you are in a tightly packed and excited crowd, you are pressed on all sides; but as the people in the crowd sway a little, you are sometimes jammed more tightly, and again presently have a little more elbow room. You and each of your neighbors touch each other all the time; but if the people in the part where you are move closer together, in their effort to see something, you are pressed a little more; if some of them are attracted to turn and move a little away from you, you are pressed less. These movements of greater or less pressure are due to a slight to-and-fro movement of the different individuals composing the crowd. Such is the case with the air particles. Under the influence of the voice or some sounding body, those immediately near it are first, perhaps, pressed together; presently, by virtue of their elasticity, they spring apart a little more widely than they were before, and thus zones of condensation or rarefaction are produced.

These zones of disturbance are propagated onward at the rate of about eleven hundred and twenty feet a second, very much as sea waves are propagated onward, without any traveling motion of the air or water itself, and are called "sound-waves" or sonorous undulations. But as these zones are produced by and correspond to the slight vibratory motions of the air particles, it is found more convenient to study the motions of the particles themselves.

The Astronomer Royal (On Sound, by Sir George B. Airy, London, 1871) thus defined wave motion in 1871:

"We have states of condensation and states of rarefaction traveling on continually without limit in one direction, while the motion of every individual particle is extremely small, and is alternately backwards and forwards. And this is the conception of a wave as depending on the motion of particles in the same line as that in which the wave travels. This is the kind of wave which we shall consider as explaining the transmission of sound.

"But in all these there is one general character, that a state of displacement travels on continually in one direction without limit, while the motion of each individual particle is or may be small and of oscillatory character. And this is the general conception of a wave. It will be remembered that the special character of the waves of air applying to the problem of sound is that the displacements of the particles are in the same direction (backwards and forwards) as that in which the wave travels.

Such is the case with each air particle between the speaker and the listener, with the drum of the listener's ear, and with the elastic diaphragm of the telephone transmitter. The speaker's voice agitates the air, throws it into to-and-fro vibrations, makes the particles at each spot now to be more closely huddled together and now more widely separated,—that is, the air at each spot to be alternately more dense and less dense than it originally was,—and thus a diaphragm exposed to it is alternately pushed and pulled backward and forward.

"We must free our minds, therefore, from the notion of anything like a continued onward flow as a necessary concomitant of sound-waves, or indeed of any 'undulations.'"

"Form" of Vibration.

This phrase has nothing to do with the contour of a wave as a painter draws it. It is a purely technical term, used in a sense borrowed from a peculiar graphic, short-hand way of expressing the character of a vibration—the feature to which quality is due. This phrase, used in the patent, was devised and its meaning established long before the patent was drawn.

The following from Helmholtz, "Sensations of Tone," pp. 28, 29, 32 (published in 1862), explains this:

"Human speech employs these very qualitative varieties of tone in order to distinguish different letters. * * *

"On inquiring to what external physical difference in the waves of sound the different qualities of tone correspond, we must remember that the amplitude of the vibration determines the force or loudness, and the period of vibration the pitch. Quality of tone can, therefore, depend upon neither of these. The only possible hypothesis, therefore, is, that the quality of tone should depend upon the manner in which the motion is performed within the period of each single vibration.

"Every different quality of tone requires a different form of vibration.

(P. 100.) "To render the law of such motions more comprehensible to the eye than is possible by lengthy verbal descriptions, mathematicians and physicists are in the habit of applying a graphical method, which must be frequently employed in this work, and should, therefore, be well understood.

"To render this method intelligible, suppose a drawing point b, fig. 5, to be fastened to the prong A of a tuning fork in such a manner as to mark a surface of paper B B. Let the tuning fork be moved with a uniform velocity in the direction of the upper arrow, or else the paper be drawn under it in the opposite direction, as shown by the lower arrow. When the fork is not sounding, the point will describe the dotted straight line d c. But if the prongs have been first set in vibration, the point will describe the undulating line d c, for as the prong vibrates, the attached point b will constantly move backwards and forwards, and hence be sometimes on the right and sometimes on the left of the dotted straight line d c, as is shown by the wavy line in the figure. This wavy line once drawn, remains as a permanent image of the kind of motion performed by the end of the fork during its musical vibrations. As the point b is moved in the direction of the straight line d c with a constant velocity, equal sections of the straight line d c will correspond to equal sections of the time during which the motion lasts, and the distance of the wavy line on either side of the straight line will show how far the point b has moved from its mean position to one side or the other during those sections of time.

"Physicists, then, having in their mind such curvilinear forms, representing the law of the motion of sounding bodies, speak briefly of the form of vibration, of a sounding body, and assert that the quality of tone depends on the form of vibration."

Physicists speak of the "form" of a vibration, meaning its character; not because it has "form," but because the curve which represents it has.

The employment of this word "form" in the patent, in the scientific sense, since Helmholtz's work became classic, implies ex vi termini, the element of "quality," including articulation, especially when, as in the patent, reference is made to the utterances of the human voice.

It must always be borne in mind that the phrases "form of vibration" and "vibrational curves" do not signify the form of waves in the painter's sense, nor yet any curved line which the vibrating particle describes or follows in the air. Thus the pendulum and the tuning fork simply swing to and fro.

The form of the vibration of the curve traced on the paper. The curve is merely a geometrical expression of a mathematical statement of the successive changes in velocity and direction at each successive instant, however minute. The sounding air particle simply moves to and fro in a straight line. The curves are in the geometrical statement of the changes in its motion.

In the sonorous vibrations of the air there are three characteristics which are so far independent of each other that each can be varied or altered without changing the other. They are, period, or frequency of vibration, signifying the time occupied in performing the whole complete vibration, starting from one end of the path, going to the other and returning to the starting point; amplitude of vibration, signifying the distance between the two extreme limits which the vibrating particle attains to; character, or technically "form" of vibration, signifying the way or manner in which the particle performs its vibrations. As expressed, and correctly expressed, in the quotations from Helmholtz, Donkin, Taylor and Dr. Seiler, the period of vibration corresponds to and determines the pitch of the sound; the amplitude of vibration corresponds to and determines the loudness of the sound; the "form" of vibration corresponds to and determines the quality of the sound, and "quality" includes articulate character.

It is true that any of the complex vibrations that constitute articulate speech and most sounds can be mathematically, and by special apparatus experimentally, resolved into the equivalent of one dominant fundamental sound or vibration, with which other sounds lesser and of higher pitch, or more rapid vibrations, are blended, so that the unaided ear does not distinguish them. But such a sound is, in the language of scientific acoustics, as in the ordinary habit of speech, considered a single sound. When we speak of it on the side of sensation we mean by its pitch, the pitch which the ear recognizes, and which is given to it by its fundamental or dominant constituent; when we speak of it on the mechanical side, we refer to it as a sound consisting of a number of vibrations per second which corresponds to what the ear so recognizes as the pitch; that is, the pitch of the fundamental tone,—in the case of a man's voice in ordinary speech about one hundred per second. And the other peculiarities, due to what are called the blended overtones, are referred to in the language of science, not as separate vibrations, but as elements which modify the form of the vibrations first spoken of. When, therefore, we speak of copying the number of vibrations, or reproducing the pitch of a sound, we refer, according to the established use of language at the time when Helmholtz wrote in 1862, and also at the time of the Bell patent, to the number of complete vibrations per second corresponding to what the ear recognizes as the pitch of the sound. When we say that a vibration has received, either from the vocal organs or from the telephone, the special form of a particular uttered sound, we mean that the resulting sound copies, not in pitch or intensity necessarily or merely, but in quality, the character of the sound whose vibrations are thus copied, including the characteristics of articulate words. Such was the established significance of the terms.

Electrical Undulations.

It is also one of the usages of science—and, indeed, of daily life—to represent graphically by curves successive values or intensities, like successive values at successive times of cotton, or gold, or other commodities, or the height of the thermometer or barometer on different days; and in this way, the same language which the science of acoustics adopted from the graphic method of representing sonorous vibrations by curves is applied to all other reciprocating changes. The rise and fall of electric intensity at any particular point may thus be represented by a curve which will exhibit the precise character of the rise and fall, and, quite in accordance with the established use of the phrases, this rise and fall, if of a certain character, may be spoken of as an electrical undulation, the precise character of which will be expressed by the "form" of a curve actually drawn on paper, or which, if drawn, would represent it. Such electrical changes may thus be spoken of as undulations having particular forms.

The Molecular and Overland Companies introduced in evidence as anticipating Bell's 5th claim the following:

"TRANSLATION FROM WORK ENTITLED "DER ELECTROMAGNETISCHE TELEGRAPH," BY DR. H. SCHELLEN, 1867, PAGES 539–542."

"Figure 375 represents the action of the electro-magnet E upon the printing mechanism of the apparatus, and also the device for coupling together the two parts b and b' of the printing axis.

"The cores of the electro-magnet are not connected together at the back by a yoke, as in the case of an ordinary electro-magnet, but as shown in Fig. 376, they are attached to the N and S poles of a powerful steel magnet. The action of this magnet upon the cores is regulated by means of an armature of soft iron placed on the legs N and S which can be moved up or down. The nearer it is placed to the end of the poles the less will be the magnetic effect upon the cores of the electro-magnet.

"By this arrangement the cores are constantly magnetic, and attract the armature n (Fig. 375), as long as no current passes through the coils. A strong steel spring r operating on the arm F serves by its attractive power to withdraw the armature when, by the passage of a current through the coils, the magnetic power derived from the steel magnet is neutralized. In order to avoid too strong an attraction, the armature does not touch the surface of the poles, but is separated by a space equal to about the thickness of an ordinary sheet of paper.

"When a current whose polarity is opposite to the polarity of the steel magnet is passed through the coils E E, the magnetism is weakened or neutralized, and it no longer holds the armature against the retractile force of the spring r, which immediately draws the armature upward with considerable power. This movement is communicated to the lever $d\,d'$ which has its center of motion at the axis H. One end of the lever rests, with an adjusting screw, on the top of the armature; therefore, when, under the action of the current, the armature is released and flies upward, one extremity d is raised with it, while the other goes downward, and it is by this movement that the coupling of the two portions of the printing axis b_1 b' (Figs. 369 and 370) is effected, and the motion of the wheel work transmitted from the pinion 5 to the front part of the printing axis b' and its four cams.

"The transmission of this motion is effected in the following manner: On the back part of the printing axis b_1, a wheel g (Fig. 375), with very fine and strong teeth, is fixed. On the front part of the axis b' is a circular sector $l\,l'$, on one side of which is a flyer c', to which is attached a detent c''. This detent has three teeth which gear into the teeth of wheel g. On the other side of the sector is a spring b which presses down the toothed detent, which with its flyer c' is allowed to rise and fall a little. When it is free as represented in Fig. 375, the spring v presses the detent c'', into the teeth of wheel g, and it revolves with the wheel in the direction indicated by the arrow, and thus the rotation of printing axis b_1 at once effects the revolution of the circuit $l\ l'$ and the axis b_1. When, however, $c'\ c''$ is raised, its teeth leave the wheel g; the latter continues to turn while the motion of the sector and the axis b' is arrested.

"The sector $l\ l'$ also carries an eccentric cam u, which raises the end d' of the lever, when by the action of the armature n it has fallen. This movement presses the armature against the poles of the magnet, where it remains attracted by the permanent magnetism of the cores so long as no current passes through the coils. When in the position shown in the engraving, the sector $l\ l'$ turns in the direction of the arrow, and after making half of a revolution the front part (in Fig. 375 the lowest part) of the cam u slides under the extreme end of lever d'. As the following end of the cam is more distant from the axis b' than the front end, the extreme end of lever d' is raised by the cam, the other end d consequently falls and the adjusting screw returns the armature to the poles of the electro-magnet.

"In the figure the front end of the cam u has not reached the end of the lever d, therefore this end is depressed, and the toothed detent is still engaged with the teeth of wheel g. When the axis b' is turned a little farther d' will have reached its highest position, and d will be resting against the armature of the magnet. The axis b', sector $l\ l'$, and flyer c' continue to revolve; but when the revolution of the axis b' is nearly completed the flyer c', to which c'' is attached, reaches the inclined end of the arm d', which is now firmly held, and moves upward, lifting c'' out of the teeth of wheel g. By this the printing axis b' is disconnected from b, and the revolving wheel work and its motion arrested, in which position of rest it remains until the arm d' again falls, owing to the release of the armature by a current passing through the coils, when the flyer c' is set free; c'' again catches into the wheel g, and thus both b' and b are again coupled together. It will be seen that the printing axis b' makes a complete revolution at each action of the electro-magnet, and that the movement of armature n and the release and action of the printing mechanism is effected exclusively by mechanical power, and not by the power of an electric current. The current, during its very short duration, merely weakens or destroys the permanent magnetism of the cores of the magnet, at which the spring r raises the armature n and through the lever $d\ d'$ regulates the motion of the printing mechanism."

In the Molecular Case and in the Overland Case, the defendants alleged that Claim 5 of Bell's second patent, No. 186,787, of January 30, 1877, is bad.

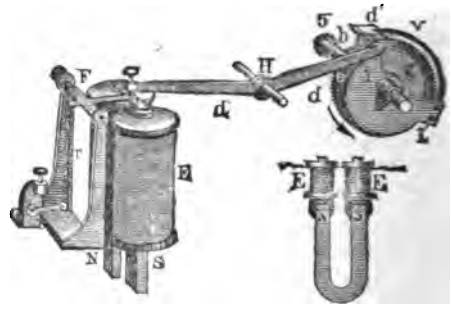
That it was a claim for a new kind of magnet, in which case it would clearly be bad, because the magnet had long been known. Such a magnet formed a part of the Hughes printing telegraph described by Schellen.

Judge Wallace, in the Molecular Case, stating that the claim had not been argued, held that the Hughes magnet was a clear anticipation. This decision was in June, 1885, and is here appealed from.

Subsequently, in December, 1885, on the hearing of the Overland Case, it was pointed out to Judge Wallace that the claim was not for the magnet per se but for an improved form of telephone, made by taking out the magnet shown in Bell's first patent, and putting in this one. He at once perceived the misconception he had fallen into and sustained the claim, as appears from his decree.

Hughes, many years ago, invented a very ingenious printing telegraph. The plan was to have synchronously working clockwork at each end. When the key corresponding to a particular letter was pressed at the sending end, and the circuit closed, the current was used either to start or stop the clockwork, and consequently, the letter which was at the proper place in the moving machine just at that instant was caused to operate and make a mark. The whole work at the receiving station was done by clockwork, driven by a weight, and the function of the electrical current was merely to pull a trigger, and start or stop that clock work at the proper time. This is the apparatus which is described and shown in the Schellen book.

In it Hughes employed the following device:



The horseshoe steel permanent magnet N S has mounted on each of its poles, N and S, a soft iron core, with a coil around it. The soft iron cores are not naturally magnetized, that is, they are neutral; but by being placed in metallic contact with the poles of the permanent steel magnet which is permanently magnetized, these soft iron cores become for the time being, magnetic by induction; and if a piece of soft iron, that is to say, an armature n, be placed in contact with the two upper ends of the cores of the coils E E, it will be held there by them by that magnetism. The soft iron armature n was laid by Hughes on top of the cores E E, with a retractile straining spring, shown as F and r in the drawing, tending to lift it away; but the strength of the spring was so graduated, by means of an adjusting screw, that it would not quite overcome the strength of the magnet. The armature was thus held, though with a nearly counterbalanced force, in contact with the poles of the two cores.

In the Dolbear Case the final decree in the court below was that the patent, granted to Alexander Graham Bell, by letters patent, No. 174,465, for improvement in telegraphy, dated March 7, 1876, is a good and valid patent and that said Bell was the original and first inventor of the improvement described and claimed therein and that the defendants had infringed the said patent; and a perpetual injunction was ordered. From this decree the defendants appealed. See 15 Fed. Rep. 488, for the opinion of Mr. Justice Gray, and 17 Fed. Rep. 604, for the opinion of Judge Lowell on final hearing.

In the case of the Molecular Telephone Company the final decree in the court below was that the several letters patent granted to Alexander Graham Bell for an improvement in telegraphy, No. 174,465, dated March 7, 1876, and for an improvement in electric telegraphy, No. 186,787, dated January 30, 1877, are good and valid; that said Bell was the original and first inventor of the inventions described in said several letters patent; that the defendants have infringed the fifth claim of said Letters Patent No. 174,465, and the sixth, seventh, and eighth claims of said Letters Patent No. 186,787. The defendants appealed from the decree; and the complainants also appealed from it "in so far as it fails to adjudge that the fifth claim of Letters Patent No. 186,787 is good and valid in law, and that the defendants have infringed the same." See 28 Blatchf. 253.

In the case of the Clay Commercial Telephone Company, it was decreed in the court below that the said patents were valid; and that the defendants had infringed the fifth claim of said Letters Patent No. 174,465, and the third, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth claims of said Letters Patent No. 186,787, and a perpetual injunction was ordered. The defendants appealed from this decree.

In the case of the Overland Telephone Company, the decree of the court below was that the patents were valid; that said Bell was the original and first inventor of the inventions described therein and that defendants have infringed the fifth claim of said Letters Patent No. 174,465, and the third, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth claims of said Letters Patent No. 186,787, and a perpetual injunction was ordered. The defendants appealed from this decree.

In the case of the People's Telephone Company (Drawbaugh Case), the decree was that the said letters patent are good and valid; that said Bell was the original and first inventor of the inventions described in them; and that defendants have infringed the fifth claim of said Letters Patent No. 174,465, and the fifth, sixth, and eighth claims of said Letters Patent No. 186,787, and a perpetual injunction was ordered. The defendants appealed from this decree.

[For further facts see the opinion.]

Counsel argued these cases orally in the following order:

(1) Mr. James E. Maynadier for Dolbear et al.; (2) Mr. Grosvenor P. Lowrey for the Molecular Telephone Company; (3) Mr. Lysander Hill for the People's Telephone Company (Drawbaugh Case) and for the Overland Telephone Company; (4) Mr. James J. Storrow for the American Bell Telephone Company; (5) Mr. William W. Ker for the Clay Commercial Telephone Company; (6) Mr. Don M. Dickinson for the People's Telephone Company (Drawbaugh Case) and for the Overland Telephone Company; (7) Mr. George F. Edmunds for the People's Telephone Company (Drawbaugh Case) and Overland Telephone Company; (8) Mr. James J. Storrow for the American Bell Telephone Company (2d argument); (9) Mr. E. N. Dickerson for the American Bell Telephone Company; (10) Mr. Causten Browne for Dolbear et al.; (11) Mr. Wheeler H. Peckham for the Molecular Telephone Company; (12) Mr. Charles P. Crosby for the Overland Telephone Company; (13) Mr. Lysander Hill for the People's Telephone Company (Drawbaugh Case) and the Overland Company (closing argument).

Messrs. James E. Maynadier, and Causten Browne, for Dolbear et al., appellants, filed a brief from which the following is taken:

Bell's fifth claim should be construed, in view of the state of the art, to cover only that method of transmitting vocal or other sounds telegraphically which is described in his patent and illustrated in figure 7 of his drawings, that is, first, by causing the sound-waves to produce magnetic variations and thereby electrical currents, alternately positive and negative, similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the said vocal or other sounds, by reason of the fact that the positive currents represent condensations and the negative currents rarefactions of the air, or vice versa; that the rate of change from positive currents to negative currents represents the rate of the air vibrations, and the intensity of each positive or negative current represents the intensity of each condensation or rarefaction. Secondly, after thus causing these peculiar alternately positive and negative currents, transmitting them to the receiver and there converting them into magnetic variations similar in form to these varying alternately plus and minus currents, and finally, by means of these magnetic variations, setting up vibrations in a distant air body, like the vibrations caused in the air body in contact with the vocal organs or other source of sound.

"The art or process" of transmitting articulate sounds by means of undulatory vibrations of electricity is not, and cannot possibly be, either an invention or discovery, for the reason that transmitting such sounds by means of such vibrations is a mere problem, not an art, or a process.

Certainly, it is not invention, or discovery, to perceive that articulate sounds can be transmitted by vibrations of electricity, adapted in some way to do that work; and no man has shown any art or process of transmitting such sounds who has simply announced,—what is entirely obvious,—that electricity will do it, if adapted to do it; or simply announced the electrical and other conditions necessary to its being done.

Is not the 5th claim plainly void, under the authority of O'Reilly v. Morse, 56 U. S. 15 How. 62 (14: 601)? It has always been held that the patent embraces nothing more than an improvement (invention) described and claimed as new, and that anyone who afterwards discovered a method of accomplishing the same object, substantially and essentially differing from the one described, had a right to use it. And anyone may lawfully accomplish the same end, without infringing the patent, if he uses means substantially different from those described.

The transmitting apparatus used by the appellants is the Reis transmitter, and the Reis circuit, and the Reis coil and core, except that the Reis circuit is very much shortened, and the electrodes are carbon, and not platinum; these changes are mere changes in details of construction, and the Reis apparatus taken as a whole, that is, transmitter, line and receiver, does not differ from the primary circuit of appellants' apparatus, except as an ill made machine differs from a well made one.

The coil and its core of the Reis circuit, as used in the defendants' apparatus, operate precisely as do the like parts in the Reis apparatus, with one exception, viz.: that the variations of magnetic energy induced in the core by the flowing of the varying current spirally around the core are converted into electric variations of a kind wholly unknown until they were discovered by Dolbear. These electric variations of Dolbear are produced by variations of magnetic energy in the core of a secondary coil; and, inasmuch as secondary coils containing a core whose magnetism is varied are old and well-known, it is clear that, speaking generally, the Dolbear variations are like the variations in other secondary coils; but there are, nevertheless, such marked and striking differences as make them radically new, and entitle them to rank as an invention second to none in question in this case.

Dolbear's method and apparatus are substantially unlike Bell's in all particulars. His method and apparatus are substantially like Reis's method and apparatus, except as to the secondary coil, the line-wire, and the receiver, and also the Dolbear secondary coil, line-wire and receiver are radically unlike anything in Bell's '76 patent, and radically unlike anything in any other telephone, and radically new with Dolbear.

The appellants earnestly urge this proposition: That a secondary coil, one end of which is connected to a wire, which wire is insulated, and has its free end enlarged, or, what is the same thing, electrically connected to an insulated plate or disc, is radically unlike a secondary coil and its core forming a part of a closed circuit.

The greater the variation of magnetic energy, the greater the number and better the arrangement of the convolutions, and the greater the external resistance between the positive and negative ends of the secondary coil, the greater will be the electric tension, pressure or head; and where the external resistance between the positive and negative ends of the coil is infinite, as it is in Dolbear's secondary coil, the maximum pressure possible is produced; whereas, in Fig. 7 of the Bell patent, and in the commercial telephone of the Bell Company the resistance of the line and the helix of the receiver is slight and must be slight, and, therefore, the electric tension, pressure or head never approaches the maximum. The secondary coils best adapted for use in the Bell Commercial Telephone, are useless with the Dolbear receiver. There is a radical difference between the Dolbear coil, line and receiver, and the coil, line and receiver of the Bell 1876 patent.

Bell shows a generator capable of developing an electric condensation at one end, and an electric rarefaction at the other end; but these two ends are connected by an electrical conduit which prevents that electric condensation or rarefaction rising to anywhere near its maximum because of the electric current which starts to flow through the conduit on the instant that any electric condensation or rarefaction commences.

In the Dolbear apparatus the generator is capable of developing electrical condensations and rarefactions measured by thousands, instead of hundreds, and there is no electrical conduit joining the ends of the generator.

In Dolbear there is an electrical chamber of high pressure, and an electrical chamber of low pressure, and the line-wire and the plate or diaphragm electrically connected with it always forms a part of one of these chambers, and never performs the function of the line-wire and helix of the Bell line and receiver; that is, never serves as a conduit connecting the high-pressure chamber of the generator with the low-pressure chamber of the generator; nor does the line-wire and its plate or diaphragm perform any function at all like the function performed by the line-wire and helix of the Bell receiver. Moreover no one knew, until taught by Dolbear, that the electric pressure chamber, made up of the line-wire and plate of his receiver, could perform the function which it performs in his apparatus.

It is incapable of dispute that Dolbear is the first who ever made any practical application of static electricity; that is, who ever used electric tension, pressure or head, practically, for any purpose whatever, except only in the familiar way, to cause a current through an electrical conduit.

It is contended on behalf of the appellants:

I. That the Bell patent of 1876 describes and claims but one method of transmitting vocal and other sounds, which method is: (1) convert the energy of sound-waves into (2) magnetic energy; convert that into (3) vibratory currents of electricity; convert those into (4) magnetic energy; and with that cause (5) sound-waves; or briefly (1) sound; (2) magnet; (3) currents; (4) magnet; (5) sound.

II. That Bell never invented, so far as appears from the record, any other method of transmitting vocal or like sounds.

III. That there is no hint or suggestion in Bell's patent of 1876 as to the employment of sound-waves to vary an electric current, nor any hint or suggestion that a current of unvarying polarity can be made capable of use to transmit vocal or like sounds; but, on the contrary, that Bell in his '76 patent takes the utmost pains to teach (what he, in fact, discovered) that, in order to produce currents in a closed circuit, like in form to sound-waves, the currents must be alternately negative and positive; that is, to-and-fro currents, so as thereby to copy the to-and-fro motions of the air particles constituting the sound-waves.

IV. That Bell's apparatus is, in essence, (1) magnet; (2) coil; (3) closed circuit; (4) coil; (5) magnet; one magnet being supplied with the proper devices for causing the energy of sound-waves to vary the energy of the magnet, and the other magnet being supplied with the proper devices to cause its varying energy to produce sound-waves.

V. That Bell's patent of '76 does not cover either the Reis method or the Reis apparatus, but that the Reis method,—that is, (1) sound; (2) current; (3) magnet; (4) sound,—and the Reis apparatus—that is, (1) a battery; (2) its circuit; (3) a transmitter-diaphragm, and the electrodes governed by it; (4) a helix; (5) its magnet,—are both public property: 1, because of the printed publications, so fully describing that apparatus that the Reis method will necessarily become familiar to any skilled person carefully studying the operation of that apparatus; and 2, because Mr. Bell carefully refrained from putting a single word in the specification of either of his patents which tended to show that the Reis current of unvarying polarity, but varying only in strength, was capable of being made similar in form to air-waves accompanying vocal or like sounds; and, by the very strongest implication, asserted in the '76 patent that rapidly varying polarity was essential in order that the to-and-fro motions of the air particles of a sound-wave should be copied.

VI. That the battery, primary circuit, transmitter-diaphragm, its electrodes, and the helix and magnet in the primary or transmitter circuit of the defendants' apparatus, do not involve the method described and claimed in Bell's '76 patent, nor is the apparatus substantially the same as any apparatus described and claimed in Bell's '76 patent, but that this transmitter circuit and its parts are copied directly from Reis.

VII. That the Dolbear secondary coil, line and receiver is radically unlike anything described or suggested in Bell's '76 patent, and that the Dolbear method involved in its use with the Reis apparatus as a transmitter is radically unlike any method described or suggested in Bell's '76 patent, and is also radically unlike any method of utilizing electricity ever known before Dolbear discovered his method and apparatus.

VIII. That the fact that in both the commercial telephone and the Dolbear telephone the Reis apparatus is used as a transmitter circuit, in connection with a secondary coil which forms part of the line-wire, although, at first sight it may seem to make the Dolbear telephone substantially like the Bell commercial telephone in one important particular, yet it cannot have any weight whatever in view of the radical difference between the secondary coil and line of the Dolbear telephone and the secondary coil and line of the Bell commercial telephone, or the transmitting coil and line of Fig. 7 of Bell's patent; that is to say, Dolbear's secondary coil must be a generator of enormous electro-motive force, or electric tension, pressure or head, while the generator of the Bell produces relatively trifling electro-motive force or tension, pressure or head. An electrical conduit, joining the positive and negative poles, is essential to Bell, and fatal to Dolbear, and Dolbear's line and its connected plate are charged to a very high potential, tension, pressure or head, alternately positive and negative; and there are no currents, properly speaking, in the Dolbear line, but only such flow as is necessary to charge the line and the plate or disc connected with it.

IX. That wholly disregarding Reis, and assuming that Bell is the first in the field, yet the Dolbear method and apparatus are substantially unlike any method or apparatus described or claimed in the Bell patent of '76, for the reason that Dolbear does not utilize electrical undulations substantially the same as those described and claimed in the Bell patent of '76, but utilizes electrical undulations radically unlike any ever known until Dolbear discovered his method and apparatus; and for the reason that there is nothing in either the Dolbear method or apparatus copied from anything described or suggested in the Bell patent of 1876.

In the oral argument Mr. Maynadier further says:

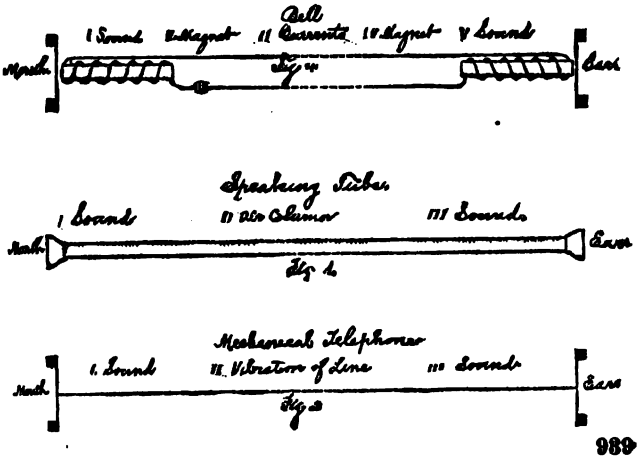
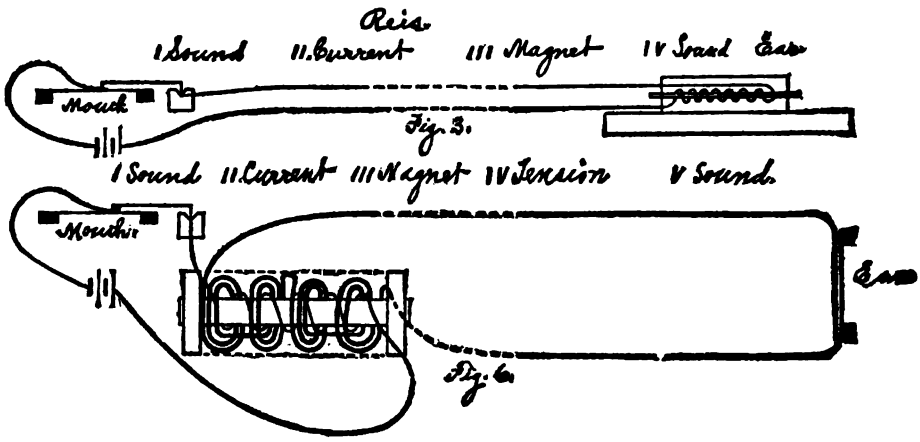
I have prepared diagrams, in order that I may be more readily followed. The first diagram under the word "speaking tube" represents probably the first improved method of transmitting vocal and other sounds to a distance; and the method there consists first, of sound; second, an air column separated from the rest of the air; and third, sound. Those dots in the middle are a draughtsman's device for showing a long tube in a short space.

The second improvement over the natural method, and a very striking invention or discovery, is that shown in the mechanical telephone. There the method is first, sound; second, vibration of line; third, sound. The genius who invented that saw that he could set in vibration a diaphragm in one place (on the left of that in figure 2), and that that diaphragm would take up all the vibrations of the speech-waves.





His device was first, sound; by sound, I mean speech-waves or sound-waves of any sort; first, sound, which sound should, by its vibratory energy, its alternate condensations and rarefactions, set in motion a diaphragm, every condensation moving that diaphragm in one direction, and every rarefaction allowing it to move in the opposite direction, and thereby produce in that diaphragm a copy exactly of the vibrations of the air body, which vibrations were caused by his own vocal organs.

He said: "Now, how shall I make the vibrations of my first diaphragm cause like vibrations in a second diaphragm?" He said: "If I connect the two by a strained cord or wire, then the molecular vibrations of that strained cord or wire must cause the second diaphragm to vibrate just as the first vibrates." And he tried it, and behold it was so.

The essential thing is that the two diaphragms must be connected by a strained cord or wire without break of any sort in it. The main interest of that figure 2 (the mechanical telephone in this case) is that here is an air body which is set in vibration by the vocal organs of the speaker, and yonder, far off, is another air body to be set in motion. The vibrations of the first air body act upon a human contrivance which is so designed, so cunningly adapted for its work, that the vibrations of the first air body are caused to set up like vibrations in a distant air body. There is an invention or discovery—it is immaterial which, so far as I understand those terms—of a method of and apparatus for transmitting vocal and other sounds telegraphically, which is admitted to be very many years prior to any other now known.

The next attempt to transmit vocal or other sounds telegraphically or to transmit speech was made by Philip Reis of Germany; and he devised the apparatus shown in figure 3 of my diagram. He adopted the general plan set forth in figure 2, namely: "I will set in motion by my vocal organs an air body in contact with my vocal organs, and I will endeavor to make those vibrations set up like vibrations in a distant air body." So his plan at base was the same as the plan of the mechanical telephone.

Reis clearly perceived this fact, that every condensation and every rarefaction of the air-waves must be transmitted by a representative on the line, on his line-wire.

The number of vibrations per second means pitch. Degree, amplitude of vibration, means loudness, and the quality so much spoken of in this case is nothing but a series of different degrees of pitch and loudness.

Reis did conceive the brilliant idea of controlling a voltaic current by the energy of air-waves. He was the first man in the world who ever spoke to an electric current, expecting to influence that current. That is a noble, magnificent invention; and when we consider that every telephone that was ever seen by any one has that precise feature in it, am I wrong in saying that Reis is entitled to as high praise certainly as Alexander Graham Bell or any other man who ever made any claim—because there is no telephone known at this day, of any commercial value, which has not that feature copied servilely from Reis.

The transmitter of the Reis apparatus consisted of a chamber in the form of a box, which chamber of course contained air, just as the chamber of the ear contains air. The transmitter is shown in the diagram, on the left. The diagram represents a box which contains air, just as the chamber of the ear contains air. Mr. Reis thought, properly enough, that by speaking he would set in vibration the air within that box, and would thereby produce condensations and rarefactions of the air in that box, just as those same condensations and rarefactions are produced in the ear of the person who hears. On the upper part of the box there was a diaphragm mounted over a hole, so that whenever the air pressure inside of the box varied, the diaphram would either bulge in or bulge out. That diaphragm carried a piece of platinum, and that piece of platinum was connected to one pole of a battery, as is shown in the diagram. The battery is shown on the diagram by two thin lines and two thick lines, which is the conventional or agreed way of showing a battery. Those are the perpendicular lines at the left hand lower side of the diagram. That line leading from the black line is supposed to be a wire which leads around in a curve to the left, and then goes to the right, to the middle of the diaphragm. The diaphragm is the line directly above the word "mouth" between the two square black blocks.

That is a diagram of a diaphragm. The wire leads to the middle of that diaphragm; and on the middle of that diaphragm there is a small piece of platinum. Then the other line leading from the middle of the diaphragm represents a carrier, an electrode carrier, which means a carrier of another piece of platinum, which other piece of platinum is connected to another wire by means of the block in white, directly underneath the word "sound."

That represents a solid block of say wood or metal, with a drop of mercury in a depression in the block; and one leg of that electrode carrier rests in that drop of mercury, and the other end of that leg rests by its own weight upon the platinum carried by the diaphragm. Then, to follow the line from that drop of mercury, it goes to what electricians call "line," —meaning the line-wire—to a coil at the right of the diagram. It goes over to that coil of wire. That coil of wire surrounds the core of metal; and the free end of that coil comes back to the battery, as the diagram illustrates.

The battery has two poles, which are commonly spoken of as the north pole and the south pole; just like a magnet, or the plus and minus ends of the battery. Whenever those two poles are joined by an unbroken wire a current flows from pole to pole. In the case of the Reis, the poles of the battery are joined by that wire when the apparatus is in action, and there is a current flowing from pole to pole of the battery. That current is a constant voltaic current, or battery current. That is a voltaic battery and the current is commonly called a voltaic current, or a battery current. That current is practically a constant current.

Mr. Reis reasoned that every condensation in the cubical box of his apparatus would bulge out of the diaphragm, and every rarefaction would allow the diaphragm to move back. That is when the speaker spoke, the column of air next his vocal organs would be pushed, and allowed to vibrate; and consequently the other end of that column which rests in that cubical box would push upon the diaphragm and relax its pressure, and thereby vibrate the diaphragm, just exactly as the air vibrated in the column.

The Reis diaphragm will follow and copy exactly the vibrations of the air particles. The appellants maintain that Reis intended to produce a variation in the current for every variation in the pressure of the air within the cubical box. They also maintain that anybody who succeeds in doing that will transmit speech electrically, to that extent.

Then the two pieces of platinum are what are called electrodes, which means simply a gate, or way, or door, for the current to pass through.

One piece of platinum is fast to the diaphragm, and the other piece of platinum is fast to that electrode carrier, one end of which is in the drop of mercury.

The electric current flows through the wire and especially flows through those two pieces of platinum, which are in contact before you begin to talk. When you begin to talk the vibration of the diaphragm so affects the contact of those two pieces of platinum, that Reis supposed that the current would be varied as the condensations and rarefactions of the air took place. He intended to transmit a current, for instance, for every condensation, and to break the current for every rarefaction of the air. For every forward motion caused by pressure under the diaphragm he intended to make or break (it is immaterial which) the current; and for every backward motion he intended to make or break (it is immaterial which) the current; and the current was to do the work. If, therefore, there were one thousand motions of the diaphragm up, and one thousand motions of the diaphragm down, per second, he was to have one thousand electrical impulses going over the line-wire, and one thousand cessations of electrical impulses over the line-wire, per second.

It was the first attempt at any method for the transmission of speech telegraphically, by the electric current. Reis made many forms of apparatus, and achieved more or less success in his efforts. What degree of success he achieved it is not important for me now to inquire, because that matter is left to other gentlemen. All that I care to say about Reis is that he showed a method of and an apparatus for transmitting sounds, which method consisted in, first, sound; second, a current,—a varied current; third, a magnet to utilize the varying energy of the current; and fourth, sound reproduced by the varying energy of that magnet.

An apparatus made by Reis, and fully described in many printed publications, and in several different languages, was thoroughly well known among scientific men long before 1874, when Mr. Bell dates his invention I believe, and long before 1876, certainly, when he got his patent.

The Reis apparatus does not differ in any way whatsoever from the present transmitting apparatus in the commercial telephone, save and except only as an ill made sewing machine, for example, differs from a well made sewing machine on the same principle.

Figure 5 of the diagram shows the commercial telephone as now in use. The diagram is a facsimile of the left hand side of the diagram figure 8, which shows the Reis apparatus. There is a short Reis circuit shown in figure 5. Reis used two pieces of platinum; on the left of figure 5, a black mark above the middle of the diaphragm indicates a piece of carbon. Carbon turns out to be far better adapted for that use than platinum.

The transmitting apparatus used by this defendant Dolbear is a facsimile of the Reis apparatus, excepting only that a piece of carbon is substituted for one piece of platinum.

Figure 6 is the Reis-Dolbear apparatus. The transmitting apparatus of the Bell telephone is a servile copy of the Reis apparatus; it is simply an improvement, a mechanical improvement, of the Reis apparatus.

When used in a certain, particular manner, the apparatus as made by Reis, without change of any kind, will transmit speech. If you modulated your voice properly you could transmit words and sentences through the Reis apparatus, just exactly as Reis left it, without change of any sort.

The Bell patent is shown in the diagram, marked figure 4. There is on the left a magnet, and on the right a magnet, each magnet being in a coil of wire, and that coil of wire having its ends joined together so as to make a complete metallic circuit for the battery current which flows from the battery. When a current flows from the battery it flows spirally around those two pieces of iron, commonly called cores, and that makes them magnets. So, there are two magnets, one on the left and the other on the right, and each magnet has a coil of wire surrounding it, and those coils are joined electrically together so as to make one circuit.

One coil is a transmitter, and the other is a receiver coil. But either coil is a transmitter, and either is a receiver, as it may be. Opposite each magnet there is a diaphragm, which diaphragm is made of iron in the diagram. It was known long before Bell's time that if you move a piece of iron towards a magnet, which magnet had a coil of wire around it, you would thereby induce an electrical current in that coil of wire. If you moved it away from that magnet, you would thereby induce a contrary current in that coil of wire.

Bell's method, in his patent of 1876, is: first, sound; second, magnet; third, currents (in the plural) vibrating alternately from left to right and from right to left; fourth, magnet; fifth, sound.

That is the full length and breadth of this claim, and nobody can infringe the Bell patent unless you find in the alleged infringing method: first, sound; converted into, second, magnetic energy; that converted into electric currents; those currents converted again into magnetic energy; and that second magnetic energy converted into sound-waves.

When the Reis-Bell is operated, what happens is that the energy of the sound-waves, acting upon the Reis diaphragm, varies the energy of the left hand magnet, just exactly, in substance, as the energy of the sound-waves acting upon the diaphragm, in figure 4 (Bell), varies the energy of the left hand magnet. That varying energy of that magnet sets up those precise currents of Bell in the line-wire. Those currents traverse the circuit just as in Bell. Those currents influence the right hand magnet just as in Bell; and that right hand magnet causes the second diaphragm to vibrate just as in Bell. So, the Reis-Bell method is: first, sound; and then, second, the Reis current; but that current is used to vary the energy of a magnet merely, which magnet induces these vibrating plus and minus currents which are precise facsimiles of Bell, differing solely in degree. They are stronger and better adapted for the purpose; otherwise they resemble Bell's currents exactly. The interposition of a magnet, or of a half dozen magnets, does not alter the principle. It does not alter the method in any way.

An induction-coil is shown in the diagram in figure 5 and figure 6. The induction-coil is a core of soft iron, with a coil of wire around it; and that coil of wire is connnected to a battery, so that the current will pass through that coil —that primary coil. There is another coil of wire around the first coil, and that secondary coil is the induction-coil, because, whenever the magnetism of the core varies a current is induced in that secondary coil. In practice the secondary coil is larger, a good deal, than the primary coil.

In figure 5, one of the coils goes to line, and is in circuit with the right hand magnet, while the smaller coil goes to battery, so that the current from the battery flows through the electrodes, governed by the diaphragm, through a short circuit, and through the small coil back to the battery again.

All that the electricity does is to vary the magnet in the secondary coil, and as the magnet in the secondary coil varies, currents are induced in that coil by the variation. Professor Wright took a Reis instrument, and prepared it as shown in figure 5, except that he had no magnet on the right hand end of figure 5, but he had what is called a condenser.

Mr. Elisha Gray and Mr. Varley also transmitted the pitch of a tuning fork and other sounds; but they did not attempt apparently, or succeed if they did, in using the energy of the speech-waves to set the apparatus in motion.

The defendant's apparatus I have called the Reis-Dolbear; that is figure 6 of the diagram. It will be seen by the diagram that the energy of the air-waves acts upon the diaphragm which we say is a facsimile of the Reis diaphragm; that the vibrations of the air-wave move that diaphragm just exactly as they do in Reis; that the diaphragm controls the voltaic or battery current just exactly as in Reis; and that variations in that current, caused by the varying pressure of the electrodes one upon the other, vary the magnetic energy of a magnet, just exactly as in the commercial telephone.

The first step in the Bell method is the varying, by force of the air-waves, or of the sound-waves, of the energy of a magnet. Dolbear's first step is much the same. But here the resemblance ends. That is the only likeness, the sole likeness, between the Bell method, as I have described it, and the Dolbear method. That is, that the energy of the air-waves in both may properly and fairly be said to vary the energy of the magnet. Now, how to utilize that varying magnetic energy. Bell utilized it by producing plus and minus currents. Dolbear produces no currents whatever, on the line. He produces simply variations of electric pressure, or in electric tension, or electric condensations and rarefactions.

The Dolbear line is an open circuit of necessity. The Bell line is a closed circuit of necessity. That is a radical difference. The electric condition of the Dolbear line is radically unlike that of Bell; and the Dolbear receiver is radically unlike that of Bell and is not a known substitute for Bell's receiver, but wholly unknown, and not in use for any purpose whatever until Dolbear's discovery that that contrivance would produce speech.

In figure 6 the secondary coil is very much larger than in figure 5. That secondary coil is the generator of the electro-motive force. Electro-motive force means electrical pressure, tension, or head.

To that plus end of the coil a wire is attached; to that minus end of the coil a wire is attached. So far it is exactly like Bell's. But those wires do not join anywhere, do not touch, are not in electrical contact anywhere. They must join, they must touch, they must be in electrical contact in Bell. In Bell they must be joined by a coil. Why? Because the current must flow spirally around the soft-iron core. In order to do Bell's work they must flow from left to right, and again from right to left, rapidly alternating.

Dolbear relies upon electrical attraction pure and simple. That feature of what is called electricity is what Dolbear has utilized, and utilized for the first time in the world for any purpose whatever, excepting only in the laboratory. It is therefore not a known substitute, or any thing like a known substitute for the way in which Bell used electrical currents. This condenser differs from any other condenser ever used for purposes of sound, in that way.

If it be true that the Bell method is, first, sound; second, magnet; third, currents; fourth, magnet; fifth, sound—then it seems to follow, without need of any other or further argument, that the Dolbear method does not infringe.

It is true that in the Dolbear method a voltaic current is made similar in form to sound-waves, by the energy of the air vibrations in the transmitter, but that voltaic current is not utilized to transmit speech, but only to vary the magnetic energy of a magnet; and that varying magnetic energy is utilized in Dolbear in a way radically unlike any way ever known before; and especially unlike anything ever pointed out by Bell.

All that Dolbear uses in his secondary coil and line are variations of electric pressure; and those variations of electric pressure do not produce currents, as in Bell; they are not for the purpose of producing currents, but they are simply variations in electrical pressure. And it is undisputed, practically, in this case that no man before Dolbear ever had any conception whatever of any such electrical variations, or of any way of using them.

Dolbear had just as good a right as Bell, to find out a method of transmitting speech telegraphically by electricity. Dolbear has made an independent invention and discovery radically unlike anything shown to him by Bell, radically different from anything suggested or hinted at in Bell, and like Bell only in the ultimate result.

The electric pressure in the Bell line is meant to do nothing but make a current.

A conduit connecting the two ends of the generator is the very essence of Bell; but there is no conduit, or anything resembling a conduit in Dolbear.

In the speaking tube the mouth vibrates one end of the air column, and the ear is at the other end of the air column. There is no motion of the air from the mouth to the ear, but only a vibration of the entire column. Therefore there is a pressure, and a less pressure, and a greater pressure, and a constantly varying pressure, in the chamber of the ear. And absolutely all that speech consists of are those vibrations of pressure upon the drum of the ear.

The commercial value of Bell's invention was trifling, because of the weakness of the currents. In the course of time other inventors added to that the Reis apparatus; and ninety-seven per cent of all the modern telephones of today, now in use, are in fact the Reis-Bell telephones and are not the Bell telephones. That is figure 5. That is to say, the transmitting portion of every commercial telephone has been a servile copy of the Reis apparatus, and the rest of it a copy of the Bell apparatus.

The Dolbear telephone is not the Reis-Bell, but is the Reis-Dolbear.

Messrs. Grosvenor P. Lowrey, Wheeler H. Peckham and H. D. Donnelly, for the Molecular Company;

"Vocal sounds" and "articulate speech" were not convertible terms in the telegraphic art at the date of Bell's patents.

The "vocal sound" of multiple telegraphy was understood to be a mere musical note, sounded at an agreed pitch, and had no reference to articulate sounds.

Vocal sound is the utterance of a sound of voice, and is common to all animals who possess the organ of voice.

Articulate speech is the series of sounds and notes uttered in arbitrary sequence to express ideas.

The art of reproducing, in any manner, vocal or other sounds and articulate speech is one art.

When the reproduction of either class of sounds employs the electric current, the natural modus operandi is that changes in the strength of the current occur, which in degree and rapidity of succession correspond substantially to the air vibrations of the specific sound or sounds being transmitted. These changes are now commonly called undulations.

There are only two ways or "methods," so far as is yet known, for producing the changes of current needed in the practice of the art of reproducing or—as it is erroneously called—transmitting sounds telegraphically, viz:

1. By varying the initial or electro-motive force of a current.

2. By varying the resistance to the flow of a current, without varying its initial or electromotive force.

These two ways of producing the needed changes constitute two distinct and different methods of practicing the art of "transmitting vocal or other sounds" (and also articulate speech) "telegraphically," by causing electrical undulations similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the sounds.

The first method is that figured in Mr. Bell's patent by a drawing. By this method the efficient current—that is, the particular current which affects the receiver—is generated in the transmitter by magnetic action; and is efficient by reason of variations in its initial force, called electro-motive force.

This is called the magneto method.

When, instead of a permanent magnet, a battery is employed to magnetise the magnet it is called a magneto-electric method. The second method is that employed by the defendants, and by the complainants.

By this method a current of constant electromotive force is generated in a chemical battery, and is made effective for work in telephony by the introduction of a varying degree of resistance to its flow through the circuit; which variation of resistance may meet it anywhere between the battery and the receiver.

This is the variable resistance method.

1. The variable resistance method requires, like the magneto-electric method, but one circuit, although two circuits, called primary and secondary, are used in commercial business where places, more than say one-half mile from each other, are to be connected. The explanation now to be given will, for greater simplicity, describe the transmitter as an element in one single circuit consisting of battery, transmitter, receiver and the necessary connecting wires.

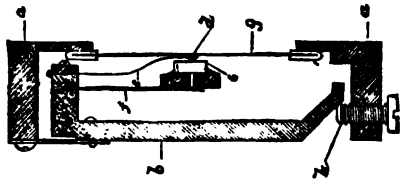
The Blake transmitter, being the one chiefly used by the defendants, and therefore more commonly known than any other, will be adopted as the example by which to illustrate the mechanism and method of operation of the class of transmitters to which it belongs, and which are popularly called microphones.



The function performed by this transmitter is to interpose a resistance to the flow of current from the battery through the circuit above described, which may be made to vary. This it does by means of a piece of carbon c and a piece of platinum d which are held in normal contact by two springs f and e, and from one to the other of which, through the platinum and carbon contact, the current must pass. The pressure of the springs is subject to be disturbed by many causes,—even by the jar of a sound made in the neighborhood; and the resistance between the contact-points, c, d, is varied as this pressure is varied.

The Blake transmitter consists essentially: (1) of a flat piece of thin board aa with a small round hole in the middle; (2) a ring of cast iron screwed to one side of the board, carrying a cross bar or spring lever b, to which near its upper end is fastened a square block of non-conducting material; (3) a thin light spring e one end of which is inserted into the block of non-conducting material, and the other end of which hangs down opposite to the hole in the centre of the board, and carries on each of its faces a small point of platinum d; (4) another but stiffer spring f, the upper end of which is in like manner inserted into the block of non-conducting material, carrying upon its lower end—which hangs parallel to the first mentioned spring,— a piece of carbon c on the face next to the other spring; (5) a piece of thin metal called a diaphragm g which is fastened at its edges to the iron ring—though insulated from it—so as to close the small hole in the board on the side next the springs. The cross bar or spring lever is subject to adjustment by a screw h which bears against its lower end so that that end may be pressed in towards the stiff spring which is parallel to and next it. The tension of the two springs above described is such that they press lightly against each other,—bring the piece of carbon c on the stiff spring into contact with the platinum point d on one face of the lighter spring,—and also press the platinum point on its other face against the diaphragm. A battery is connected by a wire to the upper part of the stiff spring; another wire is connected to the upper part of the light spring, and is led thence to the required distance where it is connected to a telephone receiver (assuming that no secondary circuit is used), and is carried thence to the ground or back to the battery, thus making a complete circuit over which an electric current may flow. The course of the current is: (1) from the battery to to the stiff spring r; (2) down that spring to its lower end; (3) through the carbon c block of that spring, to the platinum point d of the other spring; (4) through that platinum point to the light spring e, and (5) up that spring to the place where the other wire is attached; (6) thence through that wire—called the line, or line-wire—to the receiver; (7) and through the receiver to the earth or by another wire back to the battery. The contact of the platinum points with the diaphragm on one side and the carbon point on the other is such that even the slightest jar will cause the platinum and carbon to be pressed more closely together, or driven measurably apart. A strong jar (such as results from too loud speech in front of the diaphragm for instance) may, when they are properly adjusted for transmission of sound, cause them to be for a very brief period, say for the $\frac{1}{100}$ part of a second, and for a brief space say for the $\frac{1}{1000}$ to $\frac{1}{10000}$ of an inch, to be separated. Such a separation, being regarded prejudicial to the transmission of speech, is sought to be guarded against by an adjustment of the screw and cross-bar; and also by an avoidance of too loud speaking.

The apparatus being set up, a current is permitted to flow from the battery through the circuit. This it does by reason of what may be considered as a force behind it, resulting from the interaction of the elements of the battery. This is called electro-motive force. It is not a force of the current, but of its generating source; something which compels the production—at places distant from the battery, but connected with it by a conductor—of phenomena which are attributed to a force originating in the battery. In ignorance of what does actually occur, the supposed transference has been likened to the flow of water, and, for want of any better term, the electrification of the conductor has been called a current. The only thing known is, that when the elements of the battery are permitted to act, certain phenomena occur throughout the entire circuit—however long it may be—at almost the same instant; so that, if the battery be in New York, the phenomena of electrification can be made to appear in San Francisco in about three tenths of a second.

This flow meets a resistance in the circuit which can be definitely measured and stated; and which can be increased or decreased in various ways. One way is to increase or decrease the cross-section of the conductor at some point, thus narrowing the path for the current; as if a flexible tube, through which water is flowing, should be compressed by the hand. If now we suppose the diaphragm of a telephone transmitter to be vibrated by speaking before it, it will press inwards, thus driving the light spring back and pressing the platinum more against the carbon. This pressure brings many molecules—perhaps many millions—into actual contact, which were not in contact before. This increase of contact enlarges the cross-section of the conductor at that point; widens the path of the current, and the resistance to its flow is proportionally diminished. When the diaphragm reacts it relieves this pressure; there is a diminution of contact, the cross-section is diminished; the path is again narrowed and the resistance increased. If this variable contact is made correspondingly to the rarefaction and condensation of air constituting sound-waves, the current is said to be "moulded" into the form of the sound-waves; and, by help of other arrangements in the receiver, speech is reproduced.

This way of reproducing sounds is called the variable resistance method, and a transmitter thus operating is called a variable resistance, or variable contact, transmitter.

Such a transmitter is incapable of acting by the magneto method; as a magneto transmitter is incapable of acting by this method.

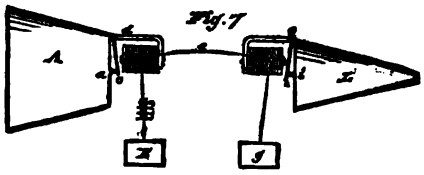
The changes in current strength being called undulations, the current in which they occur is called an undulatory current.

The essential characteristics which distinguish this method are, that the constant is a voltaic current originating in a battery, disturbed by variation of resistance,—thus creating an undulatory current of electricity,—and that the source of efficiency is the battery.

Bell's Magneto-Telephone and its Methods.

The instrument figured and in part described by Mr. Bell in his patent of 1876, No. 174,465, is shown in the following drawing:

Fig. 7



It will be seen that a battery is represented, which is the source of voltaic electricity flowing freely from the battery through a wire which leads to the transmitting apparatus, which it enters by winding about a short piece of soft irón b, the convoluted parts being insulated from each other and from the iron core by a silk covering. The wire, e, having been sufficiently wound around the soft-iron core is led away to the distant receiver, where it is wound about a similar soft-iron core f, and thence to the earth—thus completing the circuit with the battery. This core and single coil constitute, when a current is flowing, an electro-magnet, which is not, however, to be confounded with an induction-coil. There is but one circuit; and that extends from battery to receiver—however great the distance. In its course the current meets normally no changeable resistance.

The figure shows a cone, A, one end of which is covered by a membrane a, to the centre of which, on the side next the coil, is attached a metal armature c, which is an inductive body when itself magnetic, or when the core of the adjacent coil is magnetic. At the other and receiving end of the line is seen a similar arrangement of armature, membrane and cone, h, i, L, except that the end of the receiving cone is made smaller for convenience in hearing. If, now, the battery current begins to flow, it passes through the wire wound around the soft-iron core b, and over the line e, on, to the second series of convolutions around the second soft-iron core f, and thence to the earth. In obedience to well-known laws of electro-magnetism, in passing around them it causes each of the soft-iron cores to become magnetic, and so remain, so long as the current is flowing. If now a sound or concussion happens in front of the membrane a in the transmitter, it will produce upon the membrane and its armature c, an inward motion toward the magnet b, to be followed by an outward motion away from it. These motions of the inductive armature, by a well-known law of what is called magnetic induction, produce new and artificial currents in the coil of the electro-magnet, which add themselves to the current there flowing, causing it to be of a lesser or greater strength according to the movement of the armature to and from the magnet, and to the violence of such movement. Thus, if the normally constant strength of the current from the battery be taken at a unit of 100, one movement of the armature will set up an extra current, which being added, or as the technical phrase is, superposed, upon the constant battery current, will cause it to be 99; and again upon the opposite movement of the armature will increase it through various degrees to 101.

The increase and reduction, according to these well-known laws, will be in exact proportion to the violence and extent of the armature movement. These changes in the intensity of the battery current are also called undulations; and doubtless for the same reason, viz; that the customary graphical representation of them will show a wavy line, as will also any graphic chart of rise and fall in the price of wheat. The constant battery current as will be perceived is not the efficient cause of work, and has theoretically no part in that work. Its sole function is to keep the soft-iron core magnetic. This is proved by withdrawing the battery altogether and substituting permanent steel magnets in place of the soft-iron electro-magnets, when no difference will be found; from which it is apparent that whereas, in the variable resistance method the battery is essential and the induction-coil (used only where a secondary circuit is desired) non-essential, in the magneto method the battery is non-essential and a coil is essential,—for transmission.

In Bell's invention, the novelty consisted in the use of the energy of air-waves to mechanically actuate a dynamo machine, and to cause it, not to mould,—as is sometimes claimed—but to create the electrical currents which are to do the work.

The essential characteristic which distinguishes this method is: A magnetic field disturbed by the shifting presence of an inducing body; which thereby creates electrical undulations in the wire. The efficient, is the magnetic force; its source is the magnetic field; and the battery current is not in any sense the cause of work.

In the variable resistance method, the operative current has its source in a battery, and flows thence with a constant energy and direction; and the needed changes in it are caused by a variation of the resistance to its flow.

This is known in the arts as the "loose contact" "variable contact" or "variable resistance" method. In every apparatus ever devised to work by this method—beginning with that of Reis in 1861—the necessity to keep the contact loose introduces a possibility that it will be broken by too great loudness in the tones which are sought to be transmitted. In fact, the Blake transmitter frequently breaks contact in this way, and for this cause. The circuit of which a loose contact of electrodes is a part can never be spoken of as a "closed circuit" (within the sense of this patent, which shows only closed circuits, incapable of being ever open), any more than any Morse circuit, which like the former may sometimes be open and sometimes closed.

In the magneto method the battery current is not effective for reproducing speech, its sole function being, as above stated, to render the soft-iron core magnetic. If for that a steel core, permanently magnetic, be substituted, the battery may be abandoned altogether.

In this, the magneto method, the circuit was properly designated by Mr. Bell in his patent as a "closed circuit"—because there is no possibility of opening it.

The terms "continuous current" and "closed circuit," when used in the patent, or in any remark with reference to Mr. Bell's claims, are to be construed in harmony with, and in subordination to, his drawings and delineations, i. e., as being, by reasons of the mechanical structure and connections shown, incapable of being other than "closed," or "continuous."

No circuit which is capable of being either open or closed, according as accident or design may determine, is the "closed circuit" of the patent; and no current flowing in a circuit where it may be continuous or discontinuous, as accident or design may determine, is the "continuous current" of the patent.

These two ways of producing current changes by the energy of sound-waves are two different methods in the arts and in the law.

A patent for the last is not infringed by the practice of the first method.

The judgment of the circuit sustains the allegations of infringement under the fifth claim, and no other claims of the patent of 1876; and the opinion of the court shows that it is the so-called "method" portion of the fifth claim which is decmed to have been infringed.

The apparatus portion could not be considered infringed, since the two (transmitter) machines are essentially different, neither being capable of use in the place of the other. The one is adapted to vary the forces of a current flowing through it by interposing opposition to its flow. The other is adapted to the introduction in the current flowing, not through it, but in its neighborhood.

As to the parts of Bell's device, the limits of novelty will be seen when we know that Reis used the mouthpiece membrane (Reis-Bourseul Pub. p. 83); Pickering (Overland Rec. p. 208), and Bourseul, the metallic diaphragm; Schellen, the permanent magnet with the coil on the end encircling an electro-magnet exactly as figured in the Bell Patent of 1877 (Mol. Rec. p. 748); Reis-Legat, the electro-magnet (Reis-Bourseul Pub. p. 29); and Wright, the induction-coil (Ferguson, Electricity, p. 258).

Bell's patented methods are, first, a method for producing electrical undulations in a closed magneto circuit, as set forth in his Claim 3.

The second is a method for producing electrical undulations in variable resistance circuits, as set forth in his Claim 4.

The third is for transmitting sounds telegraphically, as set forth in his Claim 5.

The third and fifth claims are illustrated by an apparatus, figure 7, which, long after the date of the patent, is said to have proved operative, though it has never been in use.

This is an apparatus for transmitting sounds by the method of causing undulations in the magneto method.

No apparatus for transmitting, etc., by causing undulations in the variable resistance method is shown, or even hinted at in the patent.

A way of creating undulations in a voltaic current, through a circuit capable of being open or closed, is stated.

But how—that is, by what method or apparatus—these undulations can be put into a form similar to any sound, or can be used in vocal or other sound transmission, we are not told.

Further invention was required for this. Such invention had been previously made by Elisha Gray, and a caveat therefor filed in the Patent Office previous to the granting of Mr. Bell's patent.

If the device was Bell's invention, it was either made before the granting of the patent, and was therefore abandoned, by not being described; or was made after, and therefore cannot sustain a previous broad claim for a process.

Figure 7 is incapable of application as an alternate or substitute for the liquid, or any other variable resistance transmitter. Figure 7, or its equivalents, cannot therefore be relied upon to satisfy the requirement of the law, that a patent for a process must contain a description of some apparatus by which the process can be applied with beneficial result.

Tilghman v. Proctor, 102 U. S. 729 (26: 288).

The contention of the complainants begins with a confounding of patented methods, and results in monopolizing a law of nature.

Sound, considered in the physical sense, is a particular vibratory motion in ordinary matter.

When sound comes to be appreciated physiologically, the ear recognizes in it a variety of things.

First, it recognizes pitch; the sounds may be high or low. Second, the sounds may be loud or soft. Third, they may be of an infinite variety. These differences arise from differences in (1) the extent, (2) the number, (3) the character of vibrations made by the air particle in obedience to the sound-producing cause; that is, whether they be of pendular or irregular form.

The pitch of the sound will depend solely upon the number of vibrations which the air particle makes to and fro in a given time.

The loudness or intensity of the sound will be determined by the extent (called amplitude) of the vibration.

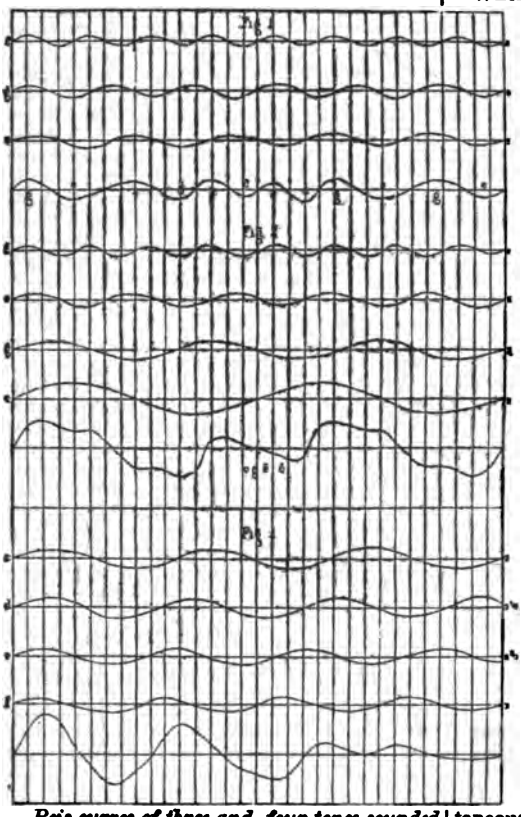
Quality, or timbre, is the third effect by which the ear perceives the difference between different sounding bodies. This sensation is hypothetically imputed by physicists to the manner in which the compounded vibrations have been performed.



Reis curves of three and four tones sounded simultaneously, and the combination or resultant curve in each case.

Helmholtz, Sensations of Tone, second English edition, by Alex. J. Ellis, London, 1885, p. 19, says:

"On inquiring to what external physical difference in the waves of sound the different qualities of tone correspond, we must remember that the amplitude of the vibration determines the force or loudness, and the period of vibration, the pitch. Quality of tone can, therefore, depend upon neither of these.

The only possible hypothesis, therefore, is that the quality of tone should depend upon the manner in which the motion is performed within the period of each single vibration."

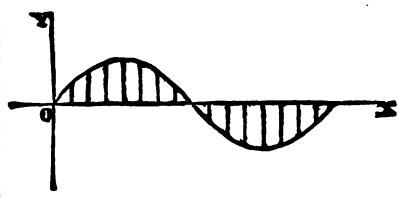
Upon this hypothesis rests, therefore, the assumption at present universally made and accepted in the scientific world for purposes of scientific reasoning, that the quality or timbre of sound, or that which enables distinction between different sound-producing causes to be recognized by the ear, arises from, is dependent upon, and truly represents, certain assumed or postulated eccentricities of conduct by the air particle while engaged in performing a certain number of journeys, of a certain length, within a certain time. Upon this Mr. Bell forms a similar hypothesis as to electrical action, and draws a conclusion that the electrical current undulates. And this conclusion—built up, hypothesis upon hypothesis—he has patented.

When more than one simultaneous tone or sound acts upon an air particle it produces a compromise in the vibration. This is called a resultant vibration, and is the algebraical equivalent of all the others. Mathematicians represent it as well as the movement of the vibrations which compose it, by curves.

Quality is that peculiarity in sound which allows us to distinguish between sounds of the same pitch and the same intensity. Thus the sound produced by the flute and clarionet are at once distinguishable.

A simple sound is one which generates an air particle motion of strictly pendular vibration.

The following is a graphical representation of the vibration due to a simple sound:



Whenever a sound is composed of more than one tone it begins to have quality. The expression of that quality is in the form.

Compound Tones.

When several fundamental tones with their related harmonics are simultaneously sounded, we have what is called a "chord" in music. The increased complexity resulting from such simultaneously sounding tones makes the quality of the compound sound more marked than the quality of any simple fundamental tone.

The following plate of curves known as Mayer's Harmonic Curves represent at a b the separate curves of six simple sound-waves, being the sound-waves of a fundamental and its overtones. The motion which an air particle will actually take up under these differing influences is represented by what is called the "resultant curve," shown in the same plate at c d.

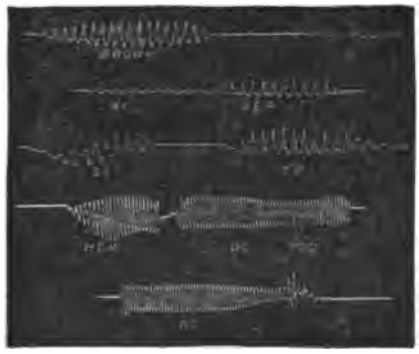
The most complex and variable of all sounds is that of articulate speech. Articulate speech is a combination of vowels and consonants following each other in a certain order or system prescribed by the law of language.

Speech consists in the first place of the emission of sounds having different characters, peculiar timbre, to wit, vowels. The second element of human speech consists of consonants, which are not persistent tones, but modes of beginning or finishing the vowel tones by a sort of explosion; that is, by a movement of the air comprising at the most a very small number of vibrations, of different form from those of the vowels which they modify. When a consonant begins a word, such explosion precedes the musical sound of the vowel and ceases as soon as the vowel sound has taken place, as in ba, be, bi, etc.; or, it terminates the vowel sound by a final motion of the lips as in ab, at, ar, etc. The consonants in no way depend upon or are affected by the pitch of the vowel sound which they introduce and terminate.

The method by which each kind of sound will be transmitted telegraphically, will be "causing electrical" variations, oscillations or "undulations, similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the sounds."

The curves due to certain articulate sound vibrations are shown by the well known "Brown-University Curve" of Professor Blake.



Any variable resistance instrument, in transmitting telegraphically a simple sound composed of a fundamental and its overtones,—or, simultaneous musical tones with their respective overtones,—will necessarily operate by the same process or method as the same or another instrument, when transmitting telegraphically the higher complexities of human speech. This method will necessarily be that which has been patented by Mr. Bell under the terms "by causing electrical undulations similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the sounds,"—whether the hypothesis expressed and patented in those terms be correct or not. Between these different uses and the operations required to accomplish each, will be found no new law, and no new art, but only degrees of mechanical adaptation or development in apparatus.

Reis and Bourseul possessed knowledge that the transmission or reproduction of any sound, simple or compound, in or through any of the media to which nature has given capacity to transmit sound vibrations, must be by means of vibrations similar in amplitude, rate and form to the vibrations immediately accompanying the sound; and this, too, whether the vibrations be to-and-fro motions of matter, or plus (+) and minus (—) changes in the strength of an electric current; and whether the energy of the air-waves themselves is the actuating cause (thus in a sense propagating itself), or is imitated by some other mechanical action.

The knowledge of this law is claimed to have been given to the world by Mr. Bell; and that erroneous idea is the sole foundation for the broad patent claim under which the rest of the world has heretofore been excluded from practicing an art, all the principles and conditions of which were known and published to the world before the year 1864, and the complete commercial realization of which awaited only a good mechanic to make a suitable apparatus, and a Boston syndicate to give it a favorable introduction to the world.

In 1854–1864, the state of knowledge in acoustics, electricity and magnetism included certain fundamental laws.

In Acoustics.

1. That sounds are propagated by vibrations of matter.

2. That the loudness of any sound is determined by the amplitude of the vibration, or the distance through which the air particle moves to and fro.

3. That the pitch of a sound is determined by the number of times in which an air particle will traverse this amplitude in a given time.

4. That simple sounds give simple periodic and regular vibrations.

5. That all sounds are compound whose vibrations are the result of simultaneous action of several simple tones, whether resulting from one or from a number of sounding bodies.

6. That "quality" pertains to and is predicable of all compound sounds,—of which articulate speech is one class; and that the air particle, in obeying the impulses of the compound-sound-producing causes, no longer makes the motion due to any one of them, but another motion, which is a compromise upon and the algebraic sum of all their varying and perhaps conflicting impulses.

7. That quality is expressed and represented by something in the manner in which the vibration is made, different from the amplitude and rate, but included within the amplitude.

8. That air vibrations can be taken up and reproduced by a plate or diaphragm.

In Electricity and Magnetism.

As will appear by the references to the writings of Bourseul and Reis, it was also known before 1864, and substantially published to the world:

9. That plate or membrane vibrations, derived from air vibrations, can be made to produce in a conductor electrical changes corresponding to the air vibrations.

10. That by the use of an electro-magnet and a second plate, the electrical vibration can produce another air vibration in another place corresponding to that which accompanied the original sound; or, in other words, that vocal and other sounds can be transmitted "telegraphically, by causing electrical undulations similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the sounds." (Bell's 5th claim.)

11. That apparatus capable to perform this work was devised, publicly used, and descriptions thereof, sufficient in law to establish an anticipation, were made prior to the year 1874, when Bell claims to have conceived the idea of his magneto telephone.

With these observations upon the state of knowledge and the arts before 1861, we may next give attention to,

First, conception of the art of transmitting speech by electricity.

The first published conception of any plan by which speech might be transmitted over an electric conductor and reproduced occurs in "L'Illustration Journal Universel," Paris, 1854, in a communication by Charles Bourseul, in which he says:

"I have asked myself, for example, if the spoken word itself could not be transmitted by electricity; in a word, if what was spoken in Vienna may not be heard in Paris? The thing is practicable in this way:

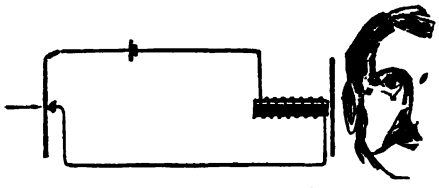
"We know that sounds are made by vibrations, and are made sensible to the ear by the same vibrations, which are reproduced by the intervening medium." * * *

"Syllables can only reproduce upon the sense of hearing the vibrations of the intervening medium. Reproduce precisely these vibrations, and you will reproduce precisely these syllables. * * * I have made some experiments in this direction. They are delicate and demand time and patience; but the approximations obtained promise a favorable result."

In this paper, unpreceded by publication in any scientific or other work, or by any discovery or suggestion, Charles Bourseul suggested not only an apparatus applicable for the conveyance of sounds, but a principle of operation which constitutes a necessary condition of the telegraphic transmission of speech.

Both he and, afterwards, Bell had in view the reproduction, by means of the electric current, of the vibrations which cause the sensation of sound.

The following is an ideal suggestion of Bourseul's plan, without working parts:



Bourseul had expressly in view the reproduction of such specific sounds as constituted articulate speech. He declared that spoken syllables could have their due and desired effect, only when the vibrations of the entire intervening media were substantially like the vibrations accompanying the spoken syllable.

The subject under discussion was the doing this with an electric current and wire. That a transmutation of mechanical into electrical forms of action and back again would happen, was, therefore, a fundamental condition of every argument and statement.

In other words, it was recognized and announced as a law, that the syllables could not produce their effect unless their vibrations were reproduced throughout all the intervening media, including, of course, the electrical conductor and current.

The telephone of today could not be better described than, in the terms of Bourseul, as an instrument by means of which spoken syllables can reproduce, through correspondent vibrations of various intervening media, a distant effect upon the sense of hearing, equivalent to themselves.

It is of no practical or legal consequence that Reis was mistaken in his theory of the operation of his apparatus. It is sufficient that he gave such description thereof as would enable one skilled in the art to accomplish the result pointed out—that of transmitting speech.

Treadwell v. Parrott, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 124; Hamilton v. Ives, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 244, 253; S. C. 92 U. S. 426 (23:494).

In 1861 Reis says: "With the above principles as a foundation, I have succeeded in constructing an apparatus with which I am enabled to reproduce the sounds of various instruments, and even to a certain degree the human voice."

Reis and Bourseul Publications, p. 15.

Reis's telephone was sufficiently operative, according to the statement in the Legat and Reis papers, and the proofs in the case, to have sustained a patent, and to anticipate a subsequent invention.

Pickering v. McCullough, 104 U. S. 319 (26: 752); Woodman v. Stimpson, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 98.

If Reis and Legat, with Bourseul, had in 1864 applied for a United States patent with broad claims for the art of transmitting vocal and other sounds telegraphically by electricity, in the manner and with the apparatus shown in the Reis-Legat paper, can it be doubted that they would have obtained it? Or that Bell, coming after them, would have obtained more than a patent limited to his magneto apparatus and method?

Had they taken out such a broad patent for the discovery of the "art" of "transmitting," etc., "vocal and other sounds," can it be supposed that any errors of opinion as to the automatic or natural function of the machine would have impaired the validity of the patent?

Saint Louis Stamping Co. v. Quinby, 4 Ban. & Ard. 192.

The microphone consists, physically, of two electrodes placed normally in contact, with a slight pressure, and forming part of a circuit supplied with a current from a battery. The principle of the microphone is the principle of a loose joint.

The following outline of the operative parts of the principal variable resistance transmitters may be referred to:

The modern receiver, by its perfection, likewise reveals the perfection of the ancient Reis transmitter. That transmitter crossed with a good receiver always produces speech.

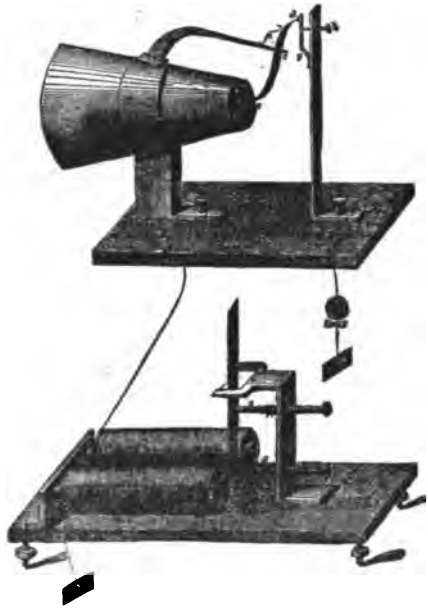
Reis-Legat Transmitter.

Blake Transmitter.

The microphone transmitter originated in two places: in Germany at the hands of Reis, and in England at the hands of Professor Hughes.

We have here pictures of the Reis-Legat instruments.



1. The tone transmitter consists of a conical tube about fifteen centimetres in length, having a front opening of about ten centimetres and a rear opening of about four centimetres.

2. The narrow end of the conical tube is covered with a collodion membrane.

3. A curved lever c d is suspended in such a way that one end of the lever rests on the collodion membrane and the other rests against the spring g, and is to be "kept in electrical connection" with the metallic conductor.

4. The proper lengths of the respective arms of the lever c e and e d are not given, but it is said that they are to be regulated by the laws of the lever.

5. The object to be attained is named. It is "in order that the least motion at c" (the membrane) "may operate with greatest effect at d" (contact-point).

6. "It is also desirable that the lever itself be made as light as possible that it may follow the movements of the membrane." "Any inaccuracy in the operation of the lever c d in this respect will produce false tones at the receiving station."

7. When in a state of rest the contact at d g is closed, and a delicate spring n maintains the lever in this position. With slight changes in construction the Reis-Legat instruments will successfully transmit speech.

The proofs concerning the Reis instruments may be summed up as follows:

1. Any instrument capable to transmit tones having quality is theoretically capable to transmit articulate speech

2. The Reis instruments are capable to transmit tones having quality; to wit, musical tones of the voice, tones of various musical instruments, and chords consisting of two or more simultaneously sounded notes.

3. The Reis instruments were devised for the transmission of articulate speech.

4. The Reis instruments did transmit words and sentences in the hands of Reis and of others in his time.

5. The Reis instruments will now, using his transmitter and receiver together, "talk," though with uncertainty.

6. The Reis transmitter will transmit clearly and well when united to a good receiver, such as the McDonough, or Bell magneto receiver.

7. The Reis apparatus entire will "talk" well, when modified in mechanical construction, without the addition of any element not already there.

8. Whenever and wherever the Reis instrument has talked, or can be made to talk, it avails of a natural method being the same which Mr. Bell has, under a name and description, the fitness of which appears as yet incapable of verification, claimed and patented.

Upon this state of facts, concerning the art of transmitting speech, before 1874, it becomes material to inquire, When is an art discovered?

To conceive that a new thing can be done; to indicate in a correct though general way the laws of nature which must be availed of; to create suitable apparatus—although suitable only in a limited degree; to use the apparatus, and succeed in the avowed purpose—though only in a limited degree; to publish the result with sufficient specification to reveal the whole purpose, and put the world fairly upon further inquiry,—appears to take the doing of that special thing out of the category of the undiscovered arts.

From that stage, in the development of that art, it would seem that invention and discovery must be deemed limited (by the state of the art) to the improvement and perfecting of old or the invention of new modes and mechanism.

This difference between the discovery of an art and the perfected practice thereof is what the court is called on in this case to clearly distinguish.

Bourseul had in 1854, by pure force of reason, predicated the capacity of electricity to transmit speech; had formulated a general expression of the law of such transmission, which is now found to include and be harmonious with all the particulars of our present state of knowledge; and had suggested an apparatus.

Reis had in 1861 pursued the law of acoustical action and effects to a fuller extent; had made an electrical machine; had challenged and solicited nature to act within the electrical and hidden part of the operation (according to her own laws whatever they might be); had received a favorable, though grudging and capricious response; and had published to the world that: "With the above principles as a foundation, I have succeeded in constructing an apparatus with which I am enabled to reproduce the tones of various instruments, and even to a certain extent the human voice."

From this time it was not open to Mr. Bell to discover speech transmission as a new art.

The fifth claim is a claim for the electrical transmission of speech under the form of a description of how nature does it.

This may be likened to a claim for raising wheat by the germination of the seed of the plant, leaving mankind free to produce wheat by all other methods.

In fact, what Mr. Bell has discovered is, not that electrical undulations can, but that they do, transmit sounds by conforming themselves to the characteristics of the energy which creates the sound, and that they will do this in no other way. This is a scientific fact.

Thus considered he has been able to monopolize a natural force and patent a scientific fact.

Considering that the process rests upon the existence of electrical undulations which are similar in form, etc., it is now and without argument, at this place, submitted that no one of the famous process cases has decided anything which will justify a patent upon a process or condition, the existence of which is incapable of proof.

That speech cannot be transmitted when the current is not continuous is not proved.

That undulations in continuous electric currents occur when speech is transmitted is also not proved.

Proof thus qualified and doubted is not adequate to support a judicial judgment (affecting important property rights), that the electric current used in a microphonic telephone transmitter is either continuous or undulatory.

Previous to 1867 Doctor Horace S. Wright, of Edinburgh, Scotland, used an induction-coil as an adjunct to a sound-transmitting apparatus in connection with a Reis transmitter.

A Wright condenser will transform electrical variations, or undulations, similar in form to the sound-waves, into corresponding sonorous vibrations, and thereby produce sounds and articulate speech.

Dr. Van der Weyde at an early date constructed a number of instruments, which he exhibited at a meeting of the Polytechnic Club of the American Institute, in Cooper Union January 7, 1869. On that occasion the experiments were confined to the reproduction of the human voice.

Thus we have the modern microphone in actual use in this country, according to the modern method, long prior to the Bell patent and to any pretense of Bell's invention or conception.

On the 8th day of April, 1870, British Letters Patent were granted to Varley. The Varley condenser, constructed as in Mr. Varley's patent, is capable of reproducing speech.

His undulations are just what Bell's are, since they will transmit speech.

There is no substantial difference between an undulatory current such as produced by the apparatus of Mr. Varley, and an undulatory current created or generated by an apparatus constructed in accordance with figure 7 of said Bell patent.

The art of creating such undulations is one generic art; which in its specific branches demands no new principle, but only greater mechanical adaptation.

The instruments constructed by Mr. James W. McDonough and used by him in the year 1875, for the transmission and reproduction of articulate speech, contained all the vital and essential elements of the telephonic apparatus now in commercial use.

Prior to Bell, McDonough constructed an apparatus capable of transmitting and reproducing articulate speech, and set forth in his application for letters patent, that that was the object of his invention.

In the winter of 1866 and 1867, Elisha Gray constructed an instrument for transmitting tones. Apparatus shown and described in British Letters Patent No. 2646, dated July 29, 1874.

The apparatus shown in figure 4 of Gray's British Patent contains a common or universal receiver capable of responding to all kinds of tones, and consequently of reproducing articulate speech. This receiver is essentially a Magneto Telephone.

Gray's American patents 166,095 and 166,096, dated July 27, 1875, described a method of producing electrical vibrations in a closed circuit and reproducing them upon a common or universal receiver.

Professor Geo. F. Barker, an eminent physicist, says: "Gray, therefore, seems to have been the first to formulate distinctly the conditions necessary to transmit the form of the sound-wave electrically through a wire, and to devise a practical manner of accomplishing it."

Gray's invention anticipated Bell's first patent. Bell's patent is for a multiple telegraph or for a singing telegraph or telephone for multiple telegraph.

If, however, it can be claimed that the first patent is a patent for anything beyond the multiple telegraph, we submit that it cannot be construed as a patent for anything but a magneto-electric telephone, and that the "method" of the fifth claim is the method of a magneto-electric telephone.

If the claim is given the broad construction asked for it by the complainant, it would be void, as a patent for a theory.

There is another aspect of this patent, pursuant to which we submit it must be held void as a patent for the new art or process of transmitting speech. That art or process is not described in the patent.

In Wakeman v. Corcoran, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 65, the familiar rule of law is stated that "the specification of a patent is bad if a skilled mechanic would not, without performing a series of experiments, be able to construct the machine from the description." And on page 72, Justice

Fry says: "The patentee must state not merely the problem which is to be solved, but the mode of solving it."

Tyler v. Boston, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 327 (19:98); Wood v. Underhill, 46 U. S. 5 How. 1 (12:23).

In the case of Downton v. Yaeger Milling Co. 1 McCrary, 30, 81, affd. 108 U. S. 466 (27:789), the court says:

"On the other hand, irrespective of the question of estoppel, if the patent is for a process to be effected without any known means of accomplishing the result, but requiring inventive faculty, whereby rolls to accomplish the purposes and their modes of operation were to be determined by new inventions or discoveries, then the patent does not furnish to any one, as then skilled in the art, means whereby the beneficial end could be accomplished. No one in the then existing state of the art could, by the use of any rolls known, or by any modes of operating the same, have effected the designed end; consequently, to uphold this patent for a process, which would have been ineffective without some inventions thereafter had, would be to block the path to all future progress in the art of milling."

Defendant's instrument is called a microphone, an invention of the highest character. Professor Bell, in the Preece discussion says: "No one can more heartily congratulate Professor Hughes upon his great discovery than I do." This court regarded discovery as the basis of and antedating a process.

Corning v. Burden, 56 U. S. 15 How. 252 (14:683).

The decree is also erroneous in that it finds that the defendant infringed the 6th, 7th and 8th claims of patent No. 186,787. That patent is not for an invention. It is not for a combination.

We submit that, in view of the state of the art, Bell's Patent No. 174,465 must be limited, either—

1. As a patent for a multiple telegraph, or a musical telephone, or,

2. As a patent for the magneto method of transmitting sounds by the energy of air-waves and electricity.

That in either case the fifth claim is not infringed by the method or apparatus used by the defendants.

That neither the fifth, sixth, seventh or eighth claims of the patent No. 186,787 are infringed by the receiver used by the defendants.

That the judgment of the court below should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the court below, with instructions to dismiss the bill, with costs.

Messrs. George F. Edmunds, Don M. Dickinson, Charles P. Crosby, Lysander Hill, T. S. E. Dixon, Henry C. Andrews and Melville Church for the People's Telephone Company (Drawbaugh Case), and the Overland Telephone Company:

From Bell's sworn preliminary statement in the "Speaking Telephone Interferences" (Complainant's Record, p. 1695) the following facts clearly appear, viz:

That prior to the summer of 1874 Bell had formed no conception of any means for the transmission of speech. In the summer of 1874, stimulated by Helmholtz' experiments in the electrical transmission of vowel sounds by means of a series of tuning forks of different pitch, Bell conceived the possibility of accomplishing "the same results" by substituting a series of vibrating reeds armatures in place of Helmholtz' tuning forks. But he never, then or at any subsequent time, made or attempted to make or test such apparatus.

In the summer or fall of 1874, he also formed an inchoate mental conception of the possible production of a similar result by means of a "membrane similar in shape and structure to that in the human ear," but, although he spoke of the plan to Dr. Blake in October, 1874, he did not devise any method of combining the membrane with an armature, or attempt to construct any apparatus upon the plan.

In March, 1875, he explained his "harp apparatus" to Professor Henry, and it was of this apparatus, and not of the membrane apparatus, that Professor Henry spoke as containing "the germ of a great invention."

About May 4, 1875, he made an experiment to test the transmission of an electric current through piano strings in vibration. The experiment was a failure.

On June 2, 1875, Bell accidentally discovered that with two multiple-telegraph instruments arranged in circuit as shown in figure 5 of his subsequent patent of March 7, 1876, he could, upon plucking one of the reeds with his finger, hear an audible response from the other, of the same pitch as the normal pitch of the transmitting reed, and with something of the timbre of that reed.

Thereupon Bell, for the first time in his life, conceived the practical possibility of transmitting articulate speech by a membrane instrument, and set about to construct one.

One was completed on July 1, 1875, and another a few days after, and with these two instruments Bell and Watson experimented in July, and, at the end of that month, discontinued their experiments without having heard a word of speech through the device, and even without Bell's having been able to hear a sound.

No further experiments were made till March 10, 1876, after the date of the first patent here in suit; but then the experiments were resumed, not with the instruments of July, 1875, but with a liquid transmitter and one of the old multiple-telegraph instruments as a receiver, and then, for the first time was obtained, to use Bell's words, "intelligible articulation."

Prior to June 2, 1875, Mr. Bell never made a telephone instrument or experiment, his work being confined exclusively to his multiple and autograph telegraph inventions, and to his professional work as a teacher of the deaf.

Bell obtained his first reproduction of speech electrically through Gray's liquid transmitter, on March 10, 1876, a few days after he had acquired knowledge of Gray's caveat at Washington.

Bell had never made, nor attempted to make, such a transmitter until after he had knowledge of Gray's caveat.

All of Bell's telephonic apparatus and experiments, prior to his knowledge of Gray's caveat, were magneto-electric apparatus and experiments.

After getting speech through Gray's liquid transmitter, on March 10, 1876, he immediately resumed experiments with his magneto-electric current and apparatus for speech transmission, but reconstructed the apparatus, and in April got speech through it.

This reconstructed apparatus was not like his apparatus of July, 1875, but was exactly like the receivers shown in Gray's caveat.

After the demonstration of electric speech on March 10, 1876, it was too late to amend or change the patent, which had issued three days before But it was not too late to amend the application so as to broaden its possible construction.

A more startling fact appears in the record, to wit, that Pollock & Bailey, Mr. Bell's attorneys, had an underground railroad in operation between their office and Examiner Wilbur's room in the Patent Office, by which they were enabled to have unlawful and guilty knowledge of Gray's papers as soon as they were filed in the Patent Office.

There is indubitable evidence that an important invention, and a claim therefor, were bodily interpolated into Bell's specification, between February 14, 1876, and February 19, 1876, by Pollock, in consequence of the guilty knowledge which the latter already had of the contents of Gray's caveat, before the declaration of interference with Gray on February 19. This interpolated claim was the fourth claim.

The interpolated new invention was the passage found on the fifth page of Bell's printed specification, to wit:

"Electrical undulations may also be caused by alternately increasing and diminishing the resistance of the circuit, or by alternately increasing and diminishing the power of the battery. The internal resistance of a battery is diminished by bringing the voltaic elements nearer together, and increased by placing them farther apart. The reciprocal vibration of the elements of a battery, therefore, occasions an undulatory action in the voltaic current. The external resistance may also be varied. For instance, let mercury or some other liquid form part of a voltaic circuit, then the more deeply the conducting wire is immersed in the mercury or other liquid, the less resistance does the liquid offer to the passage of the current. Hence, the vibration of the conducting wire in mercury, or other liquid included in the circuit, occasions undulations in the current. The vertical vibrations of the elements of a battery in the liquid in which they are immersed, produces an undulatory action in the current by alternately increasing and diminishing the power of the battery."

We have three Patent-Office copies of Bell's specification, all of which ought to agree, But here the remarkable fact appears that, while the specification, printed March 7, 1876, as a part of the patent, and the photographic facsimile of October 30, 1885, agree almost exactly with each other, neither of them agrees with the certified copy of April 10, 1879. Yet each, being a certified copy, imports verity, and proves that the record stood as certified, at the time of its certification.

There are thirty-nine separate statements in the certified copy of April 10, 1879, which disagree with the statements respectively found at the same places in the patent and in the photographic facsimile; and every one of those thirty-nine separate statements in the copy of April 10, 1879, is an exact copy of the language found in the same connection in the George-Brown paper.

The thirty-nine passages correspond so curiously to the George-Brown copy, mistakes and all, that the entire correspondence of the whole original Patent-Office specification with the George-Brown copy can no longer be doubted.

The George-Brown copy, originally written in October, 1875, was revised and corrected before it was handed to Mr. Brown at New York, on or about January 25, 1876. Before revision, the George-Brown copy was not verbatim the same as the American specification —after revision, it was a verbatim duplicate.

It follows, therefore, that it was not revised and corrected until the American specification was completed.

The American specification was not completed till January 1–10, 1876, and was not thereafter changed in any respect till filed. The George-Brown copy, therefore, was not revised and corrected to assume its completed form until as late as January 1–25.

The variable-resistance matter was, therefore, not in the American specification between January 1–10, 1876.

The patent of January 30, 1877, should be strictly limited to the magneto form of instrument.

If Bell in January, 1877, attempted to weave the variable-resistance current or apparatus into his new telephone patent, and to make descriptions and claims to cover it, there was no inadvertence, accident or mistake about the matter; it was deliberately done to defraud and deceive the public and to cover and appropriate the invention of another, and the whole patent is clearly void.

Bell made a sketch at Toronto on the 28th of December, 1875, for the information of Mr. George Brown, which shows the invention and apparatus described in Bell's United States patent, dated March 7, 1876, of which the following is a copy. (See next page.)

The explanatory passage accompanying the sketch which Bell declares was intended to illustrate the form of speaking telephone at which he had then arrived, and written by him, to be shown to Mr. Brown in explanation of the very matter in which he was then endeavoring to induce him to become personally interested, must be regarded as a bona fide statement by Bell, in the strongest permissible language, of the actual results that had then been achieved in his first attempt to transmit the human voice.

Bell had found it impossible, as yet, to construct an armature and so combine it in an apparatus that its vibrations should actually correspond to the air vibrations accompanying a sound, or, in the language of his patent, so that it should cause "electrical undulations similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the said vocal or other sounds."

But, notwithstanding this acknowledged failure, Mr. Bell, nevertheless, determined to patent the principle, leaving to the future to discover the means of utilizing it.

"In its naked, ordinary sense, a discovery is not patentable. A discovery of a new principle,

First attempt to Transmit the human voice. The varying pitch of the voice could be discriminated but not the quality. A sort of quivering effect was perceived at the Receiving End when a person talked very loudly at the other End.

force or law, operating, or which can be made to operate, on matter, will not entitle the discoverer to a patent. It is only where the explorer has gone beyond the mere domain of discovery and has laid hold of the new principle, force or law, and connected it with some particular medium or mechanical contrivance, by which, or through which, it acts on the material world, that he can secure the exclusive control of it under the Patent Act."

Morton v. New York Eye Infirmary, 5 Blatchf. 121; Burrall v. Jewett, 2 Paige, 148.

He is the inventor and is entitled to the patent who first brought the machine to perfection, and made it capable of useful operation.

Agawam Woolen Co. v. Jordan, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 602 (19:181); Whiteley v. Swayne, Id. 687 (19: 200.)

Until the invention is perfected and adapted to use, it is not patentable under the patent laws.

Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 552 (20:41); O'Reilly v. Morse, 56 U. S. 15 How. 62 (14:601); Burr v. Duryee, 68 U S. 1 Wall. 581 (17:650).

Granting their validity, what construction shall be given to Letters Patent No. 147,469, granted to Mr. Bell, March 7, 1876, and in particular to the fifth claim?

The whole fabric of Bell's reasoning, by which he has arrived at certain advantageous conclusions, is based directly upon the possession, by the "undulatory" current, of the very qualities which alone characterize the magneto-electric current.

Bell's statement that this "present invention consists in the employment of a vibratory or undulatory current of electricity, in place of a merely intermittent one, and of a method of and an apparatus for producing electrical undulations upon the line-wire," is thus clearly seen to be a statement made directly in the execution of the purpose he had formed to patent "the use of the magneto-electric current."

The newly-described current of varying resistance has not been claimed by Bell, in his patent, for use in the transmission of speech, but for multiple-telegraph purposes alone.

Moreover, the modus operandi of the newly-described current of varying resistance when employed in the transmission of speech, is wholly different from that of the magneto-electric current under similar circumstances.

Everything points to the conclusion that Bell appropriated to himself the ideas set forth by Mr. Gray in his caveat. First, by means of the new passage and claim interjected into his patent; and secondly, by embodying in the construction of instruments, both the varying resistance and the magneto, and instruments through which he for the first time transmitted articulate speech.

Messrs. E. N. Dickerson, Chauncey Smith, and James J. Storrow, for the American Bell Telephone Company:

The charge of forgery has been made, fully and elaborately in two of the briefs for the Overland and Drawbaugh Companies.

A forgery committed on the paper in the Patent Office, besides an interpolation; and that the papers were twice stolen from the files in the Patent Office, taken away, and new papers put in place of them as and for the originals.

There has never been in this case, up to last week, any hint, any charge, any insinuation, any suspicion of such a crime as is now charged. There is no such issue made in the case; I mean no issue which called upon us to put in any evidence bearing upon such charges. It is a new thing.

Bell, before he went to Washington in February, 1875, knew the substance of Gray's invention, because Gray had been describing it in the newspapers; not the speaking telephone, but the harmonic multiple telegraph.

Bell, in the fall of 1875, made a draft of a specification for his patent. The description which he wrote of that in the fall of 1875 stands to-day in the patent exactly as he then wrote it.

He completed his American application in January, 1876. The production of the certified copy of the application itself from the files of the Office has that clause exactly as it stands in the patent.

That sort of way of producing undulations—by varying the resistance—was not new in Mr. Bell's mind at that time. His letter of May 4, 1875, had said that he feared that the magneto mode, that is, by vibrating an armature, would give currents which would be too feeble to be practically useful, and therefore he thought the true way would be to use a battery current, which can be made as strong as is desired.

As early as May 4, 1875, Bell had conceived of the variable-resistance plan as the equivalent of the magneto plan for the transmission of speech. The charges that are made against Bell are, that the paper which he filed on February 14, 1876, as his application, was a copy of the George-Brown specification as written in 1875; and that the application so filed did not have this variable-resistance idea in it. The application was filed on the morning of February 14, Gray's caveat was filed on the afternoon of February 14.

Bell was not in Washington that week at all. The charge is that Messrs. Pollock & Bailey got a dishonest sight of Gray's caveat, found the liquid transmitter in it, determined to steal the idea for Bell, did so, abstracted from the files of the Office half a dozen sheets, more or less, of Bell's pending application, wrote the stolen idea in, returned the sheets and sewed them up again, and let them stand as if they were the honest original application.

The next charge is an intimation that the examiner in charge of that room was in collusion with them and aiding them.

Now the very first action of that examiner was to say, "Gray's caveat is here, and you cannot have your patent." These men, who owned him body and soul,—that is the insinuation,—were blocked by him at the very first thing he did.

Gray never proceeded. He had never made an instrument in accordance with his caveat. All the acts of the examiner, therefore, were pointedly in favor of Gray. The next part of the charge is, that after Messrs. Pollock & Bailey had committed this theft and interpolation, Bell came to Washington and they then told him what they had done and he ratified it and approved of it. This is all their imagination. There is not a word of any such thing in the testimony, not a suggestion of it anywhere until last week. They say Bell then went to the Patent Office and changed "tone" to "note" etc. There are over thirty, so they pretend, such changes made by him at that time. And he went on to change thirty-eight words in the specification.

They say that the paper, as thus altered in pencil, read as the patent reads, and thus altered, came to be the patent as it was printed and issued. But there is not a word of testimony on this subject. It is all pure conjecture.

The whole charge finally comes down to this keystone, that the paper on the files to-day is (so they say) not the paper which was on the files in 1879; which they say they find from the fact that the paper there to-day is not the paper as printed in the Dowd record and in the Drawbaugh record.

Mr. Storrow here states: "The way it came to be so printed is this: A certified copy was procured by me, or through Mr. Pollock, in 1879, for my own use. That copy was put in evidence in the Dowd Case. Upon that copy I with my own hands, in 1879, interlined words from the George-Brown specification."

"The original exhibit itself shows (it has got the printer's marks on it) that it went to the printer, and the printer in printing it printed in the words which I had written in pencil for my private memoranda."

A letter was here handed to the court written by Mr. Storrow to Mr. Andrews, counsel for the Drawbaugh Company, dated New Orleans, February 18, 1886, as follows:

"I want to make one correction in the original record of the Drawbaugh Case. The file of the Bell patent is in evidence, but the copy of the application is not printed correctly. I believe there are no errors in it which are of any importance, but there were some pencil marks on the copy that went to the printer in the Dowd Case, with brackets, etc., and that got reproduced in your case. There has been lately printed a very careful and accurate copy from a photograph of the original papers, and I directed two copies of this to be sent to you from Boston. I propose to you to substitute that for the print that now exists among our exhibits in the Drawbaugh record, and also to stipulate, as enclosed, that the court on appeal, may, if it desires, refer to a certified copy made by the Patent Office, for greater accuracy."

And a stipulation was here read as follows:

"It is agreed that upon the appeal of this case (The American Bell Telephone Company v. The People's Telephone Company), the supreme court may, if it desires for greater accuracy, refer to a copy of the Bell patent and file made and certified by the Patent Office." Signed "L. Hill, solicitor for defendants," and enclosed in a letter which read: "Herewith please find enclosed stipulation, that parties may, on the appeal, refer to a copy of the Bell patent on file, certified to by the Patent Office."

A similar letter, requesting the correction, though not stating the reasons so fully, was sent to the Overland Company, September 30, 1886, and they had the new print put into their record.

In the Drawbaugh Case they put the print into their record; they reprinted it themselves, at their own expense, and followed it by the note which you will find there (Drawbaugh, Overland Proofs, p. 764).

The original paper from which the transcript was made which is printed in the Drawbaugh Case was here produced and handed to the court.

A facsimile of the certified copy was here handed to the Chief Justice. All the pencil marks of the exhibit are here printed in blue. The following is a reproduction of one of the altered sentences showing the pencil interlineations made by counsel and erroneously printed.

The various words in blue ink are the words.

The duration of the sound may be made to signify indicate the dot or dash of the Morse alphabet — and thus a telegraphic despatch can be transmitted may be indicated by alternately interrupting and restoring the sounds.

interlined in pencil in the original exhibit. The certified copy read in ink exactly as the patent now does, "dependent for effect upon the variations," etc.

The pencil interlineations in that copy were made by scoring out the syllable "ent" and interlining "but all of them," thus:

The same air vibrations produced by the voice at one end are reproduced by the diaphragm at the other.

The problem for the inventor of the electric speaking telephone was to take away that string, and connect those two diaphragms by electricity.

There are many ways of producing undulatory currents of electricity, dependent for effect upon the vibrations or motion of bodies capable of inductive action

The interlined words were the words of the George-Brown copy, written in in pencil between the lines.

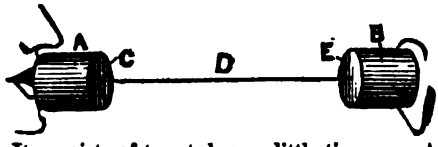
March 26, 1878, interferences were declared in the Patent Office between Bell's patents and the applications of Elisha Gray, J. W. McDonough, T A. Edison, A. G. Holcombe, A. E. Dolbear, and W. L. Voelker. Evidence was then taken, and the interferences were argued before Mr. J. B. Church, Examiner of Interferences.

He thereupon decided in favor of Bell every issue which in his opinion involved the invention of the speaking telephone.

His decision was appealed from by the various parties, and was heard before the Board of Appeals. In the fall of 1884, such Board unanimously decided every issue in favor of Bell.

This decision was appealed from, and the appeal was argued before Mr. Commissioner Butterworth in person. March 3, 1885, he affirmed the decision of the Board in favor of Mr. Bell, on all points.

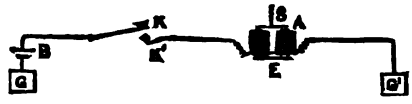
The string telephone has been spoken of by counsel. It is two hundred years old in its various forms. The following is a representation of it:



It consists of two tubes, or little tin cases, A and B with a bladder, C and E, stretched over one end of each. A string (D) has one end passed through the centre of each, and tied with a knot inside. If I speak into it at A, a person listening at B will hear what I have said. I may make this string a hundred feet long, and carry it into the next room; then if I speak into this, a person in the other room will hear what I say.

What produces the sensation of sound on the ear is the vibration of the air, set in motion by the source of sound, and reaching the ear. All you have got to do to make a person hear the sound is to produce sonorous vibrations of the appropriate kind next to the ear, and the way in which this string telephone does that is, that when you speak into this at A you set its diaphragm in vibration, and it copies the vibrations which the voice produces in the air.

The following is a representation of the Morse instrument: B is the battery; K is the key. The current comes from the battery B to the key K.



When the key is in the position represented in the cut the two parts K and K' are not in contact, and no current can pass. When I press down the key K so that it touches the "anvil" K' they come in contact, and a current can pass; and when it passes it converts the pieces of soft iron inside of those coils at E into magnets for the moment; and that magnet pulls down the armature A (normally held back by the spring S), and that makes the click which you hear. By that instrument I can produce motion at a distant place. I can produce a sound at a distant place; and I can produce just as many motions as I want. But that is all that I can do. That will not accomplish the transmission of speech.

The sound in the air is due to the vibrations in the particles of air.

More vibrations per second give a higher pitch of sound. Vibrations have, in the language of acoustics, a greater or less amplitude which determines the loudness of the sound.

There is a characteristic of sound which distinguishes one sound from another, which is neither loudness nor pitch. The characteristic which distinguishes the sound of a violin from that of the human voice or of a flute, which distinguishes one word from another, and which technically is called "quality," depends upon the way in which it performs its journey within its allotted time and over its allotted path.

(Counsel here explains the phrase "form of vibration," by reference to cut given at page 948, ante.)

Suppose I attach a pencil to an air particle, while it is vibrating; then if I place a piece of paper under the point of the pencil, I shall get a wavy line. That waviness is due to the vibration. If it vibrates in a different way it will make a different wavy line; each difference of waviness depends upon the way in which this vibrates. The character of its vibration is expressed by the waviness of the curve. From exhibiting to the mind a conception of the motion of an air particle, by means of wavy lines drawn, or supposed to be drawn, by an air particle with a pencil fastened to it, people came to speak of the "form of vibration"; by which they do not mean that the particle moves in a sinuous or crooked line, for it moves in a perfectly straight line to and fro. They mean, by that phrase, to signify the curve which the particle would draw if a pencil were fastened to it while vibrating, and a piece of paper were drawn under it.

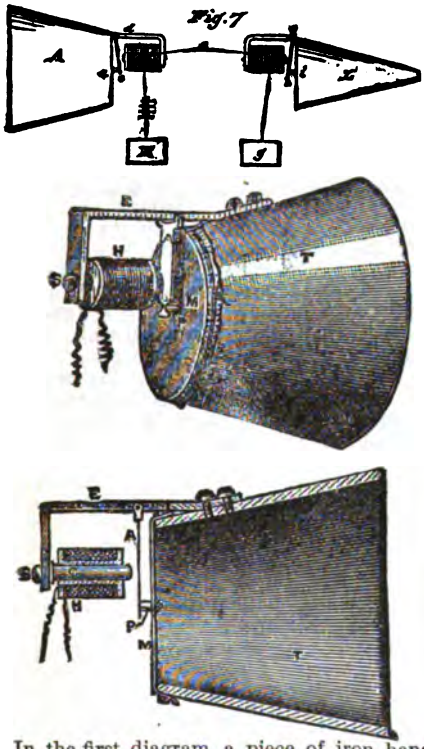
THE BELL TELEPHONE.

The first diagram here given is a drawing of figure 7 of Bell's patent. The other is a telephone transmitter like said figure 7, without adjustment.



In the first diagram, a piece of iron hangs down, marked c at the lower end of the cone A. The upper end is hinged so that it is free to move. At the lower end, marked c, it is fastened at the centre of the membrane a. b is an electro-magnet. It consists of a bar of soft iron, one end of which just juts out near c, with coils of wire wound round it.

As the armature c is hinged at the upper end so that its lower end c, fastened to the centre of the stretched membrane at a, can move freely, whenever that stretched membrane is vibrated by the voice the armature moves just as the membrane does. When this armature c is moved or waved in front of the electro-magnet b, it induces electrical disturbances in the coil of that magnet.

One end of that coil is connected with the conductor or line-wire e, which goes off to the distant station; and as that line-wire is a conductor of electricity, the flow which the disturbance in the coil, caused by waving the armature, tends to produce finds an outlet in that conductor, and the electricity will rush through the conductor e to the other instrument L.

The essential thing in the mechanical part of this particular instrument is: that there shall be a diaphragm, or its mechanical equivalent, capable of vibrating under the influence of the sound-waves produced by the voice or by any other source of sound; that an armature shall be fastened to that so that it will move just as the diaphragm does; then that the armature shall be thus moved close in front of the electro-magnet.

Currents generated in the transmitter A pass to the electro-magnet f, of the receiving instrument L, and as they go around that electro-magnet they cause its core to become more or less magnetic, and cause its magnetic strength at each particular instant to correspond to the motion that is going on in the transmitter at that instant. That electro-magnet pulls this armature h.

The varying pull of the magnet is just in accordance with the variations of the current.

The diaphragm of this receiving instrument, not only in the fact of motion, but in every variation in the sequence of its successive motions, to the minutest degree, copies the variations in the movements of this transmitter-diaphragm. The result is that we have got now, by means of electricity, what the string-telephone man had with his string. We have got the receiving diaphragm to copy by electricity the motions of the transmitting diaphragm. That is the Bell telephone.

The motions at the receiver are a copy of the electrical changes; the electrical changes are copies of the motions at the transmitter. If that holds true, then the thing will talk. Then the same character of vibrations—not only the same number, but the same character of vibrations—which takes place here at the transmitter will take place there at the receiver.

The particular novelty of Bell's contrivance, the novelty of principle, which he first introduced into science and the arts, was not that he was the first who wanted to transmit speech by electricity; it was not that he was the first who saw that to reproduce speech by electricity or by any other way you must have some distant diaphragm—or it need not be a diaphragm, it may be a piece of board, or anything else—copy the vibrations at the receiving end, for the string telephone had done that; he was the first man who conceived of, or who embodied in any description or machine, the conception that in order to do that you must have the electrical disturbances in the wire and in the circuit to be copies of the sonorous disturbances at the transmitter end.

People had been trying to make electrical speaking telephones for many years, but it never occurred to any of them that the electrical disturbance which would accomplish the result was to be one which itself should be a copy of the sonorous vibrations at the transmitting end. That was Bell's conception, and he worked it out.

That made his thing to be a speaking telephone, and the fact that no such conception had been reached or was embodied in any previous man's instrument prevented any previous man's instrument from being a speaking telephone.

These electrical changes are not a manufactured product. You can't take them out of the machine; they are made in the machine, to be used in the machine. The result is the transmission of speech. That is what was aimed at.

But these electrical changes are not results. They are made to be used at the instant of their creation.

One of the gentlemen told you that Bell and the owners of the patent wanted to monopolize the transmission of speech, by whatever means. Nothing of the sort. We want to monopolize this particular means which Bell has introduced into electrical science. If anybody can do it any other way, he has a perfect right to do it.

It would be impossible to extend this patent to cover means other than those which come within what he first introduced into the art.

This kind of electrical changes is not a thing that exists in nature like coal and iron and wood.

Bell didn't discover something that existed in nature, and undertake to patent that. He created something. These undulations are something "created by the hand of man;" or perhaps I should rather say, by the voice of man. They did not exist before he created them.

He has told you how to create a set of electrical disturbances, and he has told you that when you create those electrical disturbances you can get speech by means of them. "You can't get it without them," says Mr. Dolbear. Those electrical disturbances are the essential novelty of his apparatus.

The patent law, in express terms, says that you are to describe your machine, and "the principle" thereof, " by which it may be distinguished from other inventions." That is not all you are to do. You are to describe, says the patent law, "the best mode in which you have contemplated applying that principle."

The patent is to be in terms for the "invention or discovery," and not for any particular mode of application.

The Patent Act, by its terms, as the courts have always done, intends, expects and perceives that a man even may himself contemplate many modes, not only many machines for applying his invention, but many modes for its application. It intends that his patent shall be for his whole invention, and he has only to describe one mode of applying it. He has to describe one, because until he has done that he has not entered into the improvement of the useful arts, and has not brought himself within the domain of the patent law. When he has done that his patent is for his whole invention.

Bell v. Gray, 15 Off. Gaz. 778; Household Co. v. Neilson, Web. Pat. Cas. 688, 715; Evans v. Eaton, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 356 (5:472); McClurg v. Kingsland, 42 U. S. 1 How. 202 (11: 102); Le Roy v. Tatham, 55 U. S. 14 How. 156 (14: 367); O'Reilly v. Morse, 56 U. S. 15 How. 62 (14:601); Winans v. Denmead, Id. 330 (14:717); Parker v. Hulme, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 44; Corning v. Troy, I. & N. Factory, 56 U. S. 15 How. 451 (14: 768); Burr v. Duryee, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 567 (17: 656); Jacobs v. Baker, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 295 (19: 200); Haworth v. Hardcastle, Web. Pat. Cas. 484.

Specifications are to be construed liberally, in accordance with the design of the Constitution and the patent laws of the United States, to promote the progress of the useful arts, and allow inventors to retain to their own use, not anything which is matter of common right, but what they themselves have created.

Grant v. Raymond, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 218 (8: 376); Ames v. Howard, 1 Sumn. 482, 485; Blanchard v. Sprague, 3 Sumn. 535, 539; Davoll v. Brown, 1 Woodb. & M. 53, 57; Parker v. Haworth, 4 McLean, 372; Neilson v. Harford, Web. Pat. Cas. 341; Russell v. Cowley, Id. 470; Corning v. Burden, 56 U. S. 15 How. 252 (14: 683); Mitchell v. Tilghman, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 287 (22:125); Tilghman v. Proctor, 102 U. S. 708 (26: 279); Cochrane v. Deener, 94 U. S. 787 (24:141); James v. Campbell, 104 U. S. 377 (26: 794); McCormick v. Talcott, 61 U. S. 20 How. 402 (15:930.)

A patentable invention is a mental result. The intellectual element is recognized as the test of identity, for anticipation and infringement.

Waterbury Brass Co. v. Miller, 9 Blatchf. 77; Smith v. Nichols, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 118 (22:567); Bischoff v. Wethered, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 812 (19: 829); Clough v. Barker, 106 U. S. 166 (27:134); Blake v. Robertson, 94 U. S. 728 (24:245); Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Locomotive E. S. Truck Co. 110 U. S. 490 (28:222); Consolidated S. Valve Co. v. Crosby S. G. & Valve Co. 113 U. S. 157 (28: 939); Blake v. San Francisco, Id. 679 (28:1070); Miller v. Foree, 116 U. S. 22 (29:552).

Bell made one speaking telephone. He described one speaking telephone. Let me assume that he made only one. But the merit of that specification was that he laid down the rule for all future speaking telephones. He said, "get into the operation of that machine this which never was in any machine before, and get it in accordance with a particular rule," which he stated. Now, every man who has endeavored to improve this speaking telephone since that time has endeavored not only to avail himself of the fact that Bell found, but has endeavored to conform more and more perfectly to the rule which Bell laid down.

I have described the operation of that particular machine, but I have not described the whole of it. If Your Honors will look again at figure 7, you will find that beside the electromagnet which generates the currents I spoke of, there is a battery in the circuit, shown conventionally by the cross lines, just above E. Now, what happens? The battery sends along a big strong current, which I will represent by a big space between those two lines. The magneto machine (which is the transmitter) is adding to or substracting from that current, according to the direction of the motions of its armature. It is doing that, and in doing that it is adding a little or is taking away a little of the electric energy from that great stream. Now it adds a little, and now subtracts a little. It makes it a little stronger, or a little weaker. Those changes are very small as compared with the whole. It cannot take away enough to stop it entirely. It makes it a little stronger and a little weaker. The result is that in figure 7 of the patent, according to the description of the patent, you get a great, strong stream, always fairly strong, sometimes a little stronger, and sometimes a little weaker. It is that stream or rather the variations of its strength, which work the receiver. Sometimes it pulls it a little stronger, and sometimes it pulls it a little less.

Fig. 7

THE MICROPHONE.

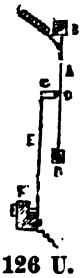
I have here a battery, and a wire from each pole or plate of the battery. If those two wires join so that they make one wire, the current flows through them around the circuit. If I separate them, the current ceases to flow. That is what is called "opening" the circuit. Opening the circuit is opening the wire. When I put them together again the current flows. When I put them together again I cannot make so good a union as there was between the particles of the uncut wire. The current does not flow so strongly.

Suppose I have one of the wires beaten out into the form of a diaphragm d, and bring the other c up to it so that they touch; the current will pass; and if I press them more strongly together the current will pass more strongly; if I press them together weakly the current will be enfeebled. The changes in the current will correspond to the variations of pressure at this point of contact. Suppose now, holding that wire-end c there, I speak to the back of this diaphragm d, and make it vibrate gently, not enough to part contact between the diaphragm d and the wire-end c, but enough to make it vary this pressure, as when I press my thumb with a slight pressure, or a greater pressure, on the table. Thus variations of pressure will be caused by the voice; and not only will they be caused by the voice, but the variations of pressure will correspond to the vibration which this diaphragm d performs under the influence of the voice.

That is the principle of the microphone. It was invented, in the United States, by Mr. Berliner and by Mr. Edison in 1877, independently of each other. It was invented independently, by Hughes, in England, in 1878.

When coupled with a receiver it constituted an improved form of the Bell apparatus.

The essential mechanical features of the microphone are: (1) that the parts should be so constructed that one electrode can be vibrated by the voice while in contact with the other, and that the other shall be so arranged as to mechanically so resist that motion that it shall result in variations of pressure; and (2) that the parts should be so constructed and arranged that the vibrations given to one electrode by the ordinary action of the voice shall not break the contact under ordinary circumstances.



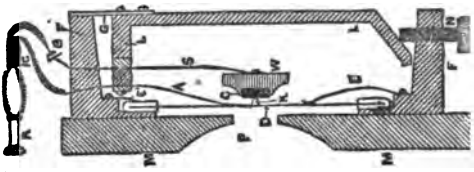
In the diagram, which is taken from an application filed by Edison in July, 1877, the carbon electrode C is mounted on the end of a spring E, strained by a screw F towards the diaphragm electrode D to prevent breaks of contact.

The problem which the microphone solves is this: to introduce into an electrical circuit an electrical resistance, which resistance shall be in exact accord with sonorous vibrations.

It is a law of electricity that the strength of the current in the circuit depends upon the amount of electrical energy used to create it, and it also depends upon the resistance.

Hughes' microphone is a contrivance which will produce the same changes in the electric current—the same sequence of successive strengths in the current—by varying the resistance that Bell had in figure 7.

The form in which that is commercially used is shown in the Blake transmitter.



Here is a long cast-iron lever L, hinged at the upper end. At the lower end is a screw N, which enables that lever to be moved a little. Down inside you will find a very slender spring A that comes from the upper end. It goes down to the centre of the diaphragm, and carries a little knob of platinum K, about as big as the head of a pin. The steel spring S is clothed with india rubber, with a brass knob W at the end. If you draw that back against the large lever, you can separate it from the platinum knob. The electric current comes down through the inner slender spring to the platinum point K, thence passes to C, a little piece of carbon; thence through W, up the spring S, and around to the battery B again. The mouthpiece P is a hole in M. Inside of that, fastened to this rim F is a disk or diaphragm D of sheet iron. There is a little packing or fold of rubber around its edges. Plate D can come out, and is free to vibrate. When I speak into it through mouthpiece P, I vibrate it like the diaphragm of the string telephone. The thrust which the diaphragm makes against K bears against the carbon C.

The trick in the microphone is to get those parts arranged so as to develop the increase and diminution of pressure as much as possible, but to still keep them always in contact, and that is the end of the business.

The function of spring E is to hold that diaphragm in place. If you take that spring away, and this little clip E', away, the diaphragm would fall out.

There are nearly five hundred thousand of those telephones in this country. I suppose that there are as many more in other parts of the world. Who originated them? Every speaking telephone at work in the world traces its origin right up to Bell. There were no speaking telephones used before Bell made one. Bell is the inventor of it. It was not known before.

And yet the defendants set up that the Reis apparatus was known to the whole world as a speaking telephone, and that nobody of any sense or intelligence ever supposed that Bell was the first inventor.

That the Reis publications, though well known, never in fact taught men how to make a speaking telephone, is conclusive proof of their insufficiency.

He never advertised it or sold it as a speech transmitter. He never offered it to any man as such. Nobody ever sought for it for the purpose of transmitting speech. He never hinted in any of his advertisements that speech was the thing to be transmitted by it, and that it would yield speech.

In every case where anybody has testified that in his own laboratory he got speech with the Reis apparatus, we have said to him by way of cross-examination, "Won't you be good enough to repeat that operation in the presence of witnesses, as was done in the Dolbear Case?" And they never have done it—never complied with the demand.

Reis hoped to make a speaking telephone, but after he had worked for many years with no success, after he had made first one form and then another, and finally got into this hollow box form which was made by the apparatus makers and sold, he never intended that for speech. He never asserted it would talk.

I will show you Reis's receiver. This C is Reis's receiver. Its operation is this: That (indicating) is a coiled wire through which the current is passed or stopped, whichever it may be. That (indicating) is a knitting needle run through its centre. The ends of this needle stick out a couple of inches, and rest on the bridge pieces on the box.

This is the final box form of 1863.

On that rests a little three-cornered piece of metal C C′, the two legs of which are hinged or set in little sockets E E′, in the framework A, while the middle leg of it projects over and rests—is not fastened, but just rests by its own weight—on a piece of platinum foil on the centre of the diaphragm at F. From the other side of the top at G comes a strip of platinum foil F H, which extends down over the diaphragm to its centre F, where it is glued, so that it moves with the diaphragm. The leg at the angle of the piece C C′ rests on this foil at F. The electrical connections are made in such a way that the wires from the battery B come, one to that platinum foil at G, while the other is fastened at E to one leg of the three-cornered piece C C′.

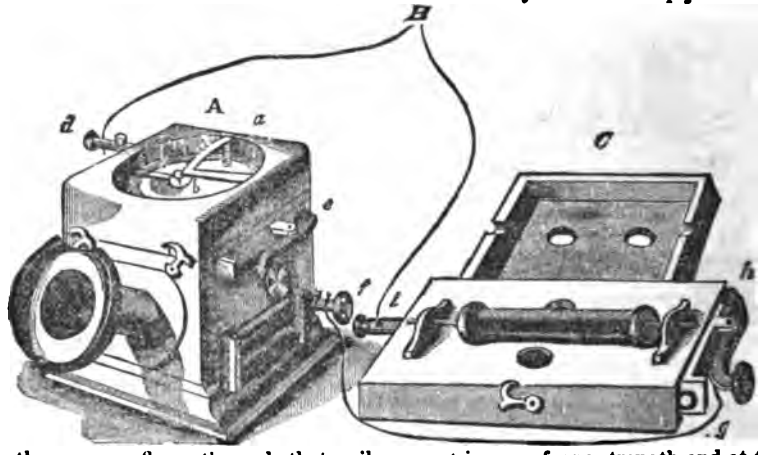
There is no such thing as an "intermittent current." You can have a succession of flows and starts, and flows and stops, and for convenience that is spoken of as an "intermittent current."

"Undulatory current" simply means that the



When the current flows through that coil and around that core, it elongates the core a very little, and when the current stops it contracts again. Every starting and stopping of the current magnetizes and demagnetizes the needle, as an electro-magnet becomes magnetized and demagnetized by starting and stopping the current. Every time that needle becomes magnetized by the passage of the current it expands a little, and when it becomes demagnetized by the cessation of the current it contracts. That produces in the needle itself a slight vibratory motion, which is imparted to the air and produces the sound.

Here is a dummy which will show the particular working parts. Here is a board A with a three-inch hole in it over which is nailed a piece of pasteboard D to represent a diaphragm.

current is now of one strength and at the next instant is of a different strength.

The curves do not represent waves like those of the sea. "Undulatory current," like "intermittent current," is merely a phrase which expresses a conception of the successive conditions of the current.

All sonorous vibrations are "undulatory" in their character, in the technical sense in which that word is used.

The intermittent current is represented by a series of blocks.

This does not mean that there are on the line at any one instant a succession of spurts of electricity—electricity at some parts of the line, and none at others. It means that for a period of time represented by the length of the block, there is, all over the line, a current whose strength is represented by the height of the block; and that after that, for a period of time represented by the blank space, there is no current at all anywhere. That phenomenon is called an intermittent current.

If now a current varies, so that at one instant it is of a strength represented by the height of the line E, and at the next instant of a strength represented by the length of the perpendicular line F, and so on, and the variations of strength, or the curve which represents those variations by joining the tops of those lines, are undulatory in its character, then we speak of that current as undulatory, because of that variation in its strength at successive instants; and those are the symbols that are used in the patent.

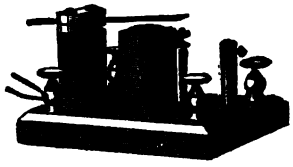
Bell was possessed with the likeness between the current which he proposed to use and sound-waves themselves. And that is the substance of his patent; that is the cardinal key and idea of his whole patent.

Bell says in the patent: "In illustration of the method of creating electrical undulation, I shall show and describe one form of apparatus for producing the effect."



It is figure 5 of the patent which he is now describing. Here is a view of one. He puts a number of those on the circuit for a multiple telegraph, and he says when one of them, A, vibrates, it produces a note of a pitch corresponding to the length of that free arm c, and it produces electrical undulations on the wire which correspond to that pitch. When another is on, it produces electrical undulations corresponding to its pitch; and those two electrical undulations going into the wire do not obliterate each other, but they manifest themselves by the composition and by the peculiar form of curve which will express the combined result of the two. It is true of harmonic multiple telegraphy that a receiving instrument can be devised, and it was well known (Bell had described it in a previous patent) which could analyze out those two sets, so that one instrument would respond to one note, or set of notes or pitches, and the other would respond to the other.

The patent says: "Hence, by these instruments two or more telegraph signals or messages may be sent simultaneously over the same circuit without interfering with one another." That is the harmonic multiple telegraph.

And the way in which that is done is described in the last four lines of the preceding paragraph: "The duration of the sound may be used to indicate the dot or dash of the Morse alphabet, and thus a telegraphic dispatch may be indicated by alternately interrupting and renewing the sound." And in that way, by those instruments (fig. 5 of the patent), several telegraphic signals may be sent simultaneously over the same circuit without interfering with one another.

The patent proceeds to describe that these electrical undulations, generally like sound-waves, can be used for other special results, when they copy special sound-waves. The patent says: "I desire here to remark that there are many other uses to which these instruments may be put, such as the simultaneous transmission of musical notes, differing in loudness, as well as in pitch, and the telegraphic transmission of noises or sounds of any kind.

The first statement was that he could transmit harmonic multiple telegraph messages by variations of pitch; and he has described that. Nothing more is to be added about that. That is finished. Now he says, "I desire here to remark that there are other uses." I don't see how it would be possible to find more explicit language in which to state that what he is going to say now is not harmonic multiple telegraphy, but it is "another" use.

He goes on and describes: "When the armature c, Fig. 5, is set in vibration, the armature h responds not only in pitch, but in loudness." When the armature c of one of these instruments is set in vibration, the armature h of the corresponding instrument just like it at the other end responds, not only in pitch but in loudness. Thus, when this armature c vibrates with little amplitude, a soft sound will proceed from the corresponding armature h of the corresponding instrument. When this armature c vibrates violently, a violent sound will be produced by the armature h of the transmitter corresponding to it at the other end.

The patent continues: "The armature c, Fig. 7, is fastened loosely by one extremity to the uncovered leg d of the electro-magnet b, and its other extremity is attached to the centre of a stretched membrane a. A cone A is used to converge sound vibrations upon the membrane. When a sound is uttered in the cone, the membrane a is set in vibration, the armature c is forced to partake of the motion." That necessarily follows: "and thus electrical undulations are created upon the circuit E b e f g."

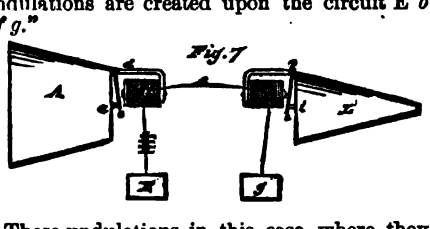
Fig. 7



These undulations in this case, where they are caused by the voice, are stated by the patent to be "similar in form to the air vibrations caused by the sound; that is, they are represented graphically by similar curves."

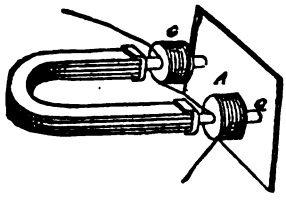
When you speak, when you make any sound in there, the sound-waves vibrate the diaphragm of this instrument, and this armature takes up those vibrations and copies them because it is fastened to the diaphragm. These motions of the armature produce electrical undulations in the circuit; not only undulations, but undulations similar in form to the motions of the diaphragm and attached armature; and those undulations when they reach the other end, by reason of their similarity in form, influence that armature h of the receiver to copy the movements of this transmitter armature c. What is the result? A similar sound to that uttered in there at A is heard to come out here at L., as claimed by Bell in the 5th claim.

The patentee describes in Claim 3 that you may produce the undulations by the inductive mode; next, in Claim 4, that you may produce the undulations by the variable resistance mode; and finally we come to Claim 5. That is not a claim for producing undulations; it is, as my brother Lowrey very well stated and he has got it in his brief, for transmitting speech by means of them, when they are of the particular form specified.

The second Bell patent No. 186,787 of January 30, 1877, is for mere improvements in the mechanical details of figure 7, of the first patent, without altering the nature of the operation in any way.

Mr. Bell subsequently found that instead of employing a battery to magnetize those cores, as the first instrument did, he could employ a permanent magnet.

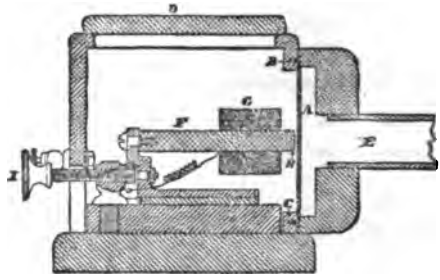
He made such an instrument in July, 1876, and in the fall of 1876 he talked from Boston to Cambridge, without any battery, by means of a permanent magnet. That is one of the improvements that is contained in this second patent. The drawing shows a horseshoe permanent magnet with a soft-iron core fastened to each end or pole, and a short, large coil of wire, wound around that core.



Those soft iron cores being screwed into the ends of this permanent steel magnet, become themselves, for the time being, magnetic. We therefore have these cores magnetized without the expense and trouble of a battery. There is no change in the principle, but this particular contrivance was found cheaper and better than the form of the first patent.

There was a third improvement.

This instrument marked "Fig. 2" of Bell's second patent consists of a box. At the front end of it there is an iron diaphragm A. Behind that is the electro-magnet consisting of the bar or core F, surrounded by the coil G. There is a little difference of form, which I will explain by and by. There are two forms.



Instrument of Bell's patent No. 186,787, Jan. 30, 1877.

In front of the diaphragm A you see a space of about two inches up and down, a white space about a quarter of an inch wide, an air space, an air chamber. In front of the diaphragm and from the centre of that space a tube E comes out.

The wood behind this diaphragm is hollowed out so as to make a cavity about two inches in diameter and about one eighth or one sixteenth of an inch in thickness, so that there is an air chamber behind—rather I should say in front of—that diaphragm. The air chamber communicates with the exterior air by a central opening through the tube E.

Bell found that that particular form of mouthpiece, a narrow air space in front of the diaphragm communicating with the external air by a circular opening at the centre,—is the best form, both for speaking and for listening at. It gives less reverberation and communicates the sound better than any other.

The commercial instruments have always taken that shape, very pronounced in these instruments.

The speaking tube was a convenience for these instruments.

Bell's Early Instruments.

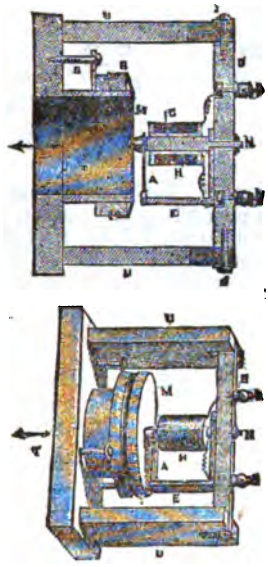
We know now why Bell did not obtain better results in June and July, 1875. All the important parts of the pair of telephones then used remain, and the apparatus has been reconstructed in exact accordance with them. The reconstructions cannot differ from the originals, unless in mere workmanship. In 1879, the reconstructed instruments were taken by a number of witnesses to the precise place in the noisy workshop where Bell tried the originals in 1875, and no words could be made out. They were immediately taken to a quiet place and conversation was carried on with them.

In the Drawbaugh Case two sets of them were made in scrupulous accord with the originals, and, in a quiet place, newspaper paragraphs were read through them in the presence of the defendants' counsel and expert witnesses.

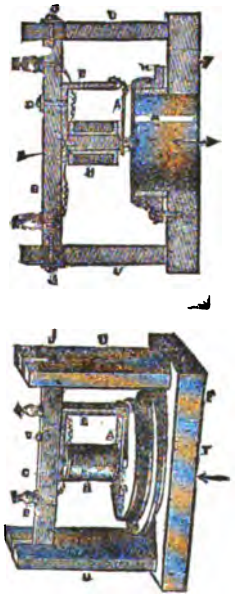
The following are views and sections of the instruments:

Introduction of the Electric Speaking Telephone to the public.

Bell's patent, No. 174,465, was applied for

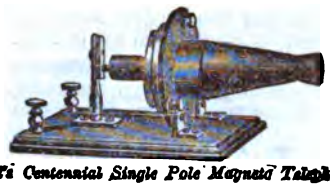


Nos. 49 and 50, Bell's First Telephone of 1875.

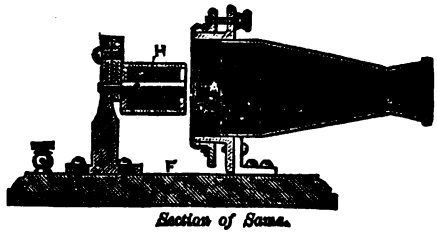


Nos. 51 and 52, Bell's Second Telephone of 1875.

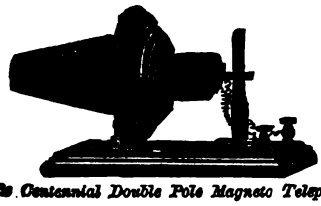
February 14, 1876, and granted March 7, 1876. His first public exhibition of his apparatus was made before the American Academy of Arts and Sciences at Boston, May 10, 1876, and published in their proceedings. Sets of his apparatus, shown in view and in section in the following cuts, were exhibited at the Centennial Exhibition, in June, 1876:



Bell's Centennial Single Pole Magnet Telephone.

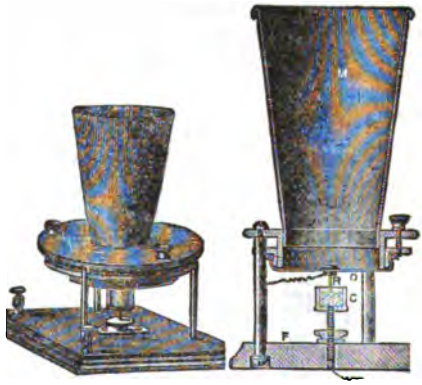


Section of Same.

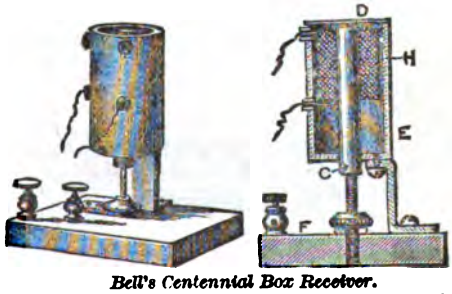


Bell's Centennial Double Pole Magneto Telephone.

The particular instruments actually used were the "membrane telephones," as transmitters, and the "membrane telephone" and "iron box magnet receiver" as receivers.



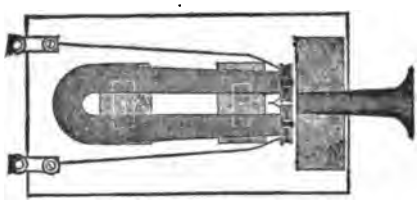
Bell's Centennial Liquid Transmitter.



Bell's Centennial Box Receiver.

The following was the first instrument that was put out for commercial use in 1877.

Box Telephone, in use before April 5, 1877.



Box Telephone in commercial use in June, 1877 (cover removed).

It was convenient in that to have a tube, because it was a heavy instrument and you could not get your mouth to it very closely. When you come to a hand instrument, there is no longer any need of that tube, because the instrument itself can be applied to the mouth or ear.

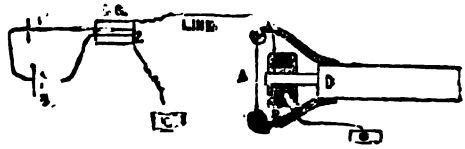
If you will look at the inside of the mouthpiece, the cap piece that unscrews and takes off, you will see a little ledge about a sixteenth of an inch long, running around near the edge on the hard rubber. Take the other piece, the small piece you have in your hand, the cap piece you have just unscrewed, and see the ledge running around inside there near the edge. Now, if you put this black diaphragm on there you have got a little air space below the diaphragm, the size of which is the diameter of that inside space, and the depth of which is the height of that little ledge.

Hand Telephone in use August, 1877.

Box Telephone in use May, 1877.

Hand Telephone in use since December, 1877.

Those two diagrams are "the Bell telephone as usually made with a microphone transmitter" and "the Bell telephone as used by Dolbear."



The above is the Bell telephone as usually made with a microphone transmitter.

In the last diagram, T is the microphone, B the battery connected with a wire which forms the inside helix of the induction-coil IC. The outside helix of the induction-coil goes to line and to the distant station.

The claims of Dolbear's patent are mere claims for mechanical construction, details of construction, particularly in rearranging the plates of an old condenser receiver, so as to vibrate more powerfully and do a little better than they had done before.

What makes the Dolbear to be a speaking telephone is not what he invented. It is not what he got from Reis. It is what he got from Bell.

The various defendants allege, in their answers, that the speaking telephone had been described, and the art of transmitting speech by electricity fully disclosed, in more than ninety patents and printed publications, before the Bell patent,—many of them a dozen years before.

Yet it is a part of the personal experience of every member of this court, and is a fact in the history of our times, which is undisputed, that speaking telephones were unknown before 1876.

There is not a pretense that any man ever applied to any useful purpose any of the contrivances which are now alleged to have been speech transmitters.

Yet the public were so ready for the speaking telephone that ten years of Bell's patent have put more than half a million of them into use.

The Reis instruments were well known as instruments which could not transmit speech, and the Reis publications never taught any one how to make an instrument that could. Bell's invention is brought within the authorities on the subject.

Howe v. Underwood, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 162; Howe v. Morton, Id. 594; Penn v. Bibby, L. R. 2 Ch. App. Cas. 127; Tilghman v. Proctor, 102 U. S. 708 (26:279).

The method, and not the form of the apparatus which embodied it, constituted the substance of the invention.

In Bischoff v. Wethered, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 815 (19:880), this court, by Mr. Justice Bradley, said: "The whole subject matter of a patent is an embodied conception."

In Winans v. Denmead, 56 U. S. 15 How. 330 (14:717), (Curtis, J.), it is said that the inventor before the court might justly assert; "My improvement did not consist in a change of form, but in the employment of principles or powers in a new mode of operation, embodied in a form by means of which a new or better result is produced; it was this which constituted my invention."

The rule of law about Prior Publications. That the Reis publications were known for many years without leading to the use of speaking telephones, in the case of a machine so much wanted that the public took it at once the instant Bell offered it, is a proof from experience that the publications were not sufficient under the rule of law.

Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 516 (20: 33); Cohn v. U. S. Corset Co. 98 U. S. 366 (23: 907); Cahill v. Brown, 15 Off. Gaz. 697; Atlantic Giant Powder Co. v. Parker, 16 Off. Gaz. 495; Hood v. Boston Car-Spring Co. 21 Fed. Rep. 67; Betts v. Menzies, 10 H. L. Cas. 154; S. C. Goodeve's Pat. Cas. 51; Neilson v. Betts, L. R. 5 H. L. 15; S. C. Goodeve's Pat. Cas. 56.

Can any swearing of professional experts now make this court believe that the Reis was a speaking telephone? Such testimony, and the men who give it, have been characterized by the courts.

Neilson v. Betts, supra.

In McCormick v. Talcott, 61 U. S. 20 How. 409 (15: 933) this court spoke of such depositions as "The opinions (the reveries they may often be called) of a class of men styled experts; men as often skillful and effective in producing obscurity and error as in the elucidation of truth."

It would not be material if, to-day, by applying to Reis' contrivance the knowledge disclosed by Bell and his successors, making it perform a new operation and cause the undulations of the Bell patent, it would produce the new result of the Bell patent.

Morris v. McMillin, 112 U. S. 248 (28: 704); Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Locomotive E. S. Truck Co. 110 U. S. 490 (28: 222); Blake v. San Francisco, 113 U. S. 682 (28: 1071); Consolidated S. Valve Co. v. Crosby S. G. & Valve Co. Id. 170 (28: 943); Clough v. Barker, 106 U. S. 176 (27: 137).

In Smith v. Nichols, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 118 (22: 567), it is said "A patentable invention is a mental result."

Winans v. Denmead, 56 U. S. 15 How. 330 (14: 717).

Criticisms on the form of the patent are simply attempts to pick a flaw in Bell's paper title to that which he has earned. They are attempts to recall the grant on behalf of that community which has received and enjoyed the consideration he gave for it. The courts have often expressed their views on this subject.

Howe v. Underwood, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 162; Grant v. Raymond, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 218 (8: 376); Hinks v. Safety Lighting Co. L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 607; S. C. Goodeve's Pat. Cas. 254; United Telephone Co. v. Harrison, Goodeve's Pat. Cas. 484.

The Patent Office found at the time that the language of the Bell patent was intelligible, and conveyed some definite idea. This, we submit, is conclusive on that question.

It is in accordance with all the rules of law, that an objection is considered of no avail, if not taken when it could be corrected.

Roemer v. Simon, 95 U. S. 220 (24: 386); Webster Loom Co. v. Higgins, 105 U. S. 596 (26: 1183).

The description is sufficient in law in the patent.

Pickering v. McCullough, 104 U. S. 318 (26: 751); Webster Loom Co. v. Higgins, 105 U. S. 586 (26: 1179); Gibson v. Harris, 1 Blatchf. 171.

The presentation of such a patent proves in law a completed invention from the date of filing.

Dane v. Chicago Mfg. Co. 2 Off. Gaz. 677; S. C. 8 Biss. 380; S. C. 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 130; Wing v. Richardson, 2 Cliff. 449; S. C. 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 535; Wheeler v. Chipper M. & R. Co. 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 1; S. C. 10 Blatchf. 181; Johnsen v. Fassman, 1 Woods, 188; Kelleher v. Darling, 4 Cliff. 426.

A specification prepared, executed, shown to others, promptly filed, and resulting in a patent, carries the invention back to its date of execution.

Webster Loom Co. v. Higgins, 105 U. S. 594 (26: 1182); Colgate v. Western U. Tel. Co. 15 Blatchf. 365; Colgate v. Gold & S. Tel. Co. 16 Blatchf. 505.

What constitutes infringement and how to ascertain it, has never been stated better, or with more freedom from confusing refinements, than in the Sewing Machine Case.

Howe v. Morton, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 588.

Bell first accomplished a great result, entirely new in kind, by the use of a means entirely new in kind.

Tilghman v. Proctor, 102 U. S. 708 (26: 279); Corning v. Burden, 56 U. S. 15 How. 267 (14: 690).

It is well settled that if the experiments do not result in a useful machine, particular features of it "cannot be dug up in after years and produced to defeat the patent of an independent and successful inventor."

Aultman v. Holley, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 534; 11 Blatchf. 317 (Woodruff, J.); Whiteley v. Swayne, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 685 (19: 199); Johnson v. Root, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 366 (Sprague, J.) Same case on a second trial, 2 Cliff. 643 (Clifford, J.)

Mr. William W. Ker, for the Clay Commercial Telephone Company:

It is alleged in the complaint that the American Bell Telephone is "a corporation duly established under the laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts." This is a descriptive allegation, not proved as laid, which is a fatal variance.

1 Greenl. Ev. 82, § 64.

The name of the proposed corporation is not mentioned in the body of the Act. "When a corporation is erected, a name must be given to it, and by that name alone it must sue and be sued, and do all legal acts."

1 Bl. Com. chap. 18, p. 476; Ang. & Ames, Corp. 10th ed. § 1; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 636 (4: 659).

The title cannot confer the name American Bell Telephone Company upon the corporation. "The title of a statute, it has been repeatedly held, is no part or parcel of the statute."

Potter's Dwarr. Stat. & Const. 102; Sedg. Const. Stat. 2d ed. 39, 40; Mills v. Wilkins, 6 Mod. 62; Hadden v. Barney, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 107 (18: 518); Commonwealth v. Slifer, 53 Pa. 71; Union Pass. R. Co's. Appeal, 81* Pa. 94.

The special Act does not give the persons named in it power to assume a name. It gives them power to organize a corporation. The Act is to be taken most beneficially for the sovereign, and against the grantee.

2 Bl. Com. 347; Potter's Dwarr. Stat. 146, 215; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, supra; Commonwealth v. Erie & N.E. R. Co. 27 Pa. 351.

The special Act refers to chapter 224, by enacting that Bell and his associates might "organize a corporation according to the provisions of chapter 224." The powers conferred by the special Act are limited to the precise language used. The language confers no authority upon the Secretary of the Commonwealth to issue such a certificate as has been offered in evidence.

Commonwealth v. Central Pass. R. Co. 52 Pa. 520; Bowling Green & M. R. Co. v. Warren County Court, 10 Bush, 711; Ellis v. Paige, 1 Pick. 43; Farmers' L. & Trust Co. v. Carroll, 5 Barb. 613; Ang. & Ames, Corp. §§ 81, 111.

The Bell Telephone Company of Philadelphia is one of the complainants mentioned in the bill of complaint. No Act, law, charter, or evidence was offered to prove that such a corporation ever did exist.

The assignment from the Bell Telephone Company recites other agreements that are a part of the chain of title. The counsel for defendants objected to the reception of the evidence, and, as a part of the objection, called for the agreements mentioned in the assignment. The evidence should have been produced with the agreements mentioned therein, and proper proof made of the execution thereof.

The Bell Telephone Company is alleged to have been incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts "to carry on business for the whole United States outside of New England," and was thus prohibited from carrying on business in Massachusetts, under whose laws it was incorporated. Therefore, the company should be regarded not as a corporation, but merely as a partnership.

"No rule of comity will allow one State to spawn corporations and send them forth in other States to be nurtured and do business there, when said first-mentioned State will not allow them to do business within its own boundaries."

Land Grant R. & Trust Co. v. Coffee County, 6 Kan. 245; Hill v. Beach, 12 N. J. Eq. 31.

This judgment and decree are erroneous, because the complainants' proofs show that the American Bell Telephone Company owned but two thirds of the patent dated March 7, 1876, and but one third of the patent dated January 30, 1877.

The evidence shows that Bell was not the original and first inventor of the inventions described in the patent. His apparatus is inherently unfit for telephonic purposes in the transmission of articulate speech.

The court below erred in entering a decree against the appellants, Scott and others, who were officers or directors of the Clay Commercial Telephone Company, and not jointly carrying on the business of telephony.

The court below erred in entering a decree against the appellant, Henry Clay, who had conveyed to the Clay Commercial Telephone Company the letters patent that had been granted to him, and had no further interest in the patents.

The bill of complaint is defective for want of sufficient parties.

The complainants failed to prove the material allegations set forth in the bill of complaint.

Bell's letters patent are not good and valid in law.

The evidence shows that the instruments used by the Clay Commercial Telephone Company are not arranged or constructed according to the specifications and claims set forth in the Bell patents; and that the defendants had not infringed said patents.

Messrs. Lysander Hill, George F. Edmunds, Don M. Dickinson, T. S. E. Dixon, Charles P. Crosby, H. C. Andrews and Melville Church, for the People's Telephone Company (the Drawbaugh Case) and the Overland Telephone Company:

It is conceded that the machines conceived and constructed by Daniel Drawbaugh, which did transmit articulate speech, operated on the principle which has been applied under the Bell patents.

The principle is that of transmitting articulate speech upon wires by a continuous electric current, with the addition of means to cause incidental undulations of the current corresponding with the incidental tones of the human voice.

When applied in the electric speaking telephone the practical result is, that the same air vibrations set in motion by the human voice, and producing sound by their impact upon the tympanum of the ear, are repeated with comparative exactness upon the tympanum or diaphragm of the transmitting instrument, are then by the process carried to a distance, and there with equal exactness repeated upon the tympanum or diaphragm of the receiver, and thence again repeated upon the tympanum of the listening ear.

The issue is simply, Did Alexander Graham Bell or Daniel Drawbaugh first conceive and apply this principle, and clothe the conception in substantial forms which demonstrated at once its practical efficacy and utility?

This court has clearly laid down the lines within which legal evidence can solve the question in favor of Drawbaugh.

Gayler v. Wilder, 51 U. S. 10 How. 477 (13: 504); Coffin v. Ogden, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 120 (21: 821).

When the Drawbaugh defense is tested by these cases, no attack can reach it.

The policy of the law is to give the utmost possible encouragement and protection to the inventor, not to the patentee.

The vast amounts invested under the Bell patents and in perfecting them, the hosts of people who have their "all" invested, the reflections upon "unscrupulous speculators," said to be behind Drawbaugh, cannot add a feather in weighing the matter of priority of invention.

The date of Bell's alleged invention can be fixed no earlier than March 10, 1876; certainly no earlier than February 14, 1876.

But for the purposes of the Drawbaugh defense, we may safely set the date of the conception by Bell at June 2, 1875.

Previous to this he had abandoned experiments with the diaphragm, and it was not until December 28, 1875, in his interview with

Mr. George Brown, of Toronto, Canada, that he drew a sketch of his July, 1875, instrument, predicated upon his experiments subsequent to June 2, 1875, and placed upon it these words in his own handwriting: "First attempt to transmit the human voice."

And so, though the evidence permits us to place it later, we fix the earliest date of Bell's invention, June 2, 1875.

We present a history from the first idea conceived by Drawbaugh, of transmitting articulate speech over a telegraph wire in 1859-60, through various experiments by which the conception finally took on mechanical, though rude forms, and became of practical use, down to the finished and nicely-adjusted mechanism; all prior to the date of Bell's invention.

This history rests for its general truthfulness, and for the accuracy of its details, upon the direct and positive testimony of an entire community, and of visitors to that community, representing all classes.

Over two hundred persons testify to knowledge of Drawbaugh's telephones as an accomplished invention prior to the date of Bell's. Over seventy talked through the machine. Over one hundred and thirty saw the machines, and most of these identify instruments.

Drawbaugh's shop was a common resort for people and a place to which visitors were frequently taken, while Drawbaugh himself was considered a remarkable man among the people.

The great mass of evidence for the defense is not of illiterate or careless witnesses, but on the contrary is that kind which is admitted to be even superior to that of the mere learned or scientific. There is no room for mistake.

So strong and vigorous was this class of testimony that the court below was constrained to hold that "The case made by these witnesses is sufficiently formidable to overcome the legal presumption of the validity of the complainant's patent."

It is doubtless true that strong circumstantial should sometimes overcome direct evidence, as in Howe v. Underwood, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 162.

But the testimony here is far beyond the range of that doctrine. Other rules apply.

In this case we have hundreds of witnesses, each describing either the knowledge of his own senses of a result, or of the hearing of the result, which, if in fact it occurred, or if in fact he heard of it, was the most startling and unheard of thing in all his experience.

It was not merely a wonderful mechanical contrivance, but here was an unseen and mysterious cause, whose processes were not discoverable to the vision, whose force seemed rather of the unnatural, and whose results alone impressed the mind and memory.

If the machine talked, and the witness heard it, there can be no doubt of the accuracy of the impression made.

It is the strongest possible corroboration that the witnesses do not agree in their memories of the, to them, novel parts of the instrument; or are at fault or are mistaken as to the identity of the instruments, or of the difference between the carbon or variable-resistance machines and the magneto machines.

They are agreed in memory of the great, conclusive fact, THAT THIS MACHINE DID TALK.

We find repeated and constantly appearing support of the main facts testified to, in perfectly natural and consistent collateral matters.

We find the unlearned and unskilled remembering well the talking machine, when clothed in the familiar garb of a tin mustard box or common glass tumbler, and forgetting other details; we find others remembering the instruments with any peculiarity about them like the spiral magnet better than they can recall other parts; we find the blacksmith remembering the shape and position of the permanent magnet with which he is familiar, and forgetting all about the electro-magnet, of which he knew nothing. We find a farmer, recalling all the details for applying electricity about the machines, but cease to wonder at his accuracy when we find that he had at some time before greatly interested himself about practical electrical machinery. The very diversity of detail, the absence of concurrence in circumstance, in occasion and in time, presents this mass of testimony impregnable against the complainants' theory, that it is the product of consultation or of prearrangement.

Care has been taken, in summoning witnesses to testify, to call no man whose character or whose word could be successfully impeached by any methods known to the law.

The charges of conspiracy and of gullibility against these witnesses rest only upon the bare statements of counsel. The lives of all the witnesses are clean, their characters for truth and veracity unassailed.

We submit an analysis of the testimony, and call particular attention to the absolute certainty of the dates as fixed by collateral matters in every instance.

Complainants have introduced forty-eight witnesses to show that they never saw the machines and never heard them spoken of. Of these but ten stand the test of cross-examination and rebuttal. Among these are Theophilus Weaver, who had been employed by the complainants to get up testimony, and was not on good terms with Drawbaugh, and David A. Hauck, with whom Drawbaugh had a suit and who was adjudged, both by the Examiner of Interferences, and, subsequently upon appeal, by the Board of Chief Examiners, to have sworn falsely.

This case affords striking illustration of the wisdom of those settled legal rules for valuing evidence, which give great weight to positive and little weight to negative testimony.

This court said in Stitt v. Huidekoper, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 384, 394 (21: 644, 647): "It is a rule that ordinarily a witness who testifies to an affirmative, is to be preferred to one who testifies to a negative.

See also Collection of Cases, 14 U. S. Dig. 642; Gilb. Ev. 140; 1 Stark. Ev. § 82.

While no person possessing a memory could well forget having talked through one of these machines, yet it may be true, that others who testify that they never heard of it, or did not see it, tell the truth, from lack of opportunity to see or hear it.

The difference in the ability of persons to recall facts is a matter of common observation; and witnesses may be influenced not to remember.

(Counsel here commented on the testimony of complainant's witnesses.)

Negative witnesses cannot stand against the positive testimony of men who saw and talked through the telephone, remember the words, and identify the instruments.

It would be presumable that the three or four witnesses testifying that Drawbaugh did not speak to them were omitted to be spoken to by him, because of discouragement, or diffidence, or experience of repeated rebuff, rather than that the positive testimony of himself, and of so many witnesses of character, is wickedly false.

Drawbaugh and his witnesses should have the benefit of the presumption in favor of truth and honesty.

When a man is relating an exceptional experience—an astonishing result, a mystery connected with spoken words—it would be more incredible if he did not remember it.

Resort has been had, not to the testimony, but to the theory of the inherent incredibility of the defense, and especially of the story of Drawbaugh himself.

Drawbaugh's history of himself and of his experiments and labors upon the electric speaking-telephone from 1860 to 1879, inclusive, must be either a truthful statement, or one manufactured by a wicked mind; yet, all the methods known to the profession have been applied for the purpose of breaking down his testimony, and without success.

Upon the course and path of his life, and his relations and dealings with all men from his boyhood down to his fifty-eighth year, the complainants have focused a light which has made luminous every detail. But we find that he bore a character, and had a life record, whose honesty and truthfulness could not be assailed. All bear testimony to his steadiness, his industry, his enthusiasm in physics, and especially in electric science.

The record is full of evidence of the employment of "agents" from the community, by the complainants, in a search for matter wherewith to attack him.

It has never been true in the history of jurisprudence that a fabricated story, covering a long period and a series of transactions, could stand the tests applied to it in the courts of justice.

Drawbaugh's testimony covers 332 pages, of which 180 pages are cross-examination, and the complainants commanded every available resource and all the ability and knowledge, both scientific, legal and common, that would by any possibility be put into an attempt to break a witness by cross-examination.

A careful reading of this testimony is convincing of its truth. The very faults of Drawbaugh's memory, the immaterial contradictions and changing of immaterial dates only go to strengthen the conviction that the history as related is genuine and truthful. It is without a trace of the inflexibility which characterizes fabrication. The man that speaks is in harmony with the history of the man's character as related; in harmony with all knowledge of the honest, ingenuous, open-minded genius, as portrayed by the account of his life.

It is said by the complainants that Drawbaugh was not a learned man; that no one but a scientist could have invented the telephone; and the fact of his busying himself with other inventions in mechanical contrivances is used as showing that he could not have conceived or had his mind upon so great a discovery as that of the transmission of articulate speech.

So far as the learning is concerned, it can be shown that successful inventors are not the product of the universities, but of natural conditions and of tendencies common enough in American civilization. Genius is innate, and the man possessing it is the man who must advance in its use.

No mere theory can give the accurate and ready knowledge which practice imparts. Von Humboldt found at Calabozo an electrical machine, the work of a man who had never seen any instrument, who had no person to consult, and who was acquainted with the phenomena of electricity only by reading the treatise of De Lafond and Franklin's Memoirs.

The Royal Society of London once elected to honorary membership a man who first demonstrated that lightning and electricity were one, whose reports as to his experiments with a kite and a key, it had formerly refused to receive and had made sport of. He stands in history and science as among the most eminent of natural philosophers. He was a "Yankee tallow chandler's son, a printer runaway boy," for whom the schools did nothing.

Michael Faraday, the son of a blacksmith, gave his attention to practical experiments with electricity, resulting in the discovery of the induction current.

Hugh Miller's great conceptions took form when, without education, he was working as a laborer at the Cromarty stone yards.

Ampere worked out difficult mathematical problems with sticks and stones before he had learned the names or forms of figures.

But it is said Drawbaugh busied himself with mechanical contrivances of comparative insignificance.

So did Robert Fulton, Guttenberg and Franklin. Again, the attack is made upon the credibility of Drawbaugh's story, upon the ground that such an invention would have been widely known, and would have commanded all the resources necessary to present it to the public.

But the telephone seemed a mystery and a novelty, of no practical utility, to the learned and the rich of the great cities, long after Bell's patents were issued.

Morse, who conceived the electric telegraph, for twelve years thereafter struggled with poverty, to secure any consideration for it.

Elias Howe for years suffered the pangs of poverty and failure to get friends or capital interested in the sewing machine in this country, or in England.

Now, what is there in this case that so distinguishes it in the domain of judicial investigation as to require a reversal of settled rules of evidence?

Direct and positive affirmative evidence, unimpeached and uncontradicted, seems in the court below to have failed of legal virtue when applied to this particular controversy; and the rule as to presumptions is so radically altered that the testimony of four doubtful witnesses that they did not hear of a fact—no, that they did not remember hearing of it—shall be received as finally closing the door against the possibility of its existence, and against the recognition of all direct and positive testimony of twenty-seven equally credible men and women, that they actually did see and hear of the thing.

And although he did apply to twenty-seven others, it is conclusively assumed that he did not have a telephone, because he did not apply to these four gentlemen. As well might it have been assumed that Howe did not invent the sewing machine, because, after repeated attempts, he ceased his applications.

Although the greatest inventors and discoverers have died in poverty, or succeeded only after long failure, yet, because Drawbaugh could not at once command recognition and influence, his story is stamped as a fabrication from beginning to end.

The community corroborating him are called knaves or fools. A mind active in the direction of other invention is held evidence that this discovery was beyond his scope.

The learned court below seems to demand a new and a special law of evidence, and a reversal of all the commonly received notions of human nature, to fit this case.

As the complainant's whole theory and the decision of the court below rest upon the basis that Drawbaugh is a fraud, and has had the ingenuity to set up the story and the influence to get it so overwhelmingly corroborated, we submit from the record a brief sketch of "His history, surroundings and testimony."

If a charlatan, unlike his kind, he has not led an itinerant life. All that can be told of him from boyhood to age, all the evil or good that is known of him, all evidences of character, all the impressions, are written of Drawbaugh in one place and upon one community.

The story from his earliest to his latest years is a very simple and homely one. If it be true that he developed into a Machiavelli in his fifty-third year, the incongruity is worth consideration.

He was giving attention to electric science in 1860, and then conceived and talked of "speaking through a telegraphic wire by electricity."

Between 1871 and 1874, Drawbaugh showed Exhibit "C," and said that the voice produced "pulsations" upon the machine.

At that early time he was experimenting with electricity, which seemed to be his hobby.

He was a person of remarkable ingenuity and skill. At thirteen he made a rifle and at a later period was skillful in wood-working. At twelve, he made a part of a clock. At sixteen he manufactured a small steam engine. In 1857, 1859, he constructed and operated a photographic apparatus, making even the lenses himself. He made a solar transit and a machine for wrapping electric wires. He made his galvanometers. He was applied to by others to invent, and did invent, machines for them—the tack machine for Patton, the paper-bag machine for Sengsier, and other machines for the pump company and for the axle company. He was a great mechanical genius and a "great inventor."

All the witnesses concur as to his sobriety, his truthfulness. and his incessant and tireless industry, and of his labors, extending far into the night. He was generous and kindly, and negligent in money matters. His wife refused to sign the deed when he wished to sell their little home, to put money into the "talking machine."

(The counsel here reviewed the evidences showing Drawbaugh's poverty.)

The able opinion of the circuit judge is exhaustive in its treatment of Drawbaugh as a conspirator, a perjurer and as a general fraud.

(Counsel here discussed the evidence on which this charge rests.)

A brief sketch of the Conception and Progress of Drawbaugh's Telephone.

He early began to study the subject. He experimented with the vocal organs, and had learned the fact that sound set up vibrations in solid substances.

He pursued the principle always, that the current must not be broken, and from the first his conception was of a continuous current.

(Counsel here goes into the evidence on this subject, showing his experiments and the progress of his invention.)

The story of Drawbaugh then, and of the record, overwhelmingly corroborated by the witnesses for the defense, is as follows:

Early conception and experiments with the continuous current, 1862. 1866 and 1867.

Tea-cup transmitter and receiver, 1866 and 1867.

Tumbler and tin cup and mustard can ("F" and "B"), 1867 and 1869.

Improvement upon "B" ("C"), 1869, 1870.

Further improvement upon "C" and the more perfect magneto instrument "I," 1870, 1871.

Mouthpiece changed to centre, and adjusting screw inserted (Exhibit "A"), 1874.

"D" and "E," perfectly adjusted and finished magneto instruments, January and February, 1875.

"L," "M," "G" and "O," from February 1875, to August, 1876.

"H," August, 1876.

"J," "N" and "P," 1878.

The reason why Drawbaugh was seen by some of the witnesses working with the earlier machines, after the perfection of the instruments "D" and "E," on other earlier magneto instruments, was that Drawbaugh, on discovering that the magneto receiver "B," as improved and organized in the improved "C," in 1870, would serve as a transmitter, temporarily abandoned the variable resistance transmitters, "F" and "B," and did not return to experiments and progress on them till 1875. From them, through a series of experiments and improvement, came finally the perfect carbon instruments in 1878.

As to the claim that Drawbaugh was still experimenting, when defendants' evidence shows he had accomplished the invention, the answer is that the instrument in his view "was not loud enough for practical purposes." He wanted it to talk out as a man talks.

The charge that Drawbaugh did not make known his invention to his associates in the shops where he worked has nothing to rest upon.

(Counsel reviews the evidence on this point and also the testimony of thirty-seven of defendants' witnesses establishing the invention of Drawbaugh.)

Without continuing an extended analysis we refer briefly, in addition to the foregoing, and in addition to the witnesses discussed and quoted, to the following equally strong and positive testimony (citing the testimony of about seventy additional witnesses).

Ephraim R. Holsinger, a newspaper man and job printer, was called by the complainants who proved by him that he published a card for Drawbaugh before June, 1874, containing a partial list of inventions and not mentioning the telephone.

This card is as follows:

Dan'l Drawbaugh,

INVENTOR OF

THE FOLLOWING PATENTS.

Stave, Heading & Shingle Cutter.
Barrel Machinery.
STAVE JOINTING MACHINE, Many in use.
Tram & Bed-staff for leveling face of Millstone.
Rine and Driver for running Millstone.
Nail Machinery for Feeding Nail Plates.
PUMPS, ROTARAY & OTHERS.
Hydraulic Ram.
THE DRAWBAUGH Rotary Measuring Faucet, very extensivly used.
CARPET RAG LOOPER—A little device by which rags are looped quick and firm, without Needle or Thread.
ELECTRIC CLOCK.

MAGNETO ELECTRIC MACHINE,

For short line Telegraphing, Fire Alarm, and Propelling Electric Clocks. It can be applied to any form of Electric movement.
Gives entire satisfaction USING NO GALVANIC BATTERY.—
☞ For SIMPLICITY it has NO RIVAL.

We say of it:

1. It was prepared by Holsinger, without Drawbaugh's supervision.

2. It purports only to give a list of patented inventions.

3. It purports to give a list of practical and everyday tools used among the people where the card was issued.

4. The advertisement in it of a double machine for telephoning would have been absurd.

5. It was early in 1874, and Drawbaugh had no telephone machines ready for sale, and the card purports to advertise only for sale to the class of people about there, and it omitted the gas governor and wire wrappers and the stamp canceller, for the same reason, i. e., such people did not use them.

6. Drawbaugh would not care to advertise to patent pirates the matter of his greatest work, to no good purpose.

7. His object was to get everyday work without calling attention to his "hobby."

8. Holsinger talked through the, to him, perfect, because finished, machines "D" and "E" (not finished until February 1875), in the summer of 1875, a year after the card: and the "experiments," as he calls them, of 1874 were with the rude and unclosed machines "F," "B" and "C."

Finally, the witness Holsinger distinctly states that his testimony for defendants is correct.

Of the witnesses, all, with the exception of eight, give their testimony as to having seen or talked with the machines prior to June 2, 1875, the date of Bell's invention; and in every case the testimony shows that the date has been fixed accurately by collateral and convincing circumstances.

To corroborate the dates we called a number of witnesses, who testified as to being told of the machines and of the common report of the machines, at the dates which the foregoing witnesses have fixed as the time they saw them; and this latter class of witnesses as accurately fix the dates.

We have in almost every instance called a stranger to the witness giving the direct testimony, to establish the date of such collateral fact.

(Counsel here recites the evidence).

A number of the original parts of these instruments exist and are in evidence, and from the parts and from the testimony of Drawbaugh and other witnesses describing them reproduced instruments were constructed, in order to show the court how they appeared and acted, when completed in all their parts. Of the reproductions "F" was the only one of the four which was a carbon instrument.

The court below lays great stress upon the failure of these instruments to do satisfactory work in the New York tests. The instruments were again reproduced and properly adjusted at Philadelphia, and worked perfectly.

It is difficult to see wherein the essential parts of these machines differ, and it is perfectly plain that the New York tests failed of perfect action from the rough treatment the machines had had, and, from having been shaken out of adjustment.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, for the People's Telephone Company (Drawbaugh Case), and the Overland Telephone Company:

The court below was right in its theory that this method of transmitting speech by electrical contrivances actually existed at the time that the defendants' testimony in the court below said that it did, or else that the whole of the defendants' testimony is false.

It was found by the court below that the story that was told by Drawbaugh and his witnesses was untrue.

If the things took place that the testimony tends to show, then Bell's case, as a prior inventor and entitled to prevent the use of these machines invented by Drawbaugh, has no place in this court.

The question that you are now to pronounce upon is not whether Drawbaugh shall have a patent; it is the question of whether he and those who have taken up his cause shall have a right to use their instruments against the intervention of Bell as a prior inventor.

It is of no consequence whether Drawbaugh has an application for a patent now pending, or whether he never made an application or thought of making an application for a patent.

The point is whether Bell is the first and prior inventor of a useful invention and has made a proper application for its exclusive use.

What is to become of the Drawbaugh invention or the Gray invention has nothing to do with this case.

A telephone is a contrivance for transmitting speech; an extremely useful, ingenious and valuable invention.

Are you to say that every man who lived in this neighborhood in Pennsylvania, and that this old unlettered man, Drawbaugh, whose life had been pure from beginning to end, are liars?

I deny it. It is against human experience; it is against human morals; it is against every principle and test.

I want to ask Your Honors to read this testimony both of the complainants and of the defendants, in this People's cause, and the Overland cause, which brings in some later testimony, and see whether you can say, as Judge Wallace did, that the statement of this poor old inventor himself is a fabrication, and that every other part of it, as to events that they say took place before this patent of Bell was applied for, was a pure delusion, and that the testimony of scores and scores of men and women, having no common concert, was a fabrication.

Suppose Drawbaugh had applied for a patent before Bell, and the Commissioner of Patents had said "I will not grant you this telephone patent because it is not a useful invention," and we appeal and come here with this testimony, could there be a doubt that you would say that that thing did exist and that Drawbaugh did it? It is impossible to deny it.

I believe you all would have thought, as Orton thought, and as the Stock Exchange thought at New York, and as everybody else thought at that period of time, "We cannot grant this patent because it is a mere toy."

I think the key to the whole of it is, that at the time when this invention was being carried forward by this man, nobody believed it was otherwise than the idea of what is now called a crank. Some people—for people differ in their emotions and their sensibilities and their perceptibilities—said "It is impossible."

Nobody believed it. That would dispose of one class of these witnesses, who said it was impossible. The other class said: "What good will it do that you can speak through this piece of wire and by this contrivance?

It took a year or more before Bell and all his coadjutors, with millions of capital and enterprise and ambition behind to push it forward, and not an over amount of scruples before to retard it, brought his invention to be believed in and invested in and operated by the public as a useful invention. It turns out to be useful.

If Drawbaugh had done the same thing that Bell had, in the same time, you would have believed the whole thing was a conspiracy and a lie and that the thing did not exist now. You would not have believed the evidence of your own senses.

Witnesses are called upon, one by one, to state what they remember; that they saw the thing and heard the voice. How are you going to disbelieve it? Why, Judge Wallace says: "It is absolutely incredible that Drawbaugh could have done that thing." That is the honest statement of the judgment of the court below, and it is the best ground on which the complainant's case below and the appellees here can be put.

That is the ground upon which the court below held that the Drawbaugh contrivances, machines, instruments, operations, and facts never existed.

Now, I beg that Your Honors will not commit yourselves to any such theory of the weighing of human testimony as that. But let us see how they treat Drawbaugh alone. I don't mean to leave Mr. Drawbaugh in the category in which Mr. Justice Wallace left him.

How are you going to tell whether a man is an honest man or not? All that we can judge by is the life and conversation of the person in question. If a man has been an immoral man, you doubt him.

Suppose a man, whose life from his birth to the day of giving his testimony has been pure, has been upright, has been respected, and that in the whole forty years that he had lived in that community never a shade or a suspicion had touched it; and he tells you a tale of an event that he himself was the doer of, and which is within the range of sanity; would you believe him, although two years, five years, ten years after, a scientist, glorified by capital and by fame, had said: "I have done that thing, and therefore you could not have done it before?" That is a statement of this case as applied to the testimony of Drawbaugh himself, if you took him alone.

And he is surrounded and fortified by scores and scores of honest and respectable people, whose character is not impeached any more than his is, who say that they saw and heard that thing done long before Bell's discovery. So that I submit that you cannot fail to say that it is proved that this old man, in that obscure place, did do the thing that Bell did, in 1876 or 1877.

I am under the impression that it is not really disputed by the gentlemen on the other side that if the things took place at Eberly's Mills, from 1869 to 1875 and '6, that the defendants' witnesses say did, and that Drawbaugh says did, then Drawbaugh used the same principle, employed the same method, the same process, in substance and in effect that were employed by Bell.

If therefore the contrivance is the same in substance, and it existed before, then Drawbaugh and his friends ought to be allowed to use it. If it is not the same, then clearly, of course, they ought to be allowed to use it, because it does not infringe Bell's patent.

Something has been said about Gray's hav-ng applied for a telephone patent in 1876, the same day that Bell did, but I will not dwell on this. What I have said is, to my mind, the key to the whole thing on the question of priority.

Judge Wallace stood on the idea that it is intrinsically impossible that Drawbaugh could have had such a conception. Why? Because it required what is called scientific training. A force of nature has never been discovered by such logical steps as Judge Wallace thought necessary. Bell himself was struggling and struggling to do something which he could not reach. How did he get it at last? Accidentally. It was not logic that did it. It was not logic that led Franklin to put his kite up in the sky. It was not logic that has led anybody to discover anything. It is not training that does it, although training is useful.

Take Arkwright, the great English inventor of the cotton spinning machinery; was he a student, a professor, a teacher, of any kind of science? Not a bit of it. He was a barber.

Watt, another Englishman,—where was his scholasticism, his great accumulation of scientific knowledge?

I can run down through Fulton, and Whitney, the cotton-gin man; and what was he? A man skillful in mechanics? No; he was a lawyer in an obscure country town in Georgia, living on a plantation, and teaching the children.

This lawyer invented the cotton gin. Up start my brothers on the other side and say, as Judge Wallace said below, "Why it is utterly impossible."

I could go through, of course, innumerable illustrations which demonstrate that the correlation between what we call scientific knowledge and education and the discovery of these important forces of nature and their application has no connection whatever. And that it is more often than otherwise that the obscure genius whom God made, and whom the schools did not make, and the obscure mechanics have been men who have brought to the knowledge of mankind most of the things which we now consider to be the most useful to us.

I must say that in respect of the topic to which I have called Your Honors' attention, that it is the end of this case, if Your Honors will take this testimony as to what took place in an honest and respectable community in Pennsylvania for years and years, year in and year out, proved by the whole body of the community, of every calling, in support of this honest old man whose career is not questioned as a man of purity of life, of uprightness of character, although poor and sorrowful; there is an end of it, and if you will only read the testimony, I have nothing more to say.

Oral argument of Mr. James J. Storrow, for the American Bell Telephone Company, on the Drawbaugh defense:

Drawbaugh's story is that he had electric speaking-telephones for eight years before the Bell patent, at his machine shop at Eberly's Mills; and yet these telephones were never used for any useful purposes whatever.

According to his story they were kept in a box, and he took them out once in a while to experiment with, or to entertain visitors. That was the only use he ever made of them.

It is impossible that a practical telephone, successful, operative, could have been there without coming into use.

Not a human being in the world ever transmitted speech by reason of any information derived from Drawbaugh. The telephones which have come into the world are the result of the independent inventions of other persons, and are not due to any information from Drawbaugh.

We know how Bell's instruments astonished the world, how his feeble instrument at the Centennial made him famous.

Such an invention could not help publishing itself. If it exists, it gets published necessarily.

The argument that was made yesterday was that Mr. Orton, the president of the Western Union Company, saw the telephones of Bell, in the spring of 1877; examined them, and pronounced them to be a mere scientific toy.

The facts are that in the summer of 1877 Mr. Orton said that the Western Union must have the speaking-telephone, and on September 6, 1877, made a contract with Dolbear to at once put out telephones and about the same time made a similar contract with Gray.

On December 1, 1877, Mr. Orton had organized a new company, the "American Speaking Telephone Company." In the spring of 1878, Mr. Orton's companies were actively engaged in furnishing telephones for commercial use.

Drawbaugh was first set up to anticipate the Bell patent by a statement in the newspapers, in the summer of 1880, that his associates had proposed to obtain a patent for him as the first inventor of the speaking telephone.

That was the first announcement of Drawbaugh to the world. This suit was brought in October, 1880, and resulted in a preliminary injunction.

There was a hearing on a motion against the Overland Company at Philadelphia in which the Drawbaugh defense was set up.

The Drawbaugh Case on its merits has been considered by Judge Wallace and by no other judge.

The defendants did not use and never intended to use any telephone made or devised by Drawbaugh. A company formed in the beginning of 1880 had proposed to use telephones devised by Klemm and by Tisdel, and were afraid they would be enjoined, and after they had started in that enterprise, they bought Drawbaugh's pretentions.

Drawbaugh is set up as a prior inventor to destroy the Bell patent. Drawbaugh's telephones were never used practically for any useful purpose. That they were not used is proof that they did not then exist or were not then capable of use.

All the apparatus alleged to have been made before 1875 by Drawbaugh has gone so far into ruins that it is impossible to transmit sound with it, except instrument "A" alleged to have been made in the fall of 1874. That instrument is a good receiver for a speaking-telephone, but it is not a speaking-telephone. It takes two instruments to make a telephone.

Of those instruments alleged to have been made in or before 1874, the parts absolutely required to make any sound cannot be restored, or their character learned, except from Drawbaugh's deposition.

After the injunction and the answer and replication, we put in our usual prima facie case, proved our patent and infringement. Then the defendants took testimony about Drawbaugh's story,—one hundred and twenty-five witnesses. Then we took about one hundred witnesses on the Drawbaugh story. Then they took about two hundred, and then we took some more, and so on, until, after about three years and a half of work, in June, 1884, the case was completed and ready for argument.

The case then went to a hearing and was decided by Judge Wallace in favor of the Bell patent about the first of December, 1884.

When the Drawbaugh decision was announced the Overland Company had not completed their testimony, and they took more testimony about Drawbaugh.

By agreement that was incorporated in the Drawbaugh Case, and laid before Judge Wallace, and argued before him on the last of November, 1875, and upon that hearing he affirmed his former decision.

We are justified in saying that whatever they did not supply at the second hearing does not exist. Mere oral recollections never yet made out a case.

In such cases, the defendant's proofs must remove doubts; every reasonable doubt should be resolved against him.

Coffin v. Ogden, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 120 (21: 821); Parham v. American Buttonhole, O. & S. M. Co. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 468.

Oral recollections cannot prevail against reasonable inferences from conduct.

Wood v. Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 550; Atlantic Works v. Brady, 107 U. S. 192 (27: 438).

Such testimony should be weighed with care, and the defense allowed to prevail only where the evidence is such as to leave no room for a reasonable doubt upon the subject.

Howe v. Underwood, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 162; Roberts v. Reed Torpedo Co. 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 630; Boulton v. Bull, 1 Carpmael, Pat. Cas. 137; Kendall v. Winsor, 62 U. S. 21 How. 322 (16:165).

Incomplete attempts to construct a machine amount to nothing as evidence to support such a defense.

Kelleher v. Darling, 4 Cliff. 424; Judson v. Bradford, 3 Ban. & Ard. 539; Ely v. Monson & B. Mfg. Co. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 79.

The inoperative character of the machine disposes of the oral testimony.

Johnson v. Root, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 292; Cahoon v. Ring, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 408; S. C. 1 Cliff. 592; Hayden v. Suffolk Mfg. Co. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 94; Motte v. Bennett, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 642; McCormick v. Seymour, 3 Blatchf. 213; Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 516 (20: 33); Aultman v. Holley, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 534; S. C. 11 Blatchf. 317; Colt v. Massachusetts Arms Co. 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 116; Parham v. American Buttonhole, O. & S. M. Co. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 468; Smith v. Fay, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 450; Brown v. Guild, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 181 (23: 161).

The disuse of a machine may be explained.

Hayden v. Suffolk Mfg. Co. supra; Snow v. Tapley, 18 Off. Gaz. 548; Goodyear v. Day, 2 Wall. Jr. 283; Roberts v. Reed Torpedo Co. 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 630; Roberts v. Schreiber, 18 Off. Gaz. 125.

This is an attempt to defeat a meritorious patented invention by proof that something similar had been previously known, though it had never been perfected, and had never been any useful contribution to human knowledge or convenience.

Smith v. Fay, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 446; LaBaw v. Hawkins, 1 Ban. & Ard. 428; Ransom v. Mayor of N. Y. 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 252; Cahoon v. Ring, Id. 397; Goodyear v. Day, supra; White v. Allen, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 453; Gottfried v. Phillip Best Brewing Co. 5 Ban. & Ard. 4; Putnam v. Hollender, 19 Blatchf. 48; S. C. 6 Fed. Rep. 882.

The defendants' proof must remove all doubts; a bare preponderance is not enough.

Washburn v. Gould, 2 Robb. Pat. Cas. 206; S. C. 3 Story, 122; Magic Ruffle Co. v. Douglas, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 330; Roberts v. Dickey, 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 532; Smith v. Fay, supra; Crouch v. Speer, 1 Ban. & Ard. 145; Stilwell & B. Mfg. Co. v. Cincinnati Gaslight & Coke Co. Id. 610; Hawes v. Antisdel, 2 Ban. & Ard. 10; Wood v. Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 550; Parham v. American Buttonhole, O. & S. M. Co. Id. 468; Comstock v. Sandusky Seat Co. 3 Ban. & Ard. 188; U. S. Stamping Co. v. Jewett, 18 Blatchf. 469; Rogers v. Beecher, 18 Off. Gaz. 793; Doubleday v. Beatty, 11 Fed. Rep. 729; Thayer v. Hart, 20 Fed. Rep. 698; Patterson v. Duff, Id. 641; Worswick Mfg. Co. v. Buffalo, Id. 128; Gloucester Isinglass & Glue Co. v. Brooks, 19 Fed. Rep. 426; Lockwood v. Cutter Tower Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 653; Atlantic Works v. Brady, 107 U. S. 192 (27: 438); Woodman v. Stimpson, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 98.

Testimony should leave no room for a reasonable doubt upon the subject.

Crouch v. Speer, and Hawes v. Antisdel, supra; Judson v. Bradford, 3 Ban. & Ard. 539; Willett v. Fister, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 91 (21: 804).

The courts attach great importance to the failure of the party, on whom the burden rests, to produce the best qualified witnesses.

Smith v. Whitman, 6 Allen, 564; Clifton v. U. S. 45 U. S. 4 How. 242 (11: 957); Gay v. Parpart, 106 U. S. 679 (27: 256); The James Martin, 5 Hughes, 448; National Car-Brake Shoe Co. v. Terre Haute Car & Mfg. Co. 19 Fed. Rep. 514; Standard Measuring Machine Co. v. Teague, 15 Fed. Rep. 390; Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. 316; McDonough v. O'Niel, 113 Mass. 92; Cheney v. Gleason, 125 Mass. 166.

The defendants must prove their case, beyond a reasonable doubt, earlier than Bell's conception; and the burden to do this is on them. They must prove a complete invention.

O'Reilly v. Morse, 56 U. S. 15 How. 108 (14: 621); Brodie v. Ophir Silver Mining Co. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 137; Dixon v. Moyer, 1 Robb. Pat. Cas. 324; Adams v. Edwards, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 1; Woodman v. Stimpson, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 98; Draper v. Potomska Mills Corp. 3 Ban. & Ard. 214; Reed v. Cutter, 1 Story, 590; Reeves v. Keystone Bridge Co. 1 Off. Gaz. 466; Kneeland v. Sheriff, 2 Fed. Rep. 901; Webster Loom Co. v. Higgins, 105 U. S. 580 (26: 1177); Roemer v. Headley, 19 Fed. Rep. 205.

Evidence is to be weighed according to that which it is in the power of one party to introduce and the other to contradict.

Clifton v. U. S. 45 U. S. 4 How. 242 (11: 957).

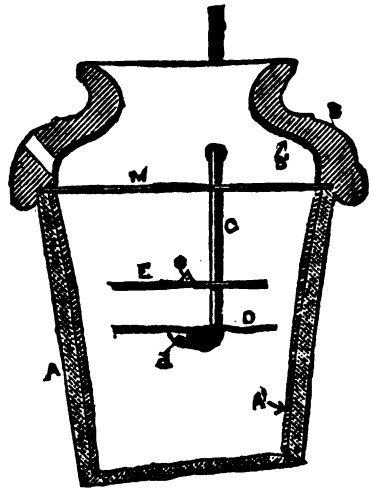
If the proof in the record does not come up to what the story would furnish, if true, it is disproof of it.

Of written proof there is none on the side of the defendant. Drawbaugh has got nothing but the recollections of men, except the testimony of these remains of his machines. These are said to be the earliest remains. This tumbler F and tin can B were made and used in 1867 or 1868. That tumbler never was of any value. It is no part of an electric speaking-telephone. The story is that that was made in 1867, and that it talked in connection with this, the can receiver B.



Broken Tumbler, F, ½ size

A bladder was tied over its top on the line M; C, E, D were the working parts; the rod C hung down, terminating with the round plate D. The plate E was supported above the plate D by a rod which went from the point e, on the upper plate E, to a diaphragm M, which was a bladder tied over the mouth of the tumbler at M. If a metal rod were continued up from e, the centre of plate E, to the line where the bladder M is, or where the bladder is said to have been, that would be what Drawbaugh says was the condition.

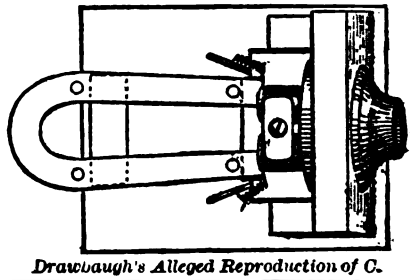
You would get E held by a strut from the under side of the bladder. It must be a stiff rod; a string would not do, because it is necessary the plate should follow the motion of the bladder, and it must be pushed down as well as pulled up.

If you have got a bladder tied over the top of that tumbler and these parts inside, or to be put inside, and you want to change them or alter them, or adjust them or arrange them, the bladder being tied on there cannot be taken off, because the bladder, put on wet, stretches itself on being allowed to dry, and you could not get that off without having to wet it and stretch it all over again.

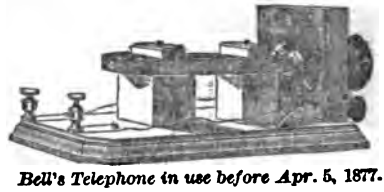
The "reproduction" has an iron diaphragm, and all the parts fastened to that. It is quite a different arrangement. If you throw away the whole tumbler of the "reproduction" it would work just as well; so if there was a bottom to the tumbler and you wanted to put in the working parts or adjust them, you could not do it. If Drawbaugh had that tumbler with a bottom on, he never had such parts inside. He says that at a very early time, if the tumbler ever had a bottom to it, it was broken off; and every witness, with one or two exceptions, swears that when they saw it there was no bottom. That may be true, or it may be merely because they see no bottom on it now. (Counsel here refers to cut given at page 881, ante.)

This is the receiver B, which he said he made first out of an old paint can, strapped to a board by a piece of tin laid over it and one tack driven at each end. That tin can is said to have been covered with a bladder across this end, tied on with a string, next the thing in front of it in the drawing; and it is alleged that an armature was fastened to the centre of that diaphragm, and that this thing in front of it was an electro-magnet placed in front of it. He says that was a telephone receiver; it is called the tin can receiver B. If his description is true, that would make a receiver on the principle of the receiver of the Bell telephone. The Scientific American of September 9, 1876, described Bell's first form of telephone as made of "a tin can with an armature glued to it, and an electro-magnet in front of it." (See cut at p. 882, ante.)

It is said that C is the remains of the next instrument. The allegation is that that instrument when first made was something like this "reproduction;" that it had a diaphragm, somewhat as now; that it had this magnet on it, like this, an electro-magnet in front of the diaphragm, and this permanent magnet behind it, to magnetize the core of the electro-magnet.

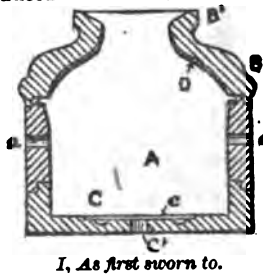


Drawbaugh's Alleged Reproduction of C.



Bell's Telephone in use before Apr. 5, 1877.

The resemblance between Drawbaugh's alleged second form and Bell's second form is also striking. Then the story is that the next instrument made is this. When this was produced in the case, and sworn to by the first lot of witnesses, it was nothing but a shell without works inside.



I, As first sworn to.

During the taking of the testimony they put in a diaphragm which was made for the purpose. That diaphragm was not made in there when it was first sworn to. They also put in, during the taking of the testimony, and after several of the witnesses had sworn to it, an electro-magnet which they said had been found in Drawbaugh's garret and he thought might be the original; but when it was first put in and sworn to by the first lot of witnesses, there was nothing in it except a wooden box,—no diaphragm, no magnet. So before they finished taking testimony they got it into this condition. The other parts were found in 1881, while we were taking the testimony.

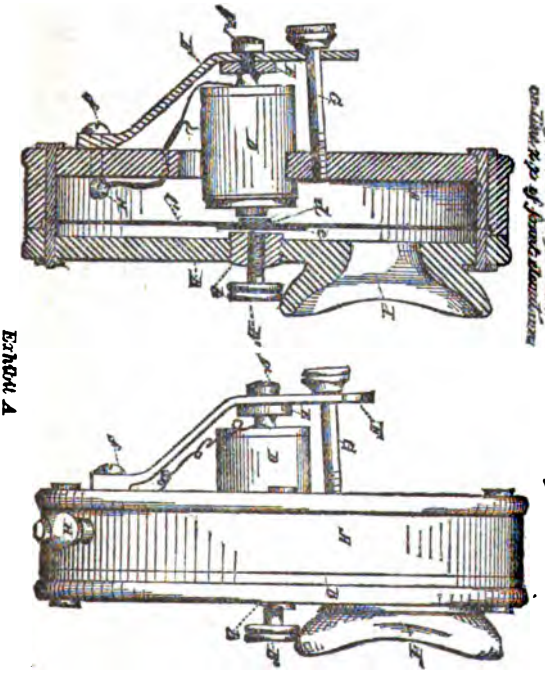
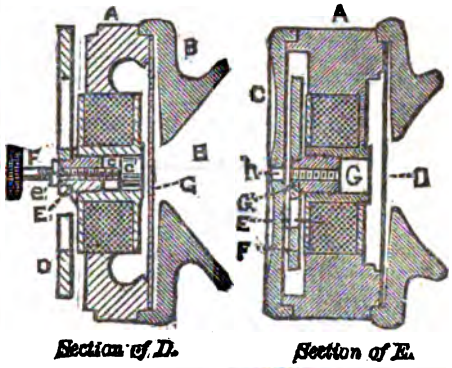
1, as added to by Drawbaugh, after it was first sworn to.

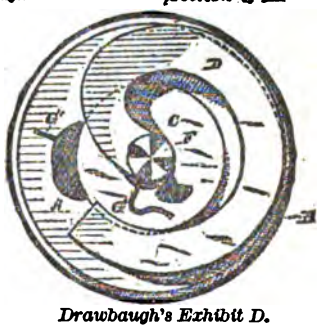
The magnet which they found and brought in was spoken of by Drawbaugh as the magnet which was in use with that instrument.



The next instrument which they speak of is this, called A. Here is a section of it. It contained inside a diaphragm of walnut veneering C. In front of it is the thin air chamber, like the second Bell patent, and then one small opening into it with a mouthpiece I. You can see the diaphragm, the heavy black line C, and this opening I into it. At the centre of the diaphragm, at the back side, is to be seen a piece of soft iron d to serve as an armature, and behind that is an electro-magnet D, which you see projecting out at the rear; and there is an adjusting screw g, to enable you to regulate the distance between that projecting magnet and the armature.

The next pair of instruments which they say was made was this pair marked D and E.





Drawbaugh's Exhibit D.

E is essentially a copy of D, except that it has a wooden cover over the back to cover in the snail-shaped magnet. Drawbaugh says that D had such a cover, but it got broken or lost. These, whenever they were made, were very good speaking-telephones.

They have got a small core, very short, C'. The heel piece of it (the back end of it) is screwed into a permanent magnet, D, which is coiled up in order to get it into small shape. There is one just like it in E covered by a cover. So that they have got the improvements described in the second Bell patent,—a soft-iron core magnetized by applying a permanent magnet to the back end of it. They have got the metallic diaphragm, an iron diaphragm G (it is common "tin," I suppose, a plate of iron tinned over), placed close to the pole of the magnet. In front of that they have got the peculiar thin air space of the modern commercial telephone, and the centre opening B.

Every refinement that is in the modern telephone of to-day, every refinement that is in the Bell telephone, is in these magnetos D and E, said to have been made in the spring of 1875.

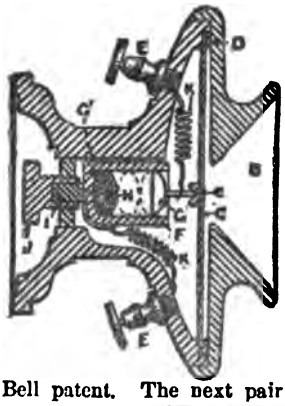
That peculiar air space which Bell got as the result of experiment after experiment is in the most perfect form in D and E.

These were put in evidence in 1881. They are sworn to by various witnesses, as having been made in the spring of 1875.

Drawbaugh says he does not know in what year they were made and the case has got to turn on the question whether those were made the year before the Bell patent or after.

These instruments, D, E, have got a rather large core compared with the permanent magnet, so that they are not as efficient as they ought to be, but it does not prevent them from talking.

The next instruments which are said to have been made are those carbon microphones.



There are four, G, O, L, M. A variable resistance carbon microphone is two pieces of hard carbon in contact, one carried on the diaphragm and the other supported behind it, so that the vibration of the diaphragm will vary the pressure between them. These are said to have been made before the Bell patent. The next pair are two, L, M, which are not different in substance from some of the others.

The next instrument which they produce was H, which they say was made in the summer of 1876, about August, 1876, perhaps improved a little after that. You will see if you open the Blake transmitter the resemblance between them.

This has the mouthpiece like the Blake and the thin air space inside.

The next instrument said to have been made is called J. It does not differ from H, except that it has two sets of contact, each of which is the same as in H, mounted on the same diaphragm. This was not an improvement on H. These instruments are very nicely made; the same is true of G, O, L, M, N.

Now it seems to me that a man who had the capacity and the skill, and tools and materials to make these nice instruments, could not have gone eight years with that rude contrivance, the broken tumbler F, as one of the best he had, if he had believed that it contained so precious a thing as a speaking-telephone.

The New York tests were in March, 1882; the Philadelphia tests were three years later, in February, 1885, with a new set of instruments, made in 1884.

In the New York test all that Mr. Benjamin heard from the tumbler and tin can used together was "a sound and now and then a word."

The whole case for the defense rests upon the assumption that when a large number of men have sworn to speech through instruments at Drawbaugh's shop, the fact is proved beyond doubt,—even though the instruments are proved to be incapable of doing what is sworn to. More than half of them swore to speech through instruments which cannot talk.

When Mr. Benjamin, after these trials, testified about them, the best he could say of "F reproduced" and "B reproduced" was: "I recognized and repeated words and parts of series of irregular numbers."

Drawbaugh's Exhibit H.

The test continued through three days, but they never after the first forenoon ventured to repeat any tests with "F reproduced" and "B reproduced."

The inside of this tumbler, in this "reproduced" instrument, consists of two rods F F running down on each side. They support this box d which is of wood; a metal plate laid in its bottom inside at d; a rivet goes up from the rods at d' to the metal lining-plate d.

"F" reproduced.

The consequence is, that an electric current, brought in by a wire attached to the upper end of this rod F, will come down the rod, up through the rivet to the metal lining d inside of the box, then through the carbon powder, which is placed in a mass on that metal lining, to this upper plate E. Then the current goes up that rod e to the diaphragm c, which is of metal, and then off from that diaphragm by a wire H around to the battery, and so on.

The work is done by varying the pressure upon the mass of carbon powder in the wooden box, by compressing it more or less by the vibratory movement given to the upper plate E by the diaphragm c, when the diaphragm is spoken to. That plate E is loose, in the wooden box of the "reproduction," so it can vibrate.

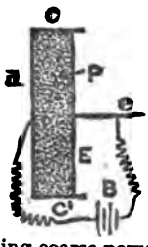
The difference between the reproductions and the originals showed that the originals could not have transmitted anything.

Why did it happen that the instrument which Drawbaugh had sworn to as a reproduction in 1882, and tried in New York, could not talk, and that the one which we tried in 1885 did talk?

In the first place, they didn't call Drawbaugh or a human being to say that this was a true reproduction. They called Professor Barker, and he said that so far as he could see the new one, the Philadelphia one, was like the New York one; but he did not know what was inside of it in certain ways, and he did not know the manner of its use. In New York it was laid down upon a table upon a block of stone.

When we went to Philadelphia to try it, the gentleman who did the talking, Mr. Hill, took this tumbler up in his hand, sat at the table, held it in his hand, moved it around, and shook it as much as was convenient or not, just as it came handy, paid no attention to keeping it still, talked into it in a steady voice, and there was no trouble in transmitting.

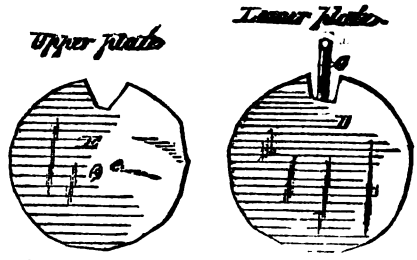
About 1881 Hunnings, in England, invented this improvement in telephone transmitters. He found that it was impossible with the instrument held in the horizontal position to get any speech; but if you hold it perpendicular, and put in granular powder like sand, and, when it gets packed, occasionally tap it with the fingers, you have got a first rate transmitter. And he patented that.



Drawbaugh never conceived of tipping that up so as to make it talk, and shaking it and using coarse powder. He says he kept it horizontal. When we got to Philadelphia, they changed the powder of the New York test into powder which was a little granular, which is of some importance, and then took the instrument and tipped it up and got in substance Hunning's conception,—his idea, inside of that tumbler, and then the thing talked.

If you took the instrument, not as Drawbaugh described it, but altered by putting the Hunning's invention inside, changing it so that it conformed to Hunning's idea, by using coarser powder and tipping it up that way and tapping it, it would make a first rate speaking-telephone. That is what the defendants did in Philadelphia.

Drawbaugh never had that notion, and swears he used his tumbler in a way which excluded that notion.



Original plates of Drawbaugh's "F," ⅛ size.

In his original that he produced he had these rude plates.

He never had a carbon-holding box around it and if he did not, he could not have tipped it up. But even if he did, it is impossible with plates having those rude jagged edges to make a tight box that will not spill out fine granular powder when it tips up edgewise.

But the instrument used in Philadelphia had that plunger piece quite tight, so that when they tipped it up edgewise it wouldn't run out.

The result, then, is that the pair "F" and "B," sworn to by more witnesses than all their other instruments put together, cannot do what the witnesses profess to recollect.

I now come to the instruments "D" and "E." There is no doubt that those are good instruments enough to destroy any telephone patent. They will talk. The only question is their date.

Drawbaugh says he does not know in what year those instruments were made and out of the four hundred witnesses they have called, they only found seven who pretend to have heard speech through that pair of instruments before the Bell patent. More than half of their witnesses swear to the tumbler and tin can.

The appearance of the tumbler and tin can at Drawbaugh's shop at any time as exhibition instruments is perfect proof that the alleged better instruments did not then exist.

If after the Bell patent he was using the tumbler and tin can habitually in his shop as the best he then had, it is perfectly certain that he did not have those pretty little magneto instruments "D" and "E," did not have those two refined vase-shaped microphones G and O, did not have the Blake transmitter "H."

Defendants' answer says: "That Drawbaugh for more than ten years prior to the year 1880 was miserably poor, in debt, with a large and helpless family dependent upon his daily labor for support, and was from such cause alone utterly unable to patent his said invention, or caveat it, or manufacture and introduce it upon the market."

All those allegations of the answer, important as they are, were displaced by his own testimony.

It is not a case where there was poverty which prevented him from reducing his invention to practice.

(Counsel here stated Drawbaugh's history and testimony as to his inventions.)

It was part of the story of Drawbaugh that it was impossible for him to draw a specification for a caveat.

Afterwards we found this card, one edition of one hundred and fifty of which was printed in 1874, and another edition of one hundred and fifty more was printed between 1874 and the fall of 1876; in which he holds himself out as a patent solicitor and model maker.

If he held himself out to the community as a solicitor of patents, he can hardly stand up and say that he was grossly incompetent to draw a caveat for his own invention.

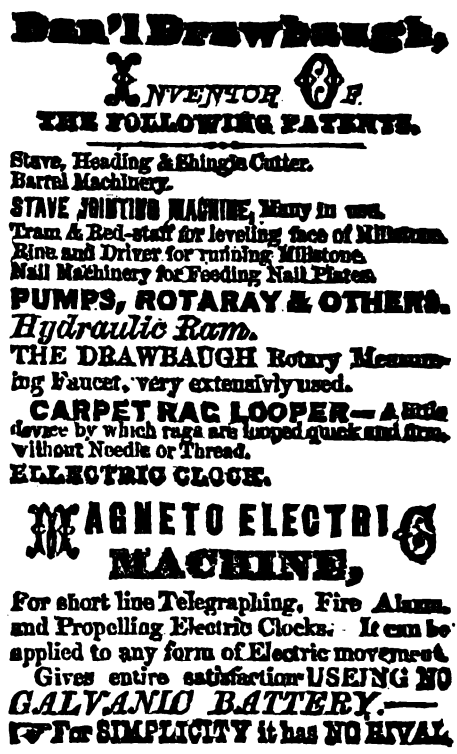
They took the depositions of two hundred and fifty witnesses after that; but they never put Drawbaugh on the stand to explain how he could have left the telephone out of that list, if he had had it.

In 1878, nearly two years after the Bell patent, Drawbaugh began to be talked of as a man who was then making telephones.

In 1878, the newspapers mentioned him as a man who was making improvements in telephones.

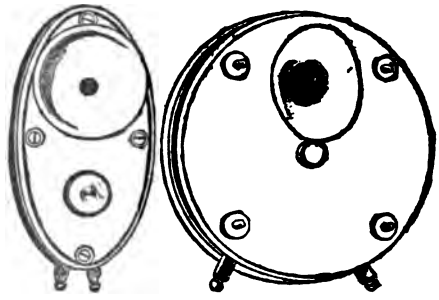
There were four, five or six articles in 1878 which spoke of him as an improver of the telephone.

He went to the telephone office in Harrisburg, in the spring of 1878 and carried instrument A with the mouthpiece off one side, said, "Let me look at your telephone."



Dan'l Drawbaugh,
INVENTOR OF
THE FOLLOWING PATENTS.
Stave, Heading & Shingle Cutter.
Barrel Machinery.
STAVE JOINTING MACHINE, Many in use.
Tram & Bed-staff for leveling face of Millstone.
Rine and Driver for running Millstone.
Nail Machinery for Feeding Nail Plates.
PUMPS, ROTARAY & OTHERS.
Hydraulic Ram.
THE DRAWBAUGH Rotary Measuring Faucet, very extensivly used.
CARPET RAG LOOPER—A little device by which rags are looped quick and firm, without Needle or Thread.
ELECTRIC CLOCK.
MAGNETO ELECTRIC MACHINE,
For short line Telegraphing, Fire Alarm, and Propelling Electric Clocks. It can be applied to any form of Electric movement.
Gives entire satisfaction USEING NO GALVANIC BATTERY.—
☞For SIMPLICITY it has NO RIVAL.

They showed him the "Phelps snuff-box" form.



He placed his "A" alongside of it. "Is this patented?" said he. "Yes." "Then mine is most too like it:" instead of his saying that the thing they had had for only six months, he had had in use four or five years.

At that time, he had exhibited his nail machine, his faucet, and his pump; he was then mentioned in the newspapers as an exhibitor. If he had wanted to make a sensation at that State Fair, why did he not take over the speaking-telephone?

If he had got it into the papers it would have been known; and there would have been no mortal use for Bell being born, after that had been done. The speaking-telephone would have been given to the world, if he had done that, ten years before Bell's patent.

The State Fairs where he exhibited his other things, but no telephone, were in 1868 and 1869. These improved instruments he alleges he had in the summer of 1876, and some of his witnesses testified that those improvements were in his shop; that in the summer or fall of 1876, they saw all of them.

The dates which they allege in their brief are that these L, M, G, O, were made in the beginning of 1876, just before the Bell patent; and this, the Blake transmitter H, in the summer of 1876.

The Baltimore American, of November, 1878, is the only paper in existence which refers to Drawbaugh as having thought of the subject of speech, or of a telephone, or of the transmission of sounds by electricity before the Bell patent.

But his poverty, says the article, prevented his bringing even the experiments that he made to a successful result. That states him as a man who experimented, not for speech, but for sounds, through what is known as a phonetic telegraph.

The value of the testimony of a large number of our witnesses does not rest upon either mere recollection or veracity. Their whole course of conduct, as well as Drawbaugh's course of conduct, is consistent with our belief that his story is untrue, and inconsistent with the story itself.

Mr. Edward N. Dickerson, for the American Bell Telephone Company:

The defenses in the Dolbear Case are: That Bell has invented the only way in which it is possible to transmit speech; that Dolbear does not infringe, because he is using one of the old, well-known kinds of receivers for sound, which Bell never used, and which is not an equivalent of the receiver of the Bell patent; and that Reis was the first inventor.

The defenses in the Molecular Case are: That Bourseul and Reis described the invention of Bell in circumstantial detail, so that any one can read it out of their descriptions; and it needs, therefore, no invention to do it after those full explanations have been given to the world; that the interpretation of Bell's patent ought to be such as to secure Bell in the exclusive enjoyment of that tin and bladder contrivance on the table, known as figure 7 of the patent; but that he ought to be confined strictly to that; that such an interpretation secures what Bell invented, and enough of what he discovered to enable him to work his invention, while not excluding other inventors from access to the universal storehouse; and that the reason why Reis' invention did not get into public use at all was, that Reis freely gave it to the world; and that Bell never thought he invented a telephone; that figure 7 is not a telephone, never was meant by him to be one; that it is in fact a "multiple telegraph," and never was meant to be anything else.

The Overland-Drawbaugh-combination defense.

It is inconsistent with the theory of Drawbaugh to admit that Reis was the inventor of the telephone; because, if he were, the patents that Drawbaugh and Company are going to have by Act of Congress, when this court decides that he was the American "Faraday" who did it, would be of no value; for the Reis publications would have destroyed them. And therefore it is necessary for them to say that Reis did not invent the speaking-telephone; that he never had that invention, but only had a musical telephone. But they say that Drawbaugh did invent it.

They also assure us that Gray invented it; but he invented it after Drawbaugh did, and before Bell.

The combination also sets up that Bell did not invent at all; but being a man, as they say, of "transcendent abilities," he devoted his talents with great success to a miscellaneous variety of felonies, in consequence of which he came out with a first rate, highly scientific description of a telephone in his pocket, and upon that he succeeded in imposing upon the world.

In the Clay Case, the defenses are: the Varley patent and that it was a speaking-telephone; and that there is no such company as the Bell Telephone Company. There is another part of that defense,—that is the testimony in pais. We had supposed that the publications abroad were all that in law could constitute a defense; but in Germany were found seven persons who were willing to say that the telephone of Reis was a talking telephone in 1860–61.

So they took out a commission in the Overland Case (and it is before you, and made a part of the evidence here), subject, of course, to objection, and sent that abroad; and they managed to get the depositions of five or six of these German persons who knew that Reis was the inventor of the telephone. That was all ruled out by His Honor Judge Wallace as incompetent, as we think it obviously is; and that ruling is before Your Honors to pass upon here on appeal.

That is the testimony which is to supplement the publications.

The Gray defense has grown into immense proportions. It is the last vain hope of the infringers.

The Western Union, in the Dowd Case, set up that Bell had "surreptitiously obtained a patent" for that of which Gray was "the first inventor, who was using due diligence" in the Patent Office to procure a patent; and the whole story of this caveat was set out in the answer in the Dowd Case in 1877. Gray was a party to that Dowd litigation. Dowd was a name only,—the real party was the American Speaking Telephone Company, and Dowd was their agent. That company was to be composed of three parts: Gray and his partner, S. S. White, of Philadelphia, were one part. One third of that company was designed for Dolbear, the other first inventor, but they kicked him out.

After the eviction of Dolbear, the Gold and Stock Company, a subordinate of the Western Union Company, owned two thirds of that stock, and do so to this day; and Gray and his partner owned one third. After the Bell patent was established by the judgment against Dowd, that company got one fifth of the profits of the Bell Company for the patents and property surrendered by the Western Union Company, and its stock became valuable and Gray sold four or five hundred thousand dollars worth of that to the community, and got his money; all founded upon the fact that Bell was the first inventor, without which it was worthless, and which fact he is now trying to destroy.

Gray went on the stand and told his story, fighting for that one third of the business of telephony in the United States; and his story was that the first conception he had of a telephone distinct enough to mention to any one, or to put upon paper, was on the 11th day of February, 1876, which was twenty-two days after the Bell specification had been sworn to, and was waiting in the hands of Mr. Pollok to be filed. He said that he then made a sketch of his idea, and gave it into the hands of his very able and respectable counsel in this town, Mr. Baldwin, to file as a caveat; which Mr. Baldwin did, on the 14th day of February, 1876, on the afternoon of that day, the Bell application having been filed in the morning of that day.

After hearing Bell's telephone talk, Gray concluded that he would try his conception which he had got on paper; and so he made one, but he could not get anything through it. That is the only time that that experiment was ever tried, from that hour to this.

Gray tried that transmitter himself at Philadelphia and it would not talk; and he has also testified that Bell was the first inventor of the magneto telephone like figure 7.

The magneto telephone, of which Gray knew Bell was the sole inventor, figures as Gray's fig. 5 of his application.

The usual term for the Bell invention was "a speaking telegraph" in those early days, and so it was called by Gray and others generally. It was not called a "telephone" until some time after the patent.

(Counsel here presented the correspondence between Gray and Bell, in 1877, after the issuing of the Bell patent and read a letter from Gray, recognizing Bell as the inventor of the speaking telegraph.)

Gray's application for a patent is for the broad art of telephony and contains three plates. The first plate is for the details of his caveat drawing; the second is for his caveated machine in operation; and the third is for the Bell magneto telephone.

It differs from this figure 7 of the Bell patent only in the circumstances that the converging cones are similar at both ends, and of slightly different shape; whereas in Bell's patent one is a tapering cone and the other flaring.

(Counsel here reviewed the evidence as to the alleged fraud on Gray, in copying from his caveat the principal alleged discovery in Bell's patent, and replied to the charge that a part of Bell's specifications were taken from such caveat.)

When Bell conceived this idea of using true "undulatory" currents, that were to be made in unison with the sonorous vibrations of the inciting cause, that was a complete new revelation. It came like a flash to him. That application of the undulating method forms the greater part of his patent.

Go back with me now to the history of this litigation. Beginning with the Dowd Case, it was pleaded that Gray was the inventor; that Bell had "surreptitiously" obtained his patent for that which Gray had invented, the caveat for which was on file; that the Commissioner of Patents had unlawfully decided the question of dates,—it is in the amended answer in the Dowd Case, and it all broke down upon the testimony itself; for whatever might be true, Gray admitted that the first he ever did was, on February 11, 1876, to make a sketch. That ended the question, because Bell had sworn to his application on the 20th of January before; had conceived, invented it, written his application for it on October of the year before; and therefore it was entirely unimportant what Mr. Gray did or did not do after that time.

But by degrees this monstrous calumny began to grow. At first it was confined to that legal plea, and the evidence accompanying it; but it began to grow in dimensions until, like a tornado, it was sweeping through the air and carrying everything before it, and it is claimed that Bell had committed a monstrous fraud on the office; he had bribed the Examiner; he had stolen the Gray caveat; and that grew into immense proportions. Whoever has read the newspapers in the last two or three years can hardly see one where that story is not told, and it came ultimately to assume that form in the courts. It has been set up in lawsuits, and published upon the wings of the wind to the uttermost parts of the earth. It came to trial in the New Orleans Case and the whole gang were witnesses, and in that case the court decided "The fact that Bell's invention certainly dates from January 20, 1876, and that it covers a speaking-telephone, transmitting articulate speech by means of an undulatory, oscillatory, or vibratory current of electricity, renders it unnecessary to pass upon the evidence relating to the tergiversations and claims of Gray; the alleged frauds of Bell in advancing his application for a patent; the illegal conduct and conflicting statements of Examiner Wilber; and many alleged vices and irregularities, the evidence of which forms the bulk of the record, and apparently the main defense in the case.

"At the same time, it is proper to say that in all the evidence we have found nothing that shows that Bell has done or caused to be done anything inconsistent with his right to be called an honest man, with clean hands."

The hypothesis in that case was that Mr. Bell had got the Gray caveat in his patent by these formal amendments, made regularly after the 27th of February. But there stood his application, with all of what they say is the Gray caveat in it, sworn to on the 20th of January, and filed on February 14, and declared by the Examiner on February 19 to contain the substance of the caveat, before he ever amended his application in respect to these immaterial things.

He is entitled to his patent if he is the first inventor; and if he has committed any of these crimes he must be punished for them by law; but you cannot confiscate his patent for that reason; there is no such punishment for crime in the statute.

The whole of the Gray caveat was in Bell's specification of the date of January 20, three weeks before the Gray caveat existed.

According to the latest and wonderful theory, Bell proceeded to mutilate his own record by interlining into it words in pencil, which were not there in the fair-written ink application.

If that application had had in it these interlineations, they would have appeared in the patent; just as those amendments that were lawfully put in do appear in the patent. Mr. Edmunds, counsel also for the Drawbaugh and Overland Companies, and Mr. Hill's leader, said that if there was a fraud "It was without the co-operation of Mr. Bell."

In his interference proceeding with Gray, in his preliminary statement on this record, Bell told the story exactly as it was—that he made his first liquid transmitter in Boston on March 10, 1876, three days after his patent; when all the while, according to this ingenious hypothesis, he was defrauding Gray.

Gray subsequently wrote him that letter which I have read, containing these words, "I gave you the credit for the talking feature of the telephone."

(The evidence as to the George-Brown Specifications was here reviewed by the counsel.)

After Mr. Brown had got his specification, there occurred to Bell several devices that are now described in his patent; the liquid transmitter, vibrating the plates of the battery, and those other different things now in the patent.

These amendments made to the American copy in Bell's hands did not get into Brown's papers in Canada, of course, and when Brown came to New York they were not inserted.

During all these years of litigation it never has been suggested by or to a human being, until it was done at this bar, that the Brown transaction had anything to do with the good faith of Professor Bell.

Bell supposed, and it is perfectly true in law, that if those amendments to the American specification were not there, the patent would be just exactly as strong in law as it is with them in; because that figure 7, in connection with the specification, discloses the whole method,—a truth which everybody swears to,—and all variable resistance devices are mere detailed plans, alternative and equivalent forms. Mr. Dolbear and other witnesses all swear they are plain equivalents. Therefore, it was of no consequence in a strict legal sense whether they were mentioned or not in the specification.

George Brown came home and Bell got those papers, brought them to the Patent Office, and laid them there before Mr. Gray, with whom he was in interference.

Every certified copy of Bell's specifications known to exist is just like the present paper. That is physical proof that these passages were all there February 14, 1876, when the paper was filed. We produce record proof which is conclusive.

I now come to the McDonough Case, which has not been touched orally on our side nor on the other, but is set out fully in both briefs. McDonough invented what we call the tambourine telephone. It is the same in substance as Reis'.

McDonough was a wholesale manufacturer of furniture in Chicago. Having a little taste for science, and having got hold of the Reis publications, he thought he would make one of those things himself; and he modified it in respect to the form of a triangular hopping piece, and he modified the receiver by using a diaphragm on it like Bell's. Having done that he applied to the Patent Office for a patent on this thing, after the Bell patent was out, and called it a "teleloge," or far talker. The Patent Office rejected him and said: "You can't have a patent for that, because it is anticipated by Reis, and it is not a talking telephone anyway."

It was April 10, 1876, when he made application; and the Patent Office rejected him because he was anticipated by Reis, quoad the whole machine, and by Bell quoad the receiver.

After he was rejected he attempted to amend his specification by writing Bell's invention into it, and Reis out of it, but was prevented by the Office.

He did not have a talking telephone.

McDonough then formed the usual telephone company, with several millions of stock; not to use his apparatus, of course,—that was a Reis machine—but to use the ordinary telephone; and he was then sued in the courts and enjoined.

Then there is the Varley patent, which is claimed to have anticipated Bell. I will ask attention for a minute to another way of putting into your minds the conception of a current of electricity.

An undulatory current is represented by a curve like a wave of the ocean.

What is meant by the words "current flowing" is, that the entire conductor or line-wire is charged with electricity from end to end.

In an "undulatory current" there is no interruption at all, and the line is always charged with electricity; but the degree of charge varies from instant to instant, and that variation is represented by the rise and fall of the curved line above a certain base.

There is no such thing in electricity as a flowing current, or an onward movement of matter.

There is an impulse transferred from molecule to molecule all the way through, like a jelly that is shaken, but nothing travels from end to end.

The transmission of electricity is much like the transmission of light through the ethereal medium.

Then again, there is no such thing, excepting conventionally, as a "to-and-fro current of electricity." We use those terms for convenience; but we know what they mean, and that they do not mean an actual flow of an actual current either way.

(Counsel here replies to attacks on Judge Wallace's decision in Drawbaugh Case.)

The principles of law which govern the Drawbaugh matter are, that in any case where a patent is assailed, particularly by a stale claim made four years after the patent has been bruited all over the world, the assault must be maintained beyond any doubt, and that if there be any doubt, created that doubt at once destroys the defense. Or, as the courts put it, "To create a doubt is to resolve it in favor of the patent."

Whatever doubts there may be in this confusion of testimony we are not to be called upon to clear up and resolve.

Doubtful defenses enough can be raised; but they cannot overcome the prima facies of the patent granted upon examination.

We have shown you that in respect to the time, many of these witnesses are grossly mistaken.

I propose now to show you that Drawbaugh was a charlatan and a dishonest impostor, and that he was surrounded by a gang who used him for the most dishonest purposes.

(Counsel here reviewed the evidence as to the Drawbaugh inventions and claims, and, after a long examination of the facts of the case, spoke of the treatment of Mr. Bell.)

Mr. Causten Browne, for Dolbear et al:

The Dolbear Company's defense to the Bell Company's suit is different in kind from the defense of any other appellant here. It is this: That the Dolbear method and apparatus do not infringe; that they are based upon a discovery of Mr. Dolbear as original and as fundamental as that of Bell; that he as well as Bell started from first principles to deal with the problem of electrically transmitting speech; that Bell proceeded by one road, while Dolbear proceeded by a road discovered by himself; and that, except in reaching the result of electrically transmitting speech, there is no resemblance between the two methods or the apparatus employed by the two inventors, so far as regards any patent protection enjoyed by Bell.

All the defenses of other appellants may fail and yet the defense of the Dolbear Company remain untouched.

No construction of Bell's patent will cover the Dolbear method as an infringement, except a broad construction for the use of electricity for the purpose of transmitting articulate speech.

A theory of invention dangerously broad was asserted by the counsel for the Bell Company. The fifth claim of the patent is limited by the expressions: "as herein described" and "substantially as set forth."

I suppose that one of these refers to the description of "electrical undulations," and that the other refers to the description of the way in which those undulations are produced and used.

Causing the sonorous motions of the air to bring about corresponding electrical changes, which electrical changes bring about sonorous motions of the air, like the first,—is the patented invention, as the appellees contend.

Mr. Justice Gray says, delivering the opinion of the court in Spencer's Case, that Bell discovered a new art, that of transmitting speech by electricity, and that his patent is not limited to a particular form of apparatus but includes the process or method.

This, while denying Bell a patent in terms for the use of electricity to transmit speech, gives it to him in substance.

Dolbear as a witness is attacked upon two grounds. The first is that he said in his testimony about the working of the Reis instrument something which contradicted what he had said in his published book. Now, that is a mistake.

In these two cases the fact is that Dolbear, the witness, was speaking about two different instruments, and the alleged contradiction in the testimony of Dolbear disappears when you come to see what he is talking about.

Then again he wrote a letter to Bell in 1877 which may be fairly construed as an offer to keep back from the public a book which he was about to publish upon the telephone, if Bell would recognize his claim to the invention of the use of the permanent magnet. This claim of invention Dolbear believed to be just. Nevertheless I agree that that letter ought not to have been written.

Dolbear was unfortunate in having counsel at that time who did not see, any more than he did, the impropriety of writing it, for the letter states that he had written it with the approval of his counsel.

Two years afterwards the road to the new use of electricity, which constitutes Dolbear's invention, was opened to him, and then the invention was made which he and his assignees now claim at your hands the right to practise.

I claim full consideration for the evidence of Dolbear upon the point I stated a little while ago—that the correspondence of electrical changes with the sonorous air changes made in speech is that in which the electrical transmission of speech consists.

It was a physical truth, known among scientific men and practically applied, that the electrical transmission of sound in general consisted in the production, in the line conductor, of electrical changes corresponding to whatever sonorous changes were made in the air by making the sounds, and the utilization of those electrical changes to produce sonorous changes in the air like the first.

Reis certainly transmitted some of the sonorous air vibrations made by speech, by having them produce corresponding electrical changes in the line conductor, which electrical changes produced sonorous air vibrations like the first.

The air is moved in speaking by way of vibration, the air particles moving to and fro in straight lines only. Every movement of air particles to and fro is a vibration, relatively long or short. In speech, every air particle moves or vibrates in obedience to a combination of impulses. It is the mixture of fundamental vibrations and overtone vibrations which gives what we call quality. Every vibration has some pitch, and some amplitude.

Condensation and rarefaction mean variations of pressure produced by movement of air particles to and fro. It can mean nothing else.

There is a scientific article published in 1863 in which Reis's work up to that time was discussed, showing that the problem was there stated, namely: Let all the sonorous air vibrations of speech be electrically represented; let them all be translated into electricity, let there be electrical changes corresponding to the sonorous air vibrations, and let them reproduce sonorous air vibrations like the first; if you can do that, you will transmit speech.

The construction which was given to the Bell patent in the court below, and which is pressed against us here, is that doing that anyhow is patented by Bell.

I read from a scientific writer of 1868, in a commentary on Reis, to show that the problem, the statement of which is called Bell's patented invention, to-day, was as well recognized then as it is now. Says the writer: "If we succeed in transmitting with the galvanic current the oscillations of a sounding body to a distance, so that there another body is put in equally rapid and, in respect to each other, equally strong oscillations, the problem of 'telephony' is solved."

The writer continues: "For then exactly the same phenomena of waves are called forth on the distant points as the ear receives at the place of origin; therefore they also must make the same impression."

The writer tells you if you can find a way to transmit upon the galvanic current these changes, absolutely and proportionally, then you can transmit speech.

Bell solved that problem and that was all he did.

The decision of this court in Tilghman v. Proctor, seems to me to be quite conclusive of this case. The opinion says, upon page 729 of the report in 102 U. S. (26: 288), that the claim of the patent is not for a mere principle. The chemical principle or scientific fact upon which it is founded was not discovered by Tilghman. He only claims to have invented a particular mode of bringing about the desired chemical union. This is a process.

In the present case also, there is a principle or scientific fact involved. If you would transmit speech, you must have the electrical condition of the wire vary with the varying conditions of the air brought about by speech, and produce again like varying conditions of the air. This is the alternative statement of transmitting speech by electricity.

What was the method invented by Bell for solving the problem? When he took his patent, there was but one agent that had ever been used for variably attracting any object so as to make it vibrate and beat the air and give out audible sound. That agent was magnetism. There was but one practical use to which electricity had ever been put for the purpose of so causing a body to vibrate and give out audible sounds; and that was as a flowing current making an iron core an electro-magnet, the variations of current strength causing like magnetic variations. Bell found a way to get electrical changes, corresponding in form to the sound-waves, in the current traversing the coils of an electro-magnet, and so to produce corresponding variations in the magnet, and corresponding vibrations of a receiver armature.

Electrical charge or tension may be brought about by rubbing an object, sealing wax for instance. That is the property which has been reduced to the service of mankind for the first time by Dolbear.

The power of a body charged with electricity to attract anything, though known for two thousand years to exist, had never been put to any practical use in the arts when Dolbear made his invention; certainly it had never been supposed that variations of electrical attraction could cause corresponding vibrations of an armature.

Dolbear's receiving apparatus is properly enough called a condenser, because in structure it generally resembles the old condensers. That is to say, it has two plates electrically insulated and charged. But the operation is radically different from that of the old condensers. No operation of vibrating either plate by variations of electrical charge was contemplated or performed in the case of any of the old condensers.

In all these old condensers the elements were placed close together, with a non-conductor (I do not mean air, but a solid non-conductor) interposed and closely fitted between them, so that the electricity might be condensed, which non-conductor prevented any practical vibration of either of the elements.

In the Dolbear receiver, on the contrary, one of the plates is held firmly so that it cannot vibrate, and the other is held so as to be free to vibrate according to the variations of electrical charge, and beat the air and give an audible sound; the two plates being separated by a body of air, so that no current can pass. Here was a change in construction, designed to produce a new operation, for a new purpose, without which change that operation could not be performed nor that purpose answered.

It will not be denied that if Reis had known that to get variations of magnetism at his receiver exactly corresponding to the sonorous air motions of the speech uttered against the transmitting membrane diaphragm, he must keep the circuit closed, and had so adjusted his means of making contact between his electrodes that the vibrations of the membrane would not break the circuit, but only vary the current strength, and had so used the instrument, he would have had Bell's method, and substantially his apparatus. That is just such a change as Dolbear made in the construction and use of the old condensers. He altered their structural arrangement a little and thereby altered their operation enormously.

To hold one element of a condenser still, so that it shall not vibrate, and suspend the other so that it shall vibrate, and then make use of its vibration according to variations of electric charge, was wholly and absolutely new. No such instrument existed. No such use of any instrument had ever been proposed or supposed to be possible. It cannot be said with any show of reason that any equivalent for it was found in any of the old condensers.

For the purpose of transmitting and reproducing any sound by variations of electrical attraction, causing vibrations of any armature, nothing in the construction or use of the old condensers furnished a known substitute for the magneto receiver.

Dolbear's discovery of the capacity of variations of electrical attraction to make an armature vibrate accordingly, was accidental.

He is not now setting up any anticipation of Bell; only claiming the right to freely use a distinct method and apparatus of his own, based upon a distinct discovery of his own.

When he showed it to scientific men, without exception they expressed their astonishment at hearing that variations of the electric potential of a terminal plate could practically produce any sound vibrations of an opposed diaphragm comparable to those produced by the varying attractions of an electro-magnet.

It is, I submit then, the truth that Dolbear, like Bell, has made an application of the laws of nature which no one had ever made before, which no one had thought of before, by an instrument which did not exist before, the result only being the same—that is to say, the electrical transmission of speech; or, in other words, making speech bring about corresponding electrical changes on the line conductor which in turn bring about corresponding audible vibrations at the receiving station.

But the appellees say that there are flowing currents in Dolbear's method. In a sense this is true; but not in the sense of the Bell invention or of the Bell patent. The current in which the electrical changes corresponding to the sonorous air changes are produced is the current on the line conductor extending from the generator through the transmitter, through the receiver and back to the generator.

These currents are, in Bell, the well-known circuit currents converted into magnetism by traversing the coils of an electro-magnet at the receiving station. In Dolbear they are merely the currents which move to or from the receiving plate which is thereby variably charged from instant to instant, so that it may exert its variable electrical attraction, there being no magnetism at all. The currents in the two are thus seen to be essentially different in character, purpose and result.

The currents of Bell do their described work of transmitting the speech to the receiving station and there delivering it, by virtue of flowing, and only while they are flowing through the coils of the receiving electro-magnet, whose corresponding magnetic variations vibrate the receiving diaphragm. All that vibrates the receiving diaphragm in Dolbear is the variations of charge of electricity in his attracting plate.

Neither Bell nor Dolbear could patent the correspondence of the electrical changes with the sonorous air changes, because that was the known law of electrically transmitting sound.

Reis tried to transmit speech by variations of current strength in an interrupted circuit. Bell tried, and succeeded, in transmitting speech by variations of current strength in a constantly closed circuit. Dolbear transmits speech by variations of electrical attraction, using no circuit, and no flowing current for that purpose at all.

He who transmits speech by Dolbear's receiver, operating by variations of electrical attraction, uses Dolbear's method and apparatus, whatever else he does as a separate matter. And he who only transmits speech through Bell's receiver, using magnetic variations to produce the vibrations of the receiving armature, does not use Dolbear's method, but uses Bell's.

But if anything in the description of the method of and apparatus for transmitting speech is characteristic of and essential to Bell's invention, it is this: that the current from transmitting station to receiving station, on which the required electrical changes are to be impressed, is a current traversing the coils of an electro-magnet, and that the operative power for vibrating the receiving diaphragm is the varying magnetism so produced in that electro-magnet.

No such current is employed by Dolbear for transmitting speech. No magnetism is used by him for reconverting the electrical changes into sonorous air changes. His method is new, because based upon a mode of using electricity not at the time of Bell's patent known to be practicable, and is substantially and fundamentally different from Bell's. His apparatus is new, and it is essentially different from Bell's, for the same reason.

The only resemblance between Bell and Dolbear is that each produces, somehow, electrical changes in the line conductor corresponding with the sonorous air changes made by speaking, and reconverts those electrical changes, somehow, into sonorous air changes at the receiving station. But this cannot be validly patented by Bell (even if his specification would bear such a construction) because it is, under another form of words, patenting the use of electricity for transmitting speech; and this, it is agreed, cannot be done.

Mr. Wheeler H. Peckham, for the Molecular Telephone Company:

Reis conceived the idea that quality might be or must be transmitted in order to produce speech. He knew and expressed what quality was.

The first electrical machines of which we know were magneto machines. Among the earliest were the Gausse & Weber machines, as they are called,—the earliest telegraphic instrument. It was a magneto machine, and it was followed by a number of others.

Varley first gave to his currents, so called, the word undulatory.

Wheatstone's device, a printing apparatus, operated upon the same principle—the magneto principle.

There is another method of effecting electrical work, by using a battery current and then putting a device in the wire through which that current runs, and making or breaking, or changing the current. Those two methods of effecting electrical work were well known at the time Reis made his inventions.

When Reis came to make his invention he adopted the constant current, the voltaic current, and his method was by interrupting to operate upon that current by means of a diaphragm actuated by sound-waves.

Bell, at a very much later period, speaks of an intermittent current as one which was pulsatory.

The "Industrial Gazette" says: "Successful experiments in telephony were made in 1861 by Reis," so that it seems not impossible to carry on conversations at miles distance, and even convey the voice itself, with its peculiar undulations.

Reis used the voltaic current and subjected it to interruptions or variations by means of the vibration of a diaphragm, caused by the action of sound therein and transmitted to a receiver, including the sounds of the human voice, and produced musical notes; and all the Reis articles speak of the production of speech.

Beyond that we have the testimony of a series of witnesses who say that at the time when Reis himself was operating, and when others operated it, that it did produce speech.

It does it far better than Bell's device (Fig. 7) ever did until after several years had elapsed, and the world had learned by constant practice how to produce instruments that would transmit speech, because the best that was ever said of Bell's instruments until the year 1879 was that they produced a faint muttering, and nothing else.

We emphatically claim that the evidence does show that the Reis telephone did produce speech, and that it was intended to produce speech, and that whatever be the theory or whatever be the explanation by which and through which speech is produced, that theory and that explanation were adopted and existed in the Reis telephone.

It was done to a far greater and better extent than Bell did it, prior to 1878 or 1879, by the instruments described by figure 7 of the first patent.

The moment you put an improvement in mechanical construction in the shape of a receiver, like the Bell receiver, this Reis transmitter will talk.

If you put the microphone with the carbon points in place of the old Reis transmitter and attach it to that Reis-Legat receiver, that will talk.

A simple improvement in the mechanical construction of the instrument, and this Reis telephone springs up into an active, strong, vigorous, practical instrument, and commercially has taken the place that otherwise would have been occupied by Bell's invention at the present day.

If Reis gave the wrong explanation, that does not affect the fact that he has produced an instrument and device operated by sound-waves made by the voice, which will convey what a person speaks into the instrument,—precisely the same thing in the way of transmitting the vibrations to the ear that is in the receiving instrument of Bell.

There is a fallacy in a statement of Bell as to the operation of his instrument. Bell says that he undulates this voltaic current, but he did not.

Reis took a voltaic circuit; he had a method of working that circuit by means of air-waves —sound-waves. That is the great invention. That is the initial step; that by means of the voice you can speak to a diaphragm, and have that diaphragm affect a voltaic circuit or affect a current of electricity, so that it will produce similar variations at the other end and be heard. Reis did that.

Varley came afterwards, and he adopted the magneto method again and he transferred sound.

He did it in three ways: First, by making and breaking a primary circuit; second, by vibrating his transmitter by the air; third, by revolving a wheel, upon the periphery of which were bar magnets, before the poles of an electro-magnet.

All those things were before Bell came. Now, what did Bell do? Bell, adopting the magneto method of effecting electrical results, took the apparatus of Reis and adapted it to that magneto method. He did not do anything else.

By the term "method" in the 5th claim of his patent, Bell meant the magneto method and nothing else.

Bell's letter of August 14, 1875, gave simply the idea of telephonic or telegraphic action—telegraphic work—by means of the magneto current. (Mol. Rec. p. 1618.)

He did nothing after his letter prior to the taking out of his patent, in the way of experiments, other than one or two or three experiments made in the early part of July, and which resulted in merely obtaining a sort of muttering effect. The draft specifications and claims of Bell, and his George-Brown specification or copy application, speak of a production of or causing electrical undulations which, by the terms of the specification, is necessarily confined to the magneto method, because the specification says that there is no other method.

And then when we have by some means, whatever they may be, whether fair or unfair, fraudulent or honest, new thoughts from Gray or from himself, or whatever may be the reason, the idea suggested to him and put into his patent that electrical undulations can be caused by the variations of the resistance of the circuit, we find a claim put in to correspond to that; but we do not find any change or any variation whatever of the fifth claim.

There is not in that patent to be found anywhere from the beginning to the end any suggestion that there is any other method of causing electrical undulations by sound-waves than the one which is pointed out and illustrated by figure 7. All prior methods of producing electrical undulations have reference to and are involved in the production of telegraphy. Some of them are ways that it is absolutely impossible to use in connection with the production of sound-waves; as, for instance, the vibration of a wheel with magnets on the periphery before the poles of the magnet.

We claim that Bell's patent should be construed as a patent for a multiple telegraph alone; that if not for that it should be construed as a patent for the magneto method, as contradistinguished from the voltaic method, or the resistance method; and that if construed more broadly than that, it is void as being a patent for a principle or an art; and further, we claim that the two instruments, giving the patent what construction you will, those used by the defendant and those used by the complainant, or those described in the patent sued upon, are so completely different, so varied in their principle and mode of action, that the one cannot be held to be an infringement upon the other.

Closing argument of Mr. Lysander Hill, for the People's Telephone Company and the Overland Telephone Company:

When an application is filed in the Patent Office, the practice is to allow that application to be amended, formally or informally upon the specification remaining in the Patent Office.

Then there is another class of amendments made by filing formal papers in the shape of a letter or document addressed to the Commissioner, formally amending the application. When that is received, the examiner places it on file, goes to the specification, and marks, around the passage that is amended, red lines, striking it out and noting on it that the amendment marked A, B or C, or whatever it is, is substituted for that passage.

But when the patent finally issues, that document, with its amendments, is sent to the government printer, and the government printer prints it as finally corrected, and the original is sent from the government printing office back to the Patent Office, and remains on file there, and is a part of what is called the "File wrapper and contents." It is a part of the contents of the file wrapper.

When any party applies to the Commissioner of Patents and asks for a certified copy of that file wrapper and contents, he gets a certified copy, among other things, of the document which was originally filed, with all the marks which were on it, whatever they may be, and however they may have been placed upon it.

The Commissioner is careful to make an exact facsimile copy; hence, in this case you can gather nothing from the printed patent of March 7, 1876, as to the prior history of the application in the Patent Office.

But if you take the certified copy of April 10, 1879, as printed in the Dowd record, that being a certified copy, you get not only the original document which was filed in the Patent Office, but you find noted on that copy the various changes which were made in it while it was there and before the patent issued.

The document of April 10, 1879, shows you how it had been corrected before the issue of the patent.

The damaging facts with regard to the George-Brown paper have not been explained. My learned friends say that there is no evidence as to when Brown got that copy from Bell; but yet it is proved that Brown got that copy from Bell on January 25 or 26, 1876, in New York.

What explanation had they to make of the fact that those two papers were together there, that they were both papers relating to the same subject matter, but that there were declarations of the most important character in one which do not appear in the other, declarations in one which are entirely inconsistent with those in the other?

My learned friend, Mr. Dickerson, says Bell understood perfectly that those two currents were equivalents and did not think it necessary to put it into the George-Brown specification; but Bell did not regard them as equivalents, for he had put into that George-Brown copy an explicit statement which excluded the variable resistance current from the invention.

When Brown left New York he must have known that there was not only the current that was shown in his papers, but that there was another current, the variable resistance current, which would do the work equally well; and yet, as a capitalist, he was going to Europe to patent the invention and to secure the monopoly of it.

Can you conceive of a capitalist taking an invention abroad, spending his money upon it, and trying to get a monopoly of it, under such circumstances leaving the door wide open, losing his monopoly, throwing it away?

The George-Brown copy of the specification stated only four advantages for multiple telegraph purposes of this current.

If this variable resistance matter has not been interpolated into the American patent since George Brown left for Europe, there was another advantage of that current stated in that document which would strike George Brown as of very great importance. This discovery included a means of preventing the lagging of cable signals. This was a practical improvement which would address itself to him as of great importance. Now, that advantage was not contained in Brown's specification which he took to Europe. When did it come in, and how? That was one of the three interpolated matters. It came in with the variable resistance interpolation, and is of itself a strong proof of the interpolated character of the whole thing.

Before these interpolations were made Bell had nothing in his mind except the magneto currents caused by the induction of an armature.

Bell never dreamed of using them for ocean cables; but when his associates or his attorney learned of this new current of Gray's, this current by which you can vary the resistance of a battery current, then you had something which you could use on ocean telegraphs, whereas the former current, a description of which Brown had taken to Europe in his document, could not be utilized.

The interpolated description in the specification describes two or three different ways of varying the current.

So far as Bell had any idea of varying the resistance in May, 1875, that idea was limited to one form of apparatus—to vibrate a stretched rod or wire, varying the current.

That idea was tried, failed, and was abandoned. Nothing further appears until you read it here in this patent which issued on March 7. Where did it come from?

On February 14, 1876, Gray had filed his caveat describing the wire dipping in liquid and varying the current by that means by placing the poles nearer together or moving them farther apart in a liquid. That was Gray's thought in the caveat. All of the things described in Bell's patent are on the same principle.

Although there are three different ways of doing it, the only thought, the only principle involved in those three different ways of doing it, the only thought, the only principle involved in those three different ways is simply using the liquid, an idea which has never before appeared in Bell's history.

It is very curious that without an experiment or thought or word in any letter or memorandum of his, there should suddenly appear in this document—after Brown had left for Europe with his paper containing not a word of it,—three ways, all of which should involve the use of a liquid to vary the resistance.

Nobody has any right to inspect any model in the Patent Office until after the patent is issued.

Every document, every model, every drawing connected with an application is kept inviolably secret. These gentlemen had no right to inspect Gray's models until after the patent had issued. Hence, if they saw his models, if Mr. Storrow admits that they went to the Patent Office and inspected his models, he admits all that we charge. They had no right to do it. That of itself was a violation of the law.

But this letter shows that Bell not only knew that he had gone as far as any particular model would show or any particular exhibition would show, but he was able to mark out the limits to which Gray had gone. How could he know that?

These parties, who had no right under the rules of the Patent Office to know that Gray even had an application there at all, did have that information.

There is another fact they have not been able to explain away. There is no explanation of the fact that Bell went home from his visit to Washington on February 25 or 26 to March 3, 1876, and immediately proceeded to construct a liquid transmitter like Gray's, got speech through it on March 10, and then kept still about it and concealed the fact. There is no explanation that the next step that he took—the next thing that he did—was to construct two magneto devices just like Gray's receiver on or about the first of April, and then got speech through them.

He did not give to the world the fact as to when and where and how he first got articulate speech, but he gave them a lie instead of the fact.

They offer explanation here. They tell you that the liquid transmitter which Bell made was not the same as the Gray liquid transmitter, and therefore it could not have been stolen from Gray.

Mr. Dickerson says in his argument that those two instruments, which he has shown on that diagram there, are entirely different in principle; that Gray had the idea of varying the resistance of the liquid, but he says that was not Bell's idea.

I prefer to take Bell's theory instead of Gray's. It does not make any difference what liquid is used. His principle is to vary the distance through which the current has to flow through that liquid from pole to pole. Where did Bell get that principle? He had only to read Gray's caveat and find the whole thing there.

I do not think that this court can afford to allow my friends to do away with the printed evidence in the case, which the complainants have put on file, by coming here and saying it is all a mistake.

My theory is that this paper was put into the Dowd Case just as it is printed here in the document; that the print was a correct print from that paper; that subsequently they substituted the fraudulent copy in the Patent Office in order to clear up the record there, and conceal the thing.

Your Honors will remember how Mr. Storrow said this was altered. It was altered by laying it along side of the George-Brown copy and simply writing into the Patent-Office copy, —the certified copy from the Patent Office,—the words that he found in the George-Brown copy, so far as there was any difference between the two. There is an inherent improbability in that.

How did that word "and" get into that copy that you have before you?

Mr. Storrow says that he put in all those words by comparing it with George Brown's copy. It did not come from the George-Brown copy; it is not there. That explanation does not account for it.

My learned brothers have argued on the other side that in law oral evidence has never been allowed to overthrow a patent. It is hardly necessary for me to treat that question. If it was I would refer to Gayler v. Wilder, 51 U. S. 10 How. 477 (13:504); Coffin v. Ogden, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 120 (21:821).

The instrument marked I in the Drawbaugh Exhibits they tell us had no magnet on it when found. It is true that when the original model was put in evidence the magnet was not with it, but after it had been produced before the examiner and put in evidence, Mr. Drawbaugh found among his various magnets at the shop a magnet which he recognized as the original used in that. He brought that magnet over and placed it on the instrument and it fitted its place exactly; both in its height, in the size of the poles which fitted holes made for it, and in every respect it showed for itself at once that it was the magnet originally in the instrument. Mr. Drawbaugh testified to the fact that that was undoubtedly the magnet.

My learned friends say that the tumbler F could not be adjusted unless the bottom was out of it originally, and yet it is the fact that the tumbler instrument F can be adjusted. The bottom was in there; it was adjusted by the screw rod at the top and not at the bottom.

Then my learned friends say the string telephone was in Drawbaugh's shop. That is clearly disproved. There is not a word of evidence of anything of the kind.

A test of those instruments was called for by my friends on the other side, and we made the test in New York. We had no time to make other instruments; we had to take the old instruments that we had which had got in a very dilapidated condition.

All those instruments operated perfectly well. They were the original instruments of Drawbaugh.

The only instruments that did not operate perfectly satisfactorily were the reproduced instruments that we had made to exhibit the arrangement of the parts; but they did operate as speaking-telephones, even those that were most dilapidated.

The tumbler operated. Mr. Benjamin testifies: "Here are some sentences, which I read from the notes, which I heard distinctly through F and A. "F" is the tumbler; "A" is the round box. That is the New York test.

We have been criticised for not making further tests in the New York Case. Why, we made the tests at the very last end of our testimony.

Professor Barker was very particular to absolutely verify the instruments with which he made those experiments. Now, my learned friends of the other side admit that we got most excellent results here at the Philadelphia test.

The whole argument is based on the fact that they will not work properly at all when held horizontally, and that the tests in New York failed for that cause, and they succeeded in Philadelphia because held at an angle. I say that it is not true; and if the court is not satisfied with the evidence of Professor Barker, which I have read, we are ready to repeat the tests here or have Professor Barker repeat them to the satisfaction of the court, and in any way the court may order, to show that those tumbler instruments F will work whether placed horizontally or placed at an angle, and that they work, if anything, better when placed as they were placed in New York, than as they were placed in Philadelphia.

Then they have complained that we did not have the carbon of the same fineness that we had in New York.

The Hunnings patent says we must pulverize the material finely. What has wheat flour got to do with it? That is not carbon pulverized. Carbon is like sand.

You will find that Drawbaugh, away back in 1881, had stated how to use those carbons, with what degree of fineness.

Before the New York tests, before the Hunnings patent was ever heard of, Professor Barker got better articulation from the fine than from the coarser.

The Philadelphia instruments were constructed in a much more thorough and workmanlike manner than the New York instruments, and were much better finished.

The powders used in the Philadelphia test were of hard carbon, of different degrees of fineness.

They would have to be of granular or gritty character, if they were carbon.

The New York instruments had become of such a condition that the parts intended to be rigid would not stay rigid, and the parts intended to be movable would not move easily. But in Philadelphia the parts intended to be rigid were rigid, and then you could take the instrument up in your hand and use it without difficulty and it would not get out of adjustment. That explains those two tests and all the differences there were between them.

Then, that Blake transmitter is compared with instrument H,—another story which is absolutely incorrect. All the newspaper publications show that they were speaking-telephones at Drawbaugh's shop.

Our thirteen witnesses that have been attacked were not the witnesses whose testimony we rely upon most; the attacks are easily answered. They are only thirteen witnesses out of two hundred and twenty. Brother Dickerson admitted to the court that Drawbaugh made those instruments that these witnesses say he made, and that it is a mere question of the date when he made them. He says their theory is that he commenced to make them in 1876. Our theory is that he commenced to make them a good many years before.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

The important question which meets us at the outset in each of these cases is as to the scope of the fifth claim of the patent of March 7, 1876, which is as follows:

"The method of, and apparatus for, transmitting vocal or other sounds telegraphically, as herein described, by causing electrical undulations, similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the said vocal or other sounds, substantially as set forth."

It is contended that this embraces the art of transferring to or impressing upon a current of electricity the vibrations of air produced by the human voice in articulate speech, in a way that the speech will be carried to and received by a listener at a distance on the line of the current. Articulate speech is not mentioned by name in the patent. The invention, as described, "consists in the employment of a vibratory or undulatory current of electricity, in contradistinction to a merely intermittent or pulsatory current, and of a method of, and apparatus for, producing electrical undulations upon the line-wire." A "pulsatory current" is described as one "caused by sudden or instantaneous changes of intensity," and an "electrical undulation" as the result of "gradual changes of intensity exactly analogous to the changes in the density of air occasioned by simple pendulous vibrations."

Among the uses to which this art may be put is said to be the "telegraphic transmission of noises or sounds of any kind," and it is also said that the undulatory current, when created in the way pointed out, will produce through the receiver at the receiving end of the line "a similar sound to that uttered into" the transmitter at the transmitting end. One of the means of imparting the necessary vibrations through the transmitter, to produce the undulations, may be the human voice. Articulate speech is certainly included in this description, for it is an "uttered" "sound" produced by the "human voice."

It is contended, however, that "vocal sounds" and "articulate speech" are not convertible terms, either in acoustics or in telegraphy. It is unnecessary to determine whether this is so or not. Articulate speech necessarily implies a sound produced by the human voice, and, as the patent on its face is for the art of changing the intensity of a continuous current of electricity by the undulations of the air caused by sonorous vibrations, and speech can only be communicated by such vibrations, the transmission of speech in this way must be included in the art. The question is not whether "vocal sounds" and "articulate speech" are used synonymously as scientific terms, but whether the sound of articulate speech is one of the "vocal or other sounds" referred to in this claim of the patent. We have no hesitation in saying that it is, and that if the patent can be sustained to the full extent of what is now contended for, it gives to Bell and those who claim under him, the exclusive use of his art for that purpose, until the expiration of the statutory term of his patented rights.

In this art—or, what is the same thing under the patent law, this process, this way of transmitting speech—electricity, one of the forces of nature, is employed; but electricity, left to itself, will not do what is wanted. The art consists in so controlling the force as to make it accomplish the purpose. It had long been believed that if the vibrations of air caused by the voice in speaking could be reproduced at a distance by means of electricity, the speech itself would be reproduced and understood. How to do it was the question.

Bell discovered that it could be done by gradually changing the intensity of a continuous electric current, so as to make it correspond exactly to the changes in the density of the air caused by the sound of the voice. This was his art. He then devised a way in which these changes of intensity could be made and speech actually transmitted. Thus his art was put in a condition for practical use.

In doing this, both discovery and invention, in the popular sense of those terms, were involved; discovery in finding the art, and invention in devising the means of making it useful. For such discoveries and such inventions the law has given the discoverer and inventor the right to a patent—as discoverer, for the useful art, process, method of doing a thing he has found; and as inventor, for the means he has devised to make his discovery one of actual value. Other inventors may compete with him for the ways of giving effect to the discovery, but the new art he has found will belong to him and those claiming under him during the life of his patent. If another discovers a different art or method of doing the same thing, reduces it to practical use, and gets a patent for his discovery, the new discovery will be the property of the new discoverer, and thereafter the two will be permitted to operate each in his own way without interference by the other. The only question between them will be whether the second discovery is in fact different from the first.

The patent for the art does not necessarily involve a patent for the particular means employed for using it. Indeed, the mention of any means, in the specification or descriptive portion of the patent, is only necessary to show that the art can be used; for it is only useful arts—arts which may be used to advantage—that can be made the subject of a patent. The language of the statute is that "any person who has invented or discovered any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter," may obtain a patent therefor. Rev. Stat. § 4886. Thus, an art—a process—which is useful is as much the subject of a patent, as a machine, manufacture, or composition of matter. Of this there can be no doubt, and it is abundantly supported by authority. Corning v. Burden, 56 U. S. 15 How. 252, 267 [14: 683, 690]; Cochrane v. Deener, 94 U. S. 780, 787, 788 [24: 139, 141]; Tilghman v. Proctor, 102 U. S. 708, 722, 724, 725 [26: 279, 285, 286]; New Process Fermentation Co. v. Maus, 122 U. S. 413, 427, 428 [30: 1193, 1198].

What Bell claims is the art of creating changes of intensity in a continuous current of electricity, exactly corresponding to the changes of density in the air caused by the vibrations which accompany vocal or other sounds, and of using that electrical condition thus created for sending and receiving articulate speech telegraphically. For that, among other things, his patent of 1876 was in our opinion issued; and the point to be decided is, whether as such a patent it can be sustained.

In O'Reilly v. Morse, 56 U. S. 15 How. 62 [14: 601], it was decided that a claim in broad terms (p. 86) [611] for the use of the motive power of the electric or galvanic current called "electro-magnetism, however developed, for making or printing intelligible characters, letters, or signs, at any distances," although "a new application of that power" first made by Morse, was void, because (p. 120) [626] it was a claim "for a patent for an effect produced by the use of electro-magnetism, distinct from the process or machinery necessary to produce it;" but a claim (p. 85) for "making use of the motive power of magnetism, when developed by the action of such current or currents, substantially as set forth in the foregoing description, * * * as means of operating or giving motion to machinery, which may be used to imprint signals upon paper or other suitable material, or to produce sounds in any desired manner, for the purpose of telegraphic communication at any distances," was sustained. The effect of that decision was, therefore, that the use of magnetism as a motive power, without regard to the particular process with which it was connected in the patent, could not be claimed, but that its use in that connection could.

In the present case the claim is not for the use of a current of electricity in its natural state as it comes from the battery, but for putting a continuous current in a closed circuit into a certain specified condition suited to the transmission of vocal and other sounds, and using it in that condition for that purpose. So far as at present known, without this peculiar change in its condition it will not serve as a medium for the transmission of speech, but with the change it will. Bell was the first to discover this fact, and how to put such a current in such a condition, and what he claims is its use in that condition for that purpose, just as Morse claimed his current in his condition for his purpose. We see nothing in Morse's case to defeat Bell's claim; on the contrary, it is in all respects sustained by that authority. It may be that electricity cannot be used at all for the transmission of speech except in the way Bell has discovered, and that, therefore, practically, his patent gives him its exclusive use for that purpose, but that does not make his claim one for the use of electricity distinct from the particular process with which it is connected in his patent. It will, if true, show more clearly the great importance of his discovery, but it will not invalidate his patent.

But it is insisted that the claim cannot be sustained, because when the patent was issued Bell had not in fact completed his discovery. While it is conceded that he was acting on the right principle and had adopted the true theory, it is claimed that the discovery lacked that practical development which was necessary to make it patentable. In the language of counsel "there was still work to be done, and work calling for the exercise of the utmost ingenuity, and calling for the very highest degree of practical invention."

It is quite true that when Bell applied for his patent he had never actually transmitted telegraphically spoken words so that they could be distinctly heard and understood at the receiving end of his line, but in his specification he did describe accurately and with admirable clearness his process, that is to say, the exact electrical condition that must be created to accomplish his purpose; and he also described, with sufficient precision to enable one of ordinary skill in such matters to make it, a form of apparatus which, if used in the way pointed out, would produce the required effect, receive the words, and carry them to and deliver them at the appointed place. The particular instrument which he had and which he used in his experiments did not, under the circumstances in which it was tried, reproduce the words spoken, so that they could be clearly understood, but the proof is abundant and of the most convincing character, that other instruments, carefully constructed and made exactly in accordance with the specification, without any additions whatever, have operated and will operate successfully. A good mechanic of proper skill in matters of the kind can take the patent and, by following the specification strictly, can, without more, construct an apparatus which, when used in the way pointed out, will do all that it is claimed the method or process will do. Some witnesses have testified that they were unable to do it. This shows that they, with the particular apparatus they had and the skill they employed in its use, were not successful; not that others, with another apparatus, perhaps more carefully constructed or more skillfully applied, would necessarily fail. As was said in Webster Loom Co. v. Higgins, 105 U. S. 580, 586 [26: 1177, 1179], "when the question is, whether a thing can be done or not, it is always easy to find persons ready to show how not to do it." If one succeeds, that is enough, no matter how many others fail. The opposite results will show, that in the one case the apparatus used was properly made, carefully adjusted, with a knowledge of what was required, and skillfully used, and that in the others it was not.

The law does not require that a discoverer or inventor, in order to get a patent for a process, must have succeeded in bringing his art to the highest degree of perfection. It is enough if he describes his method with sufficient clearness and precision to enable those skilled in the matter to understand what the process is, and if he points out some practicable way of putting it into operation. This Bell did. He described clearly and distinctly his process of transmitting speech telegraphically, by creating changes in the intensity of a continuous current or flow of electricity in a closed circuit, exactly analogous to the changes of density in air occasioned by the undulatory motion given to it by the human voice in speaking. He then pointed out two ways in which this might be done; one by the "vibration or motion of bodies capable of inductive action, or by the vibration of the conducting wire itself in the neighborhood of such bodies;" and the other "by alternately increasing and diminishing the resistance of the circuit," or by alternately increasing and diminishing the power of the battery." He then said he preferred to employ for his purpose "an electro-magnet, * * * having a coil upon only one of its legs," and he described the construction of the particular apparatus shown in the patent as Fig. 7, in which the electro-magnet, or magneto method, was employed. This was the apparatus which he himself used without entirely satisfactory results, but which Prof. Cross, Mr. Watson, Dr. Blake, Prof. Pope, and others testify has done, and will do, what was claimed for it, and transmit speech successfully, but not so well indeed as another constructed upon the principle of the microphone or the variable resistance method.

An effort was made in argument to confine the patent to the magneto instrument, and such modes of creating electrical undulations as could be produced by that form of apparatus, the position being that such an apparatus necessarily implied "a closed circuit incapable of being opened, and a continuous current incapable of being intermittent." But this argument ignores the fact that the claim is, first, for the process, and, second, for the apparatus. It is to be read (1) as a claim for "the method of transmitting vocal or other sounds telegraphically, as herein described, by causing electrical undulations similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the said vocal or other sounds, substantially as set forth;" and (2) as for "the apparatus for transmitting vocal or other sounds telegraphically, as herein described, by causing electrical undulations, * * * substantially as set forth." The method, "as herein described," is to cause gradual changes in the intensity of the electric current used as the medium of transmission, which shall be exactly analogous to the changes in the density of the air, occasioned by the peculiarities in the shapes of the undulations produced in speech, in the manner "substantially as set forth;" that is to say, "by the vibration or motion of bodies capable of inductive action, or by the vibration of the conducting wire itself in the neighborhood of such bodies," which is the magneto method; or "by alternately increasing and diminishing the resistance of the circuit, or by alternately increasing and diminishing the power of the battery," which is the variable resistance method. This is the process which has been patented, and it may be operated in either of the ways set forth. The current must be kept closed to be used successfully, but this does not necessarily imply that it must be so produced or so operated upon, as to be incapable of being opened. If opened it will fail to act for the time being, and the process will be interrupted; but there is nothing in the patent which requires it to be operated by instruments which are incapable of making the break.

The apparatus, "as herein described," which is included in the claim, is undoubtedly one in which an electro-magnet is employed, and constructed "substantially as set forth" in the specification. One acting on the variable resistance mode is not described, further than to say that the vibration of the conducting wire in mercury or other liquid included in the circuit occasions undulations in the current, and no other special directions are given as to the manner in which it must be constructed. The patent is both for the magneto and variable resistance methods, and for the particular magneto apparatus which is described, or its equivalent. There is no patent for any variable resistance apparatus. It is undoubtedly true that when Bell got his patent he thought the magneto method was the best. Indeed, he said, in express terms, he preferred it, but that does not exclude the use of the other if it turns out to be the most desirable way of using the process under any circumstances. Both forms of apparatus operate on a closed circuit by gradual changes of intensity, and not by alternately making and breaking the circuit, or by sudden and instantaneous changes, and they each require to be so adjusted as to prevent interruptions. If they break it is a fault, and the process stops until the connection is restored.

It is again said, that the claim, if given this broad construction, is virtually "a claim for speech transmission by transmitting it; or, in other words, for all such doing of a thing as is provable by doing it." It is true that Bell transmits speech by transmitting it, and that long before he did so it was believed by scientists that it could be done by means of electricity, if the requisite electrical effect could be produced. Precisely how that subtle force operates under Bell's treatment, or what form it takes, no one can tell. All we know is that he found out that, by changing the intensity of a continuous current so as to make it correspond exactly with the changes in the density of air caused by sonorous vibrations, vocal and other sounds could be transmitted and heard at a distance. This was the thing to be done, and Bell discovered the way of doing it. He uses electricity as a medium for that purpose, just as air is used within speaking distance. In effect he prolongs the air vibrations by the use of electricity. No one before him had found out how to use electricity with the same effect. To use it with success it must be put in a certain condition. What that condition was he was the first to discover; and with his discovery he astonished the scientific world. Prof. Henry, one of the most eminent scientists of the present century, spoke of it as "the greatest marvel hitherto achieved by the telegraph." The thing done by Bell was "transmitting audible speech through long telegraphic lines," and Sir William Thomson, on returning to his home in England, in August or September, 1876, after seeing at the Centennial Exposition, in Philadelphia, what Bell had done and could do by his process, spoke in this way of it to his countrymen: "Who can but admire the hardihood of invention which devised such very slight means to realize the mathematical conception that, if electricity is to convey all the delicacies of quality which distinguish articulate speech, the strength of its current must vary continuously, as nearly as may be, in simple proportion to the velocity of a particle of air engaged in constituting the sounds." Surely a patent for such a discovery is not to be confined to the mere means he improvised to prove the reality of his conception.

We come now to consider the alleged anticipation of Philipp Reis. And here it is to be always kept in mind that the question is, not whether the apparatus devised by Reis to give effect to his theory can be made, with our present knowledge, to transmit speech, but whether Reis had in his time found out the way of using it successfully for that purpose; not as to the character of the apparatus, but as to the mode of treating the current of electricity on which the apparatus is to act, so as to make that current a medium for receiving the vibrations of air created by the human voice in articulate speech at one place, and in effect delivering them at the ear of a listener in another place. Bell's patent is not alone for the particular apparatus he describes, but for the process that apparatus was designed to bring into use. His patent would be quite as good if he had actually used Reis's apparatus in developing the process for which it was granted.

That Reis knew what had to be done in order to transmit speech by electricity is very apparent, for in his first paper he said: "As soon as it is possible to produce, any where and in any manner, vibrations whose curves shall be the same as those of any given tone or combination of tones, we shall receive the same impression as that tone or combination of tones would have produced on us." Bourseul also knew it before Reis, for, in a communication published in a Paris journal in 1854, he said: "Reproduce precisely these vibrations," to wit, the vibrations made by the human voice in uttering syllables, "and you will reproduce precisely these syllables."

Reis discovered how to reproduce musical tones; but he did no more. He could sing through his apparatus, but he could not talk. From the beginning to the end he has conceded this. In his first paper he said: "Hitherto it has not been possible to reproduce the tones of human speech with a distinctness sufficient for every one. The consonants are for the most part reproduced pretty distinctly, but the vowels as yet not in an equal degree. The cause of this I will attempt to explain. According to the experiments of Willis, Helmholtz, and others, vowel tones can be produced artificially, if the vibrations of one body are from time to time augmented by those of another, something as follows: An elastic spring is set in vibration by the blow of a tooth on a toothed wheel; the first vibration is the greatest, and each subsequent one is smaller than the preceding. If, after a few vibrations of this kind (the spring not coming to a rest in the mean time), the tooth wheel imparts a new stroke, the following vibration will be again a maximum, and so on. The pitch of the tone produced in this way depends upon the number of vibrations in a given time, but the character of the tone upon the number of swellings in the same time. * * * Our organs of speech probably produce the vowels in the same manner, through the combined action of the upper and lower vocal chords, or of these latter and the cavity of the mouth. My apparatus reproduces the number of vibrations, but with an intensity much less than that of the original ones; though, as I have reason to believe, to a certain degree proportional among themselves. But in the case of these generally small variations, the difference between large and small vibrations is more difficult to perceive than in the case of the original waves, and the vowel is therefore more or less indistinct." And again: "I have succeeded in constructing an apparatus with which I am enabled to reproduce the tones of various instruments, and even to a certain extent the human voice."

No one of the many writers whose papers are found in the records claim more than this for Reis or his discoveries. Although his first paper was published in 1861, and Bell did not appear as a worker in the same field of scientific research until nearly fifteen years afterwards, no advance had been made, by the use of what he had contrived or of his method, towards the great end to be accomplished. He caused his instruments to be put on the market for sale, and both he and those whom he employed for that purpose took occasion to call attention to them by prospectus, catalogue, and otherwise, and to describe what they were and what they would do. In his own prospectus, which was published in 1865 and attached to the apparatus, he says: "Every apparatus consists * * * of two parts, the telephone proper and the receiver. * * * These two parts are placed at such a distance from each other that singing or toning of a musical instrument can be heard in no other way from one station to the other except through the apparatus." And, "Besides the human voice there can be reproduced (according to my experience) just as well the tones of good organ-pipes from F—C, and those of the piano." Albert, the mechanician employed to make the instruments, in his catalogue published in 1866, enumerates among the things he has for sale "Telephone of Reis for reproduction of tones by electricity." In a work on electricity by Robert M. Ferguson, published by William and Robert Chambers, London and Edinburgh, in 1867, it is said, in speaking of the telephone: "This is an instrument for telegraphing notes of the same pitch. Any noise producing a single vibration of the air, when repeated regularly a certain number of times in the second (not less than thirty-two), produces, as is well known, a musical sound. * * * A person when singing any note causes the air to vibrate so many times per second, the number varying with the pitch of the note he sings, the higher the note the greater being the number of vibrations. If we then by any means can get these vibrations to break a closed circuit, * * * the note sung at one station can be reproduced, at least so far as pitch is concerned, at another. Reis's telephone (invented 1861) accomplishes this in the following way," which is then described.

But it is needless to quote further from the evidence on this branch of the case. It is not contended that Reis had ever succeeded in actually transmitting speech, but only that his instrument was capable of it if he had known how. He did not know how, and all his experiments in that direction were failures. With the help of Bell's later discoveries in 1875 we now know why he failed.

As early as 1854 Bourseul, in his communication which has already been referred to, had said, substantially, that if the vibrations of air produced by the human voice in articulate speech could be reproduced by means of electricity at a distance, the speech itself would be reproduced and heard there. As a means of stimulating inquiry to that end he called attention to the principle on which the electric telegraph was based and suggested an application of that principle to such a purpose. He said: "The electric telegraph is based on the following principle: An electric current, passing through a metallic wire, circulates through a coil around a piece of soft iron, which it converts into a magnet. The moment the current stops, the piece of iron ceases to be a magnet. This magnet, which takes the name of electro-magnet, can thus in turn attract and then release a movable plate, which, by its to-and-fro movement, produces the conventional signals employed in telegraphy." Then, after referring to the mode in which speech is transmitted by the vibrations of the air, he said: "Suppose that a man speaks near a movable disc, sufficiently flexible to lose none of the vibrations of the voice; that this disc alternately makes and breaks the connection with a battery; you may have at a distance another disc which will simultaneously execute the same vibrations."

That Reis was working all the time, from the beginning to the end of his experiments, upon the principle of the telegraph as thus suggested by Bourseul, is abundantly proven. Thus, in his first paper, after describing his cubical block apparatus, he says: "If now tones or combinations of tones are produced in the neighborhood of the block, so that sufficiently powerful waves enter the opening a, then these sounds cause the membrane b to vibrate. At the first condensation the hammer-like wire d is pushed back; at the rarefaction it cannot follow the retreating membrane, and the current traversing the strips remains broken, until the membrane forced by a new condensation again presses the strip * * * against d. In this way each sound-wave causes a breaking and closing of the current. At each closing of the circuit the atoms of the iron wire inside the distant spiral are moved away from each other; on breaking the circuit these atoms seek to regain their position of equilibrium. When this happens, in consequence of the reciprocal actions of elasticity and inertia, a number of vibrations are produced, and they give the longitudinal sound of the rod. This is the case if the making and breaking of the current occur with comparative slowness. If they occur more rapidly than the oscillations of the iron core, due to its elasticity, the atoms cannot complete their course. The paths described become shorter in proportion as the interruptions are more frequent, but then are just as numerous as these. The iron wire no longer gives its longitudinal normal tone, but a tone whose pitch corresponds to the number of interruptions in a given time; this is the same as saying that the rod reproduces the tone impressed upon the interrupter."

Such was the beginning, and it was maintained persistently to the end as well by Reis as by those who availed themselves of what he was doing. To this the Reis-Legat apparatus forms no exception, for in the paper describing it Legat says: "The operation of the apparatus described is as follows: When at rest the galvanic circuit is closed. When the air which is in the tube a b of the apparatus is alternately condensed and rarefied by speaking into it (or by singing or introducing the tones of an instrument), a movement of the membrane closing the smaller opening of the tube is produced, corresponding to such condensation or rarefaction. The lever c d follows the movements of the membrane, and opens and closes the galvanic circuit at d g, so that at each condensation of the air in the tube the circuit is opened, and at each rarefaction the circuit is closed. In consequence of this operation the electro-magnet of the apparatus, in accordance with the condensations and rarefactions of the column of air in the tube * * * is correspondingly demagnetized and magnetized, and the armature of the magnet is set into vibrations like those of the membrane in the transmitting apparatus." We have not had our attention called to a single item of evidence which tends in any way to show that Reis or any one who wrote about him had it in his mind that anything else than the intermittent current caused by the opening and closing of the circuit could be used to do what was wanted. No one seems to have thought that there could be another way. All recognized the fact that the "minor differences in the original vibrations" had not been satisfactorily reproduced, but they attributed it to the imperfect mechanism of the apparatus used, rather than to any fault in the principle on which the operation was made to depend.

It was left for Bell to discover that the failure was due not to workmanship, but to the principle which was adopted as the basis of what had to be done. He found that what he called the intermittent current—one caused by alternately opening and closing the circuit—could not be made under any circumstances to reproduce the delicate forms of the air vibrations caused by the human voice in articulate speech, but that the true way was to operate on an unbroken current by increasing and diminishing its intensity. This he called a vibratory or undulatory current, not because the current was supposed to actually take that form, but because it expressed with sufficient accuracy his idea of a current which was subjected to gradual changes of intensity exactly analogous to the changes of density in the air occasioned by its vibrations. Such was his discovery, and it was new. Reis never thought of it, and he failed to transmit speech telegraphically. Bell did, and he succeeded. Under such circumstances it is impossible to hold that what Reis did was an anticipation of the discovery of Bell. To follow Reis is to fail, but to follow Bell is to succeed. The difference between the two is just the difference between failure and success. If Reis had kept on he might have found out the way to succeed, but he stopped and failed. Bell took up his work and carried it on to a successful result.

As to what is shown to have been written and done by Dr. Van der Weyde, it is only necessary to say that he copied Reis, and it was not until after Bell's success that he found out how to use a Reis instrument so as to make it transmit speech. Bell taught him what to do to accomplish that purpose.

So, as to James W. McDonough. We presume that it will not be claimed that he is entitled to more than he asked for in his application for a patent, filed April 10, 1876, and there a "circuit-breaker," so adjusted as to "break the connection by the vibrations of the membrane," is made one of the elements of his invention. The Patent Office was clearly right in holding that he had been anticipated by Reis.

The patents of Cromwell Fleetwood Varley, of London, England, granted on June 2, 1868, and the other October 8, 1870, were for "improvements in electric telegraphs." The objects of the invention covered by the first were "to cut off the disturbance arising from earth currents, to obtain a high speed of signalling through long circuits, and, should the conductor become partially exposed, to preserve it from being eaten away by electrolytic action;" and the object of the second was the "increase of the transmitting power of telegraph circuits, by enabling more than one operator to signal independent messages at the same time, upon one and the same wire, to and from independent stations." While this patentee in his specification says, "by my invention I superpose upon the currents used for working the ordinary telegraphs rapid undulations or waves, which do not practically alter the mechanical or chemical power of the ordinary signal currents," and that "these undulations are made to produce distinct and independent audible or other signals so long as these undulations are produced, whether ordinary signal currents be flowing or not," it is apparent that he uses the terms "undulations" and "waves" in an entirely different sense from Bell, for his patent implies operation on the principle of the electric telegraph; that is to say, by making and breaking the circuit. A Morse key, or something equivalent, is to be used; and besides, in the descriptive portion of the patent, it is said: "When the current is flowing through the coils of the electro-magnet the horns of the fork k are drawn apart and the spring l loses its contact; then, as the attraction of the magnet ceases, the horns of the fork spring back; this remakes the contact, and so a continual tremor is communicated to the tuning fork." In short, there is nothing in any part of the specification to indicate that the patentee had in his mind "undulations" resulting "from gradual changes of intensity exactly analogous to the changes in the density of air occasioned by simple pendulous vibrations," which was Bell's discovery, and on which his art rests. Varley's purpose was to superpose, that is to say, place upon the ordinary signal current another, which, by the action of the make and break principle of the telegraph, would do the work he wanted.

Another alleged anticipation is that of Daniel Drawbaugh.

Bell got his patent March 7, 1876, and the fortunate accident which led to his discovery occurred June 2, 1875. Active litigation to enforce his patented rights was begun by his company on the 12th of September, 1878, with a suit in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, against Richard A. Dowd. This suit was defended by the the Western Union Telegraph Company, and vigorously contested. The answer was filed November 4, 1878, setting up alleged anticipations by Gray, Edison, Dolbear and others. The record fills twelve hundred printed pages, but before a decision was reached the case was compromised and a decree entered by consent. The litigation ended at some time in the latter part of the year 1879. The last deposition was taken on the 19th of September in that year.

The next contested suit was brought in the same court on the 28th of July, 1880, against Albert Spencer and others. An answer was filed in this case September 6, 1880, and depositions afterwards taken, some of those in the Dowd suit being used in this by stipulation. On the 27th of June, 1881, a decision was announced by Judge Lowell sustaining the patent, upon which a decree was entered.

On the 14th of November, 1879, Abner G. Tisdel filed in the Patent Office an application for a patent for "a new and useful improvement in speaking-telephones," and on the 18th of November, 1879, Frank A. Klemm also filed an application for a patent for "a new and useful improvement in telephone-transmitters." These inventions were transferred by assignment to Ernest Marx and Frank A. Klemm of New York City, Moritz Loth of Cincinnati, and Simon Wolf of Washington. On the 6th of March, 1880, these parties entered into a mutual agreement to the effect that "each and all of their interests in said improvements and inventions, and the letters patent to be issued therefor, shall be merged and consolidated as common stock in a corporate body, under the laws of either of the States of Ohio, New York, or the general laws of the United States, relating to the formation of incorporations in the District of Columbia, or of such other States or Territories as may be found necessary hereafter." This agreement was recorded in the Patent Office March 10, 1880.

On the 6th of May, 1880, Edgar W. Chellis, a merchant of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, M. W. Jacobs, a lawyer at the same place, and Lysander Hill, a lawyer then residing in Washington, in the District of Columbia, made an arrangement with Daniel Drawbaugh by which they were to become jointly interested with him in his alleged telephone inventions, each to have a quarter interest. Nothing was paid for this, but each of the parties was to have one fourth of anything that should be realized from the enterprise. On the 24th of May, 1880, Simon Wolf, one of the parties interested in the Klemm and Tisdel inventions, visited Harrisburg on business with Chellis in reference to telephone matters. On the 18th of May, four days before this visit, a patent was issued to Wolf and his associates upon the invention of Tisdel. While Wolf was in Harrisburg negotiations were begun with Chellis for a transfer of the Drawbaugh inventions to the owners of those of Klemm and Tisdel. These negotiations resulted in a conditional contract of the 22d of June, by reason of which Chellis, Jacobs, Hill, and Drawbaugh went to Washington, and there on the 21st of July, 1880, Drawbaugh, claiming to "have invented certain new and useful improvements in the transmission of vocal speech, and the apparatus to be used for such purpose, for which I am about to make application for letters patent of the United States," assigned to Klemm, Marx, Wolf, and Loth "the full and exclusive right to the said invention as fully set forth and described in the specification prepared and executed by me, dated the 21st day of July, 1880, preparatory to obtaining letters patent of the United States therefor," and he, at the same time, and by the same instrument, authorized and requested the Commissioner of Patents to issue the patent to his assignees, "each as assignee of one fourth part." The specification referred to in the assignment has not been put in evidence in any of the cases. In the course of taking the testimony it was called for by the Bell Company, but the counsel for the opposite party refused to produce either the original or a copy from the Patent Office. The assignment was recorded in the Patent Office July 22, 1880, and in the official digest of assignments the following notation appears: "About to make appl'n. Spe'n dated July 21, 1880."

On the morning of July 22, 1880, the following appeared in the Cincinnati Commercial, a newspaper printed at Cincinnati, Ohio:

"TELEPHONE COMBINATION.
"Special to Cincinnati Commercial.

"WASHINGTON, D. C., July 21.—An application for a patent was filed to-day that, in consequence of its vastness of interest, as well as wealth of prospect, renders it a subject of national interest. A company of leading business men has been formed, that has bought up all the telephone patents antedating those now in use, and known as the Bell, Gray, and Edison patents. The company is composed of leading business men from all parts of the country, Cincinnati being largely represented and interested. The cash capital of the company is $5,000,000, with headquarters in New York, and in about sixty days they will open up the telephone, which will certainly result in the driving out of all telephones in the market, save the ones they hold, or else the compelling the Gray, Bell, and Edison lines to pay the new company a munificent royalty. It appears from the testimony now on file and in the possession of the new company, which is conclusive and exhaustive, that the inventor of the telephone is a poor mechanic, living near Harrisburg, Pa., named Daniel Drawbaugh. Owing to his poverty, he was unable to push his patent on the market. The new company have secured and are sole possessors of this invention, antedating those now in use. They are also owners of four patents for telephones issued to Mr. Klemm, of New York. A large number of capitalists were here to-day to see the filing of the application, and they assert, with a positiveness that is almost convincing, that it will not be long till they have entire charge of the telephones, not only in this country but in the world, and that they will be able to establish lines by which messages can be transmitted for almost a song.

"Mr. Lipman Levy, of the law firm of Moulton, Johnson & Levy, of Cincinnati, was here to-day, in the interest of the Cincinnati parties, who, as already stated, are among the most prominent financial men of our city."

Afterwards, on the 23d of August, 1880, the following appeared in the Journal of Commerce, a newspaper printed in the city of New York:

"A NEW TELEPHONE COMPANY.

A company has recently been formed in this city with a capital of $5,000,000, for the purpose of manufacturing telephones. The company is to be known as The People's Telephone Company, and a number of leading capitalists in this city and Cincinnati are interested in it. The telephones are to be manufactured under the patents of Frank A. Klemm and Abner G. Tisdel, and the application for patents of Daniel Drawbaugh, of Eberly's Mills, Cumberland County, Pa., filed July 21, 1880. It is claimed by those interested in the new enterprise that Drawbaugh is really the inventor of the telephone, and had completed one years before Professor Bell or any one else had manufactured one. He was, however, in very humble circumstances, and his neighbors who knew of his experiments looked upon him as a harmless lunatic. He continued improving his original telephone, and it is claimed that the one which the new company proposes to furnish is superior to any now in use. The company has fitted up a factory in Brooklyn, and in three months will be prepared to supply 1000 of the new telephones. As soon as operations are actively commenced, it is expected that legal proceedings will be begun against the new company by the Gold and Stock Telegraph Company, which holds most of the existing patents, and a long and interesting legal fight is anticipated."

On the 30th of August, 1880, the People's Telephone Company was incorporated under the general laws of New York, with an authorized capital stock of $5,000,000, for "manufacturing, constructing, owning, furnishing, letting and selling telephones, and the apparatus used therewith, under the inventions and patents of Abner G. Tisdel, Frank A. Klemm Daniel Drawbaugh, and other inventions and patents which may hereafter be assigned to said company;" and on the 4th of September, 1880, Klemm, Loth, Marx, and Wolf, in consideration of $4,999,550, represented by 99,991 shares of stock, assigned and transferred to that company all their interest in the Klemm, Tisdel, and Drawbaugh inventions, those of Drawbaugh being described as "the inventions in telephones made by Daniel Drawbaugh of Eberly's Mills, Cumberland County, in the State of Pennsylvania, for which application for patents was made on or about the 21st day of July, 1880, and which was assigned to us on the [twenty-] first day of July, 1880, as more particularly appears in a deed of assignment recorded in the United States Patent Office in Liber W. 25, page 85, in the Book of Transfers of Patents."

For the assignment from Drawbaugh to Klemm, Marx, Loth, and Wolf $20,000 was paid in money to Chellis, Jacobs, Hill, and Drawbaugh, and they were also to have a certain amount of the stock of the proposed corporation when formed. What amount they actually got Chellis, who was sworn as a witness in the case, declined to tell, but he admitted it was large.

At this time, and in this way, the attention of the general public was called for the first time to the fact that Drawbaugh claimed to have anticipated Bell in the discovery of the telephone. Bell's success had been proclaimed more than four years before at the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia. In the mean time inventions in aid of his discovery had been multiplied. According to the testimony of Park Benjamin, more than one hundred patents had been issued and indexed under the word "telephone." Numerous interferences had been declared and considered at the Patent Office. Gray, Edison, Dolbear, and others had either claimed for themselves, or others had claimed for them, priority of invention and discovery, and Bell had thus far been sustained as against them all. Blake had perfected his microphone apparatus, and Bell's patent had become a great commercial success.

The People's Company either began or threatened to begin operations under its charter, and on the 20th of October, 1880, the Bell Company brought suit against it in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, to prevent any infringement of the Bell patents. In the bill it was alleged "that telephone exchanges now exist in more than two hundred and seventy-five towns and cities of the United States, and in every State thereof, and exist in substantially every city in the United States having more than 15,000 inhabitants, and in many smaller places;" "that there are now in use more than 100,000 electric speaking-telephones licensed by and paying royalty to" the Bell Company; "that the owners of said Bell patents, and those who now are or heretofore have been licensed by them, have devoted great time and attention and large sums of money to the development of the telephone and the introduction thereof into extensive use, and to the proper construction of the most suitable telephone lines and systems and telephonic appliances, and have constructed many thousand miles of telephone lines for use with telephones owned by" the Bell Company, "and licensed by it for such use, and that nothing which the defendants, or F. A. Klemm, A. G. Tisdel, and D. Drawbaugh * * * have done has contributed in any substantial way to the development of the telephone or the introduction thereof into use." The bill then avers that Klemm, Marx, Loth, and Wolf, having become the owners of the Klemm and Tisdel improvements, and having heard that Drawbaugh "claimed that he had made some experiments relating to electric speaking-telephones (which experiments, if made, were incomplete, imperfect, unfruitful, and long before abandoned), entered into an arrangement with him to set up and claim that he was the first inventor of the speaking-telephone, and to make application for a patent therefor; and thereafter, alleging and pretending that said Drawbaugh was the original and first inventor of the electric speaking-telephones, and that electric speaking-telephones had not before such application been in public use or on sale for more than two years, with the knowledge and consent of Drawbaugh, they did, on or about the 21st day of July, 1880, induce him to make and cause to be filed in the Patent Office of the United States an application for a patent to issue to them as assignees of the said Drawbaugh, as the first and original inventor of the electric speaking-telephone, the said defendants well knowing at the time that electric speaking-telephones had been in public use by" the Bell Company and its licensees "for more than two years before said application." It was then further alleged that if Drawbaugh had ever made his pretended inventions they "have not been by him, or any one claiming under him, introduced into public use, and that knowledge thereof has been withheld from your orators and the public, except so far as they have been disclosed within the three months last past by certain newspaper publications."

To this bill the People's Company filed an answer in December, 1880, or January, 1881. The record does not show the precise date. In this answer it was said that Drawbaugh was "the original and first inventor and discoverer of the art of communicating articulate speech between distant places by voltaic and magneto electricity," and that "long prior to the alleged inventions by" Bell, Gray, and Edison he, "then and now residing at Eberly's Mills, constructed and operated practical working electric speaking-telephones at said Eberly's Mills, and exhibited their successful operation to a great number of other persons resident in his vicinity and elsewhere;" that his telephones, as then constructed and operated, "contained all the material and substantial parts and inventions patented" in the patents of Bell, and "also other important and valuable inventions in electric and magneto telephony, and were fully capable of transmitting, and were actually used for transmitting, articulate vocal sounds and speech between distant points by means of electric currents; that some of the original machines and instruments, invented, made, used and exhibited to many others long prior to the said alleged inventions of Bell, or either of them, are still in existence, and capable of successful practical use, and are identified by a large number of persons who personally tested and used them, and knew of their practical operation and use, in the years 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, and both prior and subsequently thereto; that certainly more than fifty, and probably not less than one hundred, persons, or even more, were cognizant of said Drawbaugh's invention and use of said telephones and of his claim to be the original and first inventor thereof prior to the alleged inventions of said Bell, or either of them; that said Drawbaugh, for more than ten years prior to the year 1880, was miserably poor, in debt, with a large and helpless family dependent on his daily labor, and was from such cause alone utterly unable to patent his invention, or caveat it, or manufacture and introduce it on the market; that said Drawbaugh never abandoned his said invention, nor acknowledged the claims of any other person or persons thereto, but always persisted in his claims to it, and intended to patent it as soon as he could procure the necessary means therefor; that said Drawbaugh never acquiesced in the public use of said Bell, Gray, Edison, Blake or other telephones, nor in the claims of the alleged inventors thereof, nor gave his consent to such use." It is then said that Drawbaugh, after finding by experiment that his invention was capable of successful working, "conceived that its range and capacity for usefulness to the public might be very greatly enlarged; that many improvements of great value might be made and added to it, which, without departing from its principle, might increase its value to himself and to the public, and therefore set himself at work to discover and invent such improvements; that he discovered and invented some of said additional improvements prior to any alleged invention by Bell; and that notwithstanding his embarrassed and impoverished pecuniary condition, and his utter want of proper mechanical tools, materials, and appliances to conduct such work, he labored with all reasonable diligence to perfect and adapt his said improvements, and did finally, in due exercise of such reasonable diligence, perfect and adapt the same; and that in so far as the said Bell has incorporated such improvements in his said two patents, or either of them, he, the said Bell, has surreptitiously and unjustly obtained a patent or patents for that which was in fact first invented by Drawbaugh, who was using reasonable diligence in perfecting and adapting the same, and, therefore, the patent or patents of the said Bell therefor is or are invalid and void." It is then said that "the defendant in good faith, and relying upon its legal rights, * * * caused applications to be made and filed in the Patent Office for letters patent on the inventions of the said Daniel Drawbaugh, with the intention of procuring interference proceedings to be instituted, in accordance with the statute, against the patents of said Bell, and the pending applications of said Gray, Edison, and others, in order that said Drawbaugh may be adjudged by the Commissioner of Patents to be, as he rightfully is, the original and first inventor of the electric speaking-telephone, and may be adjudged entitled to receive a patent or patents therefor."

The People's Company began taking depositions on the 19th of April, 1881, but Drawbaugh himself did not appear as a witness until December 7, 1881. After that time others were examined, and when the proofs were closed between three and four hundred witnesses had been produced whose testimony was taken and put into the record to establish the priority of Drawbaugh's invention. This testimony, as is now claimed, shows the story of that invention to have been as follows:

"Early conception and experiments with the continuous current, 1862, 1866, and 1867.

"Tea-cup transmitter and receiver, 1866 and 1867.

"Tumbler and tin cup and mustard can ('F' and 'B'), 1867 and 1869.

"Improvement on 'B' ('C'), 1869, 1870.

"Further improvement upon 'C,' and the more perfect magneto instrument 'I,' 1870, 1871.

"Mouthpiece changed to centre and adjusting screw inserted (Exhibit 'A'), 1874.

"'D' and 'E,' perfectly adjusted and finished magneto instruments, January and February, 1875.

"'L,' 'M,' 'G,' and 'O,' from February, 1875, to August, 1876.

"'H,' August, 1876.

"'J,' 'N,' and 'P,' 1878."

This statement of the Drawbaugh claim we have quoted from the brief of counsel appearing in his behalf, and his success in the litigation has been placed, as we understand it, both in the answer and in the argument, on the truth or falsehood of what is thus set forth.

The letters "F," "B," etc., in the statement refer to exhibits in the cause, being certain instruments claimed to have been made and used by Drawbaugh in the progress of his work and preserved until now. The original tea-cup instrument was not produced, but Drawbaugh in his deposition gave what he said was a drawing, showing how it had been constructed. "F," "B," "C," "I," and "A" were neither of them in a condition for use when they were put in evidence, and no one of all the witnesses except Drawbaugh could tell how they were originally constructed, or what the process was by which sound was transmitted when they were used. All any of the witnesses could say on that subject was that they had used one or more of the different instruments at Drawbaugh's shop, had heard sounds and sometimes spoken words through them, and that Drawbaugh told them the sound was carried on the wire by electricity. There was nothing whatever produced in print or in writing on the subject; not even a memorandum or a drawing of any kind. And there is nothing in the testimony to show that Drawbaugh ever told any one how his earlier instruments were made, or what his process was, until he was called as a witness in December, 1881, and explained it in his testimony. This was nearly twenty years, according to the present claim, after he had begun his experiments, nearly seven after he had made and used "D" and "E," "perfectly adjusted and finished magneto instruments," and more than five after "L," "M," "G," "O," and "H" had been constructed.

and kept in his shop. It was also nearly six years after the date of Bell's patent, more than five years after the success of his discovery had been proclaimed at the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, four after his process had got into public use, three after it had become an established success, and two after he had brought his first suit for the establishment of his rights against Dowd, who represented the Western Union Telegraph Company, to a successful termination.

Under these circumstances it becomes important to consider the conduct of Drawbaugh in reference to his alleged invention during this twenty years of eventful history as connected with the discovery and use of telephones. If his present claim is true his experiments began almost as far back as those of Reis, and he had in his shop at Eberly's Mills, within three miles of Harrisburg, telephones that were substantially perfect months before Bell, on the 2d of June, 1875, got the clue to his subsequent discoveries. It is conceded that "D" and "E" made, as is claimed, in February, 1875, are substantially as good magneto instruments as any Bell had used before December, 1881, and "L," "M," "G," "O," and "H," all of which it is claimed were constructed by August, 1876, and some in February, 1875, are as good or nearly as good microphones as those of Blake, which were not invented until 1878. This is the theory of Drawbaugh's defense as it is set forth in the answer and in the argument, and by it his case must stand or fall. The claim is that the discovery of the process was complete, and that perfect telephones had been made and were in a condition for use a year and more before Bell got his patent.

Drawbaugh was, when he gave his deposition, fifty-four years of age, and had lived all his life at or near Eberly Mills, a small village near Harrisburg. He was a skillful and ingenious mechanic, and if he made " D " and "E," and the instruments which came after them, at the time it is said he did, he had good tools and good materials in 1875 and 1876, and was capable of doing the best of work. He was also somewhat of an inventor, and had some knowledge of electricity. According to the testimony he was an enthusiast on the subject of his "talking machine," and showed it freely to his neighbors and people from the country when they visited his shop.

The Centennial Exposition was opened at Philadelphia in May, 1876, and Drawbaugh visited it on the 17th of October, 1876, remaining four or five days. Before he went he had heard, as he says, that some one besides himself had invented a speaking telephone, which he had the impression was on exhibition there. If what he now claims is true, he had then on hand in his shop Exhibits " D," " E," " L," "M," "G," "O," and "H," all of them good instruments of their kind, and capable of transmitting speech, and some of them but just finished. Bell's apparatus had been exhibited to the Board of Judges in June before, and had attracted marked attention. The matter was much discussed in the public press, and yet it never seems to have occurred to Drawbaugh to take any of his telephones with him when he went, although they were small in size, and some, or all of them, could have been carried without serious inconvenience.

When giving his testimony he was examined in chief as to that visit, and this is what he said on the subject of telephones.

"Q. 386. Did you attend the Centennial Exhibition, at Philadelphia, in the year 1876? A. Yes, sir; I did.

"Q. 387. Can you give the date on which you went there? A. I can by reference to a book. It was October 17, 1876. The 17th was a day on which I dated a letter from Philadelphia, while I was there on that visit.

"Q. 388. How long did you visit there last? A. About four or five days, to the best of my recollection.

"Q. 389. Who went with you on that visit? A. Mr. George Leonard.

"Q. 390. Was that the only visit to the Centennial Exhibition that you made? A. Yes, sir; it was.

"Q. 391. At the time that you went there, or before that time, had you heard that somebody else besides yourself had invented a speaking telephone—or a telephone? A. Yes, sir; some time before that, I don't remember how long, but not a great while.

"Q. 392. When you went there, did you suppose it would be on exhibition there? A. I don't remember whether I had heard that it was on exhibition or not; but I got the impression some way that it was on exhibition.

"Q. 393. While you were there at the Centennial, did you see any telephones, or make an effort to see any there? A. Yes, sir; I made an effort and seen an instrument called a telephone, and supposed it to be the instrument spoken of —the one of which I had heard. I was looking and had made some inquiry, and was directed or came to a portion of the building where I saw on a counter some man's telephone, the name I don't remember. At that time, or several times that I called, there was no one there to attend to it. I spoke to another party that had something else on exhibition —I don't recollect what it was—just near by, and I asked him whether there was any one there to attend, or to show the instruments. I was informed then there was no one there to show them.

"Q. 394. If you remember, please state what kind of an instrument it was that you saw there, and state what information you were able to obtain there regarding it and its mode of operation. A. There was a number of instruments placed on to a raised portion—something like a shelf. That is, it resembled something like pigeon-holes, a box open in front, and each instrument at the back of it had an electro-magnet. The number of instruments I don't remember. I don't remember of counting them. If I am not mistaken there may have been a dozen or more, perhaps; some were larger than others. I could not give you a much better description than that. I couldn't get any information about them. This attendant made some remarks about the instruments, but he didn't understand them, and couldn't explain them. I was several feet from where the instruments were. They were placed—it occurs to me—on a raised place like a shelf, just about high enough for a man to speak into; that is the way it looked to me. I did not go in behind the counter to examine them, although there was an opening to go in by, because I did not like to make too free, as there was no one there.

"Q. 395. Did you see any circulars lying around there referring to these instruments, or other advertisements of them? A. I don't remember about that; it may have been.

"Q. 396. What was your impression as to the character of the instruments, when you finally left them? A. I was impressed with the idea that they were instruments to telegraph by sounds. A certain sound to represent a certain letter of the alphabet. I am not certain how I got the idea, or whether any person told me that at the time, but that is the idea that I had. When I said certain sounds, I meant that sounds of a different pitch would represent different letters.

"Q. 397. Do you know whether that was 'Gray's Harmonic Telegraph' that you saw there or not? A. It didn't say 'telegraph;' I am confident it was called 'telephone.' I didn't see the working parts of the interior, except the electro-magnets. I took the name of the man and his address on a piece of paper, and put it in my pocket, but I don't know what became of it. I don't know whether it was 'Gray's Harmonic Telegraph' or not.

"Q. 398. Did you see any tuning forks about it? A. I did not."

That was all he did during his entire visit to ascertain whether any one besides himself had actually entered upon this then new and interesting field of invention and discovery. He spoke to no one about what he had done himself, and he made no special effort to find out whether that which was on exhibition was in any respect like what he had at home. Neither did he when he got home, so far as the records show, say anything to his neighbors or visiting friends about what he had seen or heard. He had apparently lost all interest in "talking machines."

Not so, however, with his other inventions. The testimony shows that during the early part of 1876, he was much occupied in building an electric clock, which he thought of exhibiting at the Centennial. This he did not do, however, but either just before he went to Philadelphia, or soon after, Rufus E. Shapley, a jeweler of Mechanicsburg, went by his invitation, or on his suggestion, to Eberly's Mills to look at the clock which he had made. Soon afterwards the clock was taken to Shapley's store in Mechanicsburg, and on the 8th of November, 1876, Drawbaugh by an instrument in writing transferred to Shapley a half interest in the "clock I am getting up, the said R. E. Shapley to pay for patenting the same." Shapley had then two thousand dollars in money which Drawbaugh was anxious to have him invest in that business, and the clock was taken by him to his shop so that it might be examined with that end in view if it should prove to be useful. Some time afterwards it was taken back to Eberly's Mills, where it remained until April 1, 1878, or thereabouts, when a clock company was formed, and that clock, or another one substantially like it, was taken about the country for exhibition. For this Drawbaugh was paid five hundred dollars, with an interest in the profits, and on the 20th of September, 1878, he applied for a patent for "improvement in earth batteries for electric clocks," which was issued January 14, 1879, to the members of the clock company. The enterprise does not seem to have been productive of any great success.

In November or December, 1878, while this clock was on exhibition at Harrisburg, Drawbaugh was introduced to Edgar W. Chellis. He had with him at the time a "wooden model of a faucet" that he wanted Chellis and another man to take each a third interest in. An arrangement was afterwards made by which Chellis got a two-thirds interest, he paying for it two hundred and fifty dollars, January 7, 1879. On the 14th of the same month Drawbaugh filed in the Patent Office an application for a patent for an "improvement in rotary measuring faucets," Chellis to have a two-thirds interest. After this application an interference was declared, March 29, 1879, between Drawbaugh and David A. Hauck, who had filed a conflicting application January 17. In his preliminary statement upon this interference Drawbaugh said that he had conceived the idea of his faucets and sketched them late in the fall of 1876; that he made a working model in the spring of 1877, and actually tested it then, but the Patent Office model was not completed until about the 1st of November, 1878. The case was closely contested, but finally decided in favor of Drawbaugh, January 15, 1880. The patent was granted to him and Chellis July 6 of the same year. In this contest Jacobs and Hill, who afterwards became interested in his telephone claims, appeared as the counsel of Drawbaugh.

On the 2d of July, 1879, Drawbaugh filed another application in the Patent Office for "improvement in water motors," Chellis to have in this also a two-thirds interest. Upon this application a patent was issued March 16, 1880.

It is impossible to believe, if Drawbaugh had in his shop, when he reached home from the Centennial, Exhibits "D," "E," "L," "M," "G," "O," and "H," or even "D" and "E" alone, that he would have set himself to work, in the first instance, at developing his clock enterprise, or perfecting his former conception of a measuring faucet, instead of making some effort to call the attention of his friends to his great discovery of the telephone, which he was in danger of losing by the patent which had been issued to another, and which he could not but have known was even then attracting the greatest attention. And in this connection it must be kept in mind that the theory of the defense is, as stated in the answer, that Drawbaugh had at that time fully perfected his invention, and that while at first he "conceived that its range and capacity for usefulness to the public might be very greatly enlarged," he had, before the date of Bell's patent, "notwithstanding his embarrassed and impoverished pecuniary condition, and his utter want of proper mechanical tools," finally perfected his work. His conduct afterwards, therefore, is to be judged, not as that of one who was still in the midst of his experiments, and doubtful of the results, but of one who had arrived at the end and had completed his success.

No man of his intelligence, with or without the enthusiasm upon the subject which it is said he possessed, could have remained silent under such circumstances. As we have read the testimony, it is not even pretended that he took any of his instruments outside of his own village until May, 1878, when, as is claimed, he showed one to his friend Stees, in Harrisburg, whom he had known for years, and who was the first to use, and, in fact, was then using, a Bell telephone, in that place, upon a private line of his own between his office and his shops. This produced no results, and when afterwards, in January, 1879, Chellis was told that Drawbaugh had "a phonograph and a telephone that he had invented," he gave it no attention, because, to use his own language, "I was interested in the faucet and motor business, and wished to push them, and I did not think we could do much with the telephone, as Bell had a patent, and I did not know that he could antedate them." And again, when speaking of a conversation he had with Drawbaugh, he said: "I advised him to drop it—the telephone—as he could not antedate Bell. He said he did not know about that; that he had been working on it a good while. It was his way of expressing himself; when I would say, 'You can't antedate Bell,' he would say, 'I don't know about that; I have been working at it a good while.'" This, it must be remembered, was in 1879, after the telephone had become a success, and after it had been a year or more in use in Harrisburg, where Chellis lived. It is impossible to believe that either Chellis or Drawbaugh was ignorant of the approximate time of Bell's invention, which had been the subject of frequent newspaper comment from the time of its exhibition at the Centennial. The subject was often referred to in the Harrisburg and Mechanicsburg papers, and it is not for a moment to be supposed that all of these various articles escaped their attention. Under such circumstances, if it were true that Drawbaugh had made his "D" and "E," as is now claimed, in February, 1875, he certainly would have said so, and would not have contented himself with so doubting an answer to Chellis's suggestion of his inability to antedate Bell as that which Chellis now says he gave.

Another important fact in this connection is one which is proved by the testimony of Andrew R. Kiefer, who, from 1868, had been division telegraph operator, having charge of the middle division of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and residing in Harrisburg. From 1867 to the winter of 1881–2 he was a member of a partnership firm in that place which was engaged in "the manufacture of burglar alarms, electric hotel annunciators, and fine electric work for the government—instruments for the Signal Bureau, patent models, &c." He had also, since 1876, kept a place for the sale of electrical supplies. He had known Drawbaugh certainly since 1876, and probably before. Drawbaugh met him on different occasions and talked upon electrical matters. In the course of their acquaintance Drawbaugh showed him an electrical fire-alarm apparatus and the works of his electric clock, but the subject of telephones was never alluded to between them until in the summer of 1881, when this occurred. We quote from Kiefer's deposition:

"In the summer of 1881 I took my wife out for a drive, and went over to see his [Drawbaugh's] works, never having seen them, and having promised to come and see him some time; my wife, not caring about going through the shop, remained in the carriage, and I went through alone with Mr. Drawbaugh. He showed me through the shops and introduced me to Mr. Chellis, and showed me parts of the water motor and some other things of his getting up. On account of my wife's being in the carriage alone I did not stay long. As I stepped into or was just in the carriage, Mr. Drawbaugh said, 'I forgot to show you my telephone.' I did not get out again to go and see it, and I drove away without seeing it, expecting to see it again, but I have never got over to the shop since."

This was after the suit of the Bell Company against the People's Company was begun, and of course after the matter got into the hands of Chellis and his associates. It is no answer to the criticism of Drawbaugh's conduct in this particular to say, as was said in argument, that "one reason why he did not speak or apply to every man with whom he had personal acquaintance, was that he was ridiculed by his neighbors; that his invention was considered a humbug by them, and of no commercial value." Bell's success was proclaimed in the Harrisburg Patriot as early as February 26, 1877, and the days of ridicule were then past. If Drawbaugh had at that time in his shop the machines which it is now claimed were all complete as they now are by August, 1876, and most of them before, there cannot be a doubt that he would have taken them to some place where they could be tried, and show that they would do what he had all along claimed for them. All he had to do, at any time after he came back from the Centennial, was to take any pair of his little instruments to his friend Zeigler or his friend Stees at Harrisburg, attach them to a line-wire, and show what he had. They were men who could appreciate his achievement, and help him if it was, as he now says it was, a success. It would certainly have been easier then, within two years of the time the first of them were made, and within a year of the date of Bell's patent, to show that he "antedated" Bell, than it was three years afterwards, when he was brought into the controversy through the instrumentality of his associates, not, as must be evident to all, to get a patent for himself, but to defeat that of Bell. And in this connection it is specially significant that the application which it is claimed was made for a patent on the 21st of July, 1880, and the specification of his invention which was then written out, have been purposely and designedly kept out of the case, although their production was demanded. They were written before this suit was begun, and it is impossible to believe that they would have been withheld, at least upon the call of the opposite party, if they were in all respects consistent with the subsequent developments of the case. The excuse given by counsel at the time, that they were "in the secret archives of the Patent Office," and "if produced and published in this cause would possibly invite the filing of contesting applications, and result in interference and additional litigation, besides unnecessarily prolonging the taking of testimony here and increasing the expenses," we cannot accept as satisfactory, especially as in the answer it was said that one object of filing the application was to procure "interference proceedings to be instituted against the patents of Bell, in order that Drawbaugh may be adjudged by the Commissioner to be, as he rightfully is, the original and first inventor."

We have not overlooked the depositions that have been taken in such large numbers to show that Drawbaugh was successful with "F," "B," "C," "I," and "A," before "D" and "E" were made. They have been studied with care and if they contained all the testimony in the case it would be more difficult to reach the conclusion that Drawbaugh's claim was not sustained. But in our opinion their effect has been completely overcome by the conduct of Drawbaugh, about which there is no dispute, from the time of his visit to the Centennial until he was put forward by the promoters of the People's Company, nearly four years afterwards, to contest the claims of Bell. He was silent so far as the general public were concerned, when if he had really done what these witnesses now think he did he would most certainly have spoken. There is hardly a single act of his connected with his present claim, from the time he heard, before going to Philadelphia, that some one else had invented a telephone which was on exhibition at the Centennial, that is not entirely inconsistent with the idea even then of a complete discovery or invention by himself which could be put to any practical use. It is not pretended that what he did was done in private. He had influential friends with ample pecuniary resources, ready to help him in bringing out his inventions when they promised success. He easily got aid for his clock and for his faucet. The news of Bell's invention spread rapidly and at once and it took but a few months to demonstrate to the world that he had achieved a brilliant success. If it were known at Eberly's Mills alone that Drawbaugh had been doing the same thing for years in his shop there—and it certainly would have been known all through the little village if it had actually been done—no one can believe that the public would be kept in ignorance of it until four years afterwards, when a "special" from Washington "to the Cincinnati Commercial" announced a "Telephone Combination" to have entire charge of the telephones, not only in this country, but in the world," that could transmit messages "for almost a song."

But there is another fact in this case equally striking. As has already been seen, "F," "B," "C," and "I" were in no condition for use when they were produced and put in evidence. They were mere "remains," and no one but Drawbaugh himself could tell how they were made or how they were to be used. He undertook to reproduce some of them, especially "F" and "B." This was in the latter part of 1881, while the testimony was being taken. The Bell Company proposed that they should be tried to see if they would do what the witnesses said had been done with the originals which the "remains" show must have been exceedingly primitive in their character. The testimony also shows that when they were originally used by or in the presence of the witnesses, no particular care was taken in their adjustment. They were lying around in the shop or standing upon shelves. Some say that when experiments were made they were held in the hand or allowed to stand on the table. Many testify to satisfactory results, and Drawbaugh himself said in his deposition: "I would have persons in the cellar reading printed matter—some advertisement or something—and I could hear the words that were read; and at other times I would go down into the cellar and read something, and coming up they would repeat the words to me that I had read."

The proposition of the Bell Company was accepted, and the reproductions were tried in March, 1882, under the most favorable circumstances. Three days were occupied in the test, and it is substantially conceded that it was a failure. Occasionally a sound was heard and sometimes a word, but "it would not transmit sentences." At the time of these experiments "F" which was the transmitter, was placed on a table, and used as Drawbaugh said it was originally. Two years afterwards other reproductions were presented, differently constructed and used in a different way, and these would "talk," but they were neither made nor used in the same way as the originals. To our minds the result of the second experiments conclusively showed that the original instruments could not have done what the witnesses supposed they did, and that what they saw and heard was produced by some other means than an electric speaking-telephone. We do not doubt that Drawbaugh may have conceived the idea that speech could be transmitted to a distance by means of electricity and that he was experimenting upon that subject; but to hold that he had discovered the art of doing it before Bell did would be to construe testimony without regard to "the ordinary laws that govern human conduct." Atlantic Works v. Brady, 107 U. S. 192, 203 [27: 438, 442]. Without pursuing the subject further we decide that the Drawbaugh defense has not been made out.

Another objection to Bell's patent, put forth in the oral argument of Mr. Hill, and in the printed brief signed by him and in that signed by Mr. Dixon, is that his application as originally filed in the Patent Office did not contain his present fourth claim, or any description of the variable resistance method, and that all which now appears in the specification on that subject, including the fourth claim, was surreptitiously interpolated afterwards.

Bell's application was filed February 14, 1876, and afterwards, during the same day, Elisha Gray filed a caveat, in which he claimed as his invention "the art of transmitting vocal sounds or conversations telegraphically through an electric circuit," and in his specification described the variable resistance method. The precise charge now made in the printed brief of Mr. Hill is, that "Mr. Bell's attorneys had an underground railroad in operation between their office and Examiner Wilbur's room in the Patent Office, by which they were enabled to have unlawful and guilty knowledge of Gray's papers as soon as they were filed in the Patent Office," and "that an important invention, and a claim therefor, were bodily interpolated into Bell's specification, between February 14, 1876, and February 19, 1876, by Pollok, in consequence of the guilty knowledge which the latter already had of the contents of Gray's caveat before the declaration of interference with Gray on February 19."

So grave a charge, made in so formal a manner, is entitled to careful consideration. It involves the professional integrity and moral character of eminent attorneys, and requires us to find from the evidence that after Bell swore to his application on the 20th of January, 1876, and after the application thus sworn to had been formally filed in the Patent Office, an examiner, who got knowledge of the Gray caveat put in afterwards, disclosed its contents to Bell's attorneys; that they were then allowed to withdraw the application, change it so as to include Gray's variable resistance method over Bell's signature, and over the jurat, and then restore it to the files, thus materially altered, as if it were the original; and all this between February 14 and February 19.

Although much stress was laid in argument on the fact that what purported to be a certified copy of the specification of Bell, as found in the file wrapper and contents printed in the Dowd Case, differed materially from the patent, the cause of these differences has been explained in the most satisfactory manner, and we entertain no doubt whatever that the specification as now found in the patent is precisely the same as that on which the order to issue was made. If any alterations were made it was all done before February 19, and the fair copy which is now found on the files of the Office is precisely as it was when the order for the patent was granted. Not a shadow of suspicion can rest on any one growing out of the misprint of the specification in the Dowd Case.

All that remains, therefore, on which to rest this serious charge is, that in a paper handed by Bell to George Brown, of Toronto, describing his invention, and which was intended to be used in England to secure a British patent, what is now claimed to be an interpolation in the American application is not to be found. It is but right to say that during the whole course of the protracted litigation upon the Bell patent, no argument was ever presented based on this discrepancy until the brief of Mr. Hill was filed in this court on the 18th of January, 1887, six days before the argument in these appeals was begun. So far as we are advised nothing had ever before occurred in the cases that seemed to make it necessary to prove when the variable resistance method or the fourth claim was put into the American application, or why it was left out of the paper handed to Brown. It seems always to have been assumed until the cases got here, that because it was in the American patent it was rightfully there. Certainly there is nothing in the pleadings in any of the cases to direct attention to the materiality of this fact.

A comparison of the paper handed Brown with the American application shows that they differ in more than thirty different places besides those which relate to the variable resistance method and the fourth claim. The differences are generally in forms of expression, thus indicating that one was written after the other and evidently for the purpose of securing greater accuracy. The paper handed Brown was clearly a rough draft and not a fair copy, for the record shows that it bore on its face the evidence of many erasures and interlineations. Bell says in his testimony that he began writing his specification in September or October, 1875, and wrote and rewrote it a number of times, finally adopting that mode of expression which seemed to him the best to explain his invention and the relation which one portion bore to another. He visited Brown in Canada in September and again in December, 1875. The arrangement was made between them on the 29th of December, at this last interview, by which Brown was to interest himself in getting out British patents. Other inventions besides the telephone were included in the contract entered into for that purpose.

Bell returned to Boston on the 1st of January, and immediately set himself to work to complete his specification. He had it done so that it was taken to Washington by Mr. Hubbard about the 10th of that month, and delivered to Pollok and Bailey, the attorneys. It was then examined by the attorneys, found correct, and a fair copy made and returned on the 18th to Bell in Boston for his signature and oath. It was signed and sworn to in Suffolk County, Massachusetts, January 20, and immediately returned to the attorneys. Afterwards Pollok met Bell in New York, and it was again gone over with care by the two together. No change whatever was made in it at that time, and Pollok took it back with him to Washington.

On the 25th of January, 1876, Bell met Brown, who was then on the way to England, in New York. It is now assumed that the paper which Brown took to England was handed to him then, and because the variable resistance method and the fourth claim were not in that, it is argued that they could not have been in the American specification at that time. But no one has said when the paper was actually handed to Brown. Bell says he cannot tell, but that it must have been after he made his contract with Brown on the 29th of December. As the American specification was signed and sworn to five days before the interview with Brown on the 25th of January, and the paper of Brown differs from it in so many particulars besides that now in question, it would seem to be clear that the paper was a copy of some former draft which Bell had made—possibly one taken to Canada in December—and not of that which was perfected afterwards. As the specification which had been prepared and sworn to was a fair copy, without erasures or interlineations, the fact that the paper handed Brown was not a fair copy would imply that it was not intended to be an exact transcript of the other. At any rate, the bare fact that the difference exists under such circumstances is not sufficient to brand Bell and his attorneys and the officers of the Patent Office with that infamy which the charges made against them imply. We therefore have no hesitation in rejecting the argument. The variable resistance method is introduced only as showing another mode of creating electrical undulations. That Bell had had his mind upon the effect of such a method is conclusively established by a letter which he addressed to Mr. Hubbard on the 4th of May, 1875, and which is found in the Dowd record, introduced into the Overland Case by stipulation. Its insertion in his final draft of his specification is another proof of the care with which his work had been done.

In the case of the Clay Commercial Company objection was made to the sufficiency of the proof of the incorporation of the American Bell Telephone Company and of its title to the Bell patents. Upon the first point the proof was (1) a special Act of the general court of Massachusetts, entitled "An Act to Incorporate the American Bell Telephone Company," which authorized certain persons therein named and their associates to organize themselves under the provisions of chap. 224 of the Acts of 1870, and the Acts in amendment thereof, for telephone purposes; and (2) a certificate of the Secretary of the Commonwealth in the form required by § 11 of chap. 224, that certain persons, among whom were the most of those mentioned in the special Act, were legally organized and established as an existing corporation under the name of the American Bell Telephone Company. This section made such a certificate "conclusive evidence of the existence of a corporation" organized under that chapter. The authority granted by the special Act to the persons named, to organize as a corporation in this way, gave them the authority to select a corporate name, and also made the statutory certificate conclusive evidence of their corporate existence.

The objections to the proof of title are not, in our opinion, well taken. We do not deem it necessary to add to the length of this opinion by referring particularly to the testimony on that point.

This disposes of all the cases so far as the patent of March 7, 1876, is concerned. It remains only to consider the patent of January 30, 1877, about which but little has been said either in the oral or printed arguments. Apparently it received but little attention by counsel or the court in either of the cases below. In the Dolbear Case it was by consent excluded from the decree, and of course is not presented by that record in this court. In all the other cases the patent was sustained, and the Clay Commercial Company was adjudged to have infringed the third, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth claims; the Molecular Company the sixth, seventh, and eighth, but not the fifth; the People's Company the fifth, sixth, and eighth; and the Overland Company the third, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth. From the decree in favor of the Molecular Company as to the fifth claim the Bell Company has appealed.

In the case of the Clay Commercial Company it was alleged in the answer that the substantial and material parts of the things described and claimed were described and claimed in a prior British patent taken out by or for Bell, dated December 9, 1876, and that, inasmuch as the American patent does not bear the same date with the foreign patent, and is not limited to expire therewith, it is void. This point has not been pressed in the argument here, and in our opinion it has been settled by the decision of this court in O'Reilly v. Morse, 56 U. S. 15 How. 62, 112 [14: 601, 623], and impliedly by that in Siemens v. Sellers, 123 U. S. 276 [30:153], at the present term, that the effect of § 4887 of the Revised Statutes is not to render invalid an American patent which does not bear the same date as a foreign patent for the same invention, but only to limit its term.

The patent itself is for the mechanical structure of an electric telephone to be used to produce the electrical action on which the first patent rests. The third claim is for the use in such instruments of a diaphragm, made of a plate of iron or steel, or other material capable of inductive action; the fifth of a permanent magnet constructed as described with a coil upon the end or ends nearest the plate; the sixth of a sounding box as described; the seventh of a speaking or hearing tube as described for conveying the sounds; and the eighth of a permanent magnet and plate combined. The claim is not for these several things in and of themselves, but for an electric telephone in the construction of which these things or any of them are used. Hence the fifth claim is not anticipated by the Schellen magnet, as was decided in the Molecular Case below. The patent is not for the magnet, but for the telephone of which it forms but part. To that extent the decree in that case was erroneous.

It follows that the decree in each of the cases, so far as it is in favor of the Bell Company and those claiming under it, must be affirmed, and that the decree in the Molecular Case, so far as it is against that company on the fifth claim of the patent of January 30, 1877, must be reversed and a decree directed to that extent in its favor. It is consequently so ordered.

Mr. Justice Gray was not present at the argument, and took no part in the decision of these cases.

Mr. Justice Lamar, not being a member of the court when these cases were argued, took no part in their decision.

Dissenting opinion of Justices Field, Bradley, and Harlan, delivered by Mr. Justice Bradley:

Mr. Justice Field, Mr. Justice Harlan and myself are not able to concur with the other members of the court, sitting in these cases, in the result which has been reached by them. Without expressing an opinion on other issues, the point on which we dissent relates to the defense made on the alleged invention of Daniel Drawbaugh, and applies to all the cases in which that invention is set up. We think that Drawbaugh anticipated the invention of Mr. Bell, who, at most, is not claimed to have invented the speaking telephone prior to June 10, 1875. We think that the evidence on this point is so overwhelming, with regard both to the number and character of the witnesses, that it cannot be overcome. As this is a question of fact, depending upon the weight of the evidence, and involves no question of law, it does not require an extended discussion on the part of those who dissent from the opinion of the majority,—which is very ably drawn, and presents the case with great clearness and force. On the point mentioned, however, we cannot concur in the views expressed.

The essence of the invention claimed by Mr. Bell is, the transmission of articulate speech to a distance, by means of an electrical current subjected to undulations produced by the air vibrations of the voice. There are two modes (as yet discovered) by which these undulations may be thus produced. In one they are produced by interposing in the circuit a substance whose electrical conductivity may be varied by the concussions or vibrations of the air produced by the voice. This is called the variable resistance process, because the electrical current is subjected to the variable resistance (or conductivity) of the substance thus interposed. By the other mode, the undulations are produced by the inductive effect of an armature (or small, flat piece of iron), attached to the membrane spoken against, and placed near to the poles of an electro-magnet situated in the circuit. In both cases, the undulations impart the vibrations which caused them to another diaphragm at a distance (called the receiver) by means of an electro-magnet in the circuit, placed near to an armature affixed to such diaphragm. These vibrations, thus reproduced, are detected by the ear, and the spoken words are heard.

We are satisfied from a very great preponderance of evidence, that Drawbaugh produced, and exhibited in his shop, as early as 1869, an electrical instrument by which he transmitted speech, so as to be distinctly heard and understood, by means of a wire and the employment of variable resistance to the electrical current. This variable resistance was produced by causing the electrical current to pass through pulverized charcoal, carbon and other substances, acted upon by the vibrations of the voice in speaking. This was the whole invention so far as the principle of variable resistance is concerned.

We are also satisfied that as early as 1871 he reproduced articulate speech, at a distance, by means of a current of electricity, subjected by electrical induction to undulations corresponding to the vibrations of the voice in speaking, —a process substantially the same as that which is claimed in Mr. Bell's patent.

In regard to the instrument in which the principle of variable resistance was used, more than seventy witnesses were examined, who either testified to having seen it and heard it, or established such facts and circumstances in relation to it as to put its existence and date beyond a question. With regard to the instrument in which electrical induction was employed to produce the requisite undulations, some forty or fifty witnesses were produced, many of whom saw it and heard speech through it, and others either saw it, or heard it talked about in such a manner as to fix the time when it was in existence. On the questions of time and result, there is such a cloud of witnesses in both cases, that it seems almost impossible not to give credence to them. The evidence of some of them may have been shaken with regard to the time they had in mind; but that of the great majority was not shaken at all, but corroborated by circumstances which rendered the proof irrefragable. Many of them, it is true, were plain country people; but they heard the words through the instrument; and that is a matter about which they could not be mistaken. It did not require science nor learning to understand that. But the witnesses were not confined to this class. A number of them were people of position in society, official, professional, and literary,—all, however, like the inventor, regarding the matter more as one of curiosity than of public importance.

As it would serve no useful purpose to repeat the testimony of these witnesses, we shall refrain from doing so. We will only add that nearly all the original instruments used by Drawbaugh were produced on the trial, and identified by the witnesses. Some of them were broken and in a dilapidated condition, but sufficiently perfect to be accurately reproduced. Their very form and principle of construction showed that they were intended for speaking-telephones and nothing else. Drawbaugh certainly had the principle, and accomplished the result. Perhaps without the aid of Mr. Bell, the speaking-telephone would not have been brought into public use to this day; but that Drawbaugh produced it, there can hardly be a reasonable doubt.

We do not question Mr. Bell's merits. He appreciated the importance of the invention, and brought it before the public in such a manner as to attract to it the attention of the scientific world. His professional experience and attainments enabled him to see, at a glance, that it was one of the great discoveries of the century. Drawbaugh was a different sort of man. He did not see it in this halo of light. Had he done so, he would have taken measures to interest other persons with him in it, and to have brought it out to public admiration and use. He was only a plain mechanic; somewhat better instructed than most ordinary mechanics; a man of more reading, of better intelligence. But he looked upon what he had made more as a curiosity than as a matter of financial, scientific, or public importance. This explains why he did not take more pains to bring it forward to public notice. Another cause of his delay in bringing his invention to public notice was, that he was ever indulging the hope of producing speech, at the receiving end of the line, loud and distinct enough to be heard across a room, like the voice of a person speaking in an ordinary tone.

It is perfectly natural for the world to take the part of the man who has already achieved eminence. No patriotic Briton could believe that anybody but Watt could produce an improvement in the steam engine. This principle of human nature may well explain the relative feeling towards Bell and Drawbaugh in reference to the invention of the telephone. It is regarded as incredible that so great a discovery should have been made by the plain mechanic, and not by the eminent scientist and inventor. Yet the proof amounts to demonstration, from the testimony of Mr. Bell himself, and his assistant, Watson, that he never transmitted an intelligible word through an electrical instrument, nor produced any such instrument that would transmit an intelligible word, until after his patent had been issued; whilst, for years before, Drawbaugh had talked through his, so that words and sentences had again and again been distinctly heard. We do not wish to say a word depreciatory of Mr. Bell. He was original, if not first. He preconceived the principle on which the result must be obtained, by that forecast which is acquired from scientific knowledge, as Leverrier did the place of the unknown planet; but in this as in the actual production of the thing, he was, according to the great preponderance of the evidence, anticipated by a man of far humbler pretensions. A common astronomer, by carefully sweeping the sky, might have been first in discovering the planet Neptune; whilst no one but a Leverrier, or an Adams, could have ascertained its existence and position by calculation. So it was with Bell and Drawbaugh. The latter invented the telephone without appreciating the importance and completeness of his invention. Bell subsequently projected it on the basis of scientific inference, and took out a patent for it. But, as our laws do not award a patent to one who was not the first to make an invention, we think that Bell's patent is void by the anticipation of Drawbaugh.

PETITION FOR REHEARING.

In the cases of the People's Telephone Company and The Overland Telephone Company, a motion for rehearing was made.

It was submitted May 7, 1888, denied May 14, 1888.

The following is a copy of the petition for rehearing:

TO THE HONORABLE JUSTICES OF SAID COURT:

The appellants' in the above-entitled cases hereby humbly pray that the court will rehear and reconsider the matters decided March 19, 1888, so far as the same involve the question of priority of invention of the electric speaking-telephone between Alexander Graham Bell and Daniel Drawbaugh; and that an order or orders be entered reversing the decisions below and dismissing the appellees' bills, with costs to the appellants in said cases respectively.

The grounds of this application are, first, that the court, in its said decision, as evidenced by its written opinion, filed on said 19th day of March, giving its reasons therefor, inadvertently erred in respect to certain matters of fact and of law material to and decisive of said question, and therefore of these cases; and, secondly, that in consequence of said errors, the decision of the court was against the weight of the evidence.

"The opinion of the court treats three portions of the evidence as controlling, viz:

I. The evidence of a great cloud of witnesses as to what Drawbaugh, prior to the fall of 1876, had accomplished in the matter of an electric speaking-telephone.

II. His conduct from that time to the year 1880, when the appellants became interested in his inventions.

III. The New York and Philadelphia tests.

I. Proofs of Drawbaugh's Priority.

Mr. Storrow, complainant's counsel, admitted in his oral argument that "forty-nine witnesses testified that they had heard speech in Drawbaugh's shop before the date of the Bell patent" (Oral Argument of Storrow, p. 149).

Seventy witnesses heard talk through the Drawbaugh telephones, or were present when others successfully talked through them, prior to Bell's alleged conception of the telephone, June 2, 1875.

One hundred and forty-nine witnesses actually saw the instruments, and two hundred and twenty testified to having heard of or seen them prior to that time.

Many of the witnesses testified to such circumstances, facts, and records corroborative of their evidence as to make it impossible that they could have erred, and either their testimony is true or they committed wilful perjury. No attempt has been made to impeach them. The dates they positively aver are all prior to June, 1875, the year when Bell claimed to have first conceived the idea of the telephone.

Of this class of witnesses are the following:

William H. Strickler: Never was at Milltown but once. Had made an invention for insulating telegraph wires. Visited Drawbaugh for information and advice concerning that invention. Had not then filed his application for a patent. He and Drawbaugh talked to each other through the telephone at that time, and Drawbaugh explained to him how electricity operated it. Subsequently filed his application and obtained a patent for his invention. Produced the specifications and drawings as filed, and the patent as issued. Date of filing, August 22, 1874; date of patent, April 20, 1875 (Additional Proofs, p. 233).

George W. Bowman: Resides at Mechanicsburg. Drove to Eberly's Mills with his wife to attend a baptism. After the baptism drove to Drawbaugh's shop. This was during the lifetime of his wife's mother, who died in 1871. He then and there heard Drawbaugh talk through the telephone (Additional Proofs, p. 173).

Mrs. Bowman, wife of the above, corroborates his testimony. Her mother died March 14, 1871. Knows the baptism was before her mother's death, because it was upon her mother's persuasion that they went to attend it (Additional Proofs, p. 177).

Emanuel Gregory: Resided at Milltown from March to October, 1870. Then removed to Massachusetts. Has never been in Pennsylvania since until he testified. At Milltown worked at Drawbaugh's shop for faucet company. The company's books corroborate this. Assisted Drawbaugh in his experiments, and heard him talk through his telephone a number of times. Identifies B and F as the instruments (Additional Proofs, p. 185).

William H. Zearing: Had a pair of steelyards relettered by Daniel Drawbaugh Entered the date and charge therefor in a book, November 23, 1873, as shown by book produced. Never had any steelyards relettered at any other time. When he went for them Drawbaugh talked to him through a telephone, saying, among other things, "The steelyards are finished." Zearing was the secretary of the school board of his township (Def. Sur. Reb. Testimony, p. 122).

Other witnesses of the same class are: Goodyear (Def. Sur. Reb. Tes., p. 1011); David Stevenson (Def. Add. Proofs, p. 141); his two daughters (Def. Add. Proofs, pp. 166, 169); William H. Martin (Def. Sur. Reb. Tes., p. 827); John Keefauver (Def. Sur. Reb. Tes., p. 837). See accompanying brief for many others.

II. Drawbaugh's Conduct.

Of the above proofs the court says: "If they contained all the testimony in the case it would be more difficult to reach the conclusion that Drawbaugh's claim was not sustained. But in our opinion their effect has been completely overcome by the conduct of Drawbaugh,—about which there is no dispute,—from the time of his visit to the Centennial until he was brought forward by the promoters of the People's Company, nearly four years afterwards, to contest the claims of Bell."

This conduct, concerning which the court says there is no dispute, relates solely to his incapacity as a business man. It is true that there is no dispute as to his incapacity to use, to the best advantage, the opportunity his invention gave him; but the court has evidently overlooked much testimony to show the constant efforts he did make to secure capital from 1876 to 1880 to enter upon the contention which would be sure to follow an application for a patent. Among the witnesses on this point are: Moffitt (Def. Record, Vol. 1, p. 497), Chellis (Same, p. 526), Shettel (Same, p. 214). The accompanying brief cites many other witnesses to Drawbaugh's constant and earnest seeking of assistance to push his telephone inventions.

III. Drawbaugh's Ignorance of the Date of Bell's Invention.

Drawbaugh swore that he did not know the alleged date of Bell's invention until 1880 (Def. Record, Vol. 2, p. 870). The court must have overlooked this testimony, for they say that he must have known of the approximate time of Bell's invention, because the subject of the invention itself was often referred to in the Harrisburg and Mechanicsburg papers. He did not know but Bell had been at work on it as he himself had been for many years. The date of the patent was no guide to the date of the invention

IV. Drawbaugh's Visit to the Centennial.

The failure of Drawbaugh to ascertain, when visiting the Centennial Exhibition whether the telephone instruments there exhibited by Bell were similar to his own, seems to have been regarded by the court as strong evidence against his claim. But the court, after citing questions and answers from 386 to 398, inclusive, overlook the answer to the very next question, in which Drawbaugh testifies that none of the instruments he saw at Philadelphia were the instruments represented in the cuts of Bell's instruments as given in the record in this case.

The testimony of Professor Barker (Add. Proofs, p. 37) says that the Bell instruments were not easily accessible in the building at that time. They seem to have been merely exhibited to invited individuals at times of private tests. A fair inference from Drawbaugh's answers cited in the opinion of the court, and the one omitted, is that he saw the instruments he supposed to be the subject of comment, and they were not telephones at all, but were harmonic telegraphic instruments, which his answers fairly describe.

V. Drawbaugh's Pursuit of his Invention.

The court says that he had apparently lost all interest in talking machines from 1876 to 1880. Such a conclusion could only be reached by overlooking the evidence of many witnesses. Among these are Stees and Johnston, who operated his carbon transmitter J at Harrisburg in May, 1878, months before the Blake transmitter was invented (Add. Proofs, pp. 198 and 209). He was constantly exhibiting his telephones during the whole of those four years to numerous witnesses, as will readily be seen by citations in the accompanying brief; but what is absolutely conclusive on this point is the fact that he made the most effective and finished telephones from 1876 to 1880.

VI. Drawbaugh's Neglect to Apply for a Patent.

"The cost of an application for a patent being small, the failure of Drawbaugh to make such application is taken by the court as evidence that he had no invention. But this view leaves out of consideration the certainty of interference proceedings, the cost of which he was advised would be enormous, which advice has since been abundantly justified.

VII. The Tests at New York and Philadelphia.

Successful tests of Drawbaugh's instruments, both original and reproduced, were made in New York in 1882 and in Philadelphia in 1885.

The court says that: "It is substantially conceded that the test in New York was a failure;" that "Occasionally sound was heard, and sometimes a word, but it would not transmit sentences." That this was a very material error is shown by the testimony of Mr. Benjamin, at page 1278 of Def. Vol. 2, and by other witnesses. So far from it being conceded that the test at New York was a failure, it was conceded by complainants' counsel, Mr. Storrow, that it was a success. Concerning the single instrument F, he said: "There were one hundred and thirty-seven phrases uttered into it on the second day; seven of those were understood, and some words of seven more, and that is all. The third day they got better. They uttered one hundred and seventy-five phrases into the transmitter; thirty-five of those were heard." (Oral argument in the Circuit Court, p. 92, filed here.)

The court was of the opinion that the instruments afterwards reproduced and tested at Philadelphia were "not the same," but "differently constructed;" but the Bell Company's expert, Pope, swore that they differed only in being constructed more carefully, and with better workmanship (Complainant's Reply, p. 176).

In the opinion of the court in this very case, it is said of Bell's original instrument: "The particular instrument which he had, and which he used in his experiments did not under the circumstances in which it was tried reproduce the words spoken so that they could be clearly understood, but the proof is abundant and of the most convincing character that other instruments carefully constructed and made exactly in accordance with the specifications, without any additions whatever, have operated and will operate successfully."

The court said the instruments were used in a different way at Philadelphia than at New York; that is to say, that at New York they rested on a table, while at Philadelphia they were held in the hand. But Prof. Barker testified that he used them both ways at Philadelphia, and that they worked best when standing on the table as they did at New York. (Barker, Ans. 81 and 84, Def. Add. Proofs, p. 28.) This evidence is more fully treated in the accompanying brief.

VIII. The Construction of the Instruments.

The court said that nobody knew the actual construction of the original machines except Drawbaugh himself. But there is much evidence beside that of Drawbaugh as to their construction, as will be seen by reference to the testimony cited in the accompanying brief, for example, H. K. Drawbaugh could reproduce the machines from memory. (Def., Vol. 1, pp. 566–7, Ans. 129, 130.) Steinberger described one from memory (Def., Vol. 1, pp. 844–6); and so did Schrader (Def. Sur. Reb., pp. 470–1); and see ten others cited in brief.

Finally.

The court says, in its opinion: "We do not doubt that Drawbaugh may have conceived the idea that speech could be transmitted to a distance by means of electricity, and that he was experimenting upon that subject,"—meaning, as is clear from the context, that he did this before Bell's invention.

The Drawbaugh story, then, is no afterthought growing out of Bell's discoveries, but is based upon the admitted facts of a prior conception of the possibility of electric speech-transmission and prior experiments actually made to accomplish it. The same witnesses who satisfied the judgment of the court as to these facts, identify the machines and testify to their successful working, and are neither impeached nor contradicted as to these additional facts. At another point, referring to Drawbaugh, the court says: "He was a skilled and ingenious mechanic. * * * He was also somewhat of an inventor, and had some knowledge of electricity. According to the testimony he was an enthusiast on the subject of the 'talking-machine,' and showed it freely to his neighbors and people from the country when they visited his shop."

Taking these admitted facts together, his prior conception of the possibility of electric speech transmission; his experiments to accomplish it; and, during his experiments his enthusiasm about the talking-machine—how can his enthusiasm be accounted for? Is it conceivable that enthusiasm resulted from constant failure? Can it be explained on any other reasonable theory than that his machines were producing the successful results about which the corroborating witnesses so abundantly testify? And why should he exhibit the invention so freely to the surrounding public, if it constantly failed to work when thus exhibited? Did he exhibit it as a failure or as a success? Can his conduct at the time, especially when taken in connection with his contemporary declarations that he had achieved the result, and was going to patent the invention, and wanted financial aid to secure the patents, be reconciled with any other theory than that of success? And is it not clear that the court has erred as to the evidential force of the facts which it admits to have been established?

On account of the errors above referred to, which will be made more apparent by reference to the accompanying brief, and to the end, therefore, that equity may be done, and that this court may, upon fuller consideration and with the advantage of oral argument, revise its former opinion (if revision be right and proper), your petitioners pray that the court may be pleased to take their suggestions under a careful consideration and grant a rehearing upon the points upon which said decision was based, and grant such other relief and order as in equity and good conscience may be proper.

New York, May 1, 1888.

LYSANDER HILL,
GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
DON M. DICKINSON,
CHARLES P. CROSBY,
HENRY C. ANDREWS,
Of Counsel with Appellants.

The above named counsel filed a brief, discussing at length the evidence applicable to the petition.

On May 14, 1888, Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

No Justice who united in the opinion of the court having asked for a rehearing, the application is denied.

END OF CASES IN VOL. 126.

APPENDIX I.

In the Supreme Court of the United States.

OCTOBER TERM, 1887.

ORDERED, That the first subdivision of Rule 20 be amended so as to read as follows:

RULE 20—PRINTED ARGUMENTS.

1. In all cases brought here on writ of error, appeal, or otherwise, the Court will receive printed arguments without regard to the number of the case on the docket, if the counsel on both sides shall choose to submit the same within the first ninety days of the term; and, in addition, appeals from the Court of Claims may be submitted by both parties within thirty days after they are docketed, but not after the first day of April; but twenty-five copies of the arguments, signed by attorneys or counselors of this Court, must be first filed.

Promulgated October 31, 1887.

APPENDIX II.

Supreme Court of the United States.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1888.

APPOINTMENT OF MARSHAL.

It is ordered by the Court that the following letters and order be entered upon the minutes.

Supreme Court of the United States.
Washington, Nov. 29, 1887.

My Dear Sir:

As the literary and historical labors upon which I am engaged as a co-worker will during the next few years require the whole of my time, I herewith tender you my resignation as Marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States, to take effect on the — day of December next.

In severing my official relations with the Court, I desire to convey to yourself and all its members my warm appreciation of their personal friendship and kindness during the whole of my fifteen years' service.

Sincerely Yours,

Chief Justice WAITE. JNO. G. NICOLAY.

Supreme Court of the United States.
Washington, Dec. 5, 1887.

My Dear Mr. Nicolay:

I found no convenient opportunity of communicating to the other Judges the contents of your letter of the 29th ulto., resigning the office of Marshal of the Supreme Court, until we met in conference last Saturday.

Knowing as we do the great importance of the literary and historical work in which you are engaged, and its constant demands on your time, we have not felt at liberty to withhold our acceptance of a resignation tendered on that account, but must ask you to allow us to fix the 31st of this month as the date of your retirement, rather than a day which is earlier.

You will take with you when you leave us the best wishes of every one of the Judges, and we shall all remember with gratitude your faithful attention to the duties of your office and your many acts of personal kindness.

Necessarily my intercourse with you has been closer than that of most of the Judges, and it has always been to me of the most agreeable kind.

I have relied on you implicitly in all that pertained to the administration of your office, and have never found my confidence misplaced in any particular.

Your accounts have all been scrupulously exact and in the highest degree satisfactory. I shall part from you officially with sincere regret, but with the hope that our personal relations may continue to be in the future what they have always been in the past.

Very Sincerely Yours,

JOHN G. NICOLAY, Esq. M. R. WAITE.

ORDER.

It is ordered by the Court, that John Montgomery Wright be, and he is hereby, appointed Marshal of this Court, in place of John G. Nicolay, resigned.

Mr. Wright thereupon took the following oath, presented a bond in the penal sum of twenty thousand dollars, as required by law, which was approved, and entered upon the duties of his office:

I, John Montgomery Wright, do solemnly swear, that I will faithfully execute all lawful precepts directed to the Marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States, and true returns make, and in all things well and truly and without malice or partiality perform the duties of the office of Marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States during my continuance in said office. So help me God.

JOHN MONTGOMERY WRIGHT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, this fourth day of January, A. D. 1888.

JAMES H. MCKENNEY,
Clerk, Supreme Court, U. S.

APPENDIX III.

Supreme Court of the United States,

OCTOBER TERM, 1887.

ORDER.

There having been an Associate Justice of this Court appointed since the commencement of this term, it is ordered that the following allotment be made of the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of said Court among the Circuits, agreeably to the Act of Congress in such cases made and provided, and that such allotment be entered of record, viz.:

For the First Circuit,	HORACE GRAY,	Associate Justice.
For the Second Circuit,	SAMUEL BLATCHFORD,	Associate Justice.
For the Third Circuit,	JOSEPH P. BRADLEY,	Associate Justice.
For the Fourth Circuit,	MORRISON R. WAITE,	Chief Justice.
For the Fifth Circuit,	LUCIUS Q. C. LAMAR,	Associate Justice.
For the Sixth Circuit,	STANLEY MATTHEWS,	Associate Justice.
For the Seventh Circuit,	JOHN M. HARLAN,	Associate Justice.
For the Eighth Circuit,	SAMUEL F. MILLER,	Associate Justice.
For the Ninth Circuit,	STEPHEN J. FIELD,	Associate Justice.

January 23, 1888.

APPENDIX IV.

In Memoriam.

WILLIAM BURNHAM WOODS, LL. D.

DIED MAY 14, 1887.*

PROCEEDINGS OF THE BENCH AND BAR OF THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

THE Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States and the officers of the Court met in the Court Room in the Capitol, Washington, on Monday, May 16, 1887, at 12.30 o'clock, to pay respect to the memory of the late Mr. Justice WOODS.

On motion, Hon. SAMUEL F. PHILLIPS was appointed Chairman, and Mr. JAMES H. MCKENNEY, Secretary.

Mr. WILLIAM A. MAURY offered the following:

Resolved, That a committee of ten members be appointed by the Chairman to prepare and report on the day named in the following resolution a fitting expression of the public loss caused by the death of WILLIAM BURNHAM WOODS, late a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Resolved, That when this meeting adjourns it shall be to reassemble in this chamber at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon of the first day of the next term of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The resolutions being agreed to, the Chairman appointed the committee, as follows, viz:

Committee.

WM. A. MAURY,	A. G. RIDDLE,
J. C. B. DAVIS,	G. A. JENKS,
S. S. HENKLE,	W. D. DAVIDGE,
J. K. MCCAMMON,	NATHANIEL WILSON,
J. HUBLEY ASHTON,	ENOCH TOTTEN.

The meeting then adjourned to the time and place designated in the resolutions.

OCTOBER 10, 1887.

On taking the chair, Mr. PHILLIPS addressed the meeting as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE SUPREME COURT BAR:

We are now to resume and conclude proceedings begun at the very close of the last term, upon the lamented occasion of the death of Mr. Justice WOODS.

In calling this meeting to order, I may not presume to anticipate the exact terms in which it shall be pleased to record its judgment of the character and services of our distinguished brother.

The largeness of the attendance here, however, says plainly that in your view the career of Mr. Justice WOODS does honor to the country and to the profession; that the high offices which with gradually ascending steps he attained were fairly obtained and fitly discharged; and that he went out of this room and laid aside his robes, clear in all.

Nor is it too much to add that the life thus ended was true to all duties, whether in the domestic circle or in the social—as citizen or as man. It is a life justly entitled to the sentence, Well done! and becomes an example for all who hereafter are to enter upon the labors and look up to the rewards of the law.

On motion of Mr. A. G. RIDDLE, the following-named gentlemen were added to the Committee on Resolutions: Mr. THOMAS J. SEMMES, Mr. ALFRED GOLDTHWAITE, Mr. VAN H. MANNING.

The committee thereupon retired, and, on returning, reported through Mr. WILLIAM A. MAURY the following resolutions for adoption:

Resolutions.

The Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States and Officers of the Court have come together for the purpose of showing their respect for the memory of the late Mr. Justice WOODS, in whose honorable and useful life they see much that deserves to be remembered, and to be held up for the imitation of his countrymen.

Looking back to the beginning of his career, when he entered the bar at Newark, Ohio, and tracing him down the stream of time, we find at every point the evidence of a character intensely devoted to duty.

There existed in this departed judge an uncommon union of patience, moderation, and determination, which had much attracted public attention before his accession to the bench. This feature of his character became very marked in the Legislature of Ohio in 1861, where he displayed great firmness and independence, in the face of censure and even suspicion—so blinded by passion was reason—in contending for the things that made for peace, and in resisting the adoption of war measures, so long as it was possible to hope for good from a policy of conciliation.

But when the die of war was cast, he hesitated not a moment as to the course he would pursue, and his strong patriotic speech in the Legislature in favor of taking up arms in defense of the Union has become historic already.

This speech he emphasized by promptly

*For biographical sketch of Judge Woods' life see Vol. 1, Digest United States Supreme Court Reports, by the Lawyers' Co-op. Pub. Co.

drawing his sword, which he did not sheathe until after peace had been firmly established. His career in the army was distinguished, and, as was to be expected in so earnest and sterling a character, he was always at the front and took part in a number of pitched battles.

He was made a full Brigadier-General on the recommendation of Generals Grant, Sherman and Logan, and afterwards received the brevet of Major-General for gallant and meritorious services. It was in Alabama that General WOODS was mustered out of service, and there he determined to take up his abode and engage in cotton planting in conjunction with the law That he soon commended himself in no small degree to the people among whom he had cast his lot is evident by the fact that in 1868 he was elected the chancellor of the district in which he lived.

To the duties of that position he dedicated himself with such ability, assiduity, and singleness of purpose, that by the following year the distinction he had already attained as chancellor formed one of the strongest grounds on which he was appointed the Circuit Judge of the Fifth Judicial District of the United States, an office which Congress had just created. That he administered the duties of his new office, sometimes most delicate and perplexing, owing to the disturbed political condition of parts of his circuit, to the satisfaction of all, is established by abundant testimony; and an examination of the four volumes of his reports of cases decided in his circuit will show the learning, the fidelity, and the ability he brought to the discharge of his duties both as Circuit Judge and Circuit Justice.

The words of the Chief Justice of Georgia as presiding officer at a banquet given to Judge WOODS at Atlanta by the bar, on the occasion of his removing from that city, to which he had changed his residence some years before, to the seat of the National Government to take his place on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, would be a proud epitaph on his tomb.

Referring to Judge WOODS, Chief Justice JACKSON said: "We are proud of him because he is identified with us, and while serving as a Judge in our midst has known nothing but the law, and been loyal to nothing but the law."

It may be truly said that as a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States he exhibited great ability and a most praiseworthy industry, and that he possessed in a high degree the invaluable judicial quality of attentiveness to the arguments at the bar.

Of this departed, able, upright Judge we believe it can be truly said that he never delayed justice to any man.

Resolved, (1) That the Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States and the officers of the Court are profoundly sensible of the loss that has been sustained in the death of WILLIAM BURNHAM WOODS, who has illustrated his country as patriot, citizen, soldier, and jurist.

(2) That we tender the family of the deceased the assurances of our sincere sympathy.

(3) That the Chairman be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit a copy of these proceedings to the Attorney-General of the United States, with the request to present the same to the Supreme Court of the United States for such action thereon as is usual and proper according to the course of the Court.

(4) That the Chairman be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit an engrossed copy of these proceedings to the family of the deceased.

REMARKS OF MR. WILLIAM A. MAURY.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that all who knew Mr. Justice WOODS must share the feeling with me that this occasion should be made profitable by recalling and dwelling upon the things in his career that deserve to be remembered.

Sir, his fellow-countrymen of all professions and callings would do well to bear in mind that his eminent success was in great part due to his spotless character and single-hearted dedication to duty; to the fact that to him nothing was irksome or to be neglected that lay in the path of duty; that duty in all circumstances and all conditions was to be followed rather than life. Such was his religion.

When this is said it is already said that he was true in every relation he held to the Republic; that the ermine she placed on his shoulders was laid down without spot or blemish; that as a soldier he defended her flag on many a bloody field; that when peace came he was as prompt to beat his sword into a plowshare as he had been to draw it from the scabbard.

To his lasting honor be it said, that his first and guiding principle of action as a Judge and Justice of the Fifth Circuit was to win back the estrangement and alienated affections of the people of that quarter of the Union by proving that his sole mission among them was to administer justice without fear or favor, to the rich and the poor alike. Permit me, sir, to read his noble words upon that interesting occasion referred to in the report of the committee when the Chief Justice of the State of Georgia indulged in a strain of eulogium that was as honorable to him as to our deceased friend to whom it was addressed. It was in reply to these allusions to himself that Judge WOODS gave expression to the sentiments I now read:

One word on another subject: Since I have sat upon the Federal Bench in this circuit I have kept one thing steadily in view, and that was so to administer the law as to encourage the sentiment that the courts of the United States were not courts of a foreign jurisdiction, but courts which belonged to the people of the districts in which they were held, in common with all the peoples of the United States, not organized to oppress, but to protect them in their rights and mete out even-handed justice to all classes.

* * * * * * * *

I hope to see this sentiment grow. I do want the Federal Courts to be looked upon engines of oppression, organized at Washington by an alien government, but courts to which the people may confidently turn for fairness justice, and the impartial administration of their own laws, both State and national—courts held by their own fellow-citizens for the benefit and protection of all the people of all the States of a common country.

It is proper to say that on the same occasion another judge of the State of Georgia chara terized Judge WOODS as "eminently a working judge."

That he succeeded well in impressing himself favorably on the people of Alabama is shown by the tribute paid to his memory at the meeting of the bar held in Montgomery, where it is said, after speaking in high terms of his ability as a judge, "he was always welcome to our homes and firesides, and there by his conduct and bearing endeared himself to our hearts and proved himself in every relation a gentleman; and in his death we mourn not only the loss of an able, just, and upright judge, but that of one whom we loved to esteem a friend."

It is fit to be recalled at this time that he was deemed worthy of the honor of valedictorian of his class at Yale College; and that in the year 1857 he was speaker of the popular branch of the Legislature of Ohio. He was indeed a leading spirit in that Legislature, and his voice for war in 1861 was enough to quell opposition and make unanimous the vote to put the State on a proper military footing. As said a member of the Licking County Bar, referring to the part Judge WOODS took in this memorable and exciting legislative struggle, "his speech preceding the vote electrified us all. He was for the Government and the integrity of the nation."

There was in Mr. Justice WOODS a combination of prudence in counsel and intrepidity in action which is not often seen in the same character; for, as the ancient historian says, timidity is usually the outcome of caution, and rashness of daring. But as that historian also said of another, so may we say of our deceased friend, "Ac sane, quod difficillimum in primis est, et prelio strenuus erat et bonus consilio.

There was a manliness, a sincerity, a directness, and an abhorrence of cant and pretension about him that marked him as a sterling character and "gave assurance of a man."

It cannot be said of him, as a judge, that he "met the cause half way" or gave occasion to a party to say "his counsel or proofs were not heard," for his bearing on the judgment-seat was marked by the strictest attention to the arguments of the bar. He possessed in an eminent degree that "patience and gravity in hearing" which Lord Bacon tells us is "an essential part of justice." He was not "an over-speaking judge," nor first to find what he might have heard, in due time, from the bar. His nice sense of the proprieties of his office saved him from all these blemishes.

He had a decided aptitude for the law of patents, and was felicitous in describing all sorts of mechanical contrivances.

An examination of the reports of the Supreme Court will show that he bore his fair share of the labors of that tribunal, which is alone sufficient to prove that he was fitted for the position he held.

It was by merit and not by favor that he won distinction as a soldier and a judge.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a copy of the brief remarks of Mr. W. A. King, a life-long friend of Mr. Justice WOODS, made at a meeting of the Licking County Bar Association a few days after his death, and I deem it a duty I owe to his memory to conclude at this point what I have to say, and read the faithful portraiture drawn by the hand of one who knew the deceased so long and so well.

"Mr. CHAIRMAN: My acquaintance with the late Justice WOODS extended over the greater part of my life; but for a number of years it was my privilege to be associated with him in business, and upon the most intimate terms of personal friendship. I therefore deeply lament with you, to-day, the loss which the country has suffered in the death of an eminent citizen, and also desire to express my sense of personal bereavement over the loss of a valued and life-long friend.

"My memories of Judge WOODS are all of the happiest character. During our long acquaintance and association together I cannot now recall one unkind word or act from him; he was ever to me the same genial, agreeable, and companionable man.

"As a lawyer Justice WOODS was distinguished for the accuracy, as well as for the extent, of his learning. He also possessed a cultured literary taste, and was familiar with the great classics of our language. Among his many rare qualities, however, there were two which, next to his high character and sterling worth as a man, impressed me more than all others. One of these was a high purpose, an honorable ambition to excel in whatever he undertook, which controlled his whole life; and the other was a tireless industry, and close application to study, to thoroughly qualify himself for any and every position, either in private or public life, to which he aspired. These two traits of character were displayed by him very early in life. After spending three years in study at Western Reserve College, in this State, he, without difficulty, entered the senior class at Yale, where he immediately took high rank as a scholar; a rare achievement indeed, when we reflect how difficult it is to gain admission to the first class in that venerable seat of learning.

"As another illustration, I remember his election to the Legislature of this State, nearly thirty years ago. After his election he resolved to become the presiding officer of the branch to which he had been elected, and immediately gave his attention to the study of parliamentary law, the intricacies of which he so thoroughly mastered in a short time, that when he became speaker of the House of Representatives he proved himself to be one of the most ready, capable, and brilliant presiding officers that that body has ever had. Before the expiration of his term of office the great civil war was begun, which so deeply stirred the patriotic impulses of his heart that he determined at once to retire from his position in civil life, go to the front, and battle for our country and her flag. With all the ardor of his nature he threw himself into his new calling, and in a short time had so mastered the art and science of war that, from the very first, he became conspicuous as an accomplished and gallant soldier. He participated in every battle of importance from Fort Donelson to Vicksburg, from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and from "Sherman's March to the Sea" to Washington. In talking with a comrade of General WOODS after the war, he told me that the men under his command at first regarded him as a severe and too strict disciplinarian; but when they got into their first battle they realized the value of this strict discipline and were filled with admiration for their gallant commander, who was always in the thickest of the fight and never failed them in the hour of danger.

"After the close of the war, General WOODS was appointed Circuit Judge of the United States for the five Gulf States, a most trying position for a northern man, and especially for one who had so recently been engaged in making war upon them; and it reflects the greatest credit and honor upon his high character as a man, and his ability as a jurist, that he at once won the confidence and esteem of the most extreme men who fought on the other side. Of the many high encomiums paid him by the southern press and bar at the time, I recall one from the Mobile Register, then edited by John Forsyth, an extreme southern man, who, after praising Judge WOODS for his ability as a lawyer and his impartiality as a judge, remarked that President Grant must certainly have made a mistake in selecting Judge WOODS for this position, as he could not believe that the President ever intended to confer so great a favor upon the southern people; and after his elevation to the Supreme Court, Justice WOODS was assigned to his old circuit by the expressed wish and at the earnest request of the leading members of the bar of those States where he had already spent twelve of the best years of his busy life.

"Thus we have seen that our distinguished brother and friend has adorned every position which he has held in public life, whether as statesman, jurist, or soldier, and has reflected honor upon himself, upon us, his brethren of the Bar, and upon this city, the place of his birth.

"I now move, Mr. Chairman, that his honor Judge Irvine be requested to adjourn Court when it convenes this afternoon, out of respect for the memory of our deceased brother, and that we attend his funeral in a body."

(The meeting was also addressed by Messrs. A. G. Riddle, and Thomas J. Semmes.)

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

NOVEMBER 7, 1887.

Present: The HON. MORRISON R. WAITE, Chief Justice;
HON. SAMUEL F. MILLER,
HON. STEPHEN J. FIELD,
HON. JOSEPH P. BRADLEY,
HON. JOHN M. HARLAN,
HON. STANLEY MATTHEWS,
HON. SAMUEL BLATCHFORD,
HON. HORACE GRAY,
Associate Justices.

The Attorney-General addressed the Court as follows:

May it please the Court:

I have been requested by the Bar and Officers of this Court to present resolutions, recently adopted by them, expressive of their estimate of the life, character, and services of the late Mr. Justice WOODS and their sorrow at his death, for such action as the court may see fit to take as to them.

In performing this duty I wish to add a few words, and they need be but few, for the resolutions themselves speak so distinctly and in terms so strong of the true character of our departed friend, there is little room for anything more to be said.

I knew Judge WOODS well and somewhat intimately, from the time he came upon this Bench, fresh and vigorous from a field of vast labor and responsibility, second only to the one he entered upon here.

His work on the Circuit had been onerous and exacting, indeed often perplexing and harassing, for during much of that time "even peace was full of horrors."

He came here from that labor well prepared and ready for the great task that lay before him.

Manfully and conscientiously did he address himself to it, and I now say, what I have often said before of him, never did I see one grow and develop in the reports of this Court more rapidly and more decidedly than he, and his portion of the work, from the time he took his seat, January, 1881, was a full share with the other members of the Court. Coming to this Court at an age young enough to add to his already extensive knowledge, he did not fail to do so, with all the aid that energy, industry, and painstaking research could bring him.

He wrote and delivered for the time he was here, a period of not quite five years and a half, one hundred and sixty-three opinions. Mr. Justice Curtis—and the country knows well his wonderful ability as a lawyer—for about the same length of time wrote and delivered fifty-one opinions. The reference is not made for comparison or contrast of the merits of the two Judges, but to show that as great and demanding as the work here has grown since the time of Mr. Justice Curtis, Mr. Justice WOODS was equal to the calls upon him.

I wish to speak of another characteristic of Mr. Justice WOODS as a judge.

He was one of the best listeners I ever saw in any court; he seemed never to tire or grow weary in the progress of a case, and appeared to hear every word uttered, and to observe everything done. He illustrated very fully what Pliny, speaking of himself in his letter to Arrianus, said: "For my own part, whenever I have to hear a case I give the greatest amount of time which any counsel asks. * * * The very first duty which a judge owes to his position is to have that patience which constitutes an important part of justice. Even superfluous matter had better be brought forward than any really necessary point be omitted."

That patience here referred to marked the bearing of Judge WOODS upon the bench to the fullest extent, and it was manifest to all. In his other relations of life, all bear testimony that he was kind, upright, affable and generous, yet firm and true to purpose, and that he adjusted his accounts with society as fully he paid his debts to the high profession of which he was so honorable a member.

With a kind and sincere regard for the memory of one of your number now no more, I ask that the resolutions be spread upon the record of the Court as a truthful testimonial to his worth.

After the reading of the resolutions Mr. Chief Justice Waite said:

We are grateful to the Bar for this tribute to the memory of our late associate.

What has been said is no more than is just, and it meets our hearty approval.

Mr. Justice WOODS was taken from us in the midst of his usefulness, but the record of his judicial life as Chancellor for the Middle Division of Alabama, as Circuit Judge for the Fifth Judicial Circuit of the United States, and as an Associate Justice of this Court, extends over a period of nearly twenty years of the most active service.

Very soon after he took his seat on the Bench of the Circuit Court he was compelled to deal with questions of the highest importance, novel in their character, and applicable to a new order of things among those whose rights were involved. How well he met them, and with what ability he exercised the duties of his office, is shown by the reports of his judgments and by the esteem in which he was held by all throughout the entire field of his labors.

He brought to this Court a large judicial experience, and from the beginning he was zealous in his work and faithful to every duty. He was an upright man and a just judge.

The resolutions of the Bar and the remarks of the Attorney-General in presenting them will be entered on the records of the Court.

APPENDIX V.

Supreme Court of the United States.

OCTOBER TERM, 1887.

ORDER.

It is ordered that the following allotment be made of the Associate Justices of this Court among the Circuits, agreeably to the Act of Congress in such case made and provided, and that such allotment be entered of record, viz.:

For the First Circuit,	HORACE GRAY,	Associate Justice.
For the Second Circuit,	SAMUEL BLATCHFORD,	Associate Justice.
For the Third Circuit,	JOSEPH P. BRADLEY,	Associate Justice.
For the Fourth Circuit,	JOHN M. HARLAN,	Associate Justice.
For the Fifth Circuit,	LUCIUS Q. C. LAMAR,	Associate Justice.
For the Sixth Circuit,	STANLEY MATTHEWS,	Associate Justice.
For the Seventh Circuit,	JOHN M. HARLAN,	Associate Justice.
For the Eighth Circuit,	SAMUEL F. MILLER,	Associate Justice.
For the Ninth Circuit,	STEPHEN J. FIELD,	Associate Justice.

April 2, 1888.

APPENDIX VI.

In Memoriam.

MORRISON REMICK WAITE, LL. D.

*Died March 23, 1888.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE BENCH AND BAR OF THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

On the coming in of the Supreme Court at noon, on the 23d day of March, 1888, Mr. Justice Miller said:

"It is my painful duty to announce to the Bar of this court that its honored Chief Justice departed this life this morning at half past six o'clock. This is not the occasion to make any extended observations on the subject; this will be done in due time. The court will adjourn until 12 o'clock Monday, April 2d."

SATURDAY, March 24, 1888.

In pursuance of a preliminary conference, held at the Capitol this day, notice is hereby given that a meeting of the Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States will be held at the Supreme Court Room at 11 o'clock on Monday, the 26th instant, to take order for their attendance at the funeral of the Chief Justice of the United States, and for a subsequent meeting of the Bar in commemoration of his eminent character and public service in the discharge of that great office.

WM. M. EVARTS, Chairman.

JAMES H. MCKENNEY, Secretary.

MONDAY, March 26, 1888.

The Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States and the officers of the Court met in the Court Room in the Capitol at 11 o'clock in pursuance of the foregoing notice, and the meeting was called to order by Mr. WILLIAM A. MAURY.

On motion of Mr. MAURY, Mr. WILLIAM M. EVARTS was called to the chair.

On motion of Mr. A. G. RIDDLE, Mr. JAMES H. MCKENNEY was elected Secretary.

On taking the chair, Mr. EVARTS said:

GENTLEMEN AND BRETHREN OF THE BAR: We are called together upon the afflictive occasion of the death of the Chief Justice of the United States to take proper order, in our respect for his position and himself, for the attendance of the Bar at the funeral, and for the appointment of a committee to prepare suitable resolutions commemorative of his character, of his virtue, and of his great services, to be presented at some future meeting of the Bar. What is your pleasure, gentlemen, in reference to this arrangement?

Mr. MAURY then presented the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Bar of the Supreme Court will assemble in the Court Room of the said Court at 11:30 o'clock Wednesday, the 28th March instant, and proceed from there in a body to the Hall of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral services of the late Chief Justice.

The Attorney-General of the United States moved that the Chairman appoint a committee of seven members to prepare suitable resolutions to be presented to a future meeting to be called by the Chairman; which was adopted, and the Chairman then appointed the following committee:

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL;

Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. VEST, of the Senate;

Mr. CULBERSON and Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, of the House;

Mr. SHELLABARGER and Mr. ASHTON, of the Bar of the District of Columbia.

Adjourned to meet at the call of the Chairman.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 29, 1888.

The members of the Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States are requested to meet in the Hall of the Court on Saturday, March 31, at 12 o'clock noon, to hear and take action on the report of the committee heretofore appointed to prepare and present resolutions in regard to the death of the late Chief Justice.

WM. M. EVARTS, Chairman.

Attest:

JAMES H. MCKENNEY, Secretary.

SATURDAY, March 31, 1888.

Mr. EVARTS. Gentlemen of the Bar, we have met in pursuance of the Chairman's call for a meeting, and I now move that Mr. EDMUNDS take the chair.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS, on taking the chair, addressed the meeting as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE BAR OF THE SUPREME COURT:

We have met, as we have on similar occasions often done before, to celebrate our last formal testimonies of respect to the life and memory of the late Chief Justice of the United States. These occasions are always those of calamity to the Bar and people; but certainly, in this instance, the event we mourn was not a calamity to the departed Chief Justice. He has achieved a triumph out of our calamity; a triumph not like those that Roman emperors and conquerors received, when the trumpets sounded war notes and the lictors cleared the way, but the triumph of the just, good, and God-fearing man and judge, who has gone to his reward. But this is not the place for me, gentlemen, to make any extended remarks; I have expressed my knowledge and opinion of the late Chief Justice recently in another place. If there be no objection, gentlemen, the Clerk of the Supreme Court, Mr. MCKENNEY, will please act as Secretary of this meeting.

*For Biographical Sketch of Judge WAITE'S see Vol. 1, Digest United States Supreme Court Reports, by the Lawyers' Co-op. Pub. Co.

At a former meeting a committee was appointed to prepare and present at this time such resolutions as they should agree upon touching the sad event which we have met to consider; is that committee ready to report?

Mr. Attorney-General GARLAND. I am instructed by the committee to report resolutions expressive of their views upon this sad occasion, and now read the same:

The Chief Justice of the United States has ended his career on earth.

He proved himself equal to all the duties which the title of his office imports.

It is fitting that the Bar of the Court over which he presided so satisfactorily should express their sense of the calamity that has visited the Court, the Bar in general, and the whole country: Therefore, be it

Resolved, I. That the Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States recognize in the late Chief Justice a combination of qualities that peculiarly fitted him for the difficult and delicate duties of president of a great court; that his ability as a judge, his strong sense of justice and his firm but mild administration, contributed to the public feeling of security and to the confidence that has made the Supreme Court the balance wheel of the Constitution; that they are grateful for the legacy of his noble and unsullied character, adorned by traits that endeared him to all who came in contact with him; that he was a type of the highest product of our free institutions, always maintaining his official and personal dignity, yet always mindful that no one was too humble for his attention and regard; and that they will remember him as one who was an honor to his country and to the whole brotherhood of men.

II. That we tender to the family of the deceased our heartfelt sympathy.

III. That the Secretary is hereby requested to furnish the Attorney-General of the United States with a copy of these proceedings, with the request to present the same to the Supreme Court of the United States for such action thereon as the Court may deem proper.

IV. That the Chairman is hereby requested to transmit an engrossed copy of these proceedings to the family of the deceased.

Under the third resolution, it is made my duty to present these resolutions at the proper time to the Court over which the late Chief Justice presided, when I shall avail myself of the opportunity of expressing briefly some additional views in reference to his career as Chief Justice on this Bench; but now it only remains for me to move the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. MAURY. I am requested to second the motion for the adoption of these resolutions.

REMARKS OF MR. WILLIAM A. MAURY.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Seldom has the stroke of death caused such dismay as filled the public mind when the intelligence burst upon it that the Chief Justice of the United States had breathed his last.

It was not generally known that he was ill, and few, if any, of those who knew of his illness apprehended a fatal result.

To the public, then, it was as if he had been stricken down in the fullness of health, and it is not surprising that the event stunned the people among whom he had lived and moved for so many years, and to whom he was endeared by his many public and private virtues.

The Bar, in common with the whole country, recognize the fact that a great pillar of state has fallen, and that the Constitution has lost a firm support.

The Chief Justice was, in very truth, called to the high magistracy he filled. It came to him; he did not go to it.

His country's call found him engrossed in the affairs of a busy life, ripe in experience of the world and versed in the knowledge of men, —qualities which were in no small degree the foundation of that rare and admirable administrative ability which made him the complement of the Court over which he presided.

But the great factor of his efficiency as a presiding officer was the unlimited confidence his associates reposed in his judgment and integrity of purpose. Much of the business that was dispatched by him alone in open court would no doubt have been reserved for the conference room but for that confidence of his brethren and the modesty with which he wore it.

The country will never know what it owed to that rare executive capacity which the departed Chief Justice displayed daily before our eyes. Nor is it accordant with experience that we who were so often before him, or even the tribunal of which he was the head, adequately appreciated in his lifetime that excellency;

> For it so falls out
> That what we have we prize not to the worth,
> Whiles we enjoy it, but, being lacked and lost,
> Why, then we rack the value, then we find
> The virtue that possession would not show us
> Whiles it was ours.

It is due, then, to the memory of the Chief Justice that whenever and wherever his career may be reviewed, and especially on this occasion, prominence should be given to that qualification of his which was so little known to the public, and yet which had so much to do with the efficiency of the Court of which he was a member.

When we consider how many great lawy in different parts of the country are almost known outside the limits of their respec States, because their jealous mistress—the L —will not trust them out of her sight, it n give no surprise that the attention of the co try was not directed to Mr. WAITE until Government selected him as one of her re sentatives before the Tribunal of Arbitrat that sat at Geneva under the Treaty of Wa ington. That honor, the appropriate hart ger of the greater one that was to come, was entirely unsolicited, and the first intelligence of it excited mingled surprise and incredulity in the busy lawyer upon whom it had been bestowed.

It must have been superior qualities that commended for service as counsel before an international tribunal, and as the associate of the other eminent counsel of the United States who appeared at Geneva, a gentleman whose life had been devoted to the discussion of questions of municipal law in the courts of his State.

How well he acquitted himself in this new field is attested by his argument in reply to Sir Roundell Palmer on the special question whether Great Britain committed a violation of neutrality in supplying the Confederate cruisers with coal. The argument is a demonstration that Great Britain had permitted the war vessels of the Confederate States to make her ports their base of operations against the United States, instead of their own from which they had been shut out by the blockade.

In this argument he displays the clearness and directness which afterwards characterized his judgments, and it is not surprising that this discussion of the rights and duties of neutrals should have settled the question of his capacity when his nomination as Chief Justice came before the Senate.

The late Chief Justice was eminently a man of affairs. He was always aiming at practical results, and was entirely satisfied when he reached them. As a consequence, it will be found that his opinions are unusually free from discussions not demanded by the case before him.

He was modest, yet firm and decided. He neither sought nor shrank from responsibility. He proved himself equal to every occasion. No one ever felt his notice to be a condescension. No subject was too small for his attention that lay in the path of duty.

Looking at his first opinion, we perceive the same ease and simplicity of diction that appear in his latest judgments and nothing to betray the fact that he was but just installed in his great place. From the beginning he was easy and natural in bearing, as one born for high station and conscious of the ability to fill it.

It was one of the fine adjustments of his well-proportioned nature to have a steady, balanced mind fitted to a vivacious, cordial temperament, making a combination that recalls the observation of William of Orange on England's greatest captain, that he had the coolest head and the warmest heart of all he had ever known.

His qualities of head and heart must have been of inestimable value when he was presiding over the deliberations of the conference om, and we are at liberty to infer his success this most delicate and difficult branch of his ties by the fact that none of those thrown st intimately with the Court ever had reason suspect the least friction or unpleasantness tween him and any of his associates.

In the history of the Court there are instances, rhaps, where the Chief Justice has not been fortunate in his relations with his associates.
It adds to this triumph of administrative skill hat it occurred during a period when the Court as sometimes stirred by dissent as it had never been stirred before.

It is a beautiful thing to remember of the departed Chief Justice, and as true as beautiful, that in distributing the business of the Court he consulted every one's convenience but his own.

It is the glory of his example, which is truly a legacy to his countrymen, that his great honors were not sought, but came unsolicited. As was said of of one of England's most eminent chief justices—

"He has shown us that real merit will make its own way without any assistance, without any little arts or assiduities, and that the only certain method to have a good reputation is to deserve it. Great and good men, who dare do right without regard to the strength of opposition or the clamors of a multitude, are not only a blessing to the age in which they live, but to succeeding generations, by their being incentives to a similar behavior to posterity."

The meeting was also addressed by Messrs. SAMUEL SHELLABARGER, FRANK M. HACKETT, JOHN RANDOLPH TUCKER and WILLIAM M. EVARTS.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and thereupon, on motion of Mr. SHELLABARGER, the meeting adjourned.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MONDAY, April 9, 1888.

Present: The Hon. SAMUEL F. MILLER,
STEPHEN J. FIELD,
JOSEPH P. BRADLEY,
JOHN M. HARLAN,
STANLEY MATTHEWS,
HORACE GRAY,
SAMUEL BLATCHFORD,
LUCIUS Q. C. LAMAR,
Associate Justices.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL addressed the Court as follows:

MAY IT PLEASE THE COURT: At a recent meeting of the Bar and the officers of this Court, I was requested to present resolutions adopted by them respecting the late Chief Justice WAITE, for the proper action of the Court thereon; and now, in complying with that request, I beg leave to read the resolutions.

(Here followed the reading of the foregoing resolutions.)

In connection with these proceedings, I wish to add a few observations by way of a personal testimonial to one I so highly esteemed.

Indeed, this is an occasion for sad and solemn reflection on the part of this Court. It is but a few months since we testified to the worth and merit of Mr. Justice WOODS, stricken down in the midst of great labor and pressing official duties; and now, before his grave is green with the first grass of spring, we are mourning the loss of the model Chief Justice, fallen before the same shaft, at a time when all his attainments were needed in the work of this tribunal. Truly, "it is a time for memory and for tears" in this Chamber.

When the resolutions state, not by comparison but directly and absolutely, that he was equal to the duties of his office of Chief Justice, in all that is implied in its title, what more can or need be said? That he filled such a place, in fact, is fame and glory enough in the minds of all people who are acquainted with our institutions and understand their workings.

Coming to this post in 1874, when the country was still rocking in the throes of the terrible civil war of four years and more, when many vexed and disturbing questions of the first moment were crowding here for determination, at once he assumed his place with the ease and familiarity of a trained jurist fitted to preside.

In his first opinion (Tappan v. Merchants' National Bank, 19 Wall.), we see the same plain, direct, clear. cogent, and judicial style that runs through his later utterances, and even characterizes his very last productions.

From this volume of Wallace to the coming 126 U. S. Reports, inclusive, forty-one volumes stand the monuments of his industry, ability, and impartiality in this forum, and they will not fall to pieces at the touch of Time.

I knew him well, from almost the time he took his seat here; and from a close observation and study of him and this Court during that period, if ever the scales of Justice wavered in his hand I did not discover it.

With him as her personification, Justice can well be painted blind.

Literally was he absorbed in the obligations of his office, they were his study by day and by night.

The accumulation of business upon the docket was oppressive to him; it was almost his skeleton at the door. Scarcely did I ever meet with him that he did not have much to say on this subject, and always with an earnest expression of hope that something would be done for the relief of the Court.

With these burdens and cares upon him, calculated to the utmost to fret and annoy, yet he was mild, kind, patient. He has done his work well, whenever and wherever found, and for it he receives universal applause, not grudgingly, but freely and cheerfully rendered.

In the analysis of his work and of his character there will be discovered an inheritance his friends, his afflicted family, and his country will cherish with gratitude and pride, and one that will not perish, but will become more precious as our Government lives and "grows in its growth and strengthens in its strength"—

> Rich in saving common-sense,
> And, as the greatest only are,
> In his simplicity sublime.

I now move that the resolutions be placed among the records of the Court.

Mr. Justice MILLER replied as follows:

The Court receives with the deepest sensibility the resolutions of the Bar in regard to the death of the late Chief Justice, and the remarks of the Attorney-General in presenting them. We fully appreciate the great loss which the country, the Bar, and the officers of the Court have sustained by this sad event.

The blow falls, however, with more force upon the members of this Court, who, associated with him in the performance of its functions, have been accustomed to the benefit of his learning and of his ability in the discharge of the duties common to us all; for not only has he guided our pathway and lightened our labors by his experience, his skill, and his practical tact, but, with an urbanity and kindliness of heart rarely, if ever, excelled, he has won our affections and attached us to himself; so that, while we sympathize in the public loss, each also feels the sorrow of the final separation from a special friend.

Chief Justice WAITE came to the Court in the prime of life, with a vigorous constitution, trained in the ways of the law and the courts by a long and successful practice, and was at once recognized as a man with faculties which fitted him for presiding over this high tribunal. As to his character, his work, and the impression which he has made upon the public, we concur in the remarks made by the Attorney-General.

The results of his labors are seen in the forty-one volumes of the Reports of the decisions of this Court, from 19th Wallace to 126th United States, inclusive. In the opinions delivered by him contained in those volumes will be found the strongest evidence of his industry and his capacity as a judge. His style was eminently judicial, terse, vigorous, and clear. No one who reads them ever doubts what is meant or what the court decided. They will stand as his highest claim to the gratitude of his country and a monument to his diligence and ability.

It has been said by eminent judges, with something of regret, that however important their services, however valuable their decisions and opinions, they are, as compared with other public servants and public men, withdrawn from observation. But the influence of a great judge, like the late Chief Justice, embodied in the reports of a court of high character, will be felt as establishing rules of conduct and for the decision of important questions, and will be commented upon and appreciated by a large class constituting a learned profession, long after contemporary addresses or public efforts of whatever character shall have passed into forgetfulness. To one desirous of posthumous fame, this connection of a distinguished judge with the principles which the courts have laid down as rules governing the rights of persons and property and the powers of government over the citizen must always present a sufficient compensation for the absence of public applause accompanying the discharge of his judicial duties.

Besides these high functions of the office of Chief Justice, it would be unjust to him to omit our testimony to the eminent skill, court and tact with which he discharged those m duties which devolved upon him as the pre ing officer of the Court. He was endowed nature with qualities rarely combined in same individual, of steadiness and firmnes action and courtesy and consideration tow all with whom that action brought him in tact.

The oldest members of this Court kno no one who was better fitted to discharge administrative duties of the office of its C

Justice, or who ever did do so with more acceptability to his associates and to the public at large.

Since we must all die, it may perhaps be said of Chief Justice WAITE that the inevitable event came to him in a manner as near to what one could have desired it to come as was possible.

Up to within a week of his death he was in the most vigorous health, and actively engaged in the discharge of his official duties. On the morning of Monday, the 19th day of March last, the Court met after a recess of four weeks. He was present, and had an opinion ready for delivery in one of the most important causes decided while he was upon the Bench, the great Bell Telephone suits, which had been before the Court for a year.

During the recess he had written the opinion of the Court, but upon the morning of its meeting, feeling slightly unwell, he requested one of the junior Justices to read it for him. This occupied nearly two hours, thus showing the immense amount of labor he had bestowed upon its preparation during this interval, which the public supposed was one of recreation for the Justices of the Court.

As soon as the opinion was read the Chief Justice returned home and went to that bed from which he never again arose. After an illness of four days, in which his suffering was not very great, on the morning of Friday, the 28d day of March, at half past six, being assisted to turn over in his bed, he said, with apparent satisfaction, "I feel better." He then asked for a drink; the nurse stepped away a moment in the same room to get a glass of water, and when she returned to the bed he was dead. Thus, without a long or painful illness, without a struggle, in the midst of his usefulness, and just at the conclusion of what was one of the ablest and most important judicial decisions of his life, he passed away. Who does not wish that when his own end shall come it may be like this?

The resolutions of the Bar just presented to us, with the remarks of the Attorney-General, will be placed upon the records of the Court.

I have also received resolutions adopted by the Senate of the State of Ohio, the State from which the Chief Justice was appointed to this Court, expressive of their admiration and sense of the great loss. They will also be spread upon the records; and it is ordered that all proceedings in relation to the death of the late Chief Justice, which may be received by the Clerk, be placed on the files of the Court.

GENERAL INDEX

TO THE

FOUR VOLUMES CONTAINED IN THIS BOOK,

123, 124, 125, 126.

OCTOBER TERM, 1887.

ABANDONED AND CAPTURED PROPERTY.

1. The secretary of the treasury's approval of expenses in the collection and sale of abandoned property is conclusive evidence that they were proper and necessary, in the absence of fraud. United States v. Johnston, 389

2. Allowance of expenses by the secretary is not reviewable, as to amount, by the courts. Id.

ACCOUNT. See also OFFICE AND OFFICER, 2; PARTNERSHIP, 3; SETTLEMENT.

The statement of an account must be adopted by one party, and submitted as correct to the other, to constitute an account stated. Nutt v. United States, 821

ACTION OR SUIT. See also APPEAL AND ERROR; BONDS, 10, 11; DUTIES, II., III.; MORTGAGE, 6; PATENTS, 48; PUBLIC LANDS, 35, 36, 39; REMOVAL OF CAUSE; REPLEVIN; SALVAGE, 3; STATE AND STATE OFFICERS; TRUSTS, 1.

1. If an Act conferring jurisdiction is repealed without reservation as to pending cases, they fall with it. Sherman v. Grinnell, 278

2. The United States can be sued for such causes and in such courts only as it has by Act of Congress permitted. United States v. Gleeson, 421

ADMIRALTY. See also COLLISION; SALVAGE; SHIPS AND SHIPPING.

Findings of fact in an admiralty case have the same effect as a special verdict in an action at law. The Maggie Smith v. Walker, 175

ALIEN. See also HABEAS CORPUS; STATE AND STATE OFFICER, 4.

1. A Chinaman who departed from the United States in 1883, and then received the certificate of identification under the Act of 1882, and returned to the United States in 1885, is not subject to the Act of 1884 in respect to the certificate; his case is governed by the Act of 1882. United States v. Jung Ah Lung, 591

2. When such certificate is lost or stolen, the district court may receive other evidence of the right of a Chinese laborer to enter the United States. Id.

AMENDMENT. See APPEAL AND ERROR, 64, 86, 93; PLEADING, 2.

APPEAL AND ERROR.

I. WHEN LIES; JURISDICTION; AMOUNT INVOLVED.

II. APPELLATE JURISDICTION OVER STATE COURTS.

III. TIME AND MANNER OF TAKING; EFFECT.

IV. RECORD.

V. HEARING AND DETERMINATION.

VI. PRACTICE GENERALLY; MOTIONS; DISMISSAL; JUDGMENT; REHEARING, ETC.

See also ADMIRALTY; CASES CERTIFIED; COLLISION, 2; COURTS, 10; EQUITY, 12; EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS, 3; JURY, 2; NONSUIT; REMOVAL OF CAUSE, 5–9; REVIEW; SALVAGE, 4.

I. WHEN LIES; JURISDICTION; AMOUNT INVOLVED.

1. A decree remanding a cause for further proceedings is not final. District of Columbia v. McBlair, 449

2. A decree establishing the right of a junior mortgagee to redeem from a prior mortgage, but not determining the amount he must pay, or the amount due on his mortgage, is interlocutory. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. v. Simmons, 78

3. Where part of property has been settled for after suit, and before judgment, so that the remainder does not exceed $5,000, a writ of error from the supreme court to the circuit court will be dismissed. Cox v. Western Land & C. Co. 178

4. In an action on an official bond, in the penal sum of $20,000, of a district court clerk, for not accounting for moneys received, where the record shows that no recovery could be had for more than $517 and a small amount of interest, after deducting the fees due the clerk, the supreme court has no jurisdiction. United States v. Hill, 275

5. Rev. Stat. § 844, providing for payment by the clerk into the treasury of surplus moneys received by him as fees of office, is not a revenue law within Rev. Stat. § 699, giving jurisdiction to the supreme court without regard to the sum in dispute. United States v. Hill, 275

6. Where amount involved is less than $5,000, a decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia not involving the decision of a Federal question, is not appealable to the United States Supreme Court. Re Craft, 449

7. On an appeal to the Supreme Court of United States from a territorial supreme court, the amount in controversy is determined by the amount due at the time of the judgment of the territorial supreme court; to determine that, interest must be added to the judgment of the territorial district court until that date. Zeckendorf v. Johnson, 277

8. In an action to set aside a deed for false representations, where the court found that the value of the land did not exceed $5,000, affidavits showing that that value was not the true one were not admissible to establish the jurisdiction of the Federal supreme court. Talkington v. Dumbleton, 813

9. Under Rev. Stat. § 707, no appeal lies from a judgment of the court of claims against the United States, "pro forma for purpose of appeal," for less than $3,000. United States v. Gleeson, 421

II. APPELLATE JURISDICTION OVER STATE COURTS.

10. State decisions as to Constitution and laws of State are generally followed by the United States courts. Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co. 795

11. Such decisions relating to some law of local character are generally conclusive and always entitled to the highest respect in the Federal courts. Id.

12. State decisions that a passenger traveling on Sunday, contrary to a statute of the State, cannot recover from the carrier for its negligence, are followed by the Federal court. Id.

13. To give the United States Supreme Court jurisdiction, under Rev. Stat. § 709, it must appear of record that a Federal question was specifically set up or claimed in the State court at the proper time and in the proper way, and that its decision was against it. Brooks v. State, 454; French v. Hopkins, 586

14. A Federal question is not set up by an objection to the admission of evidence on the ground of incompetency and irrelevancy, and not on the ground that its admission would be in violation of the Federal laws or Constitution. Brooks v. State, 454

15. Nor by an objection that indictment proceedings violate Federal laws or Constitution, and are without due process of law. Id.

16. Nor by an assignment of error to an instruction that the jury might find defendant guilty of murder, if satisfied from the evidence he did murder the person named in the indictment in manner charged in either of the counts, when one count was bad. Id.

17. Nor by an instruction that the jury should be governed by the law as given them by the court, and a refusal to allow counsel to read in argument parts of opinion of the State supreme court, where no reference was made to any provision of the Federal laws or Constitution giving defendant any right. Id.

18. Nor by refusal of court to admit anyone to court room during the trial, except jurors and witnesses. Id.

19. Nor by exceptions to rulings claimed to deprive defendant of impartial jury, where it is not claimed that the Federal Constitution guaranteed such jury. Id.

20. Where a State decision of an alleged Federal question was not necessary to its judgment, but the court also put its decision upon another ground not repugnant to the Federal laws or Constitution, the United States Supreme Court has no jurisdiction. Id.

21. The United States Supreme Court cannot review a State judgement, unless it decides a Federal question against plaintiff in error. New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Refining Co. 607

22. Nor can such judgment be reviewed on the ground that the obligation of a contract has been impaired, unless some State statute has been upheld by it. Id.; Kreiger v. Shelby R. Co. 675

23. Any enactment to which the State gives the force of law is a State statute within the law relating to the jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court. New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Refining Co. 607

24. But when the State court gives no effect to a subsequent State law, and decides on grounds independent of it that the right claimed was not conferred by the contract, the court has no jurisdiction. Id.

25. The judgment of a State court, construing a State statute, not conflicting with the Federal Constitution or laws, is final, and not reviewable in the Federal supreme court. Stryker v. Crane, 194

26. In an action involving the ownership of real property, the supreme court is controlled by the decisions of the State in which located. Clement v. Packer, 721

27. Where the single question presented to the State court was whether there had been partition of lands between tenants in common, its decision that the proof was insufficient to establish partition, decides no question of Federal law, and is not subject to review in the United States Supreme Court. Phillips v. Mound City Land & Water Asso. 588

28. Decision of State court affirming a foreclosure sale of mortgaged property as a whole, when it was capable of division into parts, involves no Federal question. French v. Hopkins, 586

29. Jurisdiction of United States Supreme Court, under Rev. Stat. § 709, for review of State decision, does not depend upon citizenship of parties, but on questions involved. Id.

30. Whether lands sold by the United States are taxable within a year after title passed from the government is not a Federal question. Stryker v. Crane, 194

31. State decision affirming constitutionality of statute validating a void assessment without giving landowners a hearing thereupon, is against a right claimed under the Fourteenth Amendment, and is one which the United States Supreme Court may review. Spencer v. Merchant, 763

32. When the Legislature ascertains for itself, and settles, the sum to be raised by tax, and the benefited district, its action is conclusive and beyond review. Id.

33. Where the work is one which the State has authority to do and to pay for by assessment on the property benefited, objections that the sum raised is exorbitant, and that part of the property assessed was not benefited, presents no question under the Fourteenth Amendment. Id.

34. In a lawsuit for taxes, the real owner of land setting up their payment by another, the question whether he thus became obligated to repay the latter is not a Federal question. Chapman v. Crane, 285

35. If decision of Federal question by State court is rendered unnecessary by the view the court properly takes of the case, within scope of pleadings, the judgment is not open to review in the Federal supreme court. Id.

36. Injunction restraining replevin in court established under authority of United States does not necessarily involve Federal question. Re Craft, 449

37. Suit for perpetual injunction against building bridge over navigable river, in case where Congress has not prohibited it, is not a suit arising under United States laws. Willamette Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 629

38. Judgment of State court in an action to enforce a contract for the use of a patent, holding that the question of the validity of the reissue of the patent could not be contested in that action, and assuming jurisdiction to render judgment against the defendant, involves a Federal question which the United States Supreme Court may review. Dale Tile Mfg. Co. v. Hyatt, 688

39. An action to enforce or set aside a contract for the use of a patent is not within the Acts of Congress by which an appeal is allowable, in cases arising under the patent laws, without regard to the value of the matter in controversy. Id.

40. A State decision based upon a contract between the parties relating to a patent does not necessarily decide any question depending upon the patent laws of the United States. Id.

41. An action upon a written contract between the joint owners of a patent to recover royalties does not present any Federal question, no ruling upon the validity or construction of the patent having been made. Felix v. Scharnweber, 687

42. A claim against the purchaser of national bank shares for failure to register his ownership in bank books presents no Federal question, the banking law not requiring him to do so. Le Sassier v. Kennedy, 262

43. The supreme court permits a motion to be made in open court, at suggestion of justice to whom application is presented, for allowance of a writ of error to State court, the case being urgent and important. Ex parte Spies, 80

44. The proper practice is to hear counsel in support of the motion on the point whether Federal questions were made and decided in the State court, and upon the character of those questions. Id.

45. The writ does not issue as a matter of right; the court should ascertain whether any question reviewable was decided in court below, and whether it is of a character to justify bringing it up for re-examination. Id.

46. If it appears that the decision of the Federal question was so plainly right as not to require argument, the writ should not be allowed. Id.

III. TIME AND MANNER OF TAKING; EFFECT.

47. Signing of citation in time by lower court is sufficient allowance of appeal. Brown v. McConnell, 495

48. Citations from Territorial courts may be signed by justices of those courts or by justice of United States Supreme Court. Id.

49. Omission to take security does not avoid citation, and permission to supply omission may be given. Id.

50. Appeal in open court takes date from its allowance; and, to be kept in force, should be docketed in supreme court before end of term for which made returnable. Radford v. Folsom, 292

51. Subsequent acceptance of appeal bond by district judge, after term at which decree was rendered and where no citation was ever issued, was no allowance of new appeal at that date. Id.

52. Appearance of counsel at present term, on making of motion to dismiss, does not waive citation. Id.

53. Where appeal is inoperative because of failure to seasonably docket it, subsequent signing of citation is allowance of new appeal. Stewart v. Masterson, 507

54. New appeal, if not accompanied by another bond, will be dismissed, unless appellant shall, within time allowed by court, file proper bond. Id.

55. Appeal will be dismissed where appellant's excuse for failure to docket case at return term is not sufficient, and transcript of record was not lodged in office of clerk until after return term, and no attempt was made to get it upon docket until another term had passed. Fayolle v. Texas Pac. R. Co. 538

56. New suits to enjoin plaintiffs in error from further violation of ordinance which was foundation of prosecution pending on error are not violations of supersedeas. Natal v. Louisiana, 238

57. Under Rev. Stat. § 1007, the supersedeas operates only on the judgment appealed from, and not on the questions involved, considered apart from the particular suit in which they were decided. Id.

IV. RECORD.

58. The initials "A. B." are not the signature of the judge, or a sufficient authentication of the bill of exceptions, or sufficient evidence of its allowance by the judge. Origet v. United States, 743

59. The opinion of the Louisiana State court is considered by the United States Supreme Court, on writs of error, as part of the record. New Orleans Water Works Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Refining Co. 607

60. The opinion of the State court, written and recorded as required by the State statute, may be examined by the United States Supreme Court to ascertain the grounds of its judgment. Kreiger v. Shelby R. Co. 675

61. Certificate of State court, allowing writ of error, that Federal question was decided against plaintiff in error, cannot supply want of evidence to that effect in the record. Felix v. Sharnweber, 687

62. Where there is no assignment of errors in transcript, specification thereof in brief, or statement of case, nor reference to pages of record relied on to support points, case will be dismissed. Benites v. Hampton, 260

63. Assignment of errors on appeal from district to supreme court of Territory cannot be accepted in Federal supreme court. Id.

64. If party in regard to whom the necessary citizenship is not shown actually possesses such citizenship, record cannot be amended in the United States Supreme Court to show the fact; but the circuit court, in its discretion, may allow that to be done when the case gets back there. Johnson v. Christian, 820

65. Omissions in record may be brought before the court by certiorari by appellees. Hoskin v. Fisher, 759

V. HEARING AND DETERMINATION.

66. Abstract questions of law are not considered on writ of error, unless it appears from record that facts were such as to make such questions material to issue. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Madison, 258

67. On an application to the supreme court for a writ of error to a State court, upon the ground that a State statute, as construed by the latter court, deprived the petitioners of a trial by an impartial jury, the supreme court will only consider rulings on the challenges of the jurors who actually sat at the trial. Ex parte Spies, 80

68. Instruction by State court to jury, not presenting Federal question, is not considered on appeal. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Missouri River Packet Co. 781

69. Improper admission of evidence is no ground of error, where jury were instructed to disregard it, and could not have been misled. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Madison, 258

70. Under exception by defendant to court's direction to find for plaintiff, he may show there was sufficient evidence to go to jury, or that questions of law apparent upon record would control case, in opposition to direction. North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 287

71. General exception to whole of charge cannot be regarded. White v. Barber, 243

72. Exception upon entire misconception of charge of court is not well taken; and a hypercritical criticism to part of charge will not be sustained. Hartranft v. Langfeld, 672

73. Where copies of patents offered in evidence are not in the record, an exception to a refusal to admit them in evidence cannot be sustained. Clement v. Packer, 721

74. Objection to use of letter in evidence, on ground that it was obtained from defendant by unlawful search and seizure, not made in court below, cannot be considered. Ex parte Spies, 80

75. Objection that defendants, foreign born, were denied by trial court rights guaranteed by treaty, cannot be raised for first time in supreme court. Id.

76. Objections that defendants were not actually present when sentence was pronounced cannot be made if record shows that they were present. Id.

77. Objection that trial was had by court without jury cannot be raised for first time on appeal. Dundee Mortgage & T. I. Co. v. Hughes, 357

78. Rulings of circuit court upon trial by it without jury, when there has been no written waiver of jury filed with clerk, are not reviewable. Id.

79. Objections to form of information of seizure for forfeitures under Revenue Laws, not made below, must be regarded as having been waived or cured by the verdict. Freidenstein v. United States, 736

80. Defendant's exception to denial of motion for nonsuit is waived by his offer of evidence in support of defense. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Mares, 296

81. Findings of fact by lower court cannot be re-examined; and errors assigned, relating only to sufficiency of evidence to support findings, are not considered. Zeckendorf v. Johnson, 277

82. Findings of fact by referee, on which judgment was entered in court below, are conclusive on writ of error. Roberts v. Benjamin, 334

83. Exceptions to admission of evidence, or to findings of, or refusal to find, facts by referee, cannot be considered where case was tried by circuit court without filing written waiver of jury. Id.

VI. PRACTICE GENERALLY; MOTIONS; DISMISSAL; JUDGMENT; REHEARING, ETC.

84. Where stipulation is made to submit cause without oral argument, without any time being mentioned, motion to require defendant in error to submit under Rule 20, to which no reference is made in stipulation, will be denied if opposed. Glenn v. Fant, 353

85. Where, during pendency of writ of error to State court to review its affirmation of judgment on a conviction for murder, the plaintiff in error escaped and is not within the control of the court below, the submission of the cause will be set aside; and, unless plaintiff is brought within jurisdiction of court below within time specified in order of court, the cause will thereafter be left off the docket until directions to the contrary. Bohanan v. Nebraska, 854

86. Where, before stipulation for dismissal has been signed, some of plaintiffs in error assign their interest in suit, entry of dismissal in vacation may be amended by adding words "without prejudice to right of assignee to proceed as he may be advised in court below for protection of his interest." Woodman v. Missionary Society of M. E. Church, 352

87. It having been suggested that the suit had been compromised, and no cause having been shown, within the time fixed by the court, why the case should not be dismissed, the suit was dismissed. Addington v. Adams, 853

88. It having been shown to the court that, by arrangement, the defendant in error is no longer a contestant in the cause, the court, after notice to the parties and hearing, dismissed the case, with costs. East Tennessee V. & G. R. Co. v. Southern Tel. Co. 853

89. Supreme Court of New Mexico, in appeals or writs of error, may render such judgment upon verdicts on all the counts of the declaration, where the evidence does not support the special count, as, upon a consideration of the whole record, justice may appear to require. Hopkins v. Orr, 523

90. Judgment of supreme court of that Territory, affirming judgment of district court as to principal sum due, and as to interest of 6 per cent upon plaintiff's remitting excess of 4 per cent, is judgment affirming that of district court. Id.

91. In such case supreme court may render its judgment against sureties on bond as well as against principal defendant. Id.

92. Upon reversal of State judgment the United States Supreme Court will not grant a motion to give effect to its judgment where it does not appear that application has been made to State court to carry mandate into effect. Royall v. Virginia, 855

93. Judgment amended by instructing court below to amend its decree by describing lands confirmed, and by declaring that if any of lands have been sold by the United States appellees may enter like quantities of public lands, and by directing reference to ascertain what sales have been made. United States v. De Morant, 565

94. Judgment was reversed on stipulation of parties, costs were paid by plaitiff in error, and cause remanded with instruction to proceed under stipulation. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Waters, 474

95. Decree reversed on stipulation of parties, and cause remanded, with instruction to enter decree in plaintiff's favor, as agreed by parties to appeal, but without prejudice to rights of other parties to suit. Bond v. Davenport, 279.

96. Cause was remanded with directions to take further proceedings therein in accordance with Metropolitan R. R. Co. v. Moore, 121 U. S. 558 (30: 1022). Inland & Seaboard Coasting Co. v. Hall, 369

97. Where judgment has been affirmed by a divided court, and no important constitutional question is involved, a rehearing may be denied. Shreveport v. Holmes, 854

98. Rehearing denied and mandate modified. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kountz Line, 79

APPEARANCE. See APPEAL AND ERROR, 52.

ARMY. See also NAVY.

Colonel on retired list of army is not entitled to longevity increased pay, under Rev. Stat. § 1262. Marshall v. United States, 475

ASSIGNMENT. See CHECKS, 6.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

1. Under Texas Law of March 24, 1879, assignment for creditors directing payment of surplus to assignor, after paying consenting creditors, is valid; under the law nonconsenting creditors may garnish assignee for such surplus. Cunningham v. Norton, 624

2. General description of property assigned is sufficient. Id.

ATTACHMENT. See also EQUITY, 4, 5.

1. Attachment cannot issue against national bank before judgment in suit begun in United States Circuit Court. Pacific Nat. Bank v. Mixter, 567

2. A bond given to dissolve the attachment is not good where an attachment was prohibited by law. Id.

3. When Federal marshal takes property of one not named in writ, rightful owner may obtain relief by intervening by petition in action. Gumbel v. Pitkin, 374

4. Where marshal took possession of goods on Sunday under writ issued on that day, illegal by State laws, he should surrender possession to sheriff appearing with lawful writ from State court. Id.

5. Where marshal refused to do so, he is liable in damages for loss caused thereby. Id.

6. Where creditor in State court applies to Federal circuit court, that court could administer equity in the case and grant him relief. Id.

7. In such case creditor may, by service of notice upon marshal, make constructive levy of State attachment, subject to prior liens, without disturbing marshal's possession. Id.

8. Where creditor made himself party to proceedings in Federal circuit court, and proceeded therein against marshal and creditors for whom he had acted, that court will hold marshal liable as garnishee and will give such creditor priority over others. Id.

BANKRUPTCY. See also EXECUTION, 4,

1. Where assignment of claim by firm is not within prohibition of bankruptcy law, one partner, who was party to it, cannot show that it was fraudulent against his creditors. Crawford v. Halsey, 572

2. Assignee has no interest in claim assigned more than two months before bankruptcy proceedings, and is not necessary party to its submission to arbitration. Id.

3. Purchaser of claim from assignee in bankruptcy has only his rights. Id.

4. Assignee may recover insurance moneys assigned by bankrupt to his wife while in contemplation of insolvency. Vetterlein v. Barnes, 400

5. Bankrupt's wife is not necessary party defendant to action by assignee against him and insurer to enjoin collection of policies. Id.

6. Bank in which deposits from bankrupt estates are made in the name of the United States District Court may keep general account with district court, and need not keep separate account with each bankrupt estate; this is in accordance with Bankruptcy Rule 28. State Nat. Bank v. Dodge, 458

7. Bank must honor all checks drawn by court as trustee, and need not refuse checks drawn in any particular case, according to its number, beyond amount deposited in bank under that number. Id.

BANKS. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 42; ATTACHMENT, 1; BANKRUPTCY, 6, 7; CHECKS; EQUITY, 4, 5; TAXES, 8–12.

1. Savings banks are not banking institutions in the commercial sense of that phrase. National Bank of Redemption v. Boston, 689

2. Rents received by receiver of bank, under decree of court, are distributable among its creditors. Hits v. Jenks, 156

BONDS. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 4, 5; ATTACHMENT, 2; JUDGMENT, 9; MORTGAGE, 7–9; REPLEVIN.

1. Acceptance and use by railroad company of State aid bonds, issued in violation of State Constitution, does not create a lien in favor of the State, upon its income, of which a purchaser of the bonds can avail himself as against a purchaser of the road. Tompkins v. Little Rock & F. S. R. Co. 615

2. Neither the State nor its bondholders can sequester income arising from the road in the hands of a new company, organized by its purchasers on mortgage foreclosure. Id.

3. The fact that no interest had ever been paid upon State bonds, and that it had run unpaid for ten years, furnishes presumptive evidence to purchaser at auction sale that they were dishonored. Trask v. Jacksonville, P. & M. R. Co. 521

4. Purchaser of bonds with knowledge of their illegal issue acquires no title thereto which he can enforce as bona fide holder. Id.

5. Where bonds recite their issue under a certain Act and a vote, on application of "fifty legal voters," in accordance with such Act, they cannot be supported as issued under another Act, which required application by "twenty voters and taxpayers." Gilson v. Town of Dayton, 74

6. Where bonds are held void in suit between purchaser and town, the purchaser is not subrogated to right of railroad company to enforce collection of appropriation voted by town. Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Middleport, 587

7. Where railway bonds contained promise to pay interest on day certain in each year, and further provide, if net earnings are insufficient for that purpose, scrip may be issued at option of company, such option must be exercised at time when it would be required to pay interest in money; and such scrip will draw interest from day on which interest which it takes the place of was due. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marlor, 303

8. When option is not exercised on day interest is due to pay it in scrip, bondholder has immediate action for interest money. Id.

9. No demand by bondholder is necessary to entitle him to payment of interest in money in such case. Id.

10. Creditor of county cannot sue on collector's bond, conditioned to pay over State and other revenue collected, for breach of its condition. Missouri v. Winterbottom, 124

11. Such action is barred by settlement made with county by collector. Id.

BOUNDARIES.

The history of the Florida boundary stated. Coffee v. Groover, 51

BRIDGES. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 37; WATERS AND WATERCOURSES, 7.

1. The distance of 160 feet between the piers of the bridge across the Missouri River at Kansas City, required by the Act of Congress of July 25, 1886, is obtained by measuring along a line between the piers drawn perpendicularly to their faces and the current of the river. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Missouri River Packet Co. 731

2. Such Act is construed with reference to its evident purpose to connect with the exercise of the privilege granted such limitations as guaranty protection to the navigating interests affected by the proposed legislation. Id.

BURDEN OF PROOF. See INSURANCE, 8; PATENTS, 58; PUBLIC LANDS, 29, 30.

CARRIERS. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 12; COMMERCE, 5–7.

1. Carriers are subject to legislative control as to their rates of fare and freight, unless protected by their charters. Dow v. Beidelman, 841

2. In absence of legislative regulation, courts must decide for company, when controversies arise, what is reasonable. Id.

3. The Legislature, in the exercise of its power of regulating freights and fares, may classify the railroads according to the length of their lines, if the same rule is applied to all roads of the same class. Id.

4. If the classification operates uniformly, the court cannot decide whether it was the best that could have been made. Id.

5. Carrier must deliver cattle to party designated by terms of shipment, or to his order, at place of destination; and where it delivers them to one not entitled to receive them it is accountable. North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 287

6. Direction on way-bills to notify named party does not qualify duty of carrier to deliver cattle to order of consignee. Id.

7. Last carrier in connecting lines must deliver cattle at place of destination, and to consignee there, if he was made known to it on receiving freight from preceding connecting company. Id.

8. Custom of company of delivering cattle without requiring production of bill of lading or authority of shipper, does not relieve it from liability for cattle wrongfully delivered. North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 287

9. Indorsement, by shipper to plaintiff, of receipts taken on shipment of cattle, gave plaintiff right to their possession, and, if necessary, to sell them for payment of drafts taken by him against shipper. Id.

10. A passenger dropping a bag containing money and jewelry, while closing a window, cannot recover the loss from the railroad company for its refusal to stop the train in order that he might get the bag. Henderson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 92

CASES CERTIFIED.

1. Upon division in opinion of two judges of circuit, points certified to Federal supreme court must be questions of law only. Jewell v. Knight, 190

2. Whole case cannot be sent up by certificate, nor can splitting up of case into several questions enable court to take jurisdiction. Id.

3. When questions certified are not such as court is authorized to answer, case must be dismissed. Id.

4. Statement of facts should be of ultimate facts, leaving nothing but conclusions of law to be drawn. Id.

5. Whole case cannot be referred to decision of supreme court upon certificate of division. Smith v. Craft, 267

CERTIORARI. See APPEAL AND ERROR, 65.

CHECKS.

1. Instrument drawn upon bank simply directing payment, to party named, of specified sum of money on deposit with drawee, without designating future day of payment, is a check. Bull v. First Nat. Bank, 97

2. A check is not due until it is demanded, and is not treated as overdue merely because it has not been presented as early as it might be. Id.

3. Drawer is not discharged from liability for want of notice of dishonor, unless he has sustained damage. Id.

4. Until check is demanded, purchaser for valuable consideration, without notice of demand in drawer's hands against person to whom check is payable, is protected against its set-off. Id.

5. Negotiability is not affected by fact that check is payable "in current funds." Id.

6. Check upon bank is not equitable assignment of moneys, where there is only one fifth of its amount on deposit at time. Florence Mining Co. v. Brown, 424

7. Check not accepted or certified by cashier does not create lien on money which holder can enforce against bank. Id.

8. Bank need not take notice of memoranda on check, placed there by depositor for his own convenience. State Nat. Bank v. Dodge, 458

CHINESE. See ALIEN; HABEAS CORPUS.

CIRCUIT COURTS. See COURTS, 2–10.

CLAIMS. See also COURT OF CLAIMS; INTERNAL REVENUE, 8; LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, 1–3.

1. Report of quartermaster general to Congress, under Act of August 7, 1882, for relief of Julia A. Nutt, is not an award in pursuance of an arbitration; nor is it an account stated. Nutt v. United States, 821

2. Appropriation by Congress of part of amount recommended by the report to be paid to her, is not an adoption of the report, or a recognition that a larger amount was due. Id.

COLLISION.

1. One vessel brought into immediate jeopardy by another's fault is not liable if she has not been maneuvered with perfect skill and presence of mind. The Maggie Smith v. Walker, 175

2. Allowance of interests and costs in such case rests in lower court's discretion, and will not be disturbed on appeal. Id.

3. The 24th Sailing Rule applies only where there is some special cause rendering departure necessary to avoid immediate danger. Id.

COMMERCE. See also TAXES, 5.

1. Pa. Act of June 9, 1879, § 16, imposing license tax upon foreign corporations, does not conflict with commercial clause of Federal Constitution or with Fourteenth Amendment. Pembina Consolidated Silver Mining & Milling Co. v. Pennsylvania, 650

2. Only limitation upon power of State to exact conditions allowing foreign corporation to do business is where it is engaged in interstate commerce. Id.

3. Power of Congress to control commerce is not restricted by State authority. Id.

4. The State may exclude a foreign corporation entirely, or restrict its business to particular localities. Id.

5. Iowa Code, § 1553, amended by Act of 1886, April 5, prohibiting a common carrier from bringing intoxicating liquors into the State without first having the certificate therein required, is void as a regulation of interstate commerce. Bowman v. Chicago & N. R. Co. 700

6. Such statute is not an inspection or quarantine law, and is not a legitimate exercise of police power by the State. Id.

7. It constitutes no defense to an action against a carrier for refusing to carry beer into the State. Id.

8. State statute requiring locomotive engineers to be licensed is not regulation of interstate commerce, but is valid exercise of police power. Smith v. State, 508

9. Fee to be paid by applicant for examination is not provision for raising revenue, and is not tax upon transportation. Id.

10. State statute which conflicts with actual exercise of powers of Congress over commerce must give way before supremacy of National authority. Id.

COMMON CARRIERS. See CARRIERS, 8.

CONFISCATION. See also EVIDENCE, 8, 9.

1. Under Confiscation Act of July 17, 1862, all that could be sold was right to property seized, terminating with life of person for whose offense it had been seized. Shields v. Shiff, 445

2. Such sale does not affect mortgage on property in favor of third person; and subsequent sale under mortgage is valid. Id.

3. Under Act containing pact de non alienando, mortgagee can proceed against mortgagor, after latter's expropriation through confiscation proceedings, as though he had never been devested of title. Id.

4. No disposition is made by Act of property confiscated after owner's death, but it leaves it to devolve to heirs according to lex rei sitæ. Id.

CONFLICT OF JURISDICTION. See ATTACHMENT, 3–8.

CONFLICT OF LAWS. See also CONFISCATION, 4.

Mode of transfer of real estate is within jurisdiction of State Legislature, where title has passed from Federal Government and is in controversy between private citizens. Langdon v. Sherwood, 344

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW. See also CARRIERS, 1–4; COMMERCE; EMINENT DOMAIN, 9; HUSBAND AND WIFE, 5–7; INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

1. New Jersey Act of March 31, 1869, entitled "Supplemental to Act Entitled 'An Act to Ascertain Rights of State and of Riparian Owners in Lands Lying Under Waters of Bay of New York and Elsewhere in this State,'" sufficiently indicates its subject. Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 543

2. The first ten articles of Amendment of Federal Constitution were intended to operate on National Government alone. Ex parte Spies, 80

3. Fifth and Sixth Amendments of the Federal Constitution apply to United States only, and not to the States. Ex parte Sawyer, 402

4. Provision of same Constitution prohibiting passage of ex post facto State laws applies only to legislation concerning crimes. Id.

5. Fourteenth Amendment does not take from States those powers of police that were reserved at time original Constitution was adopted. Mugler v. Kansas, 205

6. It belongs to the Legislature to exercise the police power of the State, subject to the power of the courts to adjudge whether any particular law is an invasion of rights secured by the Constitution. Id.

7. The statute of Kansas, prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating liquors for use as a beverage, is not unconstitutional in respect to the owners of breweries previously established, on the ground that it deprives them of their property without due process of law, although such property is valuable chiefly, if not solely, for the manufacture of such liquors, and although at the time investments were made in such property the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors was lawful. Id.

8. Exaction of tolls, under State statute, for use of improved waterway, is not deprivation of property within Federal Constitution. Sands v. Manistee River Improvement Co. 149; Bugles v. Same, 152

9. Corporations are not citizens within Federal Constitution relating to privileges and immunities of citizens. Pembina Consolidated Silver Mining & Milling Co. v. Pennsylvania, 650

CONSULS.

Consular Appropriation Act, reducing salary of consul at Tangier to that of consul of fifth class, repeals prior Acts placing such consul in higher class. Mathews v. United States, 127

CONTEMPT. See COURTS, 7; STATE AND STATE OFFICERS, 4.

CONTRACT. See also DAMAGES; FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE, 7; FRAUDS, STATUTE OF; HUSBAND AND WIFE, 6; SALVAGE, 3; STATE AND STATE OFFICER.

1. Charge to jury, fairly presenting testimony, with instruction that if dealings of defendant were options to buy or sell at future day, verdict should be for plaintiff; but if they were contracts for absolute delivery of grain, verdict should be for defendant,—Held, not erroneous. White v. Barber, 248

2. Moneys irrevocably set apart by both plaintiff and defendant, his agent, to pay damages upon contracts for purchase of wheat, and actually paid over by agent under rules of board of trade,—Held, not recoverable. Id.

3. If contract be that promisor shall do one of two things at certain day, at his election, election cannot be exercised after day has passed. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marlor, 308

4. Written contract may be varied by subsequent verbal contract, where there is nothing in contract itself requiring it to be in writing. Teal v. Bilby, 263

5. Where quality of cattle was to be decided by arbitrator, parties must disclose to him any disease which cattle have and which cannot be discovered by careful examination. Id.

6. Where one party to contract was to preserve hides of cattle which died and ears of any which had ear marks, and there was no provision when hides of cattle dying should be counted, hides preserved should be counted at the time, with view of making them available for use or sale. Id.

7. Practical construction of contract by parties may prevail over its literal meaning, according to which one party seeks to obtain deduction of contract price. District of Columbia v. Gallaher, 526

8. Nonaction of vendee for enforcement of contract for sale of iron ore, and vendor's subsequent failure to deliver balance of iron ore or call upon vendee to comply with contract, are evidence that it was in fact rescinded by both. Florence Mining Co. v. Brown, 424

9. Where vendor makes written demand upon one to whom he had delivered securities for vendee, for their return, on ground that vendee had refused to fulfill contract for their purchase, it is rescission of contract. Hinchman v. Lincoln, 337

10. Bringing suit by vendor to recover purchase price does not authorize person to whom he had given securities, but who is not vendee's agent, to deliver them to vendee without performance of contract by latter. Id.

COPYRIGHT.

1. Rev. Stat. § 4965, limits remedy for infringement of owner's copyright to forfeiture of plates on which infringing photograph or other article is copied, and every sheet thereof; and to further forfeiture of $1 for every sheet found in possession of infringer. Thornton v. Schreiber, 577

2. Employee in store of infringing firm which has control of plates and of sheets of photographs infringing plaintiff's copyright has not possession of sheets, although he may have principal place in store. Id.

3. Words "found in his possession" refer to time before cause of action accrues at which they were found in defendant's possession. Id.

CORPORATIONS. See also COMMERCE, 1–4; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 8.

1. The Memphis & Little Rock Railroad Company, as reorganized by mortgage foreclosure purchasers in 1877, was not the same corporation as that chartered by the Legislature in 1853, but was a new corporation, subject to the Constitution and laws in force when it came into existence. Dow v. Beidelman, 841

2. The Massachusetts statutes duly authorized the organization of the American Bell Telephone Company as a corporation, and made the statutory certificate evidence of its corporate existence. The Telephone Cases, 868

COSTS. See COLLISION, 2.

COUNTIES. See BONDS, 10, 11; LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, 4–6.

COURT OF CLAIMS. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 9; INTERNAL REVENUE, 3; LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, 1–3.

1. The court of claims has jurisdiction of an action by a State to recover moneys received by United States from sales of swamp lands granted to the State by an Act of Congress. United States v. Louisiana, 69; United States v. Alabama, 78; United States v. Mississippi, 78

2. Such action is not barred by time until six years after the amount is ascertained from proofs of sales before the commissioner of the general land office. Id.

3. Neither court of claims nor Federal supreme court can determine any claim against United States, except in cases defined by Congress. United States v. Gleeson, 421

COURTS. See also COURT OF CLAIMS; EJECTMENT, 3; INJUNCTION; REMOVAL OF CAUSE.

1. Where power is delegated to tribunal over subject-matter, its acts are binding and valid as to subject-matter. Sabariego v. Maverick, 480

2. Under Rev. Stat. § 629, circuit court has jurisdiction of suit to enforce performance of contract, such suit being one to recover contents of chose in action. Shoecraft v. Bloxham, 574

3. Assignee of contract cannot sue for its enforcement in circuit court if assignor could not have done so. Id.

4. The circuit court has jurisdiction of an action in ejectment in which plaintiff claims title under a patent from the United States the validity of which is denied by defendant, although no citizenship of either party is alleged. Doolan v. Carr, 844

5. Facts on which jurisdiction of circuit court rests must, in some form, appear on the record. Johnson v. Christian, 820

6. Circuit court has jurisdiction of suit for perpetual injunction to restrain enforcement of judgment in ejectment rendered in it, without averment of citizenship of parties. Id.

7 Circuit court cannot prevent removal of police judge from office, nor adjudge city officers guilty of contempt in disregarding its order. Ex parte Sawyer, 402

8. Federal court cannot stay proceedings in a State court, except under Bankrupt Act. Id.

9. The circuit court has jurisdiction in a suit in equity which is ancillary to an action at law of which it has already acquired jurisdiction, although one of the defendants is a citizen of the district of which a portion of complainants were citizens. Dewey v. West Fairmont Gas Coal Co. 179

10. Equitable powers of Federal courts, as courts of law, to prevent abuse of their process, may be invoked by strangers to litigation without regard to citizenship. Gumbel v. Pitkin, 374

11. That Federal question was not presented in brief of counsel in State court is not sufficient reason for that court omitting to consider it, where it was fairly presented and necessarily involved in determining case. Des Moines Navigation & R. R. Co. v Iowa Homestead Co. 202

12. Decree of circuit court entered by direction of district judge, while sitting in that court, is good until reversed; and from it appeal may be taken. Bakes v. Power, 382

CRIMINAL LAW. See APPEAL AND ERROR, 85; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 4; EQUITY, 8; INDICTMENTS; WITNESS.

CUSTOM AND USAGE. See CARRIERS, 8.

CUSTOMS DUTIES. See DUTIES.

DAMAGES. See also EMINENT DOMAIN; EQUITY, 6; PATENTS, 56–61.

1. Damages for breach of contract must be capable of certain ascertainment, and not remote, speculative, or contingent. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Hall, 479

2. Where a telegraph company omitted to give the proper address in sending a message, and its delivery was delayed for a day, until the oil thereby ordered to be purchased had advanced in price; and the party to whom the order was addressed omitted to purchase the oil ordered because of such advance, and it does not appear that it was the purpose of the sender to purchase the oil in the expectation of profits to be derived from an immediate resale, or that he could have resold at a profit at any subsequent day,—he can recover only the cost of transmitting the delayed message, and not the difference between the value of the oil. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Hall, 479

3. Measure of damages for nondelivery of goods sold is their market value at date of breach of contract. Roberts v. Benjamin, 334

DAMS. See EMINENT DOMAIN, 1–4.

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR. See ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS; BANKRUPTCY; BANKS, 2; BONDS, 10, 11; FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE, II., INSOLVENCY.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES. See EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS; WILL.

DEED. See ESTOPPEL, 1; FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE, 8; HUSBAND AND WIFE, 1–4.

DEFINITIONS. See INSOLVENCY.

DEMAND. See BONDS, 9; MORTGAGE, 5, 6.

DESCENT. See CONFISCATION, 4.

DEVISE AND LEGACY. See WILL.

DISMISSAL. See APPEAL AND ERROR, VI.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. See HUSBAND AND WIFE, 1.

DIVORCE. See HUSBAND AND WIFE, 5–7.

DUTIES.

I. IMPOSITION; OFFICERS.

II. RECOVERING BACK EXCESS.

III. PENAL PROSECUTIONS.

See also EVIDENCE, 20; PRINCIPAL AND AGENT, 8; TREATIES, 1.

I. IMPOSITION; OFFICERS.

1. Nail rods, consisting of straight, flat pieces of iron, about an inch in width and three eighths of an inch thick, come within description of rolled iron, not otherwise provided for in Revised Statutes, § 2504, and are liable to duties of 1¼ cents per pound. Worthington v. Abbott, 494

2. Commercial understanding as to description of article by Congress must prevail. Id.; Miller v. Butterfield, 643

3. That 20 per cent of cotton enters into "manufactures of hair" does not change their character, under Act of 1870. Miller v. Butterfield, 643

4. Words "manufactures of hair" are sufficient designation to place such manufactures among enumerated articles under said Act. Id.

5. The words in § 21 of that Act, "all other manufactures of hair not otherwise herein provided for," means not otherwise provided for in Act of which they are part. Id.

6. Designation of cloth as hair, silk, or cotton depends upon predominance of such article in its composition. Id.

7. Under Act of March 3, 1883, schedule M, velvet ribbons of silk and cotton, of which silk is the material of chief value, used chiefly for trimming hats, pay a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem. Hartranft v. Langfeld, 672

8. Duty upon article specially provided for by one section of statute is excluded from operation of other sections. Id.

9. Quilts composed of cotton or silk and eider down, the latter being the component material of chief value, are chargeable with duty of 20 per centum ad valorem, under Act of March 3, 1883, § 2513. Hartranft v. Sheppard, 763

10. Under Act of March 3, 1883, goods imported before, but kept in bonded warehouses after, it took effect are subject only to duties thereafter leviable upon their entry for consumption. Hartranft v. Oliver, 813

11. Importer is entitled to a refund of the difference between amount of duties paid on such goods prior to their entry and amount which would be leviable if they were imported after the Act took effect. Id.

12. Goods on a ship in charge of a customs officer, preliminary to their removal to a bonded warehouse, are in government custody, and subject only to such duties as are leviable when they are freed therefrom. Id.

13. Clerk of collector of customs is not officer of United States, within Rev. Stat. § 3639, relating to safe keeping of public moneys. United States v. Smith, 534

14. Such clerks are not appointed by head of department, within constitutional provision regarding appointing officers of United States. Id.

II. RECOVERING BACK EXCESS.

15. Declaration to recover excess of duties paid under protest need not state that suit was brought within time limited by Rev. Stat. § 2931. Beard v. Porter, 492

16. United States waives claim of voluntary payment of duties sought to be recovered, where such duties were paid under agreement of secretary of the treasury, contained in letter, that question of voluntary payment would not be raised as defense to suit to recover back duties paid, if importer would pay them. Id.

17. Liquidation and payment of duties on imported goods is settlement thereof which, in absence of fraud or protest, is conclusive after one year. Id.

18. Protest, to prevent such settlement from being conclusive, must be one against that liquidation or settlement, and not against attempted reliquidation more than one year after. Id.

19. Action to recover excess of duties is not maintainable unless payment, in addition to protest, was made to obtain possession of merchandise. Porter v. Beard, 490

20. Importers can obtain benefit of exemption from duties sued for, after delivery of goods, if they are in fact illegally imposed, only by defense in suit brought by United States to recover them. Porter v. Beard, 490

21. In suit to recover excess of duties, importer may raise question of want of qualification of merchant appraiser. Mustin v. Cadwalader, 169; Oelbermann v. Merritt, 164

22. Importer may show that appraiser did not open and appraise packages designated by collector, as required by statute. Id.

23. Appraiser is competent witness to prove his own unfamiliarity with goods, and character of his examination of them. Id.

III. PENAL PROSECUTIONS.

24. Statute providing that judgment will not be reversed or arrested for any defect or want of form is applicable to informations of seizure for forfeitures. Friedenstein v. United States, 786

25. Such information need not aver that alleged acts were done with actual intent to defraud the government; but finding to that effect must be made on the trial, under the Act of June 22, 1874, § 16. Id.

26. General verdict against claimant will be supported if any count of the information is good against formal objections, where government was not required to elect on which count it claimed a verdict. Id.

27. In suit in rem for forfeiture of merchandise for violation of Act of June 22, 1874, § 12, a finding of the jury "that the goods were brought in with intent to defraud" the government is sufficient. Origet v. United States, 743

28. Under that section the goods are forfeited irrespective of any criminal prosecution. Id.

EJECTMENT. See also COURTS, 4, 6.

1. Certificates of register of land office, of location of military land warrant, or of receiver, acknowledging payment for purchase of land, are incompetent to show legal title in holder. Langdon v. Sherwood, 344

2. Until patent for land is issued under such certificates, legal title is in United States. Id.

3. In Federal courts recovery can only be had upon strict legal title. Id.

EMINENT DOMAIN. See also REMOVAL OF CAUSE, 1.

1. Under Act of July 15, 1882, the United States must give compensation for land taken for dam across Potomac River, although some part thereof is not within survey and map directed to be made by said Act. Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Garland, 527

2. Such Act opens court of claims to every person injured by construction of dam, provided that within given time he files his petition in that court setting forth his title and amount claimed as damages. Id.

3. Objections to map and survey are waived by suit in court of claims by owner for compensation for lands under this Act. Id.

4. Paintiff, by suing in court of claims, waives right that compensation be paid in advance of taking of land, and right to demand that amount of compensation be determined by jury. Id.

5. Under Illinois Constitution recovery of damages may be had where private property sustains substantial damage by the making of an improvement public in its character. Chicago v. Taylor, 638

6. If construction of a railroad is cause of damage, although consequential, party may recover. Id.

7. Introduction of word "damaged" into above Constitution shows purpose to abolish old test of direct physical injury to property. Id.

8. Impairment of value to improvements on property is element of damage. Id.

9. A prohibition simply upon the use of property for purposes that are declared by valid legislation to be injurious to the health, morals, or safety of the community cannot, in any just sense, be deemed a taking or an appropriation of property for the public benefit, so as to require any compensation to the owners of the property in question. Mugler v Kansas, 205

EQUITY. See also INTOXICATING LIQUORS, 4; LACHES; PLEDGE, 2; PUBLIC LANDS, 23, 25, 28–30.

1. Equity cannot restrain criminal proceedings unless instituted by party to suit pending before it to try same right in issue there; nor has it any jurisdiction over appointment or removal of public officers. Ex Parte Sawyer, 402

2. Receiver of bank may in equity sue attaching creditors and sureties on bonds, to dissolve attachment, to reduce to his possession securities held by sureties, and to restrain enforcement of bonds, although bonds are invalid. Pacific Nat. Bank v. Mixter, 567

3. Decree in such action, holding that sureties are not liable, concludes creditors from further proceedings against them on bonds. Id.

4. Suit in equity is not maintainable for damages from inferior quality of coke sold, where it was received without objection, and there was no warranty as to quality. Dewey v. West Fairmont Gas Coal Co. 179

5. In suit for relief from fraud, it is enough if the facts found are not substantially different from those alleged in the bill. Tufts v. Tufts, 91

6. Multifariousness as to subjects or parties, within jurisdiction of equity, must be taken advantage of by demurrer, plea, or answer; it does not render decree void so as to be collaterally impeached. Hefner v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 309

7. Direct and positive denials in answer under oath must be disproved by more than one witness, or by one witness and corroborating circumstances, in order that complainant may have decree. Southern Development Co. v. Silva, 678

8. On trial of equity case, jury may be called into court and issues submitted to it by court. Wilson v. Riddle, 280

9. What issues should be submitted to jury is in discretion of court. Id.

10. Where chancellor adopts finding of jury, appellate court will not consider formal exceptions to rulings in trial of issues before jury. Wilson v. Riddle, 280

ERROR. See APPEAL AND ERROR.

ESTOPPEL. See also JUDGMENT, 8–11; LACHES, 2; TAXES, 21.

1. Recitals in deed bind parties and claimants under them, but not strangers claiming adverse title. Sabariego v. Maverick, 430

2. Estoppels must be mutual. Litchfield v. Crane, 199

3. Brief filed at hearing in Federal supreme court by one interested in question to be decided does not make him party to suit, or estop him by decree. Stryker v. Crane, 194

EVIDENCE.

I. PRESUMPTIONS.

II. DOCUMENTARY; SECONDARY; PAROL.

III. HANDWRITING.

IV. DECLARATIONS.

V. EXPERTS; OPINIONS.

See also LIEN, 2; BONDS, 3; CORPORATIONS, 2; DUTIES, 22, 23; EJECTMENT, 1; HUSBAND AND WIFE, 2, 5; INSURANCE, 8; NEGLIGENCE; PATENTS, 58; PUBLIC LANDS, 22, 29, 30, 33; RECEIPT; WITNESS.

I. PRESUMPTIONS.

1. After twenty-one years from the return of a survey to the land office, the presumption is that the warrant was located as returned by the surveyor; but this is rebutted by proof of the existence of facts tending to show that the actual location was different from the official courses and distances. Clement v. Packer, 721

2. Presumption of performance of duty by public officers does not supply proof of substantive and independent facts. Sabariego v. Maverick, 430

II. DOCUMENTARY; SECONDARY; PAROL.

3. In action to try title to land granted by Government of Coahuila and Texas in 1828 to one Rabago, the protocol of his application for grant, produced from archives in office of secretary of state of Coahuila, is admissible as link in chain of title. Williams v. Conger, 778

4. Alleged power of attorney from Rabago, found in an old trunk, is admissible as an ancient writing. Id.

5. Recitals in ancient instrument that maker was citizen of Mexico, with evidence that he was merchant in City of Mexico, held sufficient evidence that he was such citizen. Id.

6. Instrument not duly authenticated must be proved to have been executed by the party to be charged by it. Id.

7. Copy of instrument is admissible to show that original was in existence when it was made, and that the latter was an ancient instrument. Id.

8. Documents showing sale and conveyance of premises upon confiscation of property by Spanish Government, but not showing any decree of confiscation sufficient to warrant sale, or that person whose property is thus sold was within jurisdiction of tribunal which could pronounce such decree, are not sufficient to show legal confiscation, or to pass title to purchaser at sale. Sabariego v. Maverick, 430

9. Confiscation must be proved by official record of transaction, or duly certified copy thereof, and, in case of its loss, by proof of its previous existence and contents. Id.

10. Certificates of other officers, referring to record collaterally, although as basis of their own official action, are not legal proof of fact itself. Id.

11. Copies of official letters by general land office commissioner, sworn to by clerk in office acquainted with facts, are evidence of his decisions, when written by him to parties interested. Coan v. Flagg, 107

12. Secondary evidence of proof of loss is admissible, upon a failure to produce original in evidence on notice. Union Ins. Co. v. Smith, 497

13. Where the original landmarks of the survey have disappeared, the original and well-established marks, found upon a later survey, made by the same surveyor, about the same time, and adjoining the one in dispute, are admissible to aid the jury in ascertaining the exact location of the older survey. Clement v. Packer, 721

14. Note sued on, varying from description in special count in declaration, is admissible under common counts as evidence of money had and received. Hopkins v. Orr, 528

15. Written evidence of the grant by the Mexican government, of its confirmation by the land commissioners, of the affirmance of the award of that commission by the courts, and of the record of two surveys showing the location and the confirmation of the Mexican grant, and their dates, is admissible in ejectment, to show title under grant. Doolan v. Carr, 844

16. In an action at law extrinsic evidence is admissible to prove that a patent from the United States is void for want of power in the officers to issue it, and the facts which show that want of power. Id.

17. Oral evidence is admissible to identify land as coming within the Mexican grant and the surveys of the land office. Id.

III. HANDWRITING.

18. Handwriting of instruments, proved to be genuine, in evidence for other purposes, may be compared by jury with that of signature in question, and its genuineness inferred from comparison; but other signatures cannot be introduced for purpose of comparison. Williams v. Conger, 778

IV. DECLARATIONS.

19. Declarations of captain of tug after she had become disabled, in regard to occurrence, where not shown to be part of res gestæ, are inadmissible. Union Ins. Co. v. Smith, 497

20. Declarations by a person having goods in possession and offering them for sale, made to a special agent of the treasury department, making an official investigation as to whether goods should be seized for forfeiture under the Revenue Laws, are part of res gestæ, and admissible against persons claiming to be their owner. Friedenstein v. United States, 736

21. In Pennsylvania the declarations of deceased surveyors, in cases of boundaries between private estates, are admissible, where they spoke from personal knowledge. Clement v. Packer, 721

V. EXPERTS; OPINIONS.

22. Master, mate, and fireman of tug, on board of her at time lost, who have been engaged in navigation for many years, are competent as expert witnesses as to loss and as to prudence of management of tug. Union Ins. Co. v. Smith, 497

23. Prudence and good seamanship in management of tug are proper subjects of expert testimony. Id.

24. Where, owing to scarcity of ready money after the war, lands were sold for low prices at forced sale, opinions of witnesses, as to intrinsic value of land to hold in reference to future use, and not of actual cash market value at time of sale, are not sufficient to establish that lands were sold at grossly inadequate prices, so that sale could be set aside. Boyd v. Wyly, 369

EXECUTION.

1. Nebraska Act of February 23, 1875, did not, on December 2, 1875, govern proceedings for stay of judgment in Federal courts, or determine surety's liability on bonds given for such stay; and act of clerk extending judgment against sureties was void. Lamaster v. Keeler, 238

2. Sale of property under invalid execution confers no title. Id.

3. Confirmation of sale did not cure invalidity of execution upon which it was made. Id.

4. In action by assignee of bankrupt, his allegations that judgment against a bankrupt execution and sale thereunder were fraudulent as to bankrupt's creditors, were not sustained by proof. Norton v. Hood, 364

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

1. In proceeding to remove testamentary executor, where it appeared he had abandoned his duties and had no domicile in State, and that certain attorneys had appeared for him to oppose application for removal, he was actual party to proceeding, and appointment of his successor was valid. Boyd v. Wyly, 369

2. Although by Indiana statute personalty vests in executor from testator's death, he cannot interfere with estate further than to preserve it until issuance of letters testamentary. Wall v. Bissell, 772

3. In absence of State decision, United States Supreme Court declines to hold that release of mortgage by executor who has never qualified and to whom no letters have been issued is valid. Id.

4. Such release executed as trustee by executor, but to whom letters have not been issued, is not valid. Id.

5. Where legal title to mortgage is in one as executor, but title to debt for which it is security is in him as surviving creditor, he may in latter capacity release it without taking out letters. Id.

6. Such release, although executed by him as executor, is binding upon the interests of the representatives of testator, as well as upon his own. Id.

EXPERTS. See EVIDENCE, V.

FEDERAL COURTS. See COURTS, 2–10.

FLORIDA. See BOUNDARIES.

FOREIGN CORPORATIONS. See COMMERCE, 1–4.

FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

I. FRAUD IN GENERAL.

II. FRAUD UPON CREDITORS.

See also EQUITY, 7; TRIAL, 6.

I. FRAUD IN GENERAL

1. Vendee must have relied and acted upon false representations, in order to avoid the sale therefor. Southern Development Co. v. Silva, 678

2. Expressions of opinion which are not statements of fact do not constitute fraud. Id.

3. Such expressions in respect to value of property sold are not fraudulent in law, to the extent that the sale will be set aside if they are untrue. Id.

4. The law raises no presumption of knowledge of falsity from the single fact per se that the representation was false. Id.

5. Purchaser making his own investigations, which the vendor does not prevent from being as full as he chooses to make, cannot afterwards allege that the vendor made misrepresentations. Id.

6. Mere acceptance of part of profits of contractor of portion of railroad by its assistant engineer, who had no interest in and did not represent company when contract was made, or have anything to do therewith, is not ground for setting aside award of sum due on contract. Union R. R. Co. v. Dull, 417

7. To cancel an executed contract, fraud must be made clearly to appear. Id.

8. Bill to cancel deed is dismissed, where the issue is entirely one of fact and the integrity of the transaction is not satisfactorily impeached. Cissel v. Dutch, 642

II. FRAUD UPON CREDITORS.

9. Sale and delivery of goods in satisfaction of honest debt cannot be avoided by other creditors unless made and received with intent in fact to defraud them. Jewell v. Knight, 190

10 That one of creditors preferred was debtor's wife does not affect question. Id.

11. Whether agreement, that if bank would lend borrower money from time to time, he would secure it, should anything occur by which he would not be able to pay his debts, is fraudulent,—is question of fact. Smith v. Craft, 267

12 Where borrower sold his stock in trade to bank, to pay indebtedness, stipulation in bill of sale that bank should employ him in business so long as it should continue business is valid, if its sole purpose was to obtain services necessary to wind up business and turn goods into money for benefit of other party; whether it was fraudulent in fact was question to be decided by trial court. Id.

13. Execution sale of father's realty to his son on judgment by confession upon note, given to son, consideration of which was fictitious, is fraudulent against father's creditors. Woodfolk v. Seddon, 598

14. Subsequent purchase of same property by son at delinquent tax sale is also void against such creditors. Id.

15. In Georgia husband may make voluntary settlement for wife and children provided it is recorded with clerk of superior court of county of his residence within three months after its execution; and it is valid against subsequent mortgagee with notice. Wilson v. Riddle, 280

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

1. Receipt and acceptance under verbal contract of sale are questions for jury. Hinchman v. Lincoln, 337

2. But where facts in relation to such contract are undisputed, their legal effect is for court. Id.

3. To satisfy statute, delivery must be made with intent to vest right of possession in vendee; and there must be actual acceptance by him as vendee. Id.

GAMING. See CONTRACT, 1, 2.

GARNISHMENT. See ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS, 1; ATTACHMENT, 8.

HABEAS CORPUS.

1. Habeas corpus will issue where Chinaman is held in custody on vessel in Port of San Francisco and not permitted to enter United States. United States v. Jung Ah Lung, 591

2. Act of May 6, 1882, relating to Chinese Treaty, as amended by Act of July 5, 1884, does not affect jurisdiction of Federal courts to issue such writ. Id.

3. Action of collector of port upon question of allowing Chinese to land in United States may be reviewed. Id.

4. Fourth article of Chinese Treaty does not exclude judicial cognizance, or confine remedy of Chinese to diplomatic action. Id.

HANDWRITING. See EVIDENCE, III.

HOMESTEAD.

1. Under Illinois Act of 1871, in enforcing lien upon premises including homestead, if value of premises exceeds homestead exemption, and they cannot be divided, sale of the whole and payment of amount of exemption to party entitled will be ordered. Knight v. Paxton, 518

2. Holder of lien paying amount of homestead exemption into court for benefit of person entitled to it is entitled to a decree for possession of entire property. Id.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. See also BANKRUPTCY, 4, 5; EVIDENCE, 22, 23; FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE, 10, 15.

1. Title of husband and wife to land in District of Columbia may be conveyed to secure his debts, by deed voluntarily executed by both, notwithstanding Federal Act of 1869, exempting her property from liability for his debts. Hite v. Jenks, 156

2. Wife's acknowledgment cannot be avoided by extrinsic evidence of manner examination was conducted by magistrate, except for fraud or duress. Id.

3. Under Illinois Act of 1869, execution of deed by married woman joining with her husband is sufficiently authenticated by her signature; her acknowledgment is only necessary to render it admissible as evidence without further proof or to release her homestead right in property. Knight v. Paxton, 518

4. Deed by married woman, made by her upon a fair settlement with the grantee, and under advice of competent counsel, will not be set aside. De Wolf v. Hays, 818

5. State Legislature may grant a divorce when either party is resident of the State; and the facts that there was no cause of divorce, and that it was obtained without the knowledge of the party, does not affect the validity of the Act. Maynard v. Hill, 654

6. Marriage is not a contract within Federal constitutional provision as to impairment of contracts. Id.

7. Wife divorced from husband before he had acquired vested right in donation lands has no interest in the donation claim. Id.

INDICTMENT. See also POSTOFFICE, 5.

1. In an indictment all material facts embraced in the definition of the offense must be stated. United States v. Hess, 516

2. Indictment for devising scheme to defraud must state scheme, with all such particulars as are essential to constitute it. Id.

3. Language of statute used in indictment must be accompanied with such statement of facts as informs accused of specific offense with which he is charged. Id.

4. Omission of matters of substance in indictment is not aided or cured by verdict. Id.

INFANTS. See PARTITION.

INFORMATION. See DUTIES, III.

INJUNCTION. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 36, 37; BANKRUPTCY, 5; COURTS, 6–8; EQUITY, 3; STATE AND STATE OFFICERS, 1.

Injunction restraining operation of telegraph lines, the greater part of which are over post roads of United States, until payment or State tax, cannot be sustained; and State statute authorizing such injunction as a remedy is void. Western U. Tel. Co. v. Massachusetts, 790

INSOLVENCY.

One unable to pay his debts is insolvent. Cunningham v. Norton, 624

INSURANCE.

I. LIFE.

II. MARINE.

See also BANKRUPTCY, 4, 5.

I. LIFE.

1. Where assured answered question as to whether he had ever been addicted to intemperate use of liquors in the negative, his answer cannot be found to be untrue by jury unless he had, prior to issue of policy, been addicted to such intemperate use. Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Davey, 315

2. Condition to policy that it shall be void if insured become so far intemperate as to impair his health, is broken by excessive use of liquor, although insured may not have had delerium tremens, and although previous to his last illness he had not indulged in strong drink for such period of time or so frequently as to become intemperate. Id.

3. Whether death was caused by such intemperate use is a question of fact. Id.

II. MARINE.

4. Where vessel is insured against perils of lake excepting certain excluded causes, if vessel is lost from perils not arising from one of excluded causes, company is liable. Union Ins. Co. v. Smith, 497

5. Warranty of seaworthiness in time policy is complied with if vessel be seaworthy at commencement of risk. Id.

6. Defect of seaworthiness, arising after commencement of risk and permitted to continue from bad faith of insured, discharges insurer from liability for loss occasioned thereby. Id.

7. But this does not affect insurance as to any other risk covered by policy, not caused by such particular defects. Id.

8. Defendant setting up want of ordinary care at time of loss has burden of proof. Id.

9. A loss whose proximate cause was a peril insured against is within the protection of a marine policy, notwithstanding it may have been occasioned remotely by the negligence of the master and mariners. Orient Mut. Ins. Co. v. Adams, 63

10. Master's misconduct, unless affected by fraud or design, will not defeat recovery on marine policy. Id.

11. A loss by derangement of mud valves of vessels, the derangement not being the proximate cause, is not within exception of policy freeing company from claim for loss by derangement of machinery. Id.

12. The right of abandonment of vessel, under the contract, is to be determined from the facts as they existed on the day of abandonment. Id.

13. If the facts present a case of extreme hazard, and of probable expense exceeding half the value of the ship, the insured may abandon, although it should happen that she might be recovered afterwards at a less expense. Id.

INTEREST. See BONDS, 7–9; COLLISION, 2; PATENTS, 60.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

1. Under Federal Act of July 14, 1870, railroad company is not liable for tax of 2½ per centum on its profits for 1871 used for construction during that year. Marquette H. & O. R. Co. v. United States, 802

2. Under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3220, internal revenue commissioner is authorized, on appeal to him, to repay judgment against collector for act in performance of duty. United States v. Frerichs, 471

3. Allowance of such judgment by commissioner and secretary of treasury makes it claim against United States; and judgment creditor may recover thereon in court of claims. Id.

4. Payment of judgment satisfies demand of judgment creditor against United States, and he is only required to enter satisfaction on receipt of money. Id.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS. See also COMMERCE, 5–7; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 5–7.

1. State law prohibiting manufacture of liquor within its limits, to be there sold as beverage, does not necessarily infringe any right, privilege, or immunity secured by Federal Constitution. Mugler v. Kansas, 205

2. Kansas Prohibition Law is valid. Id.

3. State may declare that any place maintained for illegal manufacture and sale of liquors shall be deemed common nuisance, and abated; and at same time provide for indictment and trial of offender. Id.

4. Proceedings in equity for purposes indicated in Kansas Act of 1885, § 18, as to abatement of such nuisances, are not inconsistent with due process of law. Id.

5. Provision that in prosecution by indictment, or otherwise, State need not, in first instance, prove that defendant has not permit required by State, does not deprive him of presumption of innocence. Id.

JUDGMENT. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, VI.; COURTS, 10; EQUITY, 5, 8; ESTOPPEL, 3.

1. Judgment by court without jurisdiction is void. Ex parte Sawyer, 402

2. Under Nebraska Code, § 429, a judgment rendered for a conveyance, in a State court, not complied with by the parties within the time limited, has the same operation and effect as if the conveyance had been executed pursuant thereto. Langdon v. Sherwood, 844

3. Where subject-matter, cause of action, and parties are the same as in a former suit, the judgment therein constitutes a bar to the suit. Lyon v. Perin & Gaff Mfg. Co. 889

4. Where words of qualification, such as

"without prejudice," did not accompany decree, it is presumed to be rendered on the merits. Lyon v. Perin & Gaff Mfg. Co. 839

5. Decree dismissing the complaint and entitling defendant to recover costs, if set up as a plea in bar to new bill for same cause, is conclusive, if dismissal was upon hearing and is not in direct terms "without prejudice." Id.

6. Decree does not bar suit for different cause of action arising afterward. Chapman v. Crane, 285

7. Where suit was removed to Federal court and all parties appeared without objection, decree of supreme court on appeal is not void, for want of jurisdiction, because it appears on face of record that some of defendants, not joining in petition for removal, were citizens of same State with plaintiff; but, until judicially annulled, vacated, or set aside, is binding on parties, and bars subsequent action for same cause. Des Moines Navigation & R. R. Co. v. Iowa Homestead Co. 202

8. Judgment on demurrer is no less conclusive of facts confessed by it than judgment on verdict. Bissell v. Spring Valley Township, 411

9. Where, by such judgment, coupons of municipal bonds were adjudged invalid, plaintiff cannot bring action upon different coupons afterwards becoming due, attached to same bond. Id.

10. Where one not named as party is represented by one who is party and under whom he claims, and puts in answer in name of such party, and pays part of expenses of litigation, he is bound by decree therein. Plumb v. Crane, 268

11. Prior adjudication is not binding on one not a party to suit in which it was had, although he had paid part of expenses of suit. Litchfield v. Crane, 199

JUDICIAL SALES. See also EXECUTION; TRUSTS, 2.

1. Under Act of Congress of August 18, 1856, where purchaser at sale of real estate limited by will to certain lives, with contingent limitation over, makes default in payment of consideration, resale should be made only on failure to pay unpaid portion of consideration within some reasonable time fixed by court. District of Columbia v. McBlair, 449

2. Decree ordering resale, without regard to previous payments and right to make additional payments, is erroneous. Id.

3. On payment of amount due by purchaser, he is entitled to decree of court for conveyance to him of title. Id.

JURISDICTION. See APPEAL AND ERROR, I., II.; COURT OF CLAIMS, 1, 3.

JURY. See also EQUITY, 10–12.

1. When a challenge to a juror for bias is disallowed, and the juror is peremptorily challenged and excused, and an impartial juror is obtained in his place, accused's constitutional right is maintained. Ex parte Spies, 80

2. The finding of the trial court upon the issue of whether jury is impartial should not be set aside by reviewing court unless error is manifest. Id.

3. Jurors who had formed an opinion based upon newspaper statements, about the truth of which they had expressed no opinion, and stating they could determine the case upon the proof presented, regardless of such opinion, are competent. Id.

LACHES. See also SALE, 2, 3.

1. If, at hearing in equity, case appears liable to objection of laches, relief will be refused. Richards v. Mackall, 396

2. Acquiesence by plaintiff for twelve years, in execution sale of his property, estops him from asking to have it set aside because of improper description of premises in advertisement of sale. Id.

LANDS. See PUBLIC LANDS.

LICENSE. See COMMERCE, 1.

LIEN. See BONDS, 1; CHECKS, 7; HOMESTEAD.

LIFE INSURANCE. See INSURANCE, I.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS. See also COURT OF CLAIMS, 2; MORTGAGE, 1.

1. Claim against United States is barred within six years after suit could be commenced thereon against Government. Finn v. United States, 128

2. Rule that statute must be pleaded does not apply to suits in court of claims against United States. Id.

3. Judgment in court of claims for claim which record shows to be barred by statute is erroneous. Id.

4. Nebraska Statute of Limitations of five years does not run against county warrant. King Iron Bridge & Mfg. Co. v. Otoe County, 514

5. Cause of action upon such warrant did not accrue when payment was refused. Id.

6. Answer that such cause of action did not accrue within five years next before commencement of suit is insufficient. Id.

LIQUORS. See INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

LOST INSTRUMENTS. See EVIDENCE, 12.

MANDAMUS. See REMOVAL OF CAUSE, 4.

MARINE INSURANCE. See INSURANCE, II.

MASTER AND SERVANT.

1. Where employee was injured through negligence of engineer, evidence that latter had frequently shown his recklessness and unfitness, and, notwithstanding complaints against him, was retained by master, makes case for plaintiff. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Mares, 296

2. Servant could assume that master used proper care and diligence in the employment and retention of engineer. Id.

MINES AND MINING. See PUBLIC LANDS, 26, 27.

MORTGAGE. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 2, 28; CONFISCATION, 2, 3; EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS, 3–6; PRINCIPAL AND SURETY; RAILROAD COMPANIES, 3–7.

1. Prescription is lost to mortgagor by his failure to plead it in foreclosure. Shields v. Shiff, 445

2. Neither inscription nor reinscription is necessary to preserve mortgage against mortgagor. Id.

3. Railroad mortgagor need not account for earnings while the property is in his possession until a demand therefor or for the surrender of the possession under the mortgage. Sage v. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. 694

4. Trustees in a railroad mortgage, who have not asked possession or intervened in the suit, are not entitled to have the net earnings of the property, while it was in the hands of a receiver appointed in suit instituted by judgment creditor, applied in discharge of mortgage bonds. Id.

5. Until demand, railroad mortgagor having possession of property need not account for earnings. Dow v. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. 565

6. Demand for possession may be made by bringing suit for that purpose, and thereafter mortgagor must account for earnings; and it is of no consequence that receiver was not appointed until subsequently. Id.

7. Upon foreclosure of mortgage by trust company, all its interests in land as trustee for bondholders passes to purchaser at sale, which binds bondholders receiving share of proceeds without objection. Richter v. Jerome, 132

8. If sale was in fraud of bondholders' rights, their remedy is to set it aside and to proceed anew with another foreclosure. Id.

9. In such foreclosure bondholders are not necessary parties; they are represented by their trustee. Id.

10. Equities which form part of the security which was enforced in a foreclosure suit, if not excepted from the sale, pass by it. Id.

MOTIONS. See APPEAL AND ERROR, VI.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS. See BONDS, 5, 6; COURTS, 7; PUBLIC LANDS, 44–47.

NAVIGABLE WATERS. See WATERS AND WATERCOURSES, 5–7.

NAVY. See also ARMY.

1. One who, at passage of Federal Acts of March 3, 1883, and July 15, 1870, was lieutenant-commander, and who had served as officer in regular navy from September 21, 1860, by continuous service in various positions, is entitled to graduated pay given by latter Act. United States v. Mullan, 140

2. Where officer has entered service but once, that is taken as last entry, within statute. Id.

3. Lieutenant-commander in navy, performing duty as executive officer on board a receiving ship, under an order designating his employment as "shore duty," is entitled to pay for sea services. United States v. Strong, 828

4. Student at Naval Academy appointed a midshipman was, while a midshipman, serving as officer, within Act of 1883, chap. 97. United States v. Baker, 824

5. One who was in 1867 appointed a midshipman, continued, after Act of 1870, chap. 295, an officer on the active list, although he might be properly styled, after the Act of 1870, a cadet midshipman. Id.

6. No legislation after July 14, 1872, when he was promoted to the grade of ensign, can affect the question, arising under Act of 1883, as to service of such officer prior to July 14, 1872. Id.

7. Paymaster in navy is not entitled in settlement of accounts, under Federal Act of March 3, 1883, to longevity increment on his 33½ per cent of salary allowed in lieu of fuel, etc., under Navy General Order No. 75, of 1886. United States v. Allen, 147

8. The allowances provided for in said order are ascertained by reference to amount statedly received by the officer as statutory pay at the time the order was in force. Id.

9. Act of Congress of March 3, 1883, providing for increase of pay to officers of navy, according to length of service, includes paymaster's clerk; and he is to be credited with actual time he served as officer or enlisted man in regular or volunteer army or navy, or both. United States v. Hendee, 465

10. Paymaster's clerk is not officer of navy within Act of Congress of June 30, 1876, and is not entitled to compensation for traveling expenses. United States v. Mouat, 468

11. Private of Marine Band, who performed on the capitol and president's grounds under proper orders, is entitled to additional pay provided by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1613. United States v. Bond, 478

12. Assistant engineer, retired on furlough pay, is entitled to one half the leave-of-absence pay of officer on active list. Potts v. United States, 661

13. Upon being transferred to retired pay list, his pay is raised to that of officer on half sea pay. Id.; United States v. Burchard, 662

14. He cannot recover difference between one half and three quarters of sea pay from date of his transfer. Potts v. United States, 661

15. In suit by him to recover balance claimed to be due, United States may set up as counterclaim amount paid him over what he was entitled to by law. United States v. Burchard, 662

NEGLIGENCE. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 12; MASTER AND SERVANT; TRIAL, 7.

Defendant charging contributory negligence must establish it by a preponderance of evidence. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Mares, 296.

NONSUIT.

Motion for nonsuit at close of plaintiff's testimony is waived by introduction of testimony by defendant. Union Ins. Co. v. Smith, 497

OFFICE AND OFFICER. See also ARMY; CONSULS; COURTS, 7; DUTIES, I.; EVIDENCE, 1, 2; NAVY; POSTOFFICE, 1–8.

1. Unless one in service of government holds his place under appointment by president or heads of departments authorized to make appointments, he is not, under Constitution, officer of United States. United States v. Mouat, 468

2. Settlement of account by Federal accounting officer should not be opened because of technical irregularities in allowance of expenses, years afterwards, when remedy of party against United States is barred by Statute of Limitations. United States v. Johnston, 389

PARENT AND CHILD. See FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE, 13, 14.

PARTIES. See BANKRUPTCY, 2, 5; MORTGAGE, 9; TAXES, 20; TRUSTS, 1.

PARTITION.

Long acquiescence of minor, after maturity, to proceedings for partition of his property is equivalent to express affirmance of them, even if they are affected by such irregularities as would have justified court in setting them aside. Brasee v. Schofield, 484

PARTNERSHIP. See also BANKRUPTCY, 1.

1. Partner in possession of firm property must pay taxes thereon, which are a joint liability on the property; and he is not discharged from so doing by copartner's statement that he would not repay him. Chapin v. Streeter, 475

2. Partner renting copartner's share of firm property and permitting it to be sold for taxes of latter, and afterwards renting it from tax purchaser, cannot be allowed rent paid latter in action by copartner to recover rent due him. Id.

3. Partner cannot sue for accounting under agreement of partnership which has never gone into effect. Davis v. Key, 112

PATENTS.

I. PATENTABILITY OF INVENTION; ANTICIPATION; PRIOR USE; APPLICATION.

II. REISSUE.

III. DISCLAIMER.

IV. SALE.

V. INFRINGEMENT.

VI. TERM.

See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 38–41; PUBLIC LANDS, passim; STATUTES, 1.

I. PATENTABILITY OF INVENTION; ANTICIPATION; PRIOR USE; APPLICATION.

1. There is no patentable invention in applying to heating of wine from inside of cask, apparatus previously used to heat another liquid in same manner. Dreyfus v. Searle, 852

2. Patent granted to Munson on April 2, 1867, for improvements in preserving, filing, and canceling bonds, etc., is void because containing no patentable novelty, as the only change from former blank books for the purpose consists in providing spaces for the bonds and changing the order of arrangement of the coupons. Munson v. Mayor, etc. New York, 586

3. The fifth claim of the Bell patent of March 7, 1876, for improvement in telegraphy, as follows: "The method of, and apparatus for, transmitting vocal or other sounds telegraphically, by causing electrical undulations, similar in form to the vibrations of the air accompanying the said sounds," embraces the art of transferring to or impressing upon an undulatory current of electricity the vibrations of air produced by the human voice in articulate speech, so that the speech will be carried to and received by the listener at a distance on the line of the current. The Telephone Cases, 863

4. Articulate speech is included in the description of the patent, the sound thereof being one of the "vocal or other sounds" referred to in the claim. Id.

5. Bell had the right to a patent for the discovery that this process of transmitting speech could be accomplished by gradually changing the intensity of a continuous electric current, so as to make it correspond exactly to the changes in the density of the air caused by the sound of the voice, and in devising a way in which those changes of intensity could be made and speech actually transmitted. Id.

6. O'Reilly v. Morse, 15 How. 62, holding that the use of magnetism as a motive power, without regard to the particular process with which it was connected in a patent, could not be claimed, but that its use in that connection could, sustains Bell's claim, which is not one for the use of electricity distinct from the particular process with which it is connected in his patent. Id.

7. The patent for an art does not necessarily involve a patent for the particular means employed for using it; a useful art or process is the subject of a patent. Id.

8. A discoverer or inventor need not have brought his art to the highest degree of perfection in order to obtain a patent; it is sufficient if he describes his method with sufficient precision to enable those skilled in the matter to understand what the process is, and points out some practicable way of putting it in operation. Id.

9. Bell's patent is for the process that the apparatus was designed to bring into use; and the process can be operated by the vibration or motion of bodies capable of inductive action, or by the vibration of the conducting wire itself in the neighborhood of such bodies, which is the magnetic method; or by alternately increasing and diminishing the resistance of the circuit or the power of the battery, which is the variable resistance method; and the patent is for both these methods, and for the particular magneto apparatus described, or its equivalent. Id.

10. A patent for such discovery is not confined to the mere means improvised to prove the reality of the conception. Id.

11. The discovery of Bell, that the true way to produce the delicate forms of the air vibrations caused by the human voice in articulate speech, was to operate on an unbroken current by diminishing and increasing its intensity, was new. Id.

12. Bell's discovery was not anticipated by the discovery of Reis as to how to produce musical tones, since the latter never succeeded in transmitting speech. Id.

13. McDonough was anticipated by Reis in what he asked for in his application for a patent filed in 1876. Id.

14. Varley's English patents of 1868 and 1870 did not include Bell's discovery. Id.

15. Drawbaugh may have conceived the idea that speech could be transmitted by electricity, and was experimenting on the subject, but he did not discover the art of doing it before Bell. Id.

16. The evidence does not prove that the fourth claim of Bell's patent was surreptitiously interpolated afterwards. Id.

17. The fifth claim of Bell's patent of January 30, 1887, is not anticipated by the Schellen magnet, since the patent is not for a magnet, but for a telephone, of which it forms a part. Id.

18. Patent granted to Rathbone and Hailes, November 21, 1865, for improvement in coal stoves, was anticipated by prior patents. Hailes v. Albany Stove Co. 284

19. Under Act of 1839, as well as under Rev. Stat. § 4886, public use for more than two years prior to application renders patent void, whether such use was or was not with knowledge or consent of applicant. Andrews v. Hovey, 160

20. Such use for purposes of trade and profit, experiment being merely incidental, defeats right to patent. Id.; Smith & Griggs Mfg. Co. v. Sprague, 141

21. Where defense of prior public use to action for infringement is met only by allegation that use was by way of experiment, patentee's proof should be full and convincing. Id.

22. Patents to L. A. Sprague, for making buckle levers, are void by reason of prior public use for more than two years before application. Id.

23. Driven-well patent, No. 4872, is invalid for same reason. Andrews v. Hovey, 160

24. Patents are often granted with view to leaving open for decision of courts questions which patent office does not deem it proper to adjudicate against applicant by withholding patent. Andrews v. Hovey, 557

25. Rule of patent office, that prior use of patent for more than two years with consent of patentee invalidates it, is not judicial adjudication of question whether patent granted had been in use for such time with such consent. Id.

26. Two years' prior use renders patent invalid, whether with consent of inventor or not, by Act of 1839, § 7, clause 2. Id.

27. Determination of commissioner of patents in granting patent does not conclude determination of courts in regard thereto. Id.

28. Specification is construed in light of that knowledge which existed in art at time of its date. Lawther v. Hamilton, 325

29. Patent granted Lawther, September 28, 1875, for improvements in processes in treating oleaginous seeds, is valid as patent for a process; the process is to be limited by specification to use of powerful revolving rollers for crushing seeds between them under pressure. Id.

30. Patent granted Dryfoos in 1880, for improvement in quilting machines, cannot be extended so as to cover all mechanisms for giving circular direction to feed motion, nor to process of operation of mechanism described therein. Dryfoos v. Wiese, 362

II. REISSUE.

31. Whether delay in applying for reissue of patent has been reasonable is question of law, and the action of the patent office in granting a reissue is not sufficient to explain delay in the application which otherwise constitutes laches. Hoskin v. Fisher, 759

32. Delay, unless shown to be reasonable, in application for reissue expanding claims of original patent, invalidates it. Id.

33. Where it does not appear that any attempt has been made to secure by original patent enlarged claims in reissue, those claims are regarded waived, so far as reissue is concerned. Id.

34. Reissued letters patent must be for the same invention, and are invalid where they are not. Parker & Whipple Co. v. Yale Clock Co. 100

35. Patent cannot be reissued to enlarge claim unless there has been clear mistake in wording of claim, and application is made within reasonably short period after original patent was granted. Id.

36. Validity of reissued patent is question of law for the court. Id.

37. Patent cannot be amended so as to cover improvement invented by others after its issue. Id.

38. It is good defense in suit on reissued patent to show that commissioner exceeded authority in granting it. Id.

39. The statement in the original specification of the object of an invention, in general terms, does not make the reissue one for the same invention as that of the original, when it otherwise would not be. Id.

40. The invention described in the first eight claims of reissued letters patent 10,062, for improvements in clocks, differs from the original. Id.

41. The last clause of the Act of 1870, § 53, relates to the matter of evidence alone, and cannot enlarge the power of the commissioner as to the invention for which a reissue may be granted. Id.

42. Reissue, in which claim is enlarged by omitting essential element of patentee's invention, is invalid. Matthews v. Iron Clad Mfg. Co. 477

43. Action for infringement will not be sustained on reissued patent, where original patent, if unaltered, would not sustain it, and where reissue was taken out a year or two after patentee knew defendant was making article alleged to infringe, and specification in reissue is substantially same as original, showing that it was not defective by mistake in framing it. Id.

44. Patentee, imposing words of limitation upon himself in his claim in taking out reissue is bound thereby in subsequent suits on reissued patent. Crawford v. Heysinger, 269

45. Claims of a patent for a combination of parts found in reversed position in a former device are construed as covering only precise combinations described. Id.

46. Patentee, abandoning under pressure from patent office clauses in his application and claim for a reissue, cannot insist that it was the intent of the office to include in the patent the abandoned clauses and parts. Yale Lock Mfg. Co. v. James, 807

III. DISCLAIMER.

47. Disclaimer cannot be used to change character of invention. Hailes v. Albany Stove Co. 284

48. Rev. Stat. § 4917, authorizing disclaimer to be filed in certain cases, and § 4922, enabling patentee to sue in these cases provided disclaimer is filed without unreasonable delay, apply to the same class of cases and have one purpose. Id.

IV. SALE.

49. Purchase of set of rollers, used for crushing seeds between them under pressure, with consent of patentee, does not confer consent upon purchaser to use patented process for treating oleaginous seeds. Lawther v. Hamilton, 325

V. INFRINGEMENT.

50. Claims 1 and 2 of reissued letters patent No. 9803, for improvement in device for inserting metallic staples, are not infringed by defendant's device called "Victor Tool." Crawford v. Heysinger, 269

51. A patent for a device for inserting metallic staples, which in view of the state of the art is to be construed to cover only the precise form claimed, and consists of a stationary staple, support, or anvil, and a reciprocating slotted or recessed hammer, or driver, is not infringed by a device in which the anvil or staple blade is movable and the recessed clinching base is fixed or stationary. Id.

52. A patent for improvement in quilting machines, in which the machine gives circular motion to goods by mechanism accomplishing result in one way, is not infringed by machine in which result is accomplished by different mechanism in different way. Dryfoos v. Wiese, 362

53. Decree dismissing suit for infringement of driven-well patent affirmed, pursuant to stipulation that it should abide result of case of Andrews v. Hovey, ante, 160. Andrews v. Cone, 564

54. Decree dismissing injunction for infringement of reissued letters patent No. 8,914, for improvement in railroad frog, affirmed on facts of case. Weir v. Morden, 645

55. Only actual damages sustained by infringement of patent are recoverable at law; but the court may inflict, as punitive damages, thrice the amount of the verdict. Tilghman v. Proctor, 664

56. But amount of actual profits made by use of infringing invention are recoverable in equity. Id.

57. Plaintiff has burden of proving such profits. Id.

58. Under Patent Act of 1870 the court in equity may increase the damages as in actions upon the case. Id.

59. Interest is not allowed on the profits until after their amount has been judicially ascertained. Id.

60. Master's report as to damages will not be set aside, unless clearly erroneous. Id.

VI. TERM.

61. Term of American patent issued after English patent runs from publication of latter; Act of 1839 is not repealed by Act of 1861. Guarantee Ins. T. & S. D. Co. v. Sellers, 153

62. Addition of new improvement does not exempt patent from operation of law on that subject. Id.

63. Rev. Stat. § 4887, does not make an American patent, not bearing the same date as a foreign patent of the same invention, invalid, but only limits its term. The Telephone Cases, 868

PAYMENT.

Money paid for accomplishment of illegal purpose and upon illegal contract cannot be recovered. White v. Barber, 243

PENALTIES. See DUTIES, III.; SHIPS AND SHIPPING.

PLEADING. See also DUTIES, 15; EQUITY, 8, 9; EVIDENCE, 14.

1. Pleadings and practice in action on common-law side of Federal circuit court are governed by State law. Henderson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 92

2. Under the practice in Louisiana, the court may consider an amendment as a mere addition to the original petition, and thus preclude the plaintiff from contesting a material fact within his own knowledge, which he had therein averred. Id.

PLEDGE.

1. Pledgor who indorsed bonds to bearer, and delivered them to pledgee for sale without notice to him, cannot claim any right under former sale against bona fide purchasers from pledgee. Lacombe v. Forstall, 255

2. Pledgor, after value of such bonds has risen, cannot in equity recover their value where he has never made tender to redeem them nor effort to reclaim them. Id.

POSTOFFICE.

1. Postmaster general need not readjust salaries of postmasters oftener than once in two years. United States v. Vilas, 329

2. But he may, in his discretion, do so oftener in special cases. Id.

3. Such readjustment can only establish salaries for two years thereafter, and cannot be made unless there are quarterly returns for two years prior thereto upon which it can be based. Id.

4. Each letter taken out of or put in post-office, to carry out fraudulent scheme contrary to U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5480, is distinct violation thereof. Re Henry, 174

5. Three distinct offenses committed within same six months may be joined in same indictment; and, when joined, there is to be single sentence for all. Id.

POWERS. See PRINCIPAL AND AGENT, 1, 2.

PRACTICE. See APPEAL AND ERROR; CASES CERTIFIED; JUDGMENT; PLEADING; REFERENCE; REMOVAL OF CAUSE; REVIEW; TRIAL.

PRESCRIPTION. See MORTGAGE, 1, 2.

PRESUMPTIONS. See EVIDENCE, I.; FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE, 2, 4; INTOXICATING LIQUORS, 5.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

1. Where agent employed by State fund commissioners to prosecute claims against United States was to receive certain commissions on amount collected for his services and expenses, the agency was revocable by the State at its will, by an Act repealing the Act under which he was employed. Missouri v. Walker, 769

2. The interest coupled with a power, to make it irrevocable, must be an interest in the thing itself, and not that which is to be produced by the exercise of the power. Id.

3. Agents assuming duty of recovering back excess of duties paid on importation of goods for principal are liable to him therefor, by failure to bring action until barred by statute. Bowerman v. Rogers, 815

4. Agent of person engaged in perpetrating fraud upon railroad company by appropriating bonds issued by it to his own use can acquire no lien thereon on account of his services as agent, where his principal had no title against company. Trask v. Jacksonville, P. & M. R. Co. 521

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY. See also REPLEVIN.

1. Surety of railroad company on injunction bond given to protect its rolling stock from execution sale is entitled to indemnity from receiver of property on mortgage foreclosure. Union Trust Co. v. Morrison, 825

2. He is entitled, upon paying judgment against him on the bond, to be reimbursed out of the property of the company, prior to a mortgage given thereon. Id.

3. Bondholders purchasing the railroad on foreclosure sale, subject to the lien of all claims then pending against it, were bound to take notice of the surety's claim for indemnity, and the property in their hands is subject to it. Id.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS. See PUBLIC LANDS, passim.

PUBLIC LANDS. See also COURT OF CLAIMS, 1; EVIDENCE, 1, 8–11, 13, 15–17; TAXES, 7.

1. Grants of land by a government de facto are invalid as against the goverment de jure. Coffee v. Groover, 51

2. Where grants by either of two States are found, upon adjustment of disputed boundary between the States, to be within the other's terrritory, they are void unless confirmed by latter State; such confirmation cannot affect titles to same lands previously granted by latter State itself. Id.

3. Act of Congress of 1876, chap. 246, providing that, before any land granted to any railroad company by the United States shall be conveyed to it, unless it is exempted by law from payment of costs, there shall first be paid into Federal treasury cost of survey of land by company, applies to all lands theretofore granted to any company by the United States, and to the cost of surveying such land, whether previously conveyed or not. New Orleans Pac. R. Co. v. United States, 888

4. On failure of company to complete its road within time limited, Congress has power to impose new condition upon which right to conveyance could be earned in future. Id.

5. Until cost of survey as provided by Act is paid, equitable title of company is incomplete. Id.

6. Land covered by a Mexican grant is not public land, within the meaning of the Acts of Congress making grants to railroads, but was reserved from the granting clause of those statutes. Doolan v. Carr, 844

7. To the extent of such claims, when the grant was for land with specific boundaries or known by a particular name, and also to the extent of the quantity named within outboundaries containing a greater area, Mexican claims are excluded from the grant to the railroad company. Id.

8. Under Donation Act of Oregon, notice to surveyor general of claim of settler may be given after his death by his widow, where public survey was not made during his life. Brasee v. Schofield, 484

9. Where settlement has been joint by husband and wife, benefit of donation should be secured, in case of death of either, to his or her heirs. Id.

10. One deriving title through conveyances of deceased settler, through patent, is estopped from setting up that requirements of Donation Act were not complied with, or that widow and children were not entitled to the land under the Act. Id.

11. Third parties cannot complain that surveyor general has carried out a division agreed upon by the widow and heirs themselves. Id.

12. Under Federal Act of July 7, 1838, § 2, forbidding issuance of patent upon Virginia military warrants where survey is excessive, applicant's right is merely to withdraw survey and resurvey location, excluding such surplus quantity. Doan v. Flagg, 107

13. The proviso in the Act of March 23, 1807, does not make excessive surveys binding on the government so as to entitle the holder of the warrant to a patent for the whole or part of the survey. Id.

14. The Act of May 20, 1826, § 2, is limited to cases provided for by the preceding section, and ceased to operate after the dates therein mentioned. Id.

15. The Act of February 18, 1871, grants to Ohio all the lands in the Virginia military district which had not, at that time, been legally surveyed and sold by the United States. Id.

16. The Act of May 27, 1880, § 4, confirms and ratifies previous titles made by the Ohio Agricultural and Mechanical College, under the Act of February 18, 1871. Id.

17. It was essential to the vesting of any interest under an entry and survey within the Virginia military land district, made prior to January 1, 1852, that the survey should be returned to the commissioner of the general land office at Washington on or before that date. Id.

18. Under Federal Act of 1860, date of cession of Florida to the United States, or time of transferring possession, is point from which to test validity of Spanish land grants. United States v. De Morant, 171

19. Erection of houses, and residence, upon lands shortly after date of grant is sufficient evidence of cultivation. Id.

20. Part owner of lands claimed, or his heirs or representative, may have benefit of proceeding authorized by Act of 1860. Id.

21. Failure to annex sworn copy of government surveys to petition is matter relating merely to form of procedure. Id.

22. Original testimonios, signatures to which were identified, and English translation certified by keeper of public archives of West Florida, is sufficient evidence that alleged grants were genuine. Id.

23. Suit in equity for cancellation of approved plat, delivered by United States to alleged actual settler, for part of Las Animas grant, on ground that it was illegal, is not maintainable by one claiming undivided interest in residuum of grant remaining after satisfaction of claims of actual settlers, nor on the ground that the patent issued on such plat has cut off complainant's right of appeal from the register and receiver. Downs v. Hubbard, 114

24. Where ascertainment of actual settlers upon such grant was intrusted to register and receiver of proper land district, right of appeal from their decision is not hindered by its fraudulent character. Id.

25. Where there were no actual settlers and improvements on any of the lands, as falsely set out in the affidavits in support of pre-emption claims, it is a fraud upon the United States sufficient in equity to justify the cancellation of the patents; but it is not such fraud as prevents the passing of a legal title by the patents. Colorado Coal & Iron Co. v. United States, 182

26. Words "vein or lode of quartz, etc., known to exist," in Rev. Stat. § 2333, refer to knowledge of existence of vein or lode within boundaries of placer claim; and belief, after examination, in existence of lode, is not knowledge of fact that will prevent patent from carrying title to vein or lode. Iron Silver Mining Co. v. Reynolds, 466

27. An instruction that a patent issued upon an application which was made with intent to acquire a title to a lode or vein which may exist in the ground beneath the surface of the placer claimed, will not convey such lode or vein; and that such intention, formed on investigation and belief in the existence of a valuable lode, amounts to knowledge,—is erroneous. Id.

28. To bill in equity to cancel patents upon grounds of fraud in pre-emption claims, defense of bona fide purchaser for value without notice is perfect. Colorado Coal & Iron Co. v. United States, 183

29. Burden of producing proofs overthrowing presumption in favor of bona fide purchaser is upon government. Id.

30. To raise suspicion of fraud of own officers does not justify government in casting upon defendant burden of establishing his title. Id.

31. To constitute exemption contemplated by Pre-emption Acts under head of "known mines," there should be ascertained coal deposits of such extent as to make land more valuable as coal mine than for agricultural purposes. Id.

32. New discoveries, after sale, by which land becomes profitable to work as mine, cannot affect title as it passed at time of sale. Id.

33. Government documents are not evidence of title as against parties claiming pre-existing, adverse, and paramount title. Sabariego v. Maverick, 430

34. Prior possession entitles plaintiff to recover as against mere intruder, but it must appear it has been continuous. Id.

35. Action to recover prior possession must be brought within reasonable time after its loss. Id.

36. Prior possession will be deemed abandoned by delay in bringing action, unless satisfactorily explained. Id.

37. Holder of legal title in bad faith must yield to one who had prior right from United States, in force when his possession was made under which his patent issued. Widdicombe v. Childers, 427

38. Where purchaser had for thirty-five years been in possession of southwest quarter, instead of southeast quarter, through error of land register, a third party securing patent vesting title in himself, with knowledge of purchaser's rights, is purchaser in bad faith, and equity will charge him as trustee. Id.

39. United States may sue to set aside patent for land obtained by fraud or mistake, but only when the government has an interest of its own to protect, or when fraud has been practiced on it to its prejudice, or it is under obligation to some individual to make his title good by setting aside the fraudulent patent, or its duty to the public requires such action. United States v. San Jacinto Tin Co. 747

40. When a suit is brought to benefit one of two claimants to land, the government has no interest in the matter, and the suit must fail. Id.

41. The initiation and control of such a suit lies with the attorney general. Id.

42. The testimony on which it is proposed to set aside a patent for fraud must be clear, unequivocal, and convincing. Id.

43. The fact that the survey on which the patent issued was contested at every step by the interested parties, and was finally decided, after six months' consideration, by the secretary of the interior affirming the decision of the land office,—affords strong evidence of its correctness and honesty. Id.

44. Act of Congress of July 1, 1864, to settle titles in California, conveyed to city of San Francisco lands within its corporate limits for purposes specified in ordinances of city ratified by State Act of March 11, 1858. Clark v. San Francisco, 553

45. Two squares designated in report of commissioners, approved by supervisors in 1856, were dedicated to public use. Id.

46. Lands so dedicated could not lawfully be conveyed by the city to private parties; and therefore conveyance to the city by Act of Congress did not enure to benefit of a prior grantee of the city. Id.

47. City ordinance No. 822, passed in 1855, for quieting land titles in city, granted only such titles as city was permitted by Congress and State to convey. Id.

48. Citizens of Mexico never lost the right of disposing of their Texas lands by the division of the empire. Williams v. Conger, 778

RAILROAD COMPANIES. See also BONDS, 1–4, 6–9; CARRIERS, 8–10; CORPORATIONS, 1; FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE, 6, 7; INTERNAL REVENUE, 1; MASTER AND SERVANT; MORTGAGE, 3–6; PRINCIPAL AND SURETY; RECEIVER.

1. Land grant to railroad, on condition that it should revert to grantor upon nonuse for railroad purposes, contains no covenant that railroad will build its road through land, or continue there. Hoard v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 130

2. If there was such covenant, plaintiff's remedy, where route has been changed before being built or abandoned afterward, is by action at law for damages. Id.

3. Purchasers at foreclosure sale are not obliged to perform obligations or pay debts of company defendant. Id.

4. Mortgage securities, upon which current earnings of insolvent railroad company are applied before current expenses are paid, are chargeable in equity with restoration of fund so misapplied. St. Louis & T. H. R. Co. v. Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. 882

5. Lessee of railroad, not being in default of rent, may appropriate surplus of its gross earnings to payment of interest on bonds or for additional equipment of its road; and need not accumulate a fund to meet possible contingencies in the future in respect to rent. Id.

6. Where lessee applies earnings of road on mortgage bonds, leaving rent unpaid, equity of lessor, if it exists, is against holder of such first mortgage bonds, and not against proceeds on foreclosure sale of railroad. Id.

7. Lessor actually receiving, in payment of rent, more than entire earnings of the property, has no equitable ground for payment of the amount due for rent out of the fund arising from foreclosure sale, in preference to prior mortgagees. Id.

RECEIPT.

Agreement in receipt is as conclusive as any other paper executed between parties; but mere receipt is subject to explanation. Davison v. Davis, 635

RECEIVER. See also BANKS, 2; EQUITY, 4, 5.

1. Appointment of a receiver in the case of railroad companies is a matter of discretion. Sage v. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. 694

2. Where such appointment is in the power of the court, the order appointing him is not a nullity. Id.

3. Where a railroad company did not object at the appointment of a receiver that an execution was not sued out and returned nulla bona before the suit was commenced, that point may afterwards be disregarded. Id.

RECORD. See APPEAL AND ERROR, IV.

REFERENCE. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 82, 83.

Under common-law reference, court cannot modify or vary referee's report as to matters of fact; and if report be set aside, cause stands for trial as if it had never been referred. Dundee Mort. & T. I. Co. v. Hughes, 357

REHEARING. See APPEAL AND ERROR, VI.

RELEASE AND DISCHARGE. See EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS, 3–6.

REMOVAL OF CAUSE.

1. Condemnation proceeding is suit at law within Federal Constitution and Laws; and party may have it removed to Federal court on ground of citizenship. Searl v. School District, 415

2. Petition for removal must be filed at or before term at which cause could be first tried in State court. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Burns, 333

3. Where cause is removed from State court of one county to that of another county, removal to Federal court is too late unless petition was filed at or before term at which cause could be tried in former county. Id.

4. Federal supreme court cannot issue mandamus to circuit court, to set aside order to remand suit removed from State court, on ground that at time of hearing court did not have complaint before it. Ex parte Sherman, 423

5. Since Federal Act of March 3, 1887, no appeal or writ of error lies to Federal supreme court, under Act of 1875, from order remanding suit to State court. Wilkinson v. Nebraska, 152

6. Under Act of 1887, an order of circuit court remanding suit is not appealable. Morey v. Lockhart, 68

7. Nor can such order be reviewed on a certificate of division under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 698. Id.

8. The prohibitions against appeal and writs of error in the Act of 1887 apply to removals for other causes as well as for prejudice or local influence. Id.

9. Federal supreme court cannot review order of circuit court remanding suit, made while Act of 1875 was in force, where writ of error was not brought until after passage of Act of 1887. Sherman v. Grinnell, 278

REPLEVIN. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 36.

1. In action on replevin bond, conditioned for payment of damages and for return of goods in same condition as when taken, defendant, if he succeeds in action and goods are not returned, may recover their value when taken and interest thereon. Washington Ice Co. v. Webster, 799

2. Obligors in bond are liable for value, at time when taken, of part of goods not returned, and for depreciation in value of part not returned in good condition. Id.

3. Sureties must pay damages recovered against plaintiff in replevin action, in case he has not paid them. Id.

4. It makes no difference that part of such interest recoverable by defendant is allowed in replevin suit and part in suit on bond, so long as there is no duplication. Id.

5. In action on bond, defendant may show value of property to be greater than named in bond or writ. Id.

6. The finding of the jury of the value of the goods replevied, where judgment has been entered thereon, is conclusive upon the parties and also on those who became sureties upon the bond to abide its event. Id.

RES JUDICATA. See JUDGMENT, 8–11.

REVENUE. See DUTIES; INTERNAL REVENUE; TAXES.

REVIEW.

On bill of review, nothing avails for reversal of decree but errors of law apparent on record. Willamette Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 629

RIPARIAN RIGHTS. See WATERS AND WATERCOURSES.

SALE. See also CONTRACT, 5, 6, 8; DAMAGES, 3; EQUITY, 6; FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE, 1–5; FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

1. Receipt in words "said note is given me for purchase of 379 shares of stock now held by me, and to be delivered upon payment of his note to said D," is conditional sale. Davison v. Davis, 635

2. Only equitable relief applicable is bill for relief from condition, or for specific performance; and both of these remedies are lost by laches. Id.

3. Where, during delay of several years, stock has increased in value, specific performance will be denied. Id.

SALVAGE.

1. To bar a meritorious claim for salvage by special contract, it is necessary to plead and prove a binding contract to pay whether the property be lost or saved. Potomac Steamboat Co. v. Baker Salvage Co. 75

2. A binding contract of that character is not proved by a loose conversation between the respective parties after the salvage service had been partly rendered. Id.

3. An agreement to arbitrate in case of non-agreement does not bar action for salvage brought in ordinary way in admiralty division. Id.

4. The supreme court should not reduce the amount awarded, if it can be justified on any reasonable view of the case. Id.

SAVINGS BANKS. See BANKS, 1.

SEQUESTRATION. See BONDS, 2.

SETTLEMENT. See also OFFICE AND OFFICER, 2.

Where in settlement of account plaintiff was allowed claim for shortage, made in good faith, in absence of fraud, defendant cannot have account reopened. Roberts v. Benjamin, 334

SHIPS AND SHIPPING. See also COLLISION; SALVAGE.

1. Fine imposed upon master of vessel for carrying too many passengers, by Rev. Stat. § 4253, is, by § 4270, lien upon vessel, recoverable by proceeding in rem. United States v. The Strathairly, 580

2. Rev. Stat. § 4264, amended by Act of February 27, 1887, subjects steam vessels to penalties included in § 4255, as one of several sections of chapter relating to space in vessels appropriated to use of passengers. Id.

3. Rev. Stat. § 4266, requiring master of vessel to furnish list of passengers to collector of district in which vessel arrives does not apply to steam vessel; and penalty for its violation is not chargeable as lien on vessel. Id.

4. Penalty recoverable against vessel is limited to amount adjudged as penalty by way of fine against master, and payment on part of either is satisfaction of whole. Id.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE. See COURTS, 2, 3; SALE, 2, 3; STATE AND STATE OFFICERS, 1.

STATE AND STATE OFFICERS. See also BONDS, 1–4; BOUNDARIES; HUSBAND AND WIFE, 5–7; TAXES, I.; WATERS AND WATERCOURSES, 1–4.

1. There is no remedy by suit against State itself for breach of its contract; and bill object of which is by injunction indirectly to compel specific performance of contract, by forbidding those acts which constitute breaches, is suit against State. Ex parte Ayers, 316

2. In such case, though State be not nominally a party on record, if defendants are its officers, suit is still one against State. Id.

3. Suits will lie against individual defendants who, under color of authority of unconstitutional State legislation, are guilty of personal trespasses and wrongs, and against officers, as such, where such suits are authorized by law, and act to be done or omitted is purely ministerial. Id.

4. A suit by alien to enjoin Virginia from bringing suit to enforce collection of taxes for payment of which coupons, originally attached to its bonds, had been tendered, is within prohibition of Eleventh Amendment. Id.

5. Orders in such suit adjudging officers of Commonwealth in contempt for bringing suit in violation of order of same court forbidding them, are void; and imprisonment under such orders is without authority of law and prisoners will be discharged by habeas corpus. Id.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS. See FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS. See LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

STATUTES. See also ACTION OR SUIT, 1; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Question regarding construction of statute of United States concerning patents is not judicially settled until determined by United States Supreme Court. Andrews v. Hovey, 557

2. Contemporaneous construction of statute by those charged with its execution should not be disregarded, except for cogent reasons. United States v. Johnston, 389

3. Statute granting a privilege is construed most strongly against the grantee. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Missouri River Packet Co. 731

STAY OF PROCEEDINGS. See COURTS, 8; EXECUTION, 1.

SUBROGATION. See also BONDS, 6.

1. Mere volunteer in paying debt of another person is not entitled to subrogation. Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Middleport, 537

2. Subrogation in equity requires that the person to be benefited has paid an obligation to a third party, constituting a superior lien or claim, to save himself from loss. Id.

SUNDAY. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 12.

An act done must be itself a charitable act, to constitute it such an act of charity as is exempt from Massachusetts Sunday Law. Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co. 795

SUPERSEDEAS. See APPEAL AND ERROR, 56, 57.

SURVEY. See also EVIDENCE, 1, 21.

In Pennsylvania surveys are to be located together as a block or one large tract; and all the lines and the corners marked upon any part of the block belong to each tract of which it is composed. Clement v. Packer, 721

TAXES.

I. IN GENERAL; POWER OF STATES.

II. ASSESSMENT; COLLECTION; SALE.

See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 31–35; COMMERCE, 1; FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE, 14; INJUNCTION; INTERNAL REVENUE.

I. IN GENERAL; POWER OF STATES.

1. The unpaid balance of the direct tax apportioned to a State by the Act of 1861 is not a debt of the State. United States v. Louisiana, 69; United States v. Alabama, 73; United States v. Mississippi, 73

2. Act of Congress of July 24, 1866, Rev. Stat. §§ 5253–5269, giving telegraph companies the right to run lines over public domain, does not exempt them from ordinary burdens of taxation. Western U. Tel. Co. v. Massachusetts, 790

3. Telegraph companies, receiving benefit of State laws for protection of their property and rights, are liable to be taxed upon their real or personal property as any person would be. Id.

4. Government agencies are only exempt from State taxation so far as it interferes with their efficiency in performing functions by which they serve government. Id.

5. Tax, although nominally upon shares of stock of telegraph company, is a tax upon it on account of property used by it in the State, where the proportion of the length of its lines in the State to their entire length is the basis for ascertaining the value of the property; and is not forbidden by commercial clause of Constitution. Id.

6. United States Supreme Court will not hold tax void because it might have adopted different rule for ascertaining taxable value, provided rule adopted is not unfair or unjust. Id.

7. There was nothing in Act admitting Iowa which interfered with power of State to tax lands as soon as they ceased to be Federal property. Stryker v. Crane, 194

8. Act of Congress concerning tax on national bank shares does not require perfect equality of taxation between State and national banks, but only that national bank share shall not be taxable at higher rate than other moneyed capital in hands of individuals. Davenport Nat. Bank v. Board of Equalization, 94

9. Deposits in savings bank are not within meaning of Act of Congress in such sense as to require that, because they are exempted, national bank shares must also be exempted. Id.

10. Within the limits that State taxation shall not discriminate unfavorably to the holder of national bank stock, the manner of assessing and collecting State taxes is uncontrolled by the Act of Congress. Id.

11. Exemption of deposits in savings bank from State taxation does not affect rule for taxation of national bank shares, provided they are taxed at a rate no greater than moneyed capital in the hands of individuals otherwise subject to taxation. National Bank of Redemption v. Boston, 689

12. The Massachusetts law permits the taxation of shares of a national bank, owned by another national bank, on the same footing with all other shares. Id.

II. ASSESSMENT; COLLECTION; SALE.

13. Where a hearing is given by the Taxing Act as to apportionment among landowners, such hearing is sufficient, and the Act in that respect is constitutional. Spencer v. Merchant, 768

14. New assessment made by State Legislature, including interest upon unpaid part of old assessment and part of expenses of levying it, is valid. Id.

15. In an action by the United States against a railroad company for unpaid taxes, under Federal Act of June 30, 1864, amended by Act of June 13, 1866, assessment is not required, or, if made, conclusive upon either party. United States v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 188

16. In action to set aside, as void, tax deed made upon sale of lands of nonresident owner, which were assessed at higher rate than lands of resident owner, there was not sufficient evidence of any purpose to discriminate against such nonresident owner. Besson v. Johns, 860

17. Where question relates to action of assessor, or of township board of equalization, which does not profess to be carried on with any purpose of making any such discrimination, mere errors in assessment should be corrected in proceedings, as provided by statute, before sale is made. Id.

18. By Iowa statute, if tax deed is invalid, lien is only interest in land that purchaser at sale acquires. Hefner v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 809

19. If deed is valid, it extinguishes all prior titles and incumbrances of private persons and all equities arising out of them. Id.

20. Where title in land was in mortgagor at date of mortgage, and tax title was subsequent in time, although paramount in right, to title acquired under mortgage foreclosure, upon foreclosure of mortgage in equity the court could determine validity of tax title; and owner of such title was a proper, if not necessary, party to foreclosure. Id.

21. Decree against owner of tax title, adjudging that he has no valid title, estops him from setting up such title in subsequent action. Id.

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES. See DAMAGES, 2; INJUNCTION; TAXES, 2–6.

TREATIES. See also HABEAS CORPUS, 2, 4.

1. Ninth article of Dominican Treaty, that duty on importation of products of that country shall be no higher than that on like articles from other foreign countries, was not designed to prevent special concessions touching importation of specific articles into this country from another foreign country. Whitney v. Robertson, 886; Kelly v. Hedden, 889

2. For infraction of provisions of treaty, remedy must be sought by injured party through reclamations upon the other; whether complaining nation has just cause of complaint is not matter for judicial cognizance. Id.

3. So far as a treaty can be made subject of a judicial cognizance in courts of this country, it is subject to such Acts as Congress may pass for its enforcement, modification, or repeal. Id.

4. By Federal Constitution a treaty is made of like obligation as an Act of Legislature. Id.

5. Validity of a law, clear in its provisions, cannot be assailed before courts for want of conformity with stipulations of previous treaty not already executed. Id.

TRIAL. See also EQUITY, 10, 12; FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE, 1, 11, 12; FRAUDS, STATUTE OF, 1, 2; INSURANCE, 3; JURY; NONSUIT; PATENTS, 86.

1. Court may give to jury its opinion on weight of evidence. Williams v. Conger, 778

2. On trial in Federal court, judge may give opinion upon questions of fact, provided questions are submitted to jury. United States v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 188

3. An instruction the tendency of which is to withdraw from the consideration of the jury a considerable amount of important and pertinent testimony is error. Clement v. Packer, 721

4. Circuit court may direct verdict for plaintiff upon evidence, where it is clear he is entitled to recovery. North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 287

5. Where there is evidence for plaintiff sufficient to go to jury, it is error to direct verdict for defendant. Humiston v. Wood, 354

6. Whether sale of goods is fraudulent as against plaintiff is either question of fact, or of mixed law and fact. Jewell v. Knight, 190

7. Whether it was contributory negligence for a servant, with knowledge of the unfitness of an engineer, to work with him, is a question for the jury. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Mares, 296

8. Omission of word "dollars" in verdict is not such defect as prevents rendering of judgment according to intent of jury. Hopkins v. Orr, 528

TRUSTS.

1. In action to set aside trust deed for fraud, cestui que trust need not be joined. Vetterlein v. Barnes, 400

2. Whatever binds the trustee in any legal proceeding which he begins and carries on in good faith to enforce a trust, to which the cestuis que trust are not actual parties, binds them. Richter v. Jerome, 182

UNITED STATES. See ACTION OR SUIT, 2; CLAIMS; EMINENT DOMAIN, 1–4.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

1. Vendor not making any positive representations as to quantity of land, or any statements intended to deceive purchaser, is not liable for deficiency in quantity of land sold. Lawson v. Floyd, 847

2. Continued payments upon land after purchaser had opportunity to discover deficiency in quantity afford presumption that vendor did not intend to warrant quantity. Id.

3. In contract for sale of land, words "about 1,000 acres," and in subsequent contract of compromise, words "estimated to contain 1,000 acres," are to be construed with reference to circumstances surrounding parties which would probably influence them in making contract. Id.

4. Where contract was for exchange of lands, some of which were incumbered by judgment liens, without agreed price per acre, it will not be construed so strictly as regards quantity as if it were an independent purchase to be paid for in money. Id.

WAGER. See CONTRACT, 1, 2.

WAIVER. See APPEAL AND ERROR, 52, 79, 80; DUTIES, 16; EMINENT DOMAIN, 3, 4; NONSUIT.

WATERS AND WATERCOURSES. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 37; BRIDGES; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 1, 7.

1. Under New Jersey Riparian Laws, lands below highwater mark of navigable waters belong to State. Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 543

2. State may either sell or convey its title to riparian owner or his assigns, or to stranger who, succeeding to its title, has no relation to adjacent riparian owner, except that of common boundary. Id.

3. New Jersey grants of such lands are of the estate in the lands, and transfer or extinguish every previous right of the State therein, except such sovereign right as it may lawfully exercise over other private property. Id.

4. Grantees from the State have exclusive possession of premises against adverse claim of municipality to easement over them by virtue of dedication of streets to highwater mark by proprietor of premises. Id.

5. Obstructions in navigable streams within States are indictable as offenses against its laws, but not as against United States laws which do not exist. Willamette Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 629

6. Congress is not deemed to have assumed police power over navigable river in consequence of expenditures in improving its navigation. Id.

7. Erection of bridge over Willamette River at Portland is not violation of Admission Act of Oregon. Id.

WILL.

1. Where third clause of will gave testator's wife income of estate, and fourth clause provided that his two sisters, if living at death of himself and wife, should have such income during life and at their death it should be divided between three named charitable societies,—widow takes estate for life, with estate over for life to the others, contingent upon one of them surviving widow, with ultimate remainder to charitable societies. Robison v. Female Orphan Asylum, 293

2. Death of sisters before testator did not cause bequests to societies never to take effect, or give wife estate absolutely. Id.

3. If property be limited upon death of one person, to another, and first donee happened to predecease testator, gift over will take effect, notwithstanding failure, by lapse, of prior gift. Id.

WITNESS.

Defendant, a witness in his own behalf, is bound to submit to a cross-examination, the extent of which is a question of State law as administered in State courts. Ex parte Spies, 80